Sibelius is a most interesting figure in contemporary music. He is a master musician and a man of very unusual imagination. He is a follower of none of the schools of today. True, he casts his early symphonies in the classic form, but the material which he uses and the manner in which he treats it are entirely his own. He is not a slave to the folk-music of his country, as Grieg, for example, was to the folk-music of Norway, yet in his programme music he has been influenced chiefly by the legends of Finland and in them and in his symphonies one always feels the tragic history of his nation. In this First Symphony one realizes in the music the stark, rugged contour of his native country, the stark, rugged nature of its people, and the smoldering embers of revolt which have filled Finland for over a century. It is great music, that holds the attention of the auditor from first to last.

Much sea music has been written but it is doubtful whether any composer has so caught the feeling of the sea as Wagner. Wagner undoubtedly rose to his highest point when he was translating the moods of nature into tone. The early part of his great love tragedy he is writing of a summer sea, glinting in the sunshine. In the "Flying Dutchman" Overture he has still in mind that dreadful voyage he made from Riga to London through the storms of the Baltic and North seas. The Overture, in a sense like most of his overtures and preludes, is an epitome of the entire opera which follows and through it we see the restless spirit of the Dutchman flying from the storms, offest by the serene beauty of "Das Ewig-Weibliche" as personified by Senta.

On the quaint chorale to St. Anthony, written by Haydn, Brahms has built a series of Variations which holds the attention most closely and incidentally demand the utmost virtuosity on the part of the orchestra.

The final number, the "Oberon" overture of Weber, is familiar to all concertgoers.

The programme follows:
Sibelius—Symphony No. 1 in E minor.
Wagner—Overture to the opera, "The Flying Dutchman."
Brahms—Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn, Opus 56a.
Weber—Overture to the opera, "Oberon."

m POST JAN

dress: Syracuse, N.

JAN 23 1917

PACK WIETING TO HEAR BOSTON SYMPHONISTS

Record Concert Crowd Delighted With Recital Conducted by Dr. Karl Muck.

NEUTRAL PROGRAMME GIVEN

One Number Is French; Others by Brahms and Wagner, Germans Noted for Their Musical Fued, and by Russian Borodin.

BY GEORGE L. MAC DONNELL.

IN a biting Arctic wind and falling snow more than 200 men, women and even children stood in line for nearly two hours last night waiting for the doors of the Wieting Opera House to open for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck. And such a concert was worth waiting for, even in the shadow of an iceberg. It was the most expressive orchestral recital ever heard in Syracuse.

That good music in this city is no longer considered a luxury, but a necessity, was amply demonstrated by the attendance, which in numbers, applause and reverent attention paid an honor to Syracuse and showed its appreciation for the famous orchestra from the Hub. There was not a vacant seat in the house, and the attendance was said to be the largest ever seen at a similar concert here. That the alleged economic havoc caused by the high cost of living had any affect on the attendance was not discernible and emphasizes the former statement that the best in music is demanded by Syracuse.

A Neutral Programme.

The concert programme combined a symphony and overture from two of the most illustrious German composers, Brahms and Wagner, the parties to one of the most historic musical feuds on record and which continues even to the present time between the respective adherents of the composers. And it is a coincidence in referring to this feud that it arose over the appearance of the symphony of Brahms which was the premier number on last night's programme.

The two other numbers consisted of an overture by the French composer, Berlioz, and the almost unknown Russian, Borodin. It may have been a diplomatic stroke on the part of the Teuton, Dr. Muck, so to constitute the programme, two representing the allies and two the German empire, for it would seem the proper thing in a neutral country. On the other hand, some might take exception to the placing of Brahms and Wagner on the same programme for the reason that there was trouble between them. Wagner accused Brahms of plagiarism in his symphony No. 1, which was played last night.

Plagiarism Charged.

It was charged that he stole the theme from Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. While there is a striking similarity in some harmonies of both, those who have repeatedly heard and studied each find that the theme, construction and other elements of the symphony of Brahms are divergent. Wagner was simply jealous of Brahms, just as some of the modern musicians of smaller caliber cavil over their respective qualities and knowledge. These little ones, however, can take consolation in having for their prototypes such men as Wagner and Brahms.

Dr. Muck did not come to his rostrum on the stage until nearly 8.30 o'clock. All of his 100 performers were seated. Every eye in the vast audience was strained for several minutes, waiting to see the far-famed conductor of the wonderful organization. Some of the old-time opera goers and patrons of orchestral concerts must have been disappointed in his appearance. Dressed in the most conventional manner and looking physically like the son-in-law of President Wilson, Secretary McAdoo, Dr. Muck impressed the audience as being a man with a pronounced personality expressing the great mentality behind it. He seemed like a typical American business man as the audience broke into a storm of applause.

(Concluded from Page Six.)

No Flowing Locks or Scarf.

He is clean shaven, short haired and well groomed. The old timers may have missed the long-haired conductor of the olden days who interlaced his rotund digits in a bristling pompadour and affected the poetic conceit of a flowing scarf. Slovenliness has no place to-day in art. It never did, but it almost became a custom among some of the great masters.

Dr. Muck is a conductor of the new school, but combines the best in the old. He typifies the raison d'etre for the incomparable excellence of his orchestra. From the descent of the baton every instrument becomes an integral part of one vast harmonious machine. He is the center which radiates the musical nerves which respond to his presence and whose ear is attuned to every chord, phrase and melody sounded by every individual instrument. He is a man with a message vitalized by his orchestra.

Gem of Musical Architecture.

The opening number on last night's programme, Brahms' Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68, was rendered with exquisite effects in each movement. This is regarded as one of the gems of musical architecture. It has even been styled architecture in motion, so intricate are the movements at times and so melting in its diminuendos and pianissimos. The first movement starts in an austere style and is a mine of pystique melodies that seem at first to confuse the ear, but to the initiated the movement is but a mystical prologue to the greatest harmonies that were ever brought into symphonic form.

Technicians may find loopholes for criticism in the merging of one movement into another and all such technical fault finding. They may talk of contrapuntal effects, nuances and musicianship, but it is the spirit of pedantry that makes such criticisms. To enjoy a symphony such as that of Brahms it is not necessary to take a dissecting table to the concert.

A Torrent of Harmony.

The real way to enjoy such productions is to sit and listen, become deluged with the torrent of harmony and do the dissecting afterward. It is as the beauty of some classic minster or cathedral, which must be seen as a whole to be enjoyed.

The third movement of the symphony was one of the brilliant features of last night's concert, closing with a triumphant flourish that simply electrified the audience. There were no explosive tones. The execution was marked by masterly graduations of tone, while the swells and decrescendos produced thrilling effects.

The Berlioz overture to the Corsair, Op. 2L, which has seldom if ever been heard here before, was typically a production of the master of programme music and to whom is attributed the genesis of modern orchestra instrumentation. Berlioz is considered one of the most illustrated of French composers, but his works are of the filligree kind, replete with beauty and color, and as some of his enemies claim, lack ideas or substance.

Founded on Byron's Poem.

Whether this is the case, it is certain that his overture to the Corsair, founded on Lord Byron's poem of that name, was rendered in a style that showed the work to be as full af animation, variety and color as a Parisian boulevard. It has almost an Italian tempo and, perhaps, too much of the staccato quality. But that may be justified by the theme on which the concert was constructed, for it has long been established that the rythm of Byron's poetry has always appealed more to Frenchmen and Celts than to his own fellow countrymen.

This number seemed to give an unusual pleasure to the audience, who were attracted by the tempo and the animation. It was thoroughly Berliosque. The third number, unheard of to nearly the entire audience, was an orchestral sketch entitled "On the Steppes of Middle Asia," by Borodin, a Russian. It was a charming insertion prior to the all-resounding overture of Wagner's "Flying Dutchman." It was a melange of Russian folk songs and Oriental melodies. The peasant's lute sounded far away, and soothing, and as the harmonious sounds drew closer and merged with the Asiatic melodies produced a wonderful and thrilling effect.

Wagner Number as Finale.

The concert closed with the Wagner number, which was rendered in a style that might have made Wagner himself envious. "The Flying Dutchman" is based on one of the most interesting and romantic sea legends on record. In the opening of the overture is seen in forcible style the claim that Wagnerites make for their master as the author of the "music of nature" and the "music of the future."

What the music of the future may be is as tangible just at present as is the nebular hypothesis, but that the music of nature is peculiarly Wagnerian there is no question. In the overture rendered last night there is produced by the drums, cymbals and all the instruments the loud-resounding sea as it beats on a rock-ribbed coast, the forests torn by the shrieking of the wind and a general cataclamic effect in nature. The storm fantasy becomes almost realistic as one watches the forest of boughs as they bend, rush backward and forward like mighty elms or oaks in a forest. The music, like most of Wagner's, is wild, weird and wanton at times, but always full of elegant harmony. At times it may sound chaotic, but it is the chaos of melody and consonance. Some call it the dissonance of harmony, while Wagner calls it the "cry of the mind." Wagner, probably, expressed the idea better than anybody else. The overture was a fitting close to an unusual musical evening.

That such concerts have an enlightening influence on the public must not be forgotten. The public is indebted to the Morning Musicals and the Salon Musicals for bringing such organizations as the Boston Symphony to Syracuse. It was one of the many that have come here this winter and there are more coming.

To Miss A. Kathleen King and Miss Laura Van Kuran must be given credit for their enterprise in the presentation of these concerts. Their enterprise is one of culture and refinement and makes for social security.

EVENING NEWS

Buffalo, N. Y.

JAN 20 1917

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ANNUAL BUFFALO CONCERT TUESDAY NIGHT AT MUSIC HALL

Noted Conductor of Community Singing at Hutchinson High School Saturday Night, January 27—Solo Quartet for Elijah Performance at May Festival—Cleveland Organist at Free Organ Concert—Damrosch to Play Lenore Raff Symphony at February Concert—Henry Zeintz and William Walsh Give Tomorrow's Recital at South Park High School—Shattuck-Glenn Concert at Twentieth Century Club January 30—Church Choir Music—Ratan Devi Sings Thursday Afternoon Next at Twentieth Century Club.

The annual concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra wil be given in Elmwood Music hall next Tuesday evening, January 23, at 8:15. This is the third of the very interesting series of subscription concerts which Mrs. Mai Davis Smith arranged for the current season. Since October, 1905, when the orchestra returned after an absence of 12 years, it has been an annual visitor in this city and its coming (which almost goes without saying) is always welcome. Whatever may be the character of a series of concerts, when one is by the Boston Symphony orchestra that must always make the climax, for with this wonderful organization one reaches the perfection of ensemble playing, which in the end is the highest point attainable in music.

The orchestra gives in Buffalo the second concert of its annual Western trip this year, the other cities visited being Syracuse, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Ann Arbor and Detroit. It brings its entire personnel and, of course, its great conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, will come with it.

The program is one which should give great pleasure to the patrons of the concerts. It comprises the First Symphony in E Minor of the Finnish composor, Sibelius; Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"; Brahms' variations on a theme by Haydn, and Weber's "Oberon" overture.

Sibelius is a most interesting figure in contemporary music. He is a master musician and a man of very unusual imagination. He is a follower of none of the schools of today. True, he casts his early symphonies in the classic form, but the material which he uses and the manner in which he treats it are entirely his own. Like all musicians who come from the far north of Europe, his music reflects to a certain degree the characteristics of his land and his people.

Much sea music has been written but it is doubtful whether any composer has so caught the feeling of the sea as Wagner. Wagner undoubtedly rose to his highest point when he was translating the moods of Nature into tone. So far as sea music is concerned one has only to recall the opening act of "Tristan and Isolde" and the overture to "The Flying Dutchman." The early part of his great love tragedy he is writing of a summer sea, glinting in the sunshine. In the "Flying Dutchman" overture he has still in mind that dreadful voyage he made from Riga to London through the storms of the Baltic and North seas. The overture, in a sense, like most of his overtures, and preludes, is an epitome of the entire opera which follows and through it we see the restless spirit of the Dutchman flying from the storms, offset by the serene beauty of "Das Ewig-Weibliche" as personified by Senta.

Ordinarily variations are used to display the learning of musical pedants and have as little interest as such music naturally might have. The great exception to the rule was Brahms who delighted in this form of composition and succeeded in it as no other composer has. On the quaint Chorale of St. Anthony written by Haydn, Brahms has built a series of variations which hold the attention most closely and incidentally demand the utmost virtuosity on the part of the orchestra.

The final number, the "Oberon" overture of Weber, is familiar to all concert-goers. It is one of the three great overtures written by this genius which are among the most precious legacies of the past.

The program in its entirety is as follows:

Sibelius. Symphony No. 1 in E-Minor
Wagner. Overture to the opera, "The Flying Dutchman"
Brahms. Variations on a theme by Josef Haydn, Opus 56a.
Weber, Overture ... era, "Oberon"

m GAZETTE TIMES

dress: Pittsburg, Pa.

e ... 1917

Orchestra Treats in Store.

The annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 players, January 24, will mark the close of the fourth season of Ellis Concerts in Carnegie Music Hall. Again on January 29 and 30, the Philadelphia Orchestra under Conductor Leopold Stokowski will give the third pair of concerts in the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association series. A concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is always an unusual treat, and the program announced here for the first time, promises even greater pleasure than any previous visit during the past three seasons. The works to be performed represent five of the most favorite composers. They follow:

Sibelius..Symphony No. 1, in E minor, Op. 39
Beethoven .....
Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84
Brahms ..... Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn, Op. 56
Debussy.....Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune—(The Afternoon of a Faun)
Chabrier..."Espana," Rhapsody for Orchestra

Heinrich Warnke.
First Cellist with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

EXPRESS

ess: Buffalo, N. Y.

JAN 20

Boston Symphony Orchestra's seat sale opens this morning

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in Buffalo next Tuesday night, giving the third in Mrs. Mai Davis Smith's annual series of six concerts in the Elmwood Music hall. The seat sale opens this morning at Denton, Cottier & Daniels.

In many respects the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the most notable event in the subscription series, for it brings to Buffalo the complete orchestra, the greatest symphonic organization in America and one of the greatest in the world.

Leaving Boston next Sunday night, the orchestra will start its midwinter tour, giving the second concert of this tour in Buffalo. Dr. Muck will conduct. From Buffalo the orchestra will go to Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Detroit and other cities farther west.

Jou

JAN 20 1917

ess: Syracuse, N. Y.

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The eagerly expected concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes next Monday evening at the Wieting. One of the largest and most brilliant audiences of the season will greet these "gentlemen from Boston," as the New York critics are fond of calling the orchestra. The orchestra is leaving Boston to-morrow (Sunday) night, arriving here Monday morning. It will spend the night here and the next day go on to Buffalo for its concert on Tuesday night. As is the custom on all its tours the orchestra is bringing its entire personnel and there will be 108 in the party, which arrives by special train. This includes the musicians, Dr. Muck and the members of the administrative staff. The orchestra was last heard here in January, 1914, and Syracuse is getting its concert this year in the regular order for the schedule of the orchestra calls for a visit to this city once every three years. The program which Dr. Muck has arranged is decidedly a tribute to the musical perception of this city. At the particular request of a great many of the musicians here he is including the First Symphony of Brahms, that in C minor, which Hans von Buelow once called 'The Tenth Symphony," as though it were (as it is) the true successor to the immortal nine of Beethoven. It is quite the greatest contribution to symphonic literature since Beethoven wrote his Ninth Symphony, and has won its way into the esteem of musicians as one of the immortal master works of the world.

so
Or Su

COURIER

ss ..... Buffalo, N. Y.

JAN 21

The third in the series of subscription concerts under the management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith will beg vine in the Elmwood Music hall on Tuesday evening of this week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This is the twelfth consecutive season that Boston's great orchestra has been an annual visitor to this city. It has appeared in that time under three conductors, Gericke once, Fiedler four times, and this is Dr. Muck's seventh visit. Thus largely due to the enterprise of Mrs. Smith Buffalo is enabled each year to keep in touch with the best that music offers in this country.

The programme is one which should give great pleasure to the patrons of the concerts. It comprises the first Symphony in E minor of the Finnish composer, Sibelius; Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"; Brahams's Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and Weber's "Oberon" Overture.

Sibelius is a most interesting figure in contemporary music. He is a master musician and a man of very unusual imagination. He is a follower of none of the schools of today. True, he casts his early symphonies in the classic form, but the material which he uses and the manner in which he treats it are entirely his own. He is not a slave to the folk-music of his country, as Grieg, for example, was to the folk-music of Norway, yet in his programme music he has been influenced chiefly by the legends of Finland and in them and in his symphonies one always feels the tragic history of his nation. In this First Symphony one realizes in the music the stark, rugged contour of his native country, the stark, rugged nature of its people, and the smoldering embers of revolt which have filled Finland for over a century. It is great music, that holds the attention of the auditor from first to last.

Much sea music has been written but it is doubtful whether any composer has so caught the feeling of the sea as Wagner. Wagner undoubtedly rose to his highest point when he was translating the moods of nature into tone. The early part of his great love tragedy he is writing of a summer sea, glinting in the sunshine. In the "Flying Dutchman" Overture he has still in mind that dreadful voyage he made from Riga to London through the storms of the Baltic and North seas. The Overture, in a sense like most of his overtures and preludes, is an epitome of the entire opera which follows and through it we see the restless spirit of the Dutchman flying from the storms, offset by the serene beauty of "Das Ewig-Weibliche" personified by Senta.

...n the quaint chorale to St. Anthony, ...ten by Haydn, Brahms has built a ...s of Variations which holds the at... most closely and incidentally de... the utmost virtuosity on the part of ...hestra.

...al number, the "Oberon" overture ..., is familiar to all concertgoers. ...gramme follows:

...ymphony No. 1 in E minor.
...verture to the opera, "The Fly...man."
...riations on a Theme by Josef ...us 56a.
...ture to the opera, "Oberon."

TIMES
ess: New York City
JAN 2 1917

THE PHILHARMONIC AGAIN.

Daniel Gregory Mason Asks if Old Ideals Have Been Maintained.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The celebration during the past week of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Philharmonic Society of New York, the oldest orchestra in the country, brings up questions as to the opportunities and duties of such an organization which cannot without grave danger to our musical life be ignored. The President of the society, Oswald Garrison Villard, by statements in his address at the jubilee concert of Jan. 11 challenged the large body of discriminating music-lovers who feel that the society has in recent years lamentably failed to maintain its ancient standard to express themselves. "Whether profits came or not," he said, the Philharmonic Society "had kept the faith. It had "maintained high artistic standards." It was "the most dignified musical organization in the American metropolis."

Unfortunately these statements do not seem to be borne out by the practice of the society in the last few years; its policy has only too evidently considered the profits unduly, or short-sightedly its artistic standards have been lowered and its dignity has in consequence seriously suffered. Even in cities as large as New York, where the minority of real music-lovers is numerous enough to support organizations which aim at only the best, (as is shown by the success for instance, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and of the Flonzaley and Kneisel Quartet,) the great majority quite naturally prefer the non-musical aspects of music such as the physical power of fascination of great or subtly varied volumes of tone, the interest of novelty or oddity, or the satisfaction of curiosity as to the personalities of soloists, &c. What may be called the box-office view of music, therefore, tends to cultivate these things at the expense of music itself. To what extent the recent policies of the Philharmonic have been guided by this view I should not presume to say, but the following facts seem to me as indicative as they are undeniable.

First, the music chosen for performance is that which appeals rather by rich modern sonorities (Wagner, Liszt, Strauss) or by dramatic effect verging on sensationalism (Strauss, Tschaikowsky) or by mere prettiness (Delibes) than that which nourishes and delights the sense of beauty. Thus, in the first thirteen concerts of the present season we find sixteen works of Wagner, eight of Tschaikowsky, four of Liszt, three or Strauss, against only four of Beethoven, one of Schubert, two of Schumann, and none of Bach, Haydn, or Mozart, nor of Brahms or Franck.

It may be answered that this strange choice (a fair sample of that of preceding years) was to some extent dictated by the will of Joseph Pulitzer, which, in making the society a large bequest, asked that recognition be given his favorite composers, Beethoven, Wagner, and Liszt, and that the programs should not be "too severely classical." But in the first place, without stopping to consider how the society could square the acceptance of a gift on these terms with the statements officially made by its President, we may note that it is not to Beethoven, but only to Wagner and Liszt, that such disproportionate representation is given, as if the appeal of sonority to the crowd had something to do with it. And what curiously corroborates this view is that when classic works make their infrequent appearances they sometimes seem to be chosen for reasons other than their beauty. Of the two pieces of Schumann mentioned above, for example, one was the overture "Julius Caesar," written in the time of its composer's mental collapse, and apparently selected solely for its novelty, without regard to the good reason for the neglect which makes it novel. But indeed, the search for novelty will go to strange lengths, as in these programs, where we find an overture by Volkmann, some pretty ballet music by Delibes, and even a symphony by Gade—and no Brahms! Mr. Villard in his remarks compared the Philharmonic Society to the Metropolitan Museum of Art and to the Public Library. How would he like to see the Watteaus crowd out the Titians, or give up to Rogers, Austin Dobson, and Tupper the shelf space of Wordsworth?

As for the appeal to curiosity and to interest in personalities, the evidence may be cited as corroborative of the weightier points rather than as proving very much in itself. Of the thirteen concerts under consideration, ten had soloists, one was an "all-Wagner program," and one brought forward an important novelty—Strauss's "Alpine" symphony. One only had no attraction except that of music. I cannot forget what a young man said to me as we sat on the floor of the dress circle among a crowd of more than a hundred people at a recent Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall. To my remark that it was encouraging to see so many assembled, even when there was no soloist, he replied: "Oh, you don't need a soloist when it's the Boston Symphony."

Now, to conclude, why is it that you do need a soloist when it is the Philharmonic? Briefly, because the directors no longer give the best music or give it at its best. It is hardly fair to blame Mr. Stransky for this, as some musicians do. It is true that he evidently does not care for the classics, which he conducts in a perfunctory and characterless way. It is precisely in the qualities most needed by classic music—clear, forcible, eloquent molding of the phrase, rhythmic power, the instinctive sense of the rhythmic and dynamic balance of a complex movement, that he is most conn TRIBUNE

ress: Providence, R. I.
JAN 21

Fourth Concert of the Boston Symphon Orchestra.

Dr. Muck has arranged an unusually attactive program for the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in Infantry Hall Tuesday evening, Feb. 6. The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the great Russian pianist, who will play Rachmaninoff's Concerto for Piano in C-minor, No. 2. The orchestral numbers will be Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony, Debussy's exquisite "Afternoon of a Faun" and Brahmn's "Academic Festival" overture.

At the dinner to be given by the Rhode Island State Federation of Women's Clubs at the Turk's Head Club on Tuesday evening, Miss Helen Bissell Pettis, a pupil of Miss Harriot E. Barrows, will be the soloist, and the Mathews Trio, Miss Hope Mathews, violinist; Miss Helen Mathews, 'cellist, and Miss Lydia Reil, pianist, will play.

UNION TIMES
Buffalo, N. Y.
JAN 18 1917

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The red-letter night of Buffalo's musical season comes next Tuesday evening with the annual concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, third in Mrs. Mai Davis Smith's annual series of six concerts in Elmwood Music Hall.

America's greatest orchestra, numbering nearly 100 men, under the splendid leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, leaves Boston next Sunday night on its annual mid-winter tour. Since 1905 its coming to Buffalo on this tour has been the gala event of the musical year. The present generation of concert-goers have heard the Boston Symphony under three of its conductors, Wilhelm Gericke, Max Fiedler and Dr. Muck. This will be Dr. Muck's seventh visit to Buffalo.

In choosing her attractions each season, Mrs. Smith includes the Boston Symphony in her series, feeling that the winter would be incomplete without at least one visit from the greatest symphonic organization in the country, and, in the opinion of most musical critics, the greatest in the world.

The seat sale opens on Saturday morning at Denton, Cottier & Daniels.

om EXPRESS
ddress: Buffalo, N. Y.
te

Boston Symphony Orchestra in Buffalo next Tuesday night.

Next Tuesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will pay its annual visit to Buffalo, giving the third in Mrs. Mai Davis Smith's season series of six concerts in the Elmwood Music hall. This always is the crowning musical event of the midwinter and one of the gala nights of the entire musical year.

Never before in its history has the Boston Symphony equaled the brilliant and spectacular triumphs of this season. In New York its entire series of concerts was sold out by subscription long before the first concert took place and standing room was at a premium every time the orchestra played. For the midwinter tour, which starts next Monday, including the Buffalo concert on Tuesday, the orchestra might have played twenty engagements where one booking was made, so insistent was the demand for dates. Next Tuesday's concert will be the seventh that the Boston Symphony has played in Buffalo under Dr. Karl Muck's direction and Dr. Muck promises a particularly beautiful and striking programme.

The seat sale opens on Saturday morning at Denton, Cottier & Daniels, but mail orders sent now to Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, No. 26 Irving place, accompanied by check payable to her, will be filled in advance of the public sale.

rom ENQUIRER
Address: Buffalo, N. Y. ate Jan 20 17

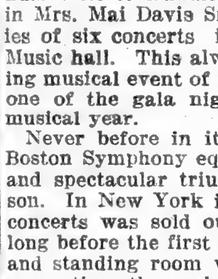
MUSIC NOTES.

The red-letter night in Buffalo's musical season comes next Tuesday evening with the annual visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which will give the third concert in Mrs. Mai Davis Smith's season series of six in Elmwood Music hall. Since 1905 the orchestra has been an annual visitor in Buffalo and for the last seven years has been under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck.



KARL MUCK.

The programme, which is one of rare beauty and striking effects, reads:

Symphony No. 1, in E. Minor, Opus 39 ..... Sibelius
I. Andante ma non troppo; Allegro energico.
II. Andante, ma non troppo lento.
III. Allegro.
IV. Finale (Quasi una fantosia): Andante; Allegro molto.
Overture to the opera, "The Flying Dutchman" ..... Wagner
Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn, Opus 56a ..... Brahms
Overture to the opera, "Oberon"...Weber

A most interesting figure in contemporary music is Sibelius, a master musician and a man of unusual imagination. Like all musicians who come from the north of Europe, his music reflects the characteristics of his land and his people.

No composer has caught the feeling of the sea as has Wagner, who rose to his supreme heights when translating into tone the moods of nature. "The Flying Dutchman" overture is an epitome of the entire opera and through it one gets the restless spirit of the Dutchman flying from the storms, offset by the serene beauty of Das Ewig-Weibliche, as personified by Senta.

COMMERCIAL
ss: Buffalo, N. Y.
JAN 24 1917

SPLENDID CONCERT

Annual Visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Very Much Enjoyed.

ELMWOOD MUSIC HALL

Dr. Karl Muck and His Players Presented Fine Program Last Evening.

The third in the series of six subscription concerts, under the direction of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, was given at Elmwood Music Hall last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor.

The anual visit of this famous organization to Buffalo is always a musical event of much importance to music lovers and music students in Buffalo and vicinity. The fame of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has spread to every quarter of this country and it was not surprising to see a capacity audience at Elmwood Music Hall last evening.

The playing by the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is without doubt just a little better than any other orchestra. The men understand each other so well they present an almost perfect ensemble and the various choirs are composed of the best orchestra musicians in the world.

Dr. Muck must be regarded as one of the greates conductors of the present time. He reads his scores in a scholarly maner and he has his men under complete control every minute. Some of the effects he produces are wonderful and he reads the innermost thoughts of the composer. Everything he does is highly artistic and very enjoyable.

The program last evening was very interesting. Symphony in E minor by Jan Sibelius was heard here for the first time and it created a fine impression. The many sweet, simple melodies, the wonderful working out of the themes and the splendid orchestration held the interest of the listeners every minute.

The first movement is full of fire and dash and the second part contains some lovely melodies. The humorous third movement captured the audience immediately.

The overture to Wagner's The Flying Dutchman was beautifully performed and Dr. Muck and his musicians were heartily applauded after this number.

Variations on a Theme of Josef Haydn by Brahms and overture to Oberon by Weber were the other program numbers and these were very much enjoyed by the large an appreciative audience. Dr. Muck received a grand ovation at the close of the concert and he had the whole orchestra stand and share honors with him.

COURIER
Buffalo, N. Y.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO PAY ANNUAL VISIT TO BUFFALO

Next Tuesday evening the Boston Symphony orchestra will pay its annual visit to Buffalo, giving the third in Mrs. Mai Davis Smith's season series of six concerts in Elmwood Music hall. This always is the crowning musical event of the midwinter and one of the gala nights of the musical year.

Never before has the Boston Symphony equaled the brilliant and spectacular triumphs of this season. In New York its series of concerts was sold out by subscription long before the first concert took place, and standing room was at a premium every time the orchestra played.

For the midwinter tour, starting next Monday, including the Buffalo concert on Tuesday, the orchestra might have played twenty engagements where one booking was made, so insistent were the demand for dates.

Tuesday's concert will be the seventh the Boston Symphony has played in Buffalo under Dr. Karl Muck's direction, and Dr. Muck promises a particularly beautiful programme.

The seat sale will open Saturday morning at Denton, Cottier & Daniels, but mail orders sent to Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, No. 26 Irving place, accompanied by check payable to her, will be filled in advance of the public sale.

[74]

om COMMERCIAL
ddress: Buffalo, N. Y.
te JAN 18

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Famous Boston Orchestra Will Be Heard in Buffalo Next Tuesday Evening.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will pay its annual visit to Buffalo next Tuesday night, January 23d, giving the third in Mrs. Mai Davis Smith's annual series of six concerts in the Elmwood Music Hall. This is always the crowning musical achievement of the mid-winter season and one of the gala events of the entire musical year.

Never before in its history has the Boston Symphony equaled the brilliant and spectacular triumphs of this season. In New York its entire series of concerts was sold out by subscription long before the first concert took place. Next Tuesday's concert will be the seventh that the Boston Symphony has played in Buffalo under Dr. Muck's direction and Dr. Muck promises a particularly beautiful and striking program.

The seat sale opens on Saturday morning at Denton, Cottier & Daniels, but mail orders sent now to Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, 26 Irving place, accompanied by check payable to her, will be filled in advance of the public sale.

TRIBUNE
: New York City
18 1917

Meanwhile the artists, those who are such by grace of genius, and those who are such only in desire and their own conceit, must rest content, and if they cannot themselves supply the reviewer with interesting material for discourse be glad when others do it. Only one out of five or ten of the concerts of the Philharmonic Society give a topic to the newspaper writer; only one out of fifty pianoforte players. Dr. Muck and his Boston Orchestra, drive him to brief reiteration of platitudes about the excellence of their performance, or to impatient complaint because the equally good orchestras of New York do not make equally good music. And then the indignant champion of Mr. Walter Damrosch or Mr. Stransky rushes to the rescue and unwisely makes plain what had been veiled under implication. The first recital of a singer, violinist, 'cellist, what not, receives a mere mention, is damned by faint praise, is ignored or frankly told that the recital added nothing to the sum of the season's interest; and immediately the protests begin to flow into the newspaper offices from the friends of the singer, violinist, 'cellist or what not. To them the incident was of vast and vital importance, and they impugn the motives of the reviewer, cast reflections on his honesty and intelligence or slander his digestive apparatus, because in having no selfish interest in the recital estimated its newspaper value by that of a hundred recitals which had preceded it, and tried to fix its place in a scheme which will embrace a hundred more before the season ends.

EXPRESS
ess: Buffalo, N. Y.
JAN 19

Paderewski scowled, D. Muck smiled, the stage cat purred.

Those who recall Paderewski's temperamental exit on the occasion of his last Buffalo concert, when the lights were suddenly switched on before he completed his last number, will appreciate what must have been his state of mind at the Metropolitan Opera-house in New York on Tuesday night, when the stage cat strolled across the stage during Paderewski's concerto with the Boston Symphony orchestra and contentedly settled herself in the footlights to enjoy the performance.

"With the best of intentions, but to the great annoyance of the pianist and the evident amusement of Dr. Muck," says the Herald, "the animal that makes its home beneath the stage, crawled up through the prompter's box, just to prove that a cat may look at a king of pianists.

"Mr. Paderewski scowled. Dr. Muck smiled. Anton Witek, concert master, tried to push away the intruder with the bow of his violin, but all to no avail. Pussy, snuggled comfortably among the unused footlights, purred peacefully through the three movements of the concerto."

Incidentally this concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Paderewski and Kreisler as soloists, broke all concert records for New York and netted $25,000 for the Vacation association. Orchestra seats sold for $10 each and the standees were limited only by the fire laws.

om EVENING NEWS
dress: Buffalo, N. Y.
te JAN 21 1917

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES NOTABLE PERFORMANCE

Sibellius' Remarkable Work Is Rendered With Eloquent and Impelling Interpretation.

A concert of absorbing interest and great beauty took place last night, when the Boston symphony orchestra made its annual appearance in Buffalo, under the local management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith. A word of gratitude must be expressed for the program, made notable by Sibelius' first symphony, while in addition were Brahms' variations on a Haydn theme, the overtures to the "Flyin Dutchman," and to "Oberon." The orchestra must have felt the response of the audience to the interest of the music, which was such a vivid contrast to the fluffy trifles usually served up by visiting organizations.

The works of Sibelius in four movements, is marked by great individuality of thematic material, different subjects being stamped by the power and distinctive character of the famous symphonic writers of the past century. To the development of this material, Sibelius brings consummate skill, a notable mastery being evident always in the use of parts of themes worked up in a manner impossible to describe, but fascinating to the listener.

With all his wealth of skill, Sibelius never uses his gorgeous orchestration, in which color is a reality, as anything but means to an end; there is no exploiting of mere mechanism and control of orchestral medium. The wonderful performance of this very fine work was one of the most eloquent and impelling interpretations ever given here by Dr. Muck. This great conductor possesses the power of translating the very soul of music into speech in a way that one can but marvel at, and look for almost in vain, certainly at present in this country, to see equaled.

The orchestra last night, under his direction, played with a clarity of delineation, a beauty of tone, and power as a whole that must be given the highest praise.

Noable among the other program numbers were the Brams variations, the performance of which was unalloyed joy. The clear cut, poetic characterizing of each separate variation was a tribute alike to player and to composer, and the entire work was received with some of the greatest enthusiasm of the evening.

Announcement is made of the engagement of Mme. Galli-Curci, the justly celebrated colorature singer, to appear at Mrs. Smith's next concert, Feb. 12.

om EVENING NEWS
ldress: Buffalo, N. Y.
te 19 19

SEATS ON SALE TOMORROW FOR SYMPHONY CONCERT

The seat sale will open tomorrow for the Boston Symphony orchestra's annual concert in Buffalo which takes place Tuesday evening in the Elmwood Music hall. This is the third in Mrs. Mai Davis Smith's season series of six concerts, and, in many respects, the most notable musical attraction of the entire series, for it brings to Buffalo the greatest symphony orchestra in America and one of the greatest in the world.

The entire orchestra will come to Buffalo for its annual concert, which will be the second of its mid-winter tour. Dr. Karl Muck conducting. The orchestra leaves Boston next Sunday night, playing in Syracuse on Monday, Buffalo on Tuesday, then going to Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Detroit and other cities further west.

om EVENING NEWS
dress: Buffalo, N. Y.
te Jan 21 JAN

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE FOR CONCERT TONIGHT

The far famed Boston Symphony orchestra arrived this morning for its concert this evening in the Elmwood Music hall, the third in Mrs. Mai Davis Smith's annual series of six.

The orchestra, with its librarian and other attaches numbering over 100, left Boston on Sunday night on its annual mid-winter tour. On the special train with the men are Dr. Karl Muck, who will conduct this evening; C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and William H. Brennan, its business manager.

Fresh from the greatest triumph of its career, its $25,000 audience last Tuesday night in New York at the Metropolitan opera house, the orchestra is in superb condition and Dr. Muck has prepared a program of novelty and charm for this evening's concert, which begins at 8:15 o'clock. Promptness in reaching the hall is urged, for no one will be seated while the orchestra is playing and latecomers will lose much of the beauty on the opening movement in the Sibelius symphony.

om LIFE
dress: Brooklyn, N. Y.
e JAN 20 1917

Gala Concert at Metropolitan for Vacation Association.

One was deeply impressed Tuesday evening at the Metropolitan Opera House when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by Paderewski and Kreisler, gave a remarkable concert for the benefit of the Vacation Association, by the way this worthy enterprise so dear to the heart of Miss Anne Morgan, its treasurer, has developed since the days of its modest beginning in 1911. To look over the audience which packed the Metropolitan from orchestra to gallery was to realize that it was not only a tribute to the wonderful musical talent assembled but a tribute to Miss Morgan and her staff of assistants who had organized the "Gala Concert" to replenish the funds of the organization. Their success may be imagined by the receipts, which totaled $25,000. Persons distinguished in society, philanthropy and professional circles occupied seats in the orchestra and other parts of the house and many hundreds of "Vacation Girls" took advantage of the opportunity to hear the concert from the moderate priced locations.

h ENQUIRER
ress: Buffalo, N. Y.
JAN 23 19

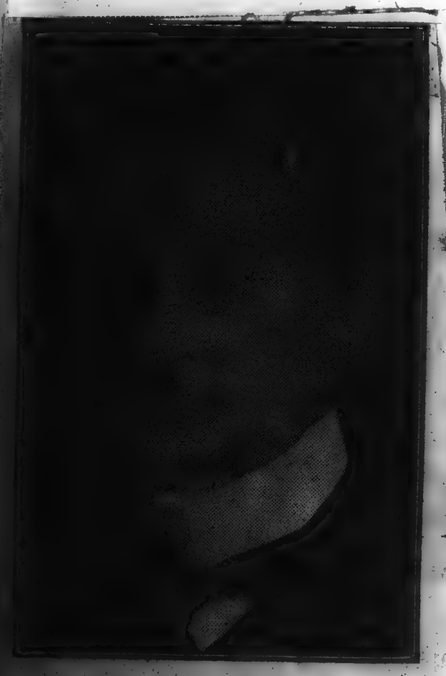
BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE FOR CONCERT

Shortly before noon today a long special train rolled into the Central station, brining to Buffalo the far-famed Boston Symphony orchestra for its concert this evening in Elmwood Music hall, the third in Mrs. Mai Davis Smith's annual series of six.

The orchestra, with its librarian and other attaches, numbering over 100, left Boston on Sunday night on its annual midwinter tour. On the special train with the men are Dr. Karl Muck, who will conduct this evening; C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and William H. Brennan, its business manager.

Fresh from the greatest triumph of its career, its $25,000 audience last Tuesday night in New York, at the Metropolitan Opera house, the orchestra is in superb condition, and Dr. Muck has prepared a programme of novelty and charm for this evening's concert which begins at 8:15 o'clock. Promptness in reaching the hall is urged, for no one will be seated while the orchestra is playing, and late-comers will lose much of the beauty of the opening movement of the Sibelius symphony.

EXPRESS
s: Buffalo, N. Y.
JAN 21 19



DR. KARL MUCK.
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a concert at Elmwood Music Hall on Tuesday, January 23d, the third in Mrs. Mai Davis Smith's series of concerts.

om ENQUIRER
dress: Buffalo, N. Y.
JAN 19

SEAT SALE FOR BOSTON CONCERT

Tomorrow morning at Denton, Cottier & Daniels, the seat sale will open for the Boston Symphony orchestra's annual concert in Buffalo, which takes place next Tuesday evening in Elmwood Music hall. This is the third in Mrs. Mai Davis Smith's season series of six concerts and, in many respects, the most notable musical attraction of the entire series, for it brings to Buffalo the greatest symphony orchestra in America and one of the greatest in the world.

The entire orchestra will come to Buffalo for its annual concert, which will be the second of its midwinter tour, Dr. Karl Muck conducting. The orchestra leaves Boston next Sunday evening, playing in Syracuse on Monday, Cleveland on Tuesday, then going to Pittsburgh, Detroit and other cities farther west.

rom COURIER
ddress Buffalo, N. Y.
JAN 2
ate

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO PLAY IN BUFFALO NEXT TUESDAY

The Boston Symphony orchestra will play in Buffalo next Tuesday night, giving the third in Mrs. Mai Davis Smith's annual series of six concerts in the Elmwood Music hall. The seat sale opens this morning at Denton, Cottier & Daniels.

In many respects the coming of the Boston Symphony orchestra is the most notable event in the subscription series, for it brings to Buffalo the complete orchestra, which is the greatest symphonic organization in America and one of the greatest in the world.

Leaving Boston next Sunday night, the orchestra will start its midwinter tour, giving the second concert of this tour in Buffalo. Dr. Karl Muck will conduct. From Buffalo the orchestra will go to Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Detroit and other cities farther west.

m TIMES
Buffalo, N
ress:
Jan 23 17 JAN

FAR-FAMED BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYS HERE TONIGHT

Shortly before noon today a long special train rolled into the Central Station, bringing to Buffalo the far-famed Boston Symphony Orchestra for its concert this evening in the Elmwood Music Hall, the third in Mrs. Mai Davis Smith's annual series of six.

The orchestra, with its librarian and other attaches numbering over 100, left Boston on Sunday night on its annual midwinter tour. On the special train with the men are Dr. Karl Muck, who will conduct this evening; C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and William H. Brennan, its business manager.

Fresh from the greatest triumph of its career, its $25,000 audience last Tuesday night in New York at the Metropolitan Opera House, the orchestra is in superb condition and Dr. Muck has prepared a program of novelty and charm for this evening's concert, which begins at 8:15 o'clock. Promptness in reaching the hall is urged, for no one will be seated while the orchestra is playing and late-comers will lose much of the beauty of the opening movement in the Sibelius symphony.

m EXPRESS
lress: Buffalo, N. Y.
JAN 23

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TONIGHT

Will play in Elmwood Music hall, Dr. Karl Muck conducting.

Fresh from the greatest triumph in its history, the $25,000 audience at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, last Tuesday, the Boston Symphony Orchestra arrives in Buffalo this morning and this evening in the Elmwood Music hall it will give the third concert in Mrs. Mai Davis Smith's annual series of six.

The men left Boston on Sunday night for their annual midwinter tour. On their big special train are more than 100 musicians and orchestra attaches, with Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, who will conduct the concert tonight; C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, and William H. Brennan, the business manager. From Buffalo they go to Pittsburgh where already the house is sold out for tomorrow night's concert.

Dr. Muck's programme for this evening is one of novelty and charm. The hour for the concert is 8.15 o'clock and promptness in arrival is urged, for no one will be seated while the orchestra is playing and late comers will lose much of the beauty of the opening movement in the Sibelius symphony.

Seats are on sale at Denton, Cottier & Daniels.

HERALD
Syracuse, N. Y.
Jan 23 17

Symphony Concert a Triumph for Dr. Muck and His Musicians

Peerless Orchestra Interprets Brahms' Number So That Every Person in Audience Understands and Appreciates.

It was not because the Wieting opera house was packed to the doors last evening that the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, given under the direction of the king of conductors, Dr. Karl Muck, was so overwhelming a success. It was not because the boxes, orchestra, chairs and entresol were filled to overflowing with men in evening dress and women robed in rich fabrics, with jewels sparkling from their hair and throats. The reason why last night's concert stands thus far in a place by itself in the annals of musical history in Syracuse is that every man, woman and child in the vast audience understood, appreciated and loved the music and paid earnest and heartfelt tribute to the genius of the players and their great leader.

Those who have thought it proper to class Brahms with the Neo-scholastic school—to declare that his works were far beyond the comprehension of the ordinary music lover and only to be appreciated by those who enjoy delving into the fields of musical mathematical equations—must have experienced a revulsion of feeling last night if they were present, to see 2,500 people hanging intent and comprehending on every note of the music, their faces changing as they listened, their ears and their hearts instruments on which the director played as he played on the strings and brass and wood winds of his hundred men with the rise and fall of his magic baton. There are no unfathomable mysteries in Johannes Brahms. He speaks to all who have ears to hear him and souls to comprehend—as he spoke to the Wieting audience last evening.

His Music Not the Fashion.

For the German composer is not one of those whose music is "the fashion." It never will be. Even Beethoven, noblest of masters, comes more under that category than he, for there are those to whom for generations the name of Beethoven has stood—as it does still—for great music which not to know and to appreciate ranks one as musically blind and deaf. With Brahms, it is different. It is more the fashion not to admire him and not to understand him and many, counted high among lovers of music, are willing to say quite simply that they can see no beauty in the works of Brahms.

That is why last night's concert was so notable a triumph for Dr. Muck and his musicians. They took the most scholastic of the four Brahms symphonies and gave its message to hundreds of people so that they understood—and, understanding, bowed in homage which had in it both love and reverence.

Hesitated Before Starting.

The composer was nearly fifty years old before he produced the C minor symphony. He had hesitated before undertaking it. He had told those who had urged him that if he wrote a symphony it would be in the key of C minor and that "there had been one C minor symphony and there was no need of another." But he finally wrote that other and it aroused among the musicians of the day such enthusiasm that von Bulow compared it with the nine symphonies of Beethoven by calling it the "Tenth symphony."

It would be hard to say which movement appealed most strongly to those who listened last night—the beautiful melancholy prelude with the violins singing the theme, and the chromatic phrase for the 'cellos and bassoons recurring now and again to preserve the unity—the hopeful aspiration of the allegro, enduring until the old unrest returns, and the long decrescendo leading up to a passage which begins almost in a whisper and is developed by degrees to the tremendous fortissimo—these made the first movement a marvellous revelation. And then the exquisitely melodious theme for the strings, followed by strains of intense passionate longing and at the close of the Andante the first melody divided as a solo between violin and flute with a beauty and romantic charm all its own. And the lovely "allegretto e grazioso" with its sweet and gentle song for the clarinet and the charming melodies for clarinet and flute and flute and oboe, the strings finally entering as a perfect accompaniment. And last of all the wonderful finale—the summary of the whole symphony—with its great dramatic fervor, its majestic Adagio, which seems to be an alernation between hope and fear—the voice of a spirit of restlessness and mystery—with the horns uttering a theme of passion and the trombones filling in a solid background of mysterious harmony. It was small wonder that the close of the mighty work left the listeners enthralled—almost breathless—in their places.

Each Has Its Charm.

It would not have been surprising if after this surpassing effort the remainder of the programme had come as an anti-climax. But it did not. Each number has its own charm. The overture to "The Corsair"—written during the most romantic period of the composer—Berlioz, eminent exponent of the romantic French school—delighted those who heard with its "free fantasie" and its stormy beauty. The Russian sketch, written by Borodin to depict the passing of a caravan through the steppes of Central Asia under the guardianship of an escort of Russian soldiers who mingle their songs of peace with the melancholy ballads of the Oriental pilgrims, was programme music of a kind rarely heard and the closing overture—"The Flying Dutchman," gave those who listened a comprehension of Wagner to which a thousand lecture recitals would not have contributed. Each of the "motifs" stands out so clearly and distinctly that a child, untrained in music, could distinguish them—the "Dutchman" theme with its stormy development in the basses, "Senta's" ballad—the "Sailors' Chorus"—all unite in making the overture one of the most beautiful and dramatic that Wagner ever wrote.

It would seem to be a foregone conclusion that the Boston symphony will return next year. And the thanks of the public are due to Miss King and Miss Van Kuran whose efforts aided in bringing out last night's wonderful audience.

From LEADER
Address: Pittsburgh, Pa.
JAN 21 1

Boston Symphony Orchestra Closing Attraction

The annual concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which marks the climax of the fourth season of Ellis' concerts, under the management of Miss May Beegle, will be given in Carnegie Music hall, next Wednesday evening, January 24, under the leadership of its famous conductor, Dr. Karl Muck.

This concert comes eight days after the most memorable concert New York has had in many years. On last Tuesday night the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Paderewski and Kreisler as soloists, gave a special concert in the Metropolitan Opera house, New York, at which the receipts ran over $25,000. This is the first time in 23 years that the orchestra has given a concert in New York outside of its regular subscription series.

It is impossible in New York to buy tickets for any of the regular Boston symphony concerts, owing to the fact that everything is sold by the season from year to year, and the desire of the musical public to take advantage of this single concert in the large Metropolitan Opera house was not to be wondered at.

Never in its history has this orchestra reached such a uniformly high level of achievement as it has during the present season.

The five years that Dr. Muck has had it in his charge have wrought wonders, and its success from every point of view has never been so great. At the concert next Wednesday evening the entire personnel of the orchestra will be used.

The program that Dr. Muck has arranged is one of great variety, full of contrasts, and each separate work must be regarded as a masterpiece of its kind. The symphony will be the first of the four written by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius.

In sharp contrast to the symphony is the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," by Beethoven. Then will come that exquisite bit of tone painting, Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun." The final number will be by another Frenchman, Emanuel Chabrier, his rhapsody "Espana," one of the most brilliant pieces in the literature of the orchestra.

m EXPRESS
ress: Buffalo, N. Y.
JAN 21

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Fresh from one of the most remarkable triumphs it has ever had in its career, the Boston Symphony orchestra will make its twelfth visit to Buffalo on Tuesday evening of this week with a concert in Elmwood Music hall. Last Tuesday evening, with Paderewski and Kreisler as soloists, it gave a gala concert in the Metropolitan opera-house, New York, to the largest receipts that any orchestra ever had. In fact, only once or twice in its history has the Metropolitan opera house, to use the trade phrase, held more money, for the total receipts were far over $20,000. It was an astounding tribute to the orchestra and its playing aroused the utmost enthusiasm. The orchestra leaves Boston tonight on its regular midwinter western trip, in which it plays in Syracuse, Buffalo, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Ann Arbor and Detroit, returning from the last place directly to Boston to resume its regular work. Its concert here is the third of the very satisfactory series of subscription concerts under the management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith. It comes with its entire personnel of 100 men and with Dr. Karl Muck as conductor. The programme is one which should give great pleasure. It comprises the First Symphony in E minor of Sibelius, Wagner's overture to The Flying Dutchman, Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and Weber's Oberon overture. Sibelius is a most interesting figure in contemporary music. He is a master musician and a man of very unusual imagination, a follower of none of the schools of today. True, his early symphonies are in classic form, but the material which he uses and the manner in which he treats it are entirely his own. Like most musicians who come from the far north of Europe, his music reflects to a certain degree the characteristics of his land and his people. In this first symphony one realizes in the music the stark, rugged contour of his native country, the stark, rugged nature of its people, and the smoldering embers of revolt which have filled Finland for over a century. It is great music and holds the attention of the auditor from first to last. Much sea music has been written, but it is doubtful whether any composer has so caught the feeling of the sea as Wagner. Wagner undoubtedly rose to his highest point when he was translating the moods of nature into tone. In the Flying Dutchman overture he has still in mind that dreadful voyage he made from Riga to London through the storms of the Baltic and North seas. The overture, like most of his overtures and preludes, is an epitome of the entire opera which follows and through it we see the restless spirit of the Dutchman flying from the storms, offset by the serene beauty of Das Ewig-Weibliche as personified by Senta. Ordinarily variations are used to display the learning of musical pedants and have as little interest as such music naturally might have. Brahms, however, delighted in this form of composition and succeeded in it. On the quaint chorale to Saint Anthony, written by Haydn, Brahms has built a series of variations which hold the attention most closely and incidentally demand the utmost virtuosity on the part of the orchestra. The final number, the Oberon overture of Weber, is familiar to all concert-goers. It is one of the three great overtures written by this genius, which are among the most precious legacies of the past. The programme in its entirety follows:

Symphony No. 1 in E minor.....Sibelius
Overture to The Flying Dutchman.....Wagner
Variations on a theme by Josef Haydn.....Brahms
Overture to Oberon.....Weber

The next regular rehearsal of the Guido chorus will be held tomorrow evening, instead of on Tuesday, at the Consistory hall.

Word has been received from Godfrey Morgan, president of the chorus, indicating that he will return from the Philippines in time for the next concert. The committee in charge is working on plans for another entertainment for the members, following the second concert, which it hopes to make fully as enjoyable as the previous meeting. Local interest is strong in the concert on February 1st, at which three of Buffalo's best soloists, Mrs. Agnese Preston Storck, Charles McCreary and Sidney Wertimer, will appear. The public sale of seats will open at Denton, Cottier & Daniels store on Monday morning, January 29th.

om LIFE

ddress: Buffalo, N. Y.

e

Gala Concert at Metropolitan for Vacation Association.

One was deeply impressed Tuesday evening at the Metropolitan Opera House when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by Paderewski and Kreisler, gave a remarkable concert for the benefit of the Vacation Association, by the way this worthy enterprise so dear to the heart of Miss Anne Morgan, its treasurer, has developed since the days of its modest beginning in 1911. To look over the audience which packed the Metropolitan from orchestra to gallery was to realize that it was not only a tribute to the wonderful musical talent assembled but a tribute to Miss Morgan and her staff of assistants who had organized the "Gala Concert" to replenish the funds of the organization. Their success may be imagined by the receipts, which totaled $25,000. Persons distinguished in society, philanthropy and professional circles occupied seats in the orchestra and other parts of the house and many hundreds of "Vacation Girls" took advantage of the opportunity to hear the concert from the moderate priced locations.

h ENQUIRER

ress: Buffalo, N. Y.

JAN 22 19

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE FOR CONCERT

Shortly before noon today a long special train rolled into the Central station, brining to Buffalo the far-famed Boston Symphony orchestra for its concert this evening in Elmwood Music hall, the third in Mrs. Mai Davis Smith's annual series of six.

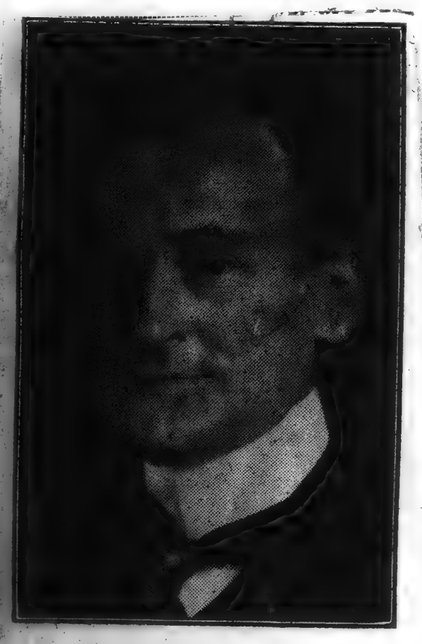
The orchestra, with its librarian and other attaches, numbering over 100, left Boston on Sunday night on its annual midwinter tour. On the special train with the men are Dr. Karl Muck, who will conduct this evening; C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and William H. Brennan, its business manager.

Fresh from the greatest triumph of its career, its $25,000 audience last Tuesday night in New York, at the Metropolitan Opera house, the orchestra is in superb condition, and Dr. Muck has prepared a programme of novelty and charm for this evening's concert which begins at 8:15 o'clock. Promptness in reaching the hall is urged, for no one will be seated while the orchestra is playing, and late-comers will lose much of the beauty of the opening movement in the Sibelius symphony.

EXPRESS

s: Buffalo, N. Y.

JAN 21



DR. KARL MUCK.

Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a concert at Elmwood Music Hall on Tuesday, January 23d, the third in Mrs. Mai Davis Smith's series of concerts.

om ENQUIRER

dress: Buffalo, N. Y.

JAN 19

SEAT SALE FOR BOSTON CONCERT

Tomorrow morning at Denton, Cottier & Daniels, the seat sale will open for the Boston Symphony orchestra's annual concert in Buffalo, which takes place next Tuesday evening in Elmwood Music hall. This is the third in Mrs. Mai Davis Smith's season series of six concerts and, in many respects, the most notable musical attraction of the entire series, for it brings to Buffalo the greatest symphony orchestra in America and one of the greatest in the world.

The entire orchestra will come to Buffalo for its annual concert, which will be the second of its midwinter tour, Dr. Karl Muck conducting. The orchestra leaves Boston next Sunday night, playing in Syracuse on Monday, Buffalo on Tuesday, then going to Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Detroit and other cities further west.

rom COURIER

ddress Buffalo, N. Y.

JAN 2

ate

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO PLAY IN BUFFALO NEXT TUESDAY

The Boston Symphony orchestra will play in Buffalo next Tuesday night, giving the third in Mrs. Mai Davis Smith's annual series of six concerts in the Elmwood Music hall. The seat sale opens this morning at Denton, Cottier & Daniels.

In many respects the coming of the Boston Symphony orchestra is the most notable event in the subscription series. For it brings to Buffalo the complete orchestra, which is the greatest symphonic organization in America and one of the greatest in the world.

Leaving Boston next Sunday night, the orchestra will start its midwinter tour, giving the second concert of this tour in Buffalo. Dr. Karl Muck will conduct. From Buffalo the orchestra will go to Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Detroit and other cities further west.

m TIMES

Buffalo, N

lress:

Jan 23 17 JAN

e

FAR-FAMED BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYS HERE TONIGHT

Shortly before noon today a long special train rolled into the Central Station, bringing to Buffalo the far-famed Boston Symphony Orchestra for its concert this evening in the Elmwood Music Hall, the third in Mrs. Mai Davis Smith's annual series of six.

The orchestra, with its librarian and other attaches numbering over 100, left Boston on Sunday night on its annual midwinter tour. On the special train with the men are Dr. Karl Muck, who will conduct this evening; G. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and William H. Brennan, its business manager.

Fresh from the greatest triumph of its career, its $25,000 audience last Tuesday night in New York ot the Metropolitan Opera House, the orchestra is in superb condition and Dr. Muck has prepared a program of novelty and charm for this evening's concert, which begins at 8:15 o'clock. Promptness in reaching the hall is urged, for no one will be seated while the orchestra is playing and late-comers will lose much of the beauty of the opening movement in the Sibelius symphony.

m EXPRESS

lress: Buffalo, N. Y.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TONIGHT

Will play in Elmwood Music hall, Dr. Karl Muck conducting.

Fresh from the greatest triumph in its history, the $25,000 audience at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, last Tuesday, the Boston Symphony Orchestra arrives in Buffalo this morning and this evening in the Elmwood Music hall it will give the third concert in Mrs. Mai Davis Smith's annual series of six.

The men left Boston on Sunday night for their annual midwinter tour. On their big special train are more than 100 musicians and orchestra attaches, with Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, who will conduct the concert tonight; C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, and William H. Brennan, the business manager. From Buffalo they go to Pittsburgh where already the house is sold out for tomorrow night's concert.

Dr. Muck's programme for this evening is one of novelty and charm. The hour for the concert is 8.15 o'clock and promptness in arrival is urged, for no one will be seated while the orchestra is playing and late comers will lose much of the beauty of the opening movement in the Sibelius symphony.

Seats are on sale at Denton, Cottier & Daniels.

Syracuse, N. Y.

Symphony Concert a Triumph for Dr. Muck and His Musicians

Peerless Orchestra Interprets Brahms' Number So That Every Person in Audience Understands and Appreciates.

It was not because the Wieting opera house was packed to the doors last evening that the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, given under the direction of the king of conductors, Dr. Karl Muck, was so overwhelming a success. It was not because the boxes, orchestra, chairs and entresol were filled to overflowing with men in evening dress and women robed in rich fabrics, with jewels sparkling from their hair and throats. The reason why last night's concert stands thus far in a place by itself in the annals of musical history in Syracuse is that every man, woman and child in the vast audience understood, appreciated and loved the music and paid earnest and heartfelt tribute to the genius of the players and their great leader.

Those who have thought it proper to class Brahms with the Neo-scholastic school—to declare that his works were far beyond the comprehension of the ordinary music lover and only to be appreciated by those who enjoy delving into the fields of musical mathematical equations—must have experienced a revulsion of feeling last night if they were present, to see 2,500 people hanging intent and comprehending on every note of the music, their faces changing as they listened, their ears and their hearts instruments on which the director played as he played on the strings and brass and wood winds of his hundred men with the rise and fall of his magic baton. There are no unfathomable mysteries in Johannes Brahms. He speaks to all who have ears to hear him and souls to comprehend—as he spoke to the Wieting audience last evening.

His Music Not the Fashion.

For the German composer is not one of those whose music is "the fashion." It never will be. Even Beethoven, noblest of masters, comes more under that category than he, for there are those to whom for generations the name of Beethoven has stood—as it does still—for great music which not to know and to appreciate ranks one as musically blind and deaf. With Brahms, it is different. It is more the fashion not to admire him and not to understand him and many, counted high among lovers of music, are willing to say quite simply that they can see no beauty in the works of Brahms.

That is why last night's concert was so notable a triumph for Dr. Muck and his musicians. They took the most scholastic of the four Brahms symphonies and gave its message to hundreds of people so that they understood—and, understanding, bowed in homage which had in it both love and reverence.

Hesitated Before Starting.

The composer was nearly fifty years old before he produced the C minor symphony. He had hesitated before undertaking it. He had told those who had urged him that if he wrote a symphony it would be in the key of C minor and that "there had been one C minor symphony and there was no need of another." But he finally wrote that other and it aroused among the musicians of the day such enthusiasm that von Bulow compared it with the nine symphonies of Beethoven by calling it the "Tenth symphony."

It would be hard to say which movement appealed most strongly to those who listened last night—the beautiful, melancholy prelude with the violins singing the theme, and the chromatic phrase for the 'cellos and bassoons recurring now and again to preserve the unity—the hopeful aspiration of the allegro, enduring until the old unrest returns, and the long decrescendo leading up to a passage which begins almost in a whisper and is developed by degrees to the tremendous fortissimo—these made the first movement a marvellous reveiation. And then the exquisitely melodious theme for the strings, followed by strains of intense passionate longing and at the close of the Andante the first melody divided as a solo between violin and flute with a beauty and romantic charm all its own. And the lovely "allegretto e grazioso" with its sweet and gentle song for the clarinet and the charming melodies for clarinet and flute and flute and oboe, the strings finally entering as a perfect accompaniment. And last of all the wonderful finale—the summary of the whole symphony—with its great dramatic fervor, its majestic Adagio, which seems to be an alernation between hope and fear—the voice of a spirit of restlessness and mystery—with the horns uttering a theme of passion and the trombones filling in a solid background of mysterious harmony. It was small wonder that the close of the mighty work left the listeners enthralled—almost breathless—in their places.

Each Has Its Charm.

It would not have been surprising if after this surpassing effort the remainder of the programme had come as an anti-climax. But it did not. Each number has its own charm. The overture to "The Corsair"—written during the most romantic period of the composer—Berlioz, eminent exponent of the romantic French school—delighted those who heard with its "free fantasie" and its stormy beauty. The Russian sketch, written by Borodin to depict the passing of a caravan through the steppes of Central Asia under the guardianship of an escort of Russian soldiers who mingle their songs of peace with the melancholy ballads of the Oriental pilgrims, was programme music of a kind rarely heard and the closing overture—"The Flying Dutchman," gave those who listened a comprehension of Wagner to which a thousand lecture recitals would not have contributed. Each of the "motifs" stands out so clearly and distinctly that a child, untrained in music, could distinguish them—the "Dutchman" theme with its stormy development in the basses, "Senta's" ballad—the "Sailors' Chorus"—all unite in making the overture one of the most beautiful and dramatic that Wagner ever wrote.

It would seem to be a foregone conclusion that the Boston symphony will return next year. And the thanks of the public are due to Miss King and Miss Van Kuran whose efforts aided in bringing out last night's wonderful audience.

From LEADER

Address: Pittsburgh, Pa.

JAN 21 1

Boston Symphony Orchestra Closing Attraction

The annual concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which marks the climax of the fourth season of Ellis' concerts, under the management of Miss May Beegle, will be given in Carnegie Music hall, next Wednesday evening, January 24, under the leadership of its famous conductor, Dr. Karl Muck.

This concert comes eight days after the most memorable concert New York has had in many years. On last Tuesday night the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Paderewski and Kreisler as soloists, gave a special concert in the Metropolitan Opera house, New York, at which the receipts ran over $25,000. This is the first time in 23 years that the orchestra has given a concert in New York outside of its regular subscription series.

It is impossible in New York to buy tickets for any of the regular Boston symphony concerts, owing to the fact that everything is sold by the season from year to year, and the desire of the musical public to take advantage of this single concert in the large Metropolitan Opera house was not to be wondered at.

Never in its history has this orchestra reached such a uniformly high level of achievement as it has during the present season.

The five years that Dr. Muck has had it in his charge have wrought wonders, and its success from every point of view has never been so great. At the concert next Wednesday evening the entire personnel of the orchestra will be used.

The program that Dr. Muck has arranged is one of great variety, full of contrasts, and each separate work must be regarded as a masterpiece of its kind. The symphony will be the first of the four written by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius.

In sharp contrast to the symphony is the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," by Beethoven. Then will come that exquisite bit of tone painting, Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun." The final number will be by another Frenchman, Emanuel Chabrier, his rhapsody "Espana," one of the most brilliant pieces in the literature of the orchestra.

m EXPRESS

ress: Buffalo, N. Y.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Fresh from one of the most remarkable triumphs it has ever had in its career, the Boston Symphony orchestra will make its twelfth visit to Buffalo on Tuesday evening of this week with a concert in Elmwood Music hall. Last Tuesday evening, with Paderewski and Kreisler as soloists, it gave a gala concert in the Metropolitan opera-house, New York, to the largest receipts that any orchestra ever had. In fact, only once or twice in its history has the Metropolitan opera house, to use the trade phrase, held more money, for the total receipts were far over $20,000. It was an astounding tribute to the orchestra and its playing aroused the utmost enthusiasm. The orchestra leaves Boston tonight on its regular midwinter western trip, in which it plays in Syracuse, Buffalo, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Ann Arbor and Detroit, returning from the last place directly to Boston to resume its regular work. Its concert here is the third of the very satisfactory series of subscription concerts under the management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith. It comes with its entire personnel of 100 men and with Dr. Karl Muck as conductor. The programme is one which should give great pleasure. It comprises the First Symphony in E minor of Sibelius, Wagner's overture to The Flying Dutchman, Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and Weber's Oberon overture. Sibelius is a most interesting figure in contemporary music. He is a master musician and a man of very unusual imagination, a follower of none of the schools of today. True, his early symphonies are in classic form, but the material which he uses and the manner in which he treats it are entirely his own. Like most musicians who come from the far north of Europe, his music reflects to a certain degree the characteristics of his land and his people. In this first symphony one realizes in the music the stark, rugged contour of his native country, the stark, rugged nature of its people, and the smoldering embers of revolt which have filled Finland for over a century. It is great music and holds the attention of the auditor from first to last. Much sea music has been written, but it is doubtful whether any composer has so caught the feeling of the sea as Wagner. Wagner undoubtedly rose to his highest point when he was translating the moods of nature into tone. In the Flying Dutchman overture he has still in mind that dreadful voyage he made from Riga to London through the storms of the Baltic and North seas. The overture, like most of his overtures and preludes, is an epitome of the entire opera which follows and through it we see the restless spirit of the Dutchman flying from the storms, offset by the serene beauty of Das Ewig-Weibliche as personified by Senta. Ordinarily variations are used to display the learning of musical pedants and have as little interest as such music naturally might have. Brahms, however, delighted in this form of composition and succeeded in it. On the quaint chorale to Saint Anthony, written by Haydn, Brahms has built a series of variations which hold the attention most closely and incidentally demand the utmost virtuosity on the part of the orchestra. The final number, the Oberon overture of Weber, is familiar to all concert-goers. It is one of the three great overtures written by this genius, which are among the most precious legacies of the past. The programme in its entirety follows:

Symphony No. 1 in E minor.....Sibelius
Overture to The Flying Dutchman.....Wagner
Variations on a theme by Josef Haydn.....Brahms
Overture to Oberon.....Weber

The next regular rehearsal of the Guido chorus will be held tomorrow evening, instead of on Tuesday, at the Consistory hall.

Word has been received from Godfrey Morgan, president of the chorus, indicating that he will return from the Philippines in time for the next concert. The committee in charge is working on plans for another entertainment for the members, following the second concert, which it hopes to make fully as enjoyable as the previous meeting. Local interest is strong in the concert on February 1st, at which three of Buffalo's best soloists, Mrs. Agnese Preston Storck, Charles McCreary and Sidney Wertimer, will appear. The public sale of seats will open at Denton, Cottier & Daniels store on Monday morning, January 29th.

[75]

COMMERCIAL

ress: Buffalo, N. Y.

JAN 23 19

ailing bricks.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HERE

Will Give a Concert This Evening at Elmwood Music Hall—Splendid Program.

Shortly before noon today a long special train rolled into the Central station, bringing to Buffalo the far-famed Boston Symphony Orchestra for its concert this evening in the Elmwood Music Hall, the third in Mrs. Mai Davis Smith's annual series of six.

The orchestra, with its librarian and other attaches numbering over 100, left Boston on Sunday night on its annual midwinter tour. On the special train with the men are Dr. Karl Muck, who will conduct this evening; C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and William H. Brennan, its business manager.

The orchestra is in superb condition and Dr. Muck has prepared a program of novelty and charm for this evening's concert, which begins at 8.15 o'clock. Promptness in reaching the hall is urged, for no one will be seated while the orchestra is playing and late comers will lose much of the beauty of the opening movement in the Sibelius symphony.

GAZETTE TIMES

: Pittsburg, Pa.

JAN

Coming of the Boston Symphony.

The annual concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which marks the climax of the fourth season of Ellis concerts under the management of Miss May Beegle, will be given in Carngie Music Hall next Wednesday evening, under the leadership of its famous conductor, Dr. Karl Muck. This concert comes eight days after the most memorable concert New York has had in many years. On last Tuesday night the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Paderewski and Kreisler as soloists, gave a special concert in the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, at which the receipts ran over $25,000. This is the first time in 23 years that the Orchestra has given a concert in New York outside of its regular subscription series.

Dr. Karl Muck,
Conductor.

At the concert next Wednesday evening the entire personnel of the orchestra will be used. The program that Mr. Muck has arranged is one of great variety, full of contrasts, and each separate work must be regarded as a masterpiece of its kind. The symphony will be the first of the four written by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius. In sharp contrast to the Symphony is the Overture to Goethe's "Egmont" by Beethoven. Then will come that exquisite bit of tone painting, Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun." The final number will be by another Frenchman, Emanuel Chabrier, his Rhapsody "Espana," one of the most brilliant pieces in the literature of the orchestra.

CHRONICLE TELEGRAM

ess: Pittsburgh, Pa.

JA

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO GIVE VARIED PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Music Hall next Wednesday night, January 24, will give a program of great variety. The entire personnel of the orchestra will be used, numbering 100 players. The symphony will be the first of the series written by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius. In contrast to this symphony is the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," by Beethoven, and Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun." The final number on the program will be the "Espana" Rhapsody by Emanuel Chabrier.

PRESS

Pittsburg, Pa.

JAN 21 1917

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO COME HERE WEDNESDAY

Annual Concert Will Be Given in Carnegie Music Hall

The annual concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which marks the climax of the fourth season of Ellis concerts under the management of Miss May Beegle, will be given in Carnegie Music hall next Wednesday evening, Jan. 24, under the leadership of its famous conductor, Dr. Karl Muck. This concert comes eight days after the most memorable concert New York has had in many years. On last Tuesday night the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Paderewski and Kreisler as soloists, gave a special concert in the Metropolitan Opera house, New York, at which the receipts ran over $25,000. This is the first time in 23 years that the orchestra has given a concert in New York outside of its regular subscription series and while it had the greatest pianist and greatest violinist a soloists, it is the general concensus of opinion that the star attraction was the orchestra. It is impossible in New York to buy tickets for any of the regular Boston Symphony concerts, owing to the fact that everything is sold by the season from year to year, and the desire on the part of the musical public to take advantage of this single concert in the large Metropolitan Opera house, was not to be wondered at.

Never in its history has this orchestra reached such a uniformly high level of achievement as it has during the present season. Its position as the foremost orchestra of the world was never so firmly established as it is today. The five years that Dr. Muck has had it in his charge have wrought wonders, and its success from every point of view has never been so great. At the concert next Wednesday evening the entire personnel of the orchestra will be used. The program that Dr. Muck has arranged is one of great variety, full of contrasts, and each separate work must be regarded as a masterpiece of its kind. The symphony will be the first of the four written by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius. In sharp contrast to the symphony is the overture to Goethe's "Egmont" by Beethoven. Then will come that exquisite bit of tone painting, Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun." The final number will be by another Frenchman, Emanuel Chabrier, his rhapsody "Espana," one of the most brilliant pieces in the literature of the orchestra.

COURIER

Buffalo, N. Y.

JAN 24 1917

BOSTON ORCHESTRA SCORES TRIUMPH

The annual visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra is always the most brilliant event in Buffalo's musical season and last evening's concert at Elmwood Music hall proved no exception to the rule, for a large and fashionable audience was in attendance, and Dr. Kark Muck and his splendid band of musicians were received with the greatest enthusiasm, which deepened in fervor as the programme progressed.

Under the spell of music so magnificently interpreted, Dr. Muck, who so superbly revealed this vision of musical beauty, stands forth as a conductor of unsurpassed powers, and his readings brought out the full tone of the orchestra, revealing perfection of the separate choirs. The programme was a blending of the classic and modern composers, the latter being represented by the opening work, Symphony No. 1 in E minor, Op. 39, by Sibelius, which created a profound impression, and at the hands of Dr. Muck fairly glowed in its vivid and changeful prismatic colors. It is a work which stirs the blood and strikes a peculiar chord of intensity and poetic feeling, particularly in the first movement, which is continued in more subdued but equally beautiful form in the Andante of the succeeding movement, while the delicate charm of the Allegro led to the imposing Finale, which swept on with crashing melodies like a rushing wind. At the close of this performance both conductor and musicians were tendered flattering appreciation.

The overture to "The Flying Dutchman" revealed Dr. Muck's genius as a Wagnerian conductor, and was weirdly beautiful and masterful in its presentation. In variations on a theme of Josef Hayden, Op. 56a, Dr. Muck once more displayed his breadth and brilliant equipment, for during this presentation there was not a wearisome moment, new life and fresh thoughts animating every measure of this delightful number.

The programme closed with the overture to Wagner's "Oberon," in which marked individuality and a dominating vitality were striking features, Dr. Muck reading it as one who knows the very inner spirit of the music and is therefore able to elucidate it for the joy and pleasure of his hearers. At the close he was recalled and paid a graceful tribute to the members of his orchestra by having them rise and share in the applause.

This was the third subscription concert given under the local management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith.

COURIER

Buffalo, N. Y.

JAN 23 191

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES CONCERT HERE TONIGHT

Fresh from the greatest triumph in its history, the $25,000 audience at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, last Tuesday, the Boston Symphony orchestra arrives in Buffalo this morning and this evening in the Elmwood Music hall it will give the third concert in Mrs. Mai Davis Smith's annual series of six.

The men left Boston on Sunday night for their annual midwinter tour. On their big special train are more than 100 musicians and orchestra attaches, with Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, who will conduct the concert tonight; C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, and William H. Brennan, the business manager. From Buffalo they go to Pittsburgh, where already the house is sold out for tomorrow night's concert.

Dr. Muck's programme for this evening is one of novelty and charm. The hour for the concert is 8:15 o'clock and promptness in arrival is urged, for no one will be seated while the orchestra is playing and late comers will lose much of the beauty of the opening movement in the Sibelius symphony.

Seats are on sale at Denton, Cottier & Daniels.

SUN

ess: Pittsburgh, Pa.

JAN 20 1917

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose concert in Carnegie Music Hall next Wednesday evening, January 24, marks the climax of the fourth season of Ellis concerts, will give a program of great variety, full of contrasts, and each work a masterpiece of its kind. The entire personnel of the orchestra will be used, numbering 100 players. The symphony will be the first of the series of four written by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius. In sharp contrast to this symphony is the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," by Beethoven. An exquisite bit of tone-painting will be given in Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun." The final number will be the "Espana" rhapsody by Emanuel Chabrier.

TRIBUNE

ess: Detroit, Mich.

JAN 28 1917

BOSTON BAND IN WAYNE PROGRAM

Dr. Karl Muck directed the Boston Symphony orchestra in the annual Wagner program of the Detroit Orchestral association, Saturday evening in Arcadia. The usual house, the largest of the orchestral season, greeted the band which is reputed to be the finest in America; and if it did not outshine, on this occasion, the orchestras which have preceded it in the course, it was due to the improvements in those organizations and to the nature of the program.

It cannot be said that Dr. Muck is the foremost interpreter of Wagner. That honor, if the memory of past performances holds good, still belongs to Mr. Damrosch, whose readings may almost be said to have standardized Wagner for the concert hall in America. Dr. Muck's direction differed materially from that of Mr. Damrosch in many instances, and did not improve upon it. He failed to give Lohengrin prelude, for example, that upper ether interpretation in which the conductor of the New York Symphony band is so wonderful, but played it with a much fuller tone, nor was the Tannhaeuser overture as impressive under Dr. Muck's baton. It may be that familiarity has accustomed Detroit audiences to Mr. Damrosch to such an extent that another style of rendition sounds queer; but certainly there was not the enthusiasm which the New Yorker has always been so successful in evoking.

This difference must not be allowed to detract from the excellence of Dr. Muck's conducting. He made the Dienzi overture very beautiful and decidedly more interesting than it sometimes sounds, and the Siegfried idyl was wonderfully played. It may have been the arrangement of the "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung" selections that made that number a bit too ponderous; but the great music from "Die Meistersinger" was masterfully played. On the whole, the strings did not seem to be up to the usual standard, and the brass was occasionally overpowering to those who sat on that side of hall, but Arcadia is not the best place in the world, or even in Detroit, for an orchestra which carries the number of men and the tone-producing power which the Boston band possesses. The wood-winds were at all times excellent. When the proper balance of choirs was maintained, as it usually was, the fine organ-quality demanded of so much of Wagner's work was notably present. Dr. Muck conducted with whole-souled enthusiasm. He has lost much of the pedantic manner which was once remarked in him, and seems to put himself more in sympathy with his audience.

Beethoven lovers will be glad to hear that the Cincinnati orchestra, which plays in the Orchestral course, Feb. 6, will give his seventh symphony.

W. K. KELSEY.

PRESS

Cleveland, Ohio

JAN 26 1917

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Whether it is the artistic ukase of Director Muck, or the expense attending the visitation of the Bostonians being too great to permit the interpolation of a soloist in Thursday night's program, is a matter of inconsequence; the fact remains that we had an exclusively symphonic concert.

Another item worthy of chronicle is that the latees were not allowed to disturb affairs until after the completion of the symphony; an indication that we are becoming metropolitanized, and mayhap in the future we may attain reformation—that is some of us.

Thursday night's program was one of distinct neutral cast, the honors of representation being divided among France, Russian and Germany; and Dr. Muck's presentation of it gave ample evidence that in art there are no belligerent lines of division.

It hardly seems necessary to dilate upon the super-excellence of the Boston orchestra. In the matter of absolute balance and refinement in nuance, it leads them all. The perfect blend of the several orchestra choirs, whether antiphonal or in ensemble, is refinement in the highest degree.

Muck Similar to Thomas.

Muck in his handling of his players reminds one of Theo Thomas; the same mental and physical poise, a self containment that infects his players and gives such unity of effort and effect as is found only in a perfectly drilled organization.

A simple indication of the baton, an inclination of the head, or a glance of the eye, is all sufficient to compel the subtlest nuance or the most elemental of climaxes.

That Muck has the best of material to work with is an assured fact, but it is his conservative poise and restrained emotionalism that makes of his orchestra a machine perfect in its component parts.

The exotic atmosphere and orientalism of Borodin's Steppes sketch was realized quite as fully as was the fantastic and grotesque character of the Strauss "Eulenspiegel" poem. Both were splendid realizations of the composer's intent, and served to display the technical virtuosity and nuance capabilities of his orches-

CHRONICLE TELEGRAM

: Pittsburgh, Pa.

JAN 25 1917

Boston Orchestra Is Given Warm Reception

Large, Representative and Appreciative Audience Pleased With Music and Orchestra Leader.

The fifth concert of the Ellis series was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Carnegie Music Hall. The audience was large, representative and appreciative. Dr. Karl Muck added to his fame as conductor, for his direction was conspicuously intelligent and resulted in a ready response from his musicians. The program began with an unusual composition—Symphony No. 1, by Sibelius. Its complexity of form and rhythm did not prevent its thorough enjoyment. The leading themes were most interestingly worked out. While the symphony is thoroughly classical in form, it gave a pleasing touch of the best of modern music to the program. The second movement—andante, ma non troppo lento—was especially melodious.

The intermission followed the symphony, and immediately afterward, Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's "Egmont" was given—a work always lovely in its classical simplicity. Then came Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn, followed by Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun." This was pleasing, not alone for its own sake, but also because it recalled to many in the audience the Russian dancers who appeared here last year. It is very restful and fanciful. Chabrier's "Espana," a rhapsody for orchestra, brought a thoughtful and decidedly intellectual program to a close, with its merry Spanish folk dances. The simplicity of the waltz was maintained during the complicated orchestration.

Syracuse, N. Y.

JAN 2 8 1917

FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAUDITS

Exquisite Perfection Features Orchestral Concert by Dr. Muck's Men.

RED LETTER MUSICAL DAY

When Syracuse Filled Wieting Right to Eaves—And Enjoyed It.

There has probably been no more exquisitely perfect concert in the history of Syracuse music than that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Wieting last night, whatever may be said of concerts where there was more sustained enthusiasm and response. Dr. Karl Muck has the Boston Symphony tradition in appreciative and intellectual direction, and under his baton he has made the orchestra probably the most perfect machine of the kind in the country to-day. The renditions are most worth, musical transcripts of the score, poetic where the composer is poetic; pictures where the composer is picturesque, and so on—faithful, wonderful, ennobling. You feel when you applaud the work of Dr. Muck and his talented men, as if you were also applauding the composer. They have read you the composer's message exactly and have not trespassed by their own individuality—the interpretation is always one of musical brains, not poetic or musical license.

These statements were especially true last night in the rendition of Brahm's wonderful Symphony No. 1 in C Minor, Op. 68 and the Berlioz overture to "The Corsair," Op. 21. There is much upon the history of both compositions, but little as regards meanings and thought except what is expressed in the music itself. That is melodiously rich and to each a message, according to lights and temperament of the hearer. Who shall say what that message was for the other?

It is doubtful if there was ever heard here a more exquisite and perfect string ensemble or sympathetic wood wind. Probably more hearts were reached by the picturesque Borodin sketch, "On the Steppes of Middle Asia," and more feeling was stirred by the Wagner overture to "The Flying Dutchman," but the evening will be remembered in the musical records of Syracuse as the "night we heard Brahm's Symphony."

Dr. Muck showed Syracuse why he stands in the first rank of conductors of the present time. He is a master of phrase; he has taught sensibility and is remarkable in the securing of perfect rhythm. It is interesting to recall that it was with this Brahm's Symphony that Dr. Muck made his first great success in this country and first fully revealed—this in the season of 1906—his supreme qualities as an interpreter of the masterpieces of orchestral music.

It has been the fashion in Syracuse when there were excellent concerts but sparsely attended to scold the music-loving public. Now it is up to somebody to reverse action, for the Wieting last night had every seat taken to the eaves and the audience was warn in its appreciation.

POST

ess: Pittsburgh, Pa.

JAN 21

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The annual concert of the Boston symphony orchestra will be given in Carnegie Music Hall Wednesday evening under the leadership of its conductor, Dr. Karl Muck. Never in the history has this orchestra reached such a uniformly high level of achievement as it has during the present season. The five years that Dr. Muck has had it in his charge have wrought wonders and its success from every point of view has never been so great. At the concert next Wednesday evening the entire personnel of the orchestra will be used. The program that Dr. Muck has arranged is one of great variety, full of contrasts, and each separate work must be regarded as a masterpiece of its kind. The symphony will be the first of the four written by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius. In sharp contrast to the symphony is the overture to Goethe's "Egmont" by Beethoven. Then will come that exquisite bit of tone painting, Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun." The final number will be by another Frenchman, Emanuel Chabrier, his rhapsody, "Espana," one of the most brilliant pieces in the literature of the orchestra.

[76]

COMMERCIAL

ress: Buffalo, N. Y.

JAN 23 19

alling bricks.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HERE

Will Give a Concert This Evening at Elmwood Music Hall—Splendid Program.

Shortly before noon today a long special train rolled into the Central station, bringing to Buffalo the far-famed Boston Symphony Orchestra for its concert this evening in the Elmwood Music Hall, the third in Mrs. Mai Davie Smith's annual series of six.

The orchestra, with its librarian and other attaches numbering over 100, left Boston on Sunday night on its annual midwinter tour. On the special train with the men are Dr. Karl Muck, who will conduct this evening; C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and William H. Brennan, its business manager.

The orchestra is in superb condition and Dr. Muck has prepared a program of novelty and charm for this evening's concert, which begins at 8.15 o'clock. Promptness in reaching the hall is urged, for no one will be seated while the orchestra is playing and late comers will lose much of the beauty of the opening movement in the Sibelius symphony.

GAZETTE TIMES

: Pittsburg, Pa.

Coming of the Boston Symphony.

The annual concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which marks the climax of the fourth season of Ellis concerts under the management of Miss May Beegle, will be given in Carngie Music Hall next Wednesday evening, under the leadership of its famous conductor, Dr. Karl Muck. This concert comes eight days after the most memorable concert New York has had in many years. On last Tuesday night the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Paderewski and Kreisler as soloists, gave a special concert in the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, at which the receipts ran over $25,000. This is the first time in 23 years that the Orchestra has given a concert in New York outside of its regular subscription series.

Dr. Karl Muck,
Conductor.

At the concert next Wednesday evening the entire personnel of the orchestra will be used. The program that Dr. Muck has arranged is one of reat variety, full of contrasts, and ach separate work must be regarded as a masterpiece of its kind. The symphony will be the first of the four written by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius. In sharp contrast to the Symphony is the Overture to Goethe's "Egmont" by Beethoven. Then will come that exquisite bit of tone painting, Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun." The final number will be by another Frenchman, Emanuel Chabrier, his Rhapsody "Espana," one of the most brilliant pieces in the literature of the orchestra.

CHRONICLE TELEGRAM

ess: Pittsburgh, Pa.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO GIVE VARIED PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Music Hall next Wednesday night, January 24, will give a program of great variety. The entire personnel of the orchestra will be used, numbering 100 players. The symphony will be the first of the series written by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius. In contrast to this symphony is the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," by Beethoven, and Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun." The final number on the program will be the "Espana" Rhapsody, by Emanuel Chabrier.

PRESS

Pittsburg, Pa.

JAN 21 1917

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO COME HERE WEDNESDAY

Annual Concert Will Be Given in Carnegie Music Hall

The annual concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which marks the climax of the fourth season of Ellis concerts under the management of Miss May Beegle, will be given in Carnegie Music hall next Wednesday evening, Jan. 24, under the leadership of its famous conductor, Dr. Karl Muck. This concert comes eight days after the most memorable concert New York has had in many years. On last Tuesday night the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Paderewski and Kreisler as soloists, gave a special concert in the Metropolitan Opera house, New York, at which the receipts ran over $25,000. This is the first time in 23 years that the orchestra has given a concert in New York outside of its regular subscription series and while it had the greatest pianist and greatest violinist a ssoloists, it is the general concensus of opinion that the star attraction was the orchestra. It is impossible in New York to buy tickets for any of the regular Boston Symphony concerts, owing to the fact that everything is sold by the season from year to year, and the desire on the part of the musical public to take advantage of this single concert in the large Metropolitan Opera house, was not to be wondered at.

Never in its history has this orchestra reached such a uniformly high level of achievement as it has during the present season. Its position as the foremost orchestra of the world was never so firmly established as it is today. The five years that Dr. Muck has had it in his charge have wrought wonders, and its success from every point of view has never been so great. At the concert next Wednesday evening the entire personnel of the orchestra will be used. The program that Dr. Muck has arranged is one of great variety, full of contrasts, and each separate work must be regarded as a masterpiece of its kind. The symphony will be the first of the four written by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius. In sharp contrast to the symphony is the overture to Goethe's "Egmont" by Beethoven. Then will come that exquisite bit of tone painting, Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun." The final number will be by another Frenchman, Emanuel Chabrier, his rhapsody "Espana," one of the most brilliant pieces in the literature of the orchestra.

COURIER

Buffalo, N. Y.

JAN 2 : 1917

BOSTON ORCHESTRA SCORES TRIUMPH

The annual visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra is always the most brilliant event in Buffalo's musical season and last evening's concert at Elmwood Music hall proved no exception to the rule, for a large and fashionable audience was in attendance, and Dr. Kark Muck and his splendid band of musicians were received with the greatest enthusiasm, which deepened in fervor as the programme progressed.

Under the spell of music so magnificently interpreted, Dr. Muck, who so superbly revealed this vision of musical beauty, stands forth as a conductor of unsurpassed powers, and his readings brought out the full tone of the orchestra, revealing perfection of the separate choirs. The programme was a blending of the classic and modern composers, the latter being represented by the opening work, Symphony No. 1 in E minor, Op. 39, by Sibelius, which created a profound impression, and at the hands of Dr. Muck fairly glowed in its vivid and changeful prismatic colors. It is a work which stirs the blood and strikes a peculiar chord of intensity and poetic feeling, particularly in the first movement, which is continued in more subdued but equally beautiful form in the Andante of the succeeding movement, while the delicate charm of the Allegro led to the imposing Finale, which swept on with crashing melodies like a rushing wind. At the close of this performance both conductor and musicians were tendered flattering appreciation.

The overture to "The Flying Dutchman" revealed Dr. Muck's genius as a Wagnerian conductor, and was weirdly beautiful and masterful in its presentation. In variations on a theme of Josef Hayden, Op. 56a, Dr. Muck once more displayed his breadth and brilliant equipment, for during this presentation there was not a wearisome moment, new life and fresh thoughts animating every measure of this delightful number.

The programme closed with the overture to Wagner's "Oberon," in which marked individuality and a dominating vitality were striking features, Dr. Muck reading it as one who knows the very inner spirit of the music and is therefore able to elucidate it for the joy and pleasure of his hearers. At the close he was recalled and paid a graceful tribute to the members of his orchestra by having them rise and share in the applause.

This was the third subscription concert given under the local management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith.

COURIER

Buffalo, N. Y.

JAN 23 191

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES CONCERT HERE TONIGHT

Fresh from the greatest triumph in its history, the $25,000 audience at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, last Tuesday, the Boston Symphony orchestra arrives in Buffalo this morning and this evening in the Elmwood Music hall it will give the third concert in Mrs. Mai Davis Smith's annual series of six.

The men left Boston on Sunday night for their annual midwinter tour. On their big special train are more than 100 musicians and orchestra attaches, with Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, who will conduct the concert tonight; C. A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, and William H. Brennan, the business manager. From Buffalo they go to Pittsburgh, where already the house is sold out for tomorrow night's concert.

Dr. Muck's programme for this evening is one of novelty and charm. The hour for the concert is 8:15 o'clock and promptness in arrival is urged, for no one will be seated while the orchestra is playing and late comers will lose much of the beauty of the opening movement in the Sibelius symphony.

Seats are on sale at Denton, Cottier Daniels.

SUN

ess: Pittsburgh, Pa.

JAN 2

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose concert in Carnegie Music Hall next Wednesday evening, January 24, marks the climax of the fourth season of Ellis concerts, will give a program of great variety, full of contrasts, and each work a masterpiece of its kind. The entire personnel of the orchestra will be used, numbering 100 players. The symphony will be the first of the series of four written by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius. In sharp contrast to this symphony is the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," by Beethoven. An exquisite bit of tone-painting will be given in Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun." The final number willbe the "Espana" rhapsody by Emanuel Chabrier.

TRIBUNE

ss: Detroit, Mich.

JAN 28 1917

BOSTON BAND IN WAYNE PROGRAM

Dr. Karl Muck directed the Boston Symphony orchestra in the annual Wagner program of the Detroit Orchestral association, Saturday evening in Arcadia. The usual house, the largest of the orchestral season, greeted the band which is reputed to be the finest in America; and if it did not outshine, on this occasion, the orchestras which have preceded it in the course, it was due to the improvements in those organizations and to the nature of the program.

It cannot be said that Dr. Muck is the foremost interpreter of Wagner. That honor, if the memory of past performances holds good, still belongs to Mr. Damrosch, whose readings may almost be said to have standardized Wagner for the concert hall in America. Dr. Muck's direction differed materially from that of Mr. Damrosch in many instances, and did not improve upon it. He failed to give Lohengrin prelude, for example, that upper ether interpretation in which the conductor of the New York Symphony band is so wonderful, but played it with a much fuller tone, nor was the Tannhaeuser overture as impressive under Dr. Muck's baton. It may be that familiarity has accustomed Detroit audiences to Mr. Damrosch to such an extent that another style of rendition sounds queer; but certainly there was not the enthusiasm which the New Yorker has always been so successful in evoking.

This difference must not be allowed to detract from the excellence of Dr. Muck's conducting. He made the Dienzi overture very beautiful and decidedly more interesting than it sometimes sounds, and the Siegfried idyl was wonderfully played. It may have been the arrangement of the "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung" selections that made that number a bit too ponderous; but the great music from "Die Meistersinger" was masterfully played. On the whole, the strings did not seem to be up to the usual standard, and the brass was occasionally overpowering to those who sat on that side of hall, but Arcadia is not the best place in the world, or even in Detroit, for an orchestra which carries the number of men and the tone-producing power which the Boston band possesses. The wood-winds were at all times excellent. When the proper balance of choirs was maintained, as it usually was, the fine organ-quality demanded of so much of Wagner's work was notably present. Dr. Muck conducted with whole-souled enthusiasm. He has lost much of the pedantic manner which was once remarked in him, and seems to put himself more in sympathy with his audience.

Beethoven lovers will be glad to hear that the Cincinnati orchestra, which plays in the Orchestral course, Feb. 6, will give his seventh symphony.

W. K. KELSEY.

PRESS

Cleveland, Ohio

JAN 26 1917

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Whether it is the artistic ukase of Director Muck, or the expense attending the visitation of the Bostonians being too great to permit the interpolation of a soloist in Thursday night's program, is a matter of inconsequence; the fact remains that we had an exclusively symphonic concert.

Another item worthy of chronicle is that the latees were not allowed to disturb affairs until after the completion of the symphony; an indication that we are becoming metropolitanized, and mayhap in the future we may attain reformation—that is some of us.

Thursday night's program was one of distinct neutral cast, the honors of representation being divided among France, Russian and Germany; and Dr. Muck's presentation of it gave ample evidence that in art there are no belligerent lines of division.

It hardly seems necessary to dilate upon the super-excellence of the Boston orchestra. In the matter of absolute balance and refinement in nuance, it leads them all. The perfect blend of the several orchestra choirs, whether antiphonal or in ensemble, is refinement in the highest degree.

Muck Similar to Thomas.

Muck in his handling of his players reminds one of Theo Thomas; the same mental and physical poise, a self containment that infects his players and gives such unity of effort and effect as is found only in a perfectly drilled organization.

A simple indication of the baton, an inclination of the head, or a glance of the eye, is all sufficient to compel the subtlest nuance or the most elemental of climaxes.

That Muck has the best of material to work with is an assured fact, but it is his conservative poise and restrained emotionalism that makes of his orchestra a machine perfect in its component parts.

The exotic atmosphere and orientalism of Borodin's Steppes sketch was realized quite as fully as was the fantastic and grotesque character of the Strauss "Eulenspiegel" poem. Both were splendid realizations of the composer's intent, and served to display the technical virtuosity and nuance capabilities of his orchestra.

CHRONICLE TELEGRAM

Pittsburgh, Pa.

JAN 25 1917

Boston Orchestra Is Given Warm Reception

Large, Representative and Appreciative Audience Pleased With Music and Orchestra Leader.

The fifth concert of the Ellis series was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Carnegie Music Hall. The audience was large, representative and appreciative. Dr. Karl Muck added to his fame as conductor, for his direction was conspicuously intelligent and resulted in a ready response from his musicians. The program began with an unusual composition—Symphony No. 1, by Sibelius. Its complexity of form and rhythm did not prevent its thorough enjoyment. The leading themes were most interestingly worked out. While the symphony is thoroughly classical in form, it gave a pleasing touch of the best of modern music to the program. The second movement—andante, ma non troppo lento—was especially melodious.

The intermission followed the symphony, and immediately afterward, Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's "Egmont" was given—a work always lovely in its classical simplicity. Then came Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn, followed by Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun." This was pleasing, not alone for its own sake, but also because it recalled to many in the audience the Russian dancers who appeared here last year. It is very restful and fanciful. Chabrier's "Espana," a rhapsody for orchestra, brought a thoughtful and decidedly intellectual program to a close, with its merry Spanish folk dances. The simplicity of the waltz was maintained during the complicated orchestration.

Syracuse, N. Y.

JAN 2 8 1917

FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAUDITS

Exquisite Perfection Features Orchestral Concert by Dr. Muck's Men.

RED LETTER MUSICAL DAY

When Syracuse Filled Wieting Right to Eaves—And Enjoyed It.

There has probably been no more exquisitely perfect concert in the history of Syracuse music than that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Wieting last night, whatever may be said of concerts where there was more sustained enthusiasm and response. Dr. Karl Muck has the Boston Symphony tradition in appreciative and intellectual direction, and under his baton he has made the orchestra probably the most perfect machine of the kind in the country to-day. The renditions are most worth, musical transcripts of the score, poetic where the composer is poetic; pictures where the composer is picturesque, and so on—faithful, wonderful, ennobling. You feel when you applaud the work of Dr. Muck and his talented men, as if you were also applauding the composer. They have read you the composer's message exactly and have not trespassed by their own individuality—the interpretation is always one of musical brains, not poetic or musical license.

These statements were especially true last night in the rendition of Brahm's wonderful Symphony No. 1 in C Minor, Op. 68 and the Berlioz overture to "The Corsair," Op. 21. There is much upon the history of both compositions, but little as regards meanings and thought except what is expressed in the music itself. That is melodiously rich and to each a message, according to lights and temperament of the hearer. Who shall say what that message was for the other?

It is doubtful if there was ever heard here a more exquisite and perfect string ensemble or sympathetic wood wind. Probably more hearts were reached by the picturesque Borodin sketch, "On the Steppes of Middle Asia," and more feeling was stirred by the Wagner overture to "The Flying Dutchman," but the evening will be remembered in the musical records of Syracuse as the "night we heard Brahm's Symphony."

Dr. Muck showed Syracuse why he stands in the first rank of conductors of the present time. He is a master of phrase; he has taught sensibility and is remarkable in the securing of perfect rhythm. It is interesting to recall that it was with this Brahm's Symphony that Dr. Muck made his first great success in this country and first fully revealed—this in the season of 1906—his supreme qualities as an interpreter of the masterpieces of orchestral music.

It has been the fashion in Syracuse when there were excellent concerts but sparsely attended to scold the music-loving public. Now it is up to somebody to reverse action, for the Wieting last night had every seat taken to the eaves and the audience was warn in its appreciation.

POST

ess: Pittsburgh, Pa.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The annual concert of the Boston symphony orchestra will be given in Carnegie Music Hall Wednesday evening under the leadership of its conductor, Dr. Karl Muck. Never in the history has this orchestra reached such a uniformly high level of achievement as it has during the present season. The five years that Dr. Muck has had it in his charge have wrought wonders and its success from every point of view has never been so great. At the concert next Wednesday evening the entire personnel of the orchestra will be used. The program that Dr. Muck has arranged is one of great variety, full of contrasts, and each separate work must be regarded as a masterpiece of its kind. The symphony will be the first of the four written by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius. In sharp contrast to the symphony is the overture to Goethe's "Egmont" by Beethoven. Then will come that exquisite bit of tone painting, Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun." The final number will be by another Frenchman, Emanuel Chabrier, his rhapsody, "Espana," one of the most brilliant pieces in the literature of the orchestra.

[76]

m POST STANDARD
dress: Syracuse, N. Y. e JAN 25 1917

Syracuse, January 23.

Music and Color.

To the Editor of The Post-Standard:

While listening to the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Monday night a question came into my mind. 1884

If a musician who was also a lover of the other arts were placed before the great canvases of Zuloaga, for example, could he concentrate his thoughts upon their beauty, however great his natural appreciation, if at the same time a chorus of discordant notes issuing from a variety of instruments hideously unadapted to each other, and all out of tune, were pounding upon his ears?

I think we will all agree that if he could ignore these sounds and drink in the glory of the canvases before him till his soul thrilled with the wonder of it all, he was either superhuman or deaf.

Yet some of us who are workers in the arts and lovers of music, though not musicians, while attempting to open our minds to the subtle suggestion of a Brahms symphony, were forced to see atrocities of color and design in the stage setting before us, the like of which cannot be portrayed in words.

Was it possible to ignore all this, and unhampered, steep our souls in the beauty of the musical harmonies?

Perhaps, if we had been blind! But we were not.

Why should the public be tortured thus unjustly? Unfortunately there are no laws against combinations of color and design such as were afforded us in the stage setting of Monday night. Cannot public opinion do something?

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with the setting to which I have just referred, reminded one of a pearl necklace displayed against a background of rags!

Is it not time that we in America—in Syracuse—begin to recognize the relationship and interdependence of the arts?

How can we hope to create a right appreciation for music where color discords are allowed to shriek at musical harmonies, while the latter seek in vain to make their proper appeal, and the innocent victim of it all cries out in despair, "How long, O Lord, how long?"

A SUBSCRIBER.

Syracuse, January 24.

NEWS TRIBUNE
ss: Detroit, Mich.
JAN 28 191

BOSTON BAND IN WAYNE PROGRAM

Dr. Karl Muck directed the Boston Symphony orchestra in the annual Wagner program of the Detroit Orchestral association, Saturday evening in Arcadia. The usual house, the largest of the orchestral season, greeted the band which is reputed to be the finest in America; and if it did not outshine, on this occasion, the orchestras which have preceded it in the course, it was due to the improvements in those organizations and to the nature of the program.

It cannot be said that Dr. Muck is the foremost interpreter of Wagner. That honor, if the memory of past performances holds good, still belongs to Mr. Damrosch, whose readings may almost be said to have standardized Wagner for the concert hall in America. Dr. Muck's direction differed materially from that of Mr. Damrosch in many instances, and did not improve upon it. He failed to give Lohengrin prelude, for example, that upper ether interpretation in which the conductor of the New York Symphony band is so wonderful, but played it with a much fuller tone, nor was the Tannhaeuser overture as impressive under Dr. Muck's baton. It may be that familiarity has accustomed Detroit audiences to Mr. Damrosch to such an extent that another style of rendition sounds queer; but certainly there was not the enthusiasm which the New Yorker has always been so successful in evoking.

This difference must not be allowed to detract from the excellence of Dr. Muck's conducting. He made the Dienzi overture very beautiful and decidedly more interesting than it sometimes sounds, and the Siegfried idyl was wonderfully played. It may have been the arrangement of the "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung" selections that made that number a bit too ponderous; but the great music from "Die Meistersinger" was masterfully played. On the whole, the strings did not seem to be up to the usual standard, and the brass was occasionally overpowering to those who sat on that side of hall, but Arcadia is not the best place in the world, or even in Detroit, for an orchestra which carries the number of men and the tone-producing power which the Boston band possesses. The wood-winds were at all times excellent. When the proper balance of choirs was maintained, as it usually was, the fine organ-quality demanded of so much of Wagner's work was notably present. Dr. Muck conducted with whole-souled enthusiasm. He has lost much of the pedantic manner which was once remarked in him, and seems to put himself more in sympathy with his audience.

Beethoven lovers will be glad to hear that the Cincinnati orchestra, which plays in the Orchestral course, Feb. 6, will give his seventh symphony.

W. K. KELSEY.

POST STANDARD
n Syracuse, N. Y.
ress:
JAN 20 1917

SYMPHONY TO PLAY NUMBERS NOT GIVEN HERE PREVIOUSLY

Boston Orchestra, 108 Strong, Coming to Wieting Monday Fresh from New York Triumph.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the leading musical organizations of the country, comes to the Wieting on Monday night for one concert performance under the auspices of the Morning Salon and Morning Musicals. The orchestra has not been here in three years and its advent at this time is due to the efforts of Miss Laura Van Kuran and Miss A. Kathleen King, representing the two clubs.

Fresh from triumphs in New York and all the large Eastern cities, the orchestra comes to Syracuse with 108 persons, including its famous German conductor, Dr. Karl Muck. The programme comprises some numbers that have never been heard here before, but have been received with great pleasure wherever presented.

The orchestra will leave Boston to-morrow night by special train and will arrive in Syracuse Monday morning. It will remain here over Monday night and start for Buffalo Tuesday morning, where it is scheduled for a concert that evening.

By request of a large number of music lovers here Conductor Muck has agreed to have the First Symphony of Brahms in C minor No. 1 played as the opening number. This is regarded as one of the finest contributions to symphonic literature since Beethoven wrote his Ninth Symphony. It is in this Brahms composition that Conductor Muck made his name and fame in this country when he arrived here in 1906. His power of interpretation in this composition has won the applause of all the leading musical journals and critics in the United States.

The programme for Monday night is as follows:

Brahms—Symphony in C minor No. 1.
Berlioz—Overture to "The Corsair," Opus 21.
Borodin—Orchestral sketch, "On the Steppes of Middle Asia."
Wagner—Overture to the opera, "The Flying Dutchman."

Providence, R. I.
ss:
JAN 28

ANOTHER week with but little music of importance is at hand, and aside from to-day's offerings and the week's club meetings, there will not be much of especial interest in comparison with the succeeding seven days during which will come the second in the series of Steinert concerts, next Sunday afternoon, at which Mme. Louise Homer is expected to appear, and the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the following Tuesday evening, when Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, will be the soloist.

Of this week's offerings the most important is expected to be the violin recital in Memorial Hall this afternoon, by Josef Sleczynski, who is a pupil of Ysaye and of Willie Burmester. The rehearsal of the Community Chorus, this afternoon, and the usual Sunday evening concerts will give what has come to be the customary amount of Sunday music.

Providence musicians have frequently proved their generosity by giving their services for the benefit of local institutions, and a concert is now being planned for the benefit of the Providence Rescue Home and Mission, which will be given in Memorial Hall on Thursday evening, Feb. 15, when Amy Woodford Finden's song cycle, "A Pagoda of Flowers," will be sung here for the first time by Miss Inez Harrison and Stephen E. Hopkins, who will be assisted by Mrs. Merwin White, George L. Claflin, Miss Helen Tyler Grant, 'cellist; Leroy Armstrong and Miss Jeane Crum, accompanists. The cycle will be preceded by a brief foreword on "The Art of India" by Dr. John Shapley.

* * *

CHRONICLE TELEGRAM
ess: Pittsburgh, Pa.
JAN 23 1917

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO PLAY TOMORROW NIGHT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 players, with Conductor Karl Muck, will arrive here tomorrow for the fifth concert in the Ellis series tomorrow night in Carnegie Music Hall. The program for tomorrow night includes Symphony No. 1 in E Minor, by Sibelius; Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's "Egmont"; Brahm's "Variations on a Theme by Haydn"; Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and the "Espana" Rhapsody by Chabrier.

n SUN
ess: Pittsburgh, Pa.
JAN 25 1917

SIBELIUS SYMPHONY HAS LOCAL PREMIERE

Boston Orchestra Plays Finnish Work in Last Concert of Ellis Series.

Pittsburgh was given its first hearing of the Sibelius Symphony No. 1 in E minor, Opus 39, last night, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conducting, performed the work in the concluding concert of this season's Ellis series, in Carnegie Music hall. A throng that filled the auditorium expressed warm appreciation, recalling the conductor repeatedly after each half of the program, and paying especial tribute to the orchestra itself.

The first half of the program was devoted entirely to the symphony, and the last to four numbers of Beethoven, Brahms, Debussy and Charbrier. Greatest interest centered in the Sibelius composition, first heard here 18 years after it was composed. Imbued with somber mystery and passionate fire closely akin to the content of Slav music, the symphony is marked by a broad and almost universal vision, untrammeled by the purely personal and unalloyed by the morbid.

Romantic in its character, inspired by vitality of spirit and vigor of rhythm, the work is built upon themes of fertile melodic invention, ingeniously developed, and recalled from movement to movement until they bind the symphony into unusual unity. The chief theme, sounded upon a clarinet at the opening of the first movement, recurs again and again, until it is taken up with the broad sustained effect of full orchestra in the last movement. And here the themes are woven together in a masterly piece of orchestral writing.

Dr. Muck and his men played the symphony with superb finish. He brought out the contrasting rhythms, and the interplay of themes with finesse. The orchestra measured to the highest standard set in former performances, a standard that is matched by few orchestras in the world.

Beethoven's "Egmont" overture was presented with appreciation of its classic quality. The Brahms variations on a theme by Josef Haydn, were especially pleasing, revealing the rich invention and orchestral resources of the composer, applied in a creative way to the basic theme. Delicate tonal coloring and atmosphere characterized the interpretation of Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune." A tempo somewhat slower than is called for by the breathless abandon of the "Espana" rhapsody by Charbrier, which closed the program, robbed this number of some of its fire.

n lress: Providence, R. I.
JAN 28 19
e

Nest." Horatio Parker.

* * *

Dr. Muck has provided a wide variety of works for the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in Infantry Hall a week from next Tuesday evening, Feb. 6. The symphony, which will be Schumann's "Rhenish," the third by the master of the German romantic school, has in recent years been more or less neglected for the first in D-minor and the fourth in B-flat. In the music Schumann sought to portray the "Gemuethlichkeit," the life along the Rhine region, as it was lived in the middle of the 19th century. As announced last Sunday, the second part of the programme will comprise Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," Rachmaninoff's second concerto for piano and orchestra in C-minor and Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture. The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the distinguished Russian pianist.

LEADER
s: Pittsburgh, Pa.
JAN 25 1917

A Fine Concert

Renewed proof of Pittsburg's interest in orchestral music was given last night when the Boston Symphony orchestra packed the Carnegie music hall from pit to roof, for the concluding Ellis concert.

The orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, gave the Pittsburg premiere of the first symphony of Jean Sibelius, the great Finnish composer.

THE PITTS

While familiar to Pittsburg audiences in some of his smaller compositions, the E minor symphony has never been heard here before and played by the Boston orchestra it was the crowning attraction of the musical season.

From DISPATCH
Address: Pittsburg, Pa.
Date JAN 21 1917

ANNUAL CONCERT

Boston Orchestra to Be Heard Under Fine Auspices

With a program of unusual variety and brilliance, with its personnel of 100 musicians under the inspired leadership of its great conductor, Dr Karl Muck, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its annual concert in Pittsburg in Carnegie Music Hall next Wednesday evening, January 24. This will make the closing concert in the fourth season of Ellis subscription concerts under the management of Miss May Beegle, and, as in previous seasons, the Boston Symphony concert is the climax of the season.

The program is full of contrasts, and each separate work is a masterpiece of its kind. The symphony is the first of a series of four written by the Finnish composer, Joan Sibelius. In sharp contrast is the second part of the program, the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," by Beethoven; Brahms' fascinating set of variations on Haydn's Choral to St Anthony; Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun," and the final number will be by another Frenchman, Emanuel Chabrier, his rhapsody, "Espana."

Dr Karl Muck

om LEADER
ldress: Pittsburgh, Pa.
te JAN 21 1917

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT THIS EVENING

The Boston Symphony orchestra of 100 players and Conductor Dr. Karl Muck arrived in Pittsburg by special train this afternoon from Buffalo, where they gave a concert last night. This celebrated organization will give the closing concert in the fourth season of Ellis concerts in Carnegie Music hall tonight. The program has made strong appeal, and the largest audience ever in attendance at a Boston Symphony concert in Pittsburg is expected.

om
dress: Syracuse, N. Y.
FEB 1 1917
e

Scenery.

To the Editor of The Post-Standard:

In summing up what has recently been stated by your correspondents about the conditions at the Boston Symphony Orchestra, I discover a certain method in the madness.

After the usual "asbestos" appears a curtain featuring Mr. Beeman, highly magnified, and a package of his gum, likewise magnified. This curtain deadens all artistic feeling to such an extent that when the stage setting provided for the musicians is exposed, one has not yet recovered sufficiently from the first atrocity to grasp the second in all its hideousness. After such a series of shocks what artistic sensibilities the audience may have had are successfully benumbed—a condition which I grant to be highly desirable as a preparation for a certain type of entertainment—but hardly necessary for a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. M. E. C.

Syracuse, January 31.

[77]

m POST STANDARD

dress: Syracuse, N. Y.

e 5 1917

Syracuse, January 25.

Music and Color.

To the Editor of The Post-Standard:

While listening to the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Monday night a question came into my mind. 1884

If a musician who was also a lover of the other arts were placed before the great canvases of Zuloaga, for example, could he concentrate his thoughts upon their beauty, however great his natural appreciation, if at the same time a chorus of discordant notes issuing from a variety of instruments hideously unadapted to each other, and all out of tune, were pounding upon his ears?

I think we will all agree that if he could ignore these sounds and drink in the glory of the canvases before him till his soul thrilled with the wonder of it all, he was either superhuman or deaf.

Yet some of us who are workers in the arts and lovers of music, though not musicians, while attempting to open our minds to the subtle suggestion of a Brahms symphony, were forced to see atrocities of color and design in the stage setting before us, the like of which cannot be portrayed in words.

Was it possible to ignore all this, and unhampered, steep our souls in the beauty of the musical harmonies?

Perhaps, if we had been blind! But we were not.

Why should the public be tortured thus unjustly? Unfortunately there are no laws against combinations of color and design such as were afforded us in the stage setting of Monday night. Cannot public opinion do something?

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with the setting to which I have just referred, reminded one of a pearl necklace displayed against a background of rags!

Is it not time that we in America—in Syracuse—begin to recognize the relationship and interdependence of the arts?

How can we hope to create a right appreciation for music where color discords are allowed to shriek at musical harmonies, while the latter seek in vain to make their proper appeal, and the innocent victim of it all cries out in despair, "How long, O Lord, how long?"

A SUBSCRIBER.

Syracuse, January 24.

NEWS TRIBUNE

ss: Detroit, Mich.

JAN 28 191

BOSTON BAND IN WAYNE PROGRAM

Dr. Karl Muck directed the Boston Symphony orchestra in the annual Wagner program of the Detroit Orchestral association, Saturday evening in Arcadia. The usual house, the largest of the orchestral season, greeted the band which is reputed to be the finest in America; and if it did not outshine, on this occasion, the orchestras which have preceded it in the course, it was due to the improvements in those organizations and to the nature of the program.

It cannot be said that Dr. Muck is the foremost interpreter of Wagner. That honor, if the memory of past performances holds good, still belongs to Mr. Damrosch, whose readings may almost be said to have standardized Wagner for the concert hall in America. Dr. Muck's direction differed materially from that of Mr. Damrosch in many instances, and did not improve upon it. He failed to give Lohengrin prelude, for example, that upper ether interpretation in which the conductor of the New York Symphony band is so wonderful, but played it with a much fuller tone, nor was the Tannhaeuser overture as impressive under Dr. Muck's baton. It may be that familiarity has accustomed Detroit audiences to Mr. Damrosch to such an extent that another style of rendition sounds queer; but certainly there was not the enthusiasm which the New Yorker has always been so successful in evoking.

This difference must not be allowed to detract from the excellence of Dr. Muck's conducting. He made the Dienzi overture very beautiful and decidedly more interesting than it sometimes sounds, and the Siegfried idyl was wonderfully played. It may have been the arrangement of the "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung" selections that made that number a bit too ponderous; but the great music from "Die Meistersinger" was masterfully played. On the whole, the strings did not seem to be up to the usual standard, and the brass was occasionally overpowering to those who sat on that side of hall, but Arcadia is not the best place in the world, or even in Detroit, for an orchestra which carries the number of men and the tone-producing power which the Boston band possesses. The wood-winds were at all times excellent. When the proper balance of choirs was maintained, as it usually was, the fine organ-quality demanded of so much of Wagner's work was notably present. Dr. Muck conducted with whole-souled enthusiasm. He has lost much of the pedantic manner which was once remarked in him, and seems to put himself more in sympathy with his audience.

Beethoven lovers will be glad to hear that the Cincinnati orchestra, which plays in the Orchestral course, Feb. 6, will give his seventh symphony.

W. K. KELSEY.

POST STANDARD

Syracuse, N. Y.

ress:

JAN 20 1917

SYMPHONY TO PLAY NUMBERS NOT GIVEN HERE PREVIOUSLY

Boston Orchestra, 108 Strong, Coming to Wieting Monday Fresh from New York Triumph.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the leading musical organizations of the country, comes to the Wieting on Monday night for one concert performance under the auspices of the Morning Salon and Morning Musicals. The orchestra has not been here in three years and its advent at this time is due to the efforts of Miss Laura Van Kuran and Miss A. Kathleen King, representing the two clubs.

Fresh from triumphs in New York and all the large Eastern cities, the orchestra comes to Syracuse with 108 persons, including its famous German conductor, Dr. Karl Muck. The programme comprises some numbers that have never been heard here before, but have been received with great pleasure wherever presented.

The orchestra will leave Boston to-morrow night by special train and will arrive in Syracuse Monday morning. It will remain here over Monday night and start for Buffalo Tuesday morning, where it is scheduled for a concert that evening.

By request of a large number of music lovers here Conductor Muck has agreed to have the First Symphony of Brahms in C minor No. 1 played as the opening number. This is regarded as one of the finest contributions to symphonic literature since Beethoven wrote his Ninth Symphony. It was in this Brahms composition that Conductor Muck made his name and fame in this country when he arrived here in 1906. His power of interpretation in this composition has won the applause of all the leading musical journals and critics in the United States.

The programme for Monday night is as follows:

Brahms—Symphony in C minor No. 1.

Berlioz—Overture to "The Corsair," Opus 21.

Borodin—Orchestral sketch, "On the Steppes of Middle Asia."

Wagner—Overture to the opera, "The Flying Dutchman."

Providence, R. I.

ss:

ANOTHER week with but little music of importance is at hand, and aside from to-day's offerings and the week's club meetings, there will not be much of especial interest in comparison with the succeeding seven days during which will come the second in the series of Steinert concerts, next Sunday afternoon, at which Mme. Louise Homer is expected to appear, and the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the following Tuesday evening, when Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, will be the soloist.

Of this week's offerings the most important is expected to be the violin recital in Memorial Hall this afternoon, by Josef Sleczynski, who is a pupil of Ysaye and of Willie Burmester. The rehearsal of the Community Chorus, this afternoon, and the usual Sunday evening concerts will give what has come to be the customary amount of Sunday music.

Providence musicians have frequently proved their generosity by giving their services for the benefit of local institutions, and a concert is now being planned for the benefit of the Providence Rescue Home and Mission, which will be given in Memorial Hall on Thursday evening, Feb. 15, when Amy Woodford Finden's song cycle, "A Pagoda of Flowers," will be sung here for the first time by Miss Inez Harrison and Stephen E. Hopkins, who will be assisted by Mrs. Merwin White, George L. Claflin, Miss Helen Tyler Grant, 'cellist; Leroy Armstrong and Miss Jeane Crum, accompanists. The cycle will be preceded by a brief foreword on "The Art of India" by Dr. John Shapley.

* * *

CHRONICLE TELEGRAM

ess: Pittsburgh, Pa.

JAN 23 1917

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO PLAY TOMORROW NIGHT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 players, with Conductor Karl Muck, will arrive here tomorrow for the fifth concert in the Ellis series tomorrow night in Carnegie Music Hall. The program for tomorrow night includes Symphony No. 1 in E Minor, by Sibelius; Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's "Egmont"; Brahm's "Variations on a Theme by Haydn"; Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," and the "Espana" Rhapsody by Chabrier.

n SUN

ess: Pittsburgh, Pa. JAN 2 0 1917

SIBELIUS SYMPHONY HAS LOCAL PREMIERE

Boston Orchestra Plays Finnish Work in Last Concert of Ellis Series.

Pittsburgh was given its first hearing of the Sibelius Symphony No. 1 in E minor, Opus 39, last night, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conducting, performed the work in the concluding concert of this season's Ellis series, in Carnegie Music hall. A throng that filled the auditorium expressed warm appreciation, recalling the conductor repeatedly after each half of the program, and paying especial tribute to the orchestra itself.

The first half of the program was devoted entirely to the symphony, and the last to four numbers of Beethoven, Brahms, Debussy and Charbrier. Greatest interest centered in the Sibelius composition, first heard here 18 years after it was composed. Imbued with somber mystery and passionate fire closely akin to the content of Slav music, the symphony is marked by a broad and almost universal vision, untrammeled by the purely personal and unalloyed by the morbid.

Romantic in its character, inspired by vitality of spirit and vigor of rhythm, the work is built upon themes of fertile melodic invention, ingeniously developed, and recalled from movement to movement until they bind the symphony into unusual unity. The chief theme, sounded upon a clarinet at the opening of the first movement, recurs again and again, until it is taken up with the broad sustained effect of full orchestra in the last movement. And here the themes are woven together in a masterly piece of orchestral writing.

Dr. Muck and his men played the symphony with superb finish. He brought out the contrasting rhythms, and the interplay of themes with finesse. The orchestra measured to the highest standard set in former performances, a standard that is matched by few orchestras in the world.

Beethoven's "Egmont" overture was presented with appreciation of its classic quality. The Brahms variations on a theme by Josef Haydn, were especially pleasing, revealing the rich invention and orchestral resources of the composer, applied in a creative way to the basic theme. Delicate tonal coloring and atmosphere characterized the interpretation of Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune." A tempo somewhat slower than is called for by the breathless abandon of the "Espana" rhapsody by Charbrier, which closed the program, robbed this number of some of its fire.

n

ress: Providence, R. I. JAN 28 1917

e

Nest" Horatio Parker.

* * *

Dr. Muck has provided a wide variety of works for the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in Infantry Hall a week from next Tuesday evening, Feb. 6. The symphony, which will be Schumann's "Rhenish," the third by the master of the German romantic school, has in recent years been more or less neglected for the first in D-minor and the fourth in B-flat. In the music Schumann sought to portray the "Gemuethlichkeit," the life along the Rhine region, as it was lived in the middle of the 19th century. As announced last Sunday, the second part of the programme will comprise Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," Rachmaninoff's second concerto for piano and orchestra in C-minor and Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture. The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the distinguished Russian pianist.

LEADER

s: Pittsburgh, Pa. JAN 2 3 1917

A Fine Concert

Renewed proof of Pittsburg's interest in orchestral music was given last night when the Boston Symphony orchestra packed the Carnegie music hall from pit to roof, for the concluding Ellis concert.

The orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, gave the Pittsburg premiere of the first symphony of Jean Sibelius, the great Finnish composer.

THE PITTS

While familiar to Pittsburg audiences in some of his smaller compositions, the E minor symphony has never been heard here before and played by the Boston orchestra it was the crowning attraction of the musical season.

From DISPATCH

Address: Pittsburg, Pa.

Date JAN 21 1917

ANNUAL CONCERT

Boston Orchestra to Be Heard Under Fine Auspices

With a program of unusual variety and brilliance, with its personnel of 100 musicians under the inspired leadership of its great conductor, Dr Karl Muck, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its annual concert in Pittsburg in Carnegie Music Hall next Wednesday evening, January 24. This will make the closing concert in the fourth season of Ellis subscription concerts under the management of Miss May Beegle, and, as in previous seasons, the Boston Symphony concert is the climax of the season.

The program is full of contrasts, and each separate work is a masterpiece of its kind. The symphony is the first of a series of four written by the Finnish composer, Joan Sibelius. In sharp contrast is the second part of the program, the overture to Goethe's "Egmont," by Beethoven; Brahms' fascinating set of variations on Haydn's Choral to St Anthony; Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun," and the final number will be by another Frenchman, Emanuel Chabrier, his rhapsody, "Espana."

Dr Karl Muck

om LEADER

ldress: Pittsburgh, Pa.

te JAN 21 1917

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT THIS EVENING

The Boston Symphony orchestra of 100 players and Conductor Dr. Karl Muck arrived in Pittsburg by special train this afternoon from Buffalo, where they gave a concert last night. This celebrated organization will give the closing concert in the fourth season of Ellis concerts in Carnegie Music hall tonight. The program has made strong appeal, and the largest audience ever in attendance at a Boston Symphony concert in Pittsburg is expected.

om

dress: Syracuse, N. Y. FEB 1 1917

e

Scenery.

To the Editor of The Post-Standard:

In summing up what has recently been stated by your correspondents about the conditions at the Boston Symphony Orchestra, I discover a certain method in the madness.

After the usual "asbestos" appears a curtain featuring Mr. Beeman, highly magnified, and a package of his gum, likewise magnified. This curtain deadens all artistic feeling to such an extent that when the stage setting provided for the musicians is exposed, one has not yet recovered sufficiently from the first atrocity to grasp the second in all its hideousness. After such a series of shocks what artistic sensibilities the audience may have had are successfully benumbed—a condition which I grant to be highly desirable as a preparation for a certain type of entertainment—but hardly necessary for a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. M. E. C.

Syracuse, January 31.

[77]

TRIBUNE EVE.
s: Providence, R. I.
FEB 7 1917

FOURTH CONCERT OF HIGH ORDER

Brilliant Program by Boston Symphony Orchestra and Pianist.

There was the usual large audience at Infantry Hall last night at the fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the noted young pianist as the soloist. The combination of this musical organization of high character and the soloist, who is regarded as one of the most eminent of the younger group of famous artists upon the piano, with a program that was brilliant and capably rendered promised a concert of the highest excellence and enjoyment and that promise was fulfilled. Once more Dr. Muck, the director, had prepared a list of numbers calculated to please all tastes among the regular attendants upon these concerts and the audience left no doubt that it appreciated what was offered to the fullest extent. Arranged in its proper order the program was as follows:

Schumann..Symphony in E-flat major, No. 3, "Rhenish," Op. 97.
Lebhaft,
Sahr massig,
Nicht schnell,
Feierlich,
Lebhaft.
Debussy .....
..."Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune"
Rachmaninoff .....
..Second Concerto for Pianoforte with orchestra. Op. 18.
Moderato,
Adagio sostenuto,
Allegro scherzando.
Brahms ..Academis Festival Overture, (
Brahms .....
....Academic Festival Overture, Op. 80

The symphony is the third in the series of four works in symphonic form left by Schumann in which he endeavored to express the feelings and hopes of the Rhenish people. This selection is not so familiar to many as others by this composer, but it is more than ordinarily rich in melody and consideration of the most characteristic of the works of this master. It was his own people whose sentiments and aspirations he sought to express through this symphony, for he sprang from the dwellers in the lower Rhine region and his thoughts often turned thither in his musical work. The music is full of tenderness, sympathy and strong feeling and what might be expected from a great composer inspired with a desire to put into musical form the emotions of the people he loved. The most impressive episode is the fourth movement based upon a festival in the great cathedral of Cologne.

Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," though one of the earlier works of this composer, seems to have had greater permanence than any other of his productions. It is comparatively brief but exquisite in form and melody and reminiscent of the Greek feeling that is the basisis of the poem that inspired the musical setting. There are few selections better adapted to a program of the highest quality and it was rendered in a manner that left nothing to be desired.

The final orchestral number, the overture to Brahm's "Academic Festival," is quite familiar to regular attendants upon Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, but always enjoyable. It is built upon traditional student songs, the occasion for its composition being the reception by Brahms of his doctor's degree from Breslau University. It is typical of the sort of music that formed its basis, being spirited and lively.

The concerto by Rachminoff was played by Mr. Gabrilowitsch in a brilliant and forceful manner. It offers special opportunity to reveal mastery of technique as well as skill of execution and that opportunity was fully embraced by the pianist. With the fine accompaniment by the orchestra the number was one of the best ever heard at one of these concerts.

om TOWN & COUNTRY
ddress: New York City
FEB 1 1917
ate

A GALA concert was given at the Metropolitan Opera House on the evening of January sixteenth by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the auspices of the Vacation Association, the organization of working girls headed by Miss Anne Morgan. This concert was distinctly out of the ordinary course of events, for the Bostonians had not played outside their own series of concerts in a great many years. Ignace Paderewski and Fritz Kreisler were the soloists. Mr. Paderewski played Schumann's concerto for pianoforte in his most lyric and imaginative style, and Mr. Kreisler's performance of the Mendelssohn concerto for violin was delightful in tone and expression. The orchestral numbers were Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride," Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," and Enesco's Rumanian Rhapsody, Op. 11, No. 1. Dr. Muck conducted and the orchestra has rarely been heard to better advantage. The opera house was filled to its utmost capacity and the results were highly satisfactory, the total receipts being about $25,000. In the sale of seats preference was given to the working girls, but there was no lack of brilliancy in the horseshoe as society was well represented in the boxes.

ess: Providence, R. I.
FEB 7 1917

DR. MUCK DIRECTS BOSTON SYMPHONY IN CONCERT HERE

Gabrilowitsch, Pianist, Soloist of Infantry Hall Programme, Plays in Brilliant Fashion. Accompaniments Are in Excellent Accord.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conducting, gave its fourth concert in this city at Infantry Hall last evening. Ossip Gabrilowitsch was the soloist. The famous pianist played Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto in brilliant style. With the exception of the solo number, the Debussy "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune," aroused the greatest interest. Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony, while a fine work, is not one calculated to enthuse the hearer. It was interestingly if not brilliantly performed.

The programme was played as follows:

Schumann..Symphony in E-flat Major, No. 3, "Rhenish," Op. 97.
Lebhaft.
Sehr massig.
Nicht schnell,
Feierlich.
Lebhaft.
Debussy..."Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune"
Rachmaninoff..Second Concerto for Pianoforte with Orchestra, Op. 18.
Moderato.
Adagio sostenuto.
Allegro scherzando.
Brahms....Academic Festival Overture, Op. 80

Schumann's Symphony, No. 3, known as the "Rhenish," depicts the life of the folk along the Rhine. Although it is by no means the composer's best symphonic work, Schumann was particularly fond of it, possibly for the reason that it was an intimate reminder of scenes that he loved. The orchestra played it in splendid fashion, the last movement's joyous character being admirably portrayed.

Dr. Muck's clear and beautiful reading of Debussy's highly imaginative tone-picture was a feature of the programme. Needless to say it was played with faultless technique. Debussy's music gives a remarkably realistic impression of the imaginative flights of the poem by Stephane Mallarme. Its ever-changing color and spontaneous floating melodies fascinate and delight the ear.

In the concerto by Rachmaninoff Mr. Gabrilowitsch displayed a brilliant technique and abounding fire. This, of course, was true in the playing of the first and third movements, the second being calm and sustained in character. In such a work the pianist has little enough opportunity to show all round ability. It is largely a battle with superior numbers and fortunate indeed is he who can smite with sufficient power to be heard above the orchestral storm.

But there were many less strenuous occasions last evening when the soloist had a chance to delight his hearers with a beautiful tone, singing phrase and wonderfully clear finger work. Dr. Muck's accompaniment was in splendid accord with the solo part, and the fine performance was greeted with tremendous and deserved applause.

Brahm's "Academic Festival Overture" is academic in name only, as it is a work of decided melodic worth, built upon a number of student songs. It brought the concert to a brilliant close.

NORTH AMERICAN
s: Philadelphia, Pa.

MADAME STOKOWSKI IN HOSPITAL; ANKLE SPRAINED

Orchestra Leader's Wife Injured in New York While on Way to Boston

Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, had authorities in several cities yesterday searching for Mrs. Stokowski, who, as Olga Samaroff, the celebrated pianist, is known internationally.

Upon his return from the orchestra concert in the Academy of Music to his home, in Merion, yesterday, Mr. Stokowski became alarmed when he found his wife was not there. Word was sent to police in this city and in New York, who sent descriptions of Mrs. Stokowski broadcast.

Last night Mr. Stokowski was relieved when she wired to him from New York. Mrs. Stokowski has a concert engagement in Boston today with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and left home on a train earlier than the one she had planned to take, but in New York she sprained an ankle and went to the Roosevelt Hospital. She will not be able to fulfill her Boston engagement, as it will be several days before she can leave the hospital.

Journal
Providence, R. I.
FEB 7 1917

DR. MUCK CONDUCTS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Gabrilowitsch, Pianist, is Soloist at Infantry Hall.

PLAYS IN BRILLIANT STYLE

Famous Organization Gives Its Fourth Concert in This City. Tone Picture is Feature of Programme.—Accompaniments Are in Splendid Accord with Solos.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conducting, gave its fourth concert in this city at Infantry Hall last evening. Ossip Gabrilowitsch was the soloist. The famous pianist played Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto in brilliant style. With the exception of the solo number, the Debussy "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune," aroused the greatest interest. Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony, while a fine work, is not one calculated to enthuse the hearer. It was interestingly if not brilliantly performed.

The programme was played as follows:

Schumann..Symphony in E-flat Major, No. 3, "Rhenish," Op. 97.
Lebhaft.
Sehr massig.
Nicht schnell.
Feierlich.
Lebhaft.
Debussy..."Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune"
Rachmaninoff..Second Concerto for Pianoforte with Orchestra, Op. 18.
Moderato.
Adagio sostenuto.
Allegro scherzando.
Brahms....Academic Festival Overture, Op. 80

Schumann's Symphony, No. 3, known as the "Rhenish," depicts the life of the folk along the Rhine. Although it is by no means the composer's best symphonic work, Schumann was particularly fond of it, possibly for the reason that it was an intimate reminder of scenes that he loved. The orchestra played it in splendid fashion, the last movement's joyous character being admirably portrayed.

Dr. Muck's clear and beautiful reading of Debussy's highly imaginative tone-picture was a feature of the programme. Needless to say it was played with faultless technique. Debussy's music gives a remarkably realistic impression of the imaginative flights of the poem by Stephane Mallarme. Its ever-changing color and spontaneous floating melodies fascinate and delight the ear.

In the concerto by Rachmaninoff Mr. Gabrilowitsch displayed a brilliant technique and abounding fire. This, of course, was true in the playing of the first and third movements, the second being calm and sustained in character. In such a work the pianist has little enough opportunity to show all round ability. It is largely a battle with superior numbers and fortunate indeed is he who can smite with sufficient power to be heard above the orchestral storm.

But there were many less strenuous occasions last evening when the soloist had a chance to delight his hearers with a beautiful tone, singing phrase and wonderfully clear finger work. Dr. Muck's accompaniment was in splendid accord with the solo part, and the fine performance was greeted with tremendous and deserved applause.

Brahm's "Academic Festival Overture" is academic in name only, as it is a work of decided melodic worth, built upon a number of student songs. It brought the concert to a brilliant close.

rom Journal
Address: Providence, R. I.
ate

OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH TO PLAY WITH SYMPHONY

Attractive Programme Arranged for Concert Next Tuesday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth concert here this year next Tuesday night in Infantry Hall. Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the young pianist, will be the soloist, and an unusually attractive programme will be played by the orchestra.

Dr. Muck has arranged for Schuman's Third Symphony, known as the "Rhenish" symphony, for the long piece of the programme. The symphony is called Rhenish because Schuman sought to make it an expression of the people of the lower Rhine region, from which he had sprung, and of whom he was always so fond. It is the symphony that contains the impressive episode inspired by a festival in the cathedral of Cologne, this being the fourth movement. Debussy's fanciful prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" will be an interesting selection, as will be Brahm's "Academic Festival" built on a foundation of traditional student songs.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch will play Rachmanoff's Concerto, great music in matter and method.

rom News
Address: Providence, R. I.
FEB 6 1917

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Infantry Hall this (Tuesday) evening beginning at 8.15. The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist. The program is as follows:

Schuman, Symphony in E-flat Major No. 3, "Rhenish"; Debussy, Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"; Rachmaninoff, Concert for piano and orchestra in C-Minor, No. 2; Brahms, Overture "Academic Festival." Soloist—Ossip Gabrilowitsch.

rom News
ddress: Providence.
FEB 7 1

FOURTH SMYPHONY CONCERT PROVES VERY DELIGHTFUL

With their usual fire and deftness the Boston Symphony orchestra gave its fourth concert of this season in the present series in Infantry Hall last evening to a large and spontaneously responsive audience. The soloist of the evening was Ossip Gabrilowitsch who enthused his hearers with several characteristic selections allowing an excellent opportunity for the celebrated Russian to display his power and varied moods.

The orchestra was under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck which is always a criterion for a uniform interpretation even if slightly individualistic at times. The whole is more pleasing than otherwise.

Aside from the pianist's work, the number which aroused the most enthusism was the tone poem of Debussy which is haunting in its melody with a combination intermingling human emotions from faltering laughter to a sob, all so melancholy set forth and once in awhile awakened and superceded by boisterous romantic laughter. Debussy's prelude will always remain a favorite, not because of its wonderful soothing melody but because it stirs the imagination and softens and moulds it into an imagistic concept of wondrous unrealities. It was the best rendered number on the program.

The program follows:

Schuman .....
..... Symphony in E-flat Major No. 3, "Rhenish," Op. 97.
Lebhaft.
Sehr massig.
Nicht schnell.
Feierlich.
Lebhaft.
Debussy .....
"Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune"
Rachmaninoff .....
Second Concerto for Pianoforte with Orchestra, Op. 18.
Moderato.
Adagio sostenuto.
Allegro scherzando.
Brahms .....
Academic Festival Overture, Op. 80.

Schumann's symphony in E-flat, major, while it is a stirring and wholesome work has not the spirit and power of Debussy's composition and for this reason fails to secure an interpretive understanding from a homogeneous audience. There was nothing the matter with Dr. Muck's interpretation and the piece satisfied.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch gave the final two pieces on the program with his customary excellence with perhaps a better opportunity to display his wares in Brahm's overture. His touch is sure, he is certain of his own powers and this makes for a complet and satisfying interpretation of the works at hand. He can draw forth the thunreding power of a heavy storm as well as the velvet tread of lovers. He was warmly received and was forced to give an encore.

n Journal
ress: Providence, R. I.
FEB 1 1917

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist who married the daughter of Mark Twain, is to be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the fourth concert of the series to be given in Infantry Hall on next Tuesday evening. It is nearly a dozen years since he first came to this country and the exquisite delicacy of his art at that time is said to be still preserved. He will play the concerto in C-minor by Sergei Rachmaninoff. The seat sale will begin on Saturday at Seddon's news stand in the Butler Exchange.

From Monitor
Feb 3, 1917.

JOHN McCORMACK IS SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Boston Symphony Orchestra in thirteenth program of thirty-sixth season Feb. 2 and 3, Dr. Karl Muck conducting. John McCormack, tenor, soloist. The program: Mozart, overture to "Le Nozze Figaro"; Mozart, rondo, "Per Pieta, Ricercate," written for Anfossi's opera "Il Curioso Indiscreto"; Reger, variations and fugue on a merry theme of J. A. Hiller, op. 100; Handel, recitative, "Stay, Shepherd, Stay," and air, "Shepherd, What Art Thou Pursuing," from "Acis and Galatea"; Strauss, "Don Juan," tone poem (after Nicolaus Lenau), op. 20.

The advent of an artist into the ranks of those selected to appear before a Boston Symphony audience is always an occasion of interest, and especially when the artist is one who has, like Mr. McCormack, achieved immense popular acclaim. There is always a challenge in the polite applause of greeting and in the settling into places preparatory to listening to and estimating the value of the new message. Likewise there is on the part of the artist a pardonable anxiety to do his best, for here is no easy approbation to win. Of one thing he may be sure, and that is the help and support he will receive from conductor and orchestra.

So Mr. McCormack, appearing at these concerts for the first time, may be pardoned for his evident solicitude that he make a favorable impression on an audience of somewhat different caliber from those made up of the cheering throngs that are swept to their feet at his popular concerts. That the audience of Friday afternoon was not swept to its feet, but on the contrary took what was offered with rather perfunctory approval, may well afford the popular tenor, used to adulation, a chance to take stock of himself, and see whether he is measuring up to the standards of which he is capable, and which his ability and his reputation warrant an audience in expecting.

In one sense the arias which Mr. McCormack essayed to sing Friday may not have been a fair test of his artistry, for deprived of the opportunity to set forth the sentiments of a ballad through his matchless enunciation—no artist on our concert stage does more than he for the cause of songs in English—he had to fall back on beauty of tone, facility of phrasing, musical understanding or personal appeal. However, against the background of the orchestra his tone lacked sweetness, smoothness and volume. No one expects notable phrasing in a florid Handel air, but Mr. McCormack was more concerned in fitting syllables to notes and making sure that he came out even than in taking account of the words he sang. Indeed, he seemed handicapped by a lack of words that he could put emotion into. Occasionally in the Mozart aria he rose to an understanding adequate to present the music, for he sings Mozart unusually well; most of the time, however, he remained outside what he was singing. As to his personal appeal, he seemed singularity ill at ease and lacking in animation and notably cold to the assistance he was receiving from Dr. Muck. So he was rather coldly received by the audience, which was not a ballad audience.

There can be nothing but praise for the work of Dr. Muck and his men in the Reger variations and the Strauss tone poem. For many, the value of the entire set of variations lies in the glorious fugue at the end. There are few loose passages in the whole work, however, for though not parsimonious with ideas, Reger worked economically with his material. The Strauss piece as usual received an exact and illuminating reading, with no attempt to show the rascally Don Juan in any other guise than that belonging to him. Like a scintillant jewel the oboe solo of Mr. Longy stood out, calling attention again to the great value of the wood wind choir in this orchestra.

[78]

TRIBUNE EVE.
s: Providence, R. I.

FOURTH CONCERT OF HIGH ORDER

Brilliant Program by Boston Symphony Orchestra and Pianist.

There was the usual large audience at Infantry Hall last night at the fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the noted young pianist as the soloist. The combination of this musical organization of high character and the soloist, who is regarded as one of the most eminent of the younger group of famous artists upon the piano, with a program that was brilliant and capably rendered promised a concert of the highest excellence and enjoyment and that promise was fulfilled. Once more Dr. Muck, the director, had prepared a list of numbers calculated to please all tastes among the regular attendants upon these concerts and the audience left no doubt that it appreciated what was offered to the fullest extent. Arranged in its proper order the program was as follows:

Schumann..Symphony in E-flat major, No. 3, "Rhenish," Op. 97.
Lebhaft,
Sahr massig,
Nicht schnell,
Feierlich,
Lebhaft.
Debussy .....
..."Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune"
Rachmaninoff .....
..Second Concerto for Pianoforte with orchestra. Op. 18.
Moderato,
Adagio sostenuto,
Allegro scherzaudo.
Brahms ..Academis Festival Overture, (
Brahms .....
.....Academic Festival Overture, Op. 80

The symphony is the third in the series of four works in symphonic form left by Schumann in which he endeavored to express the feelings and hopes of the Rhenish people. This selection is not so familiar to many as others by this composer, but it is more than ordinarily rich in melody and consideration of the most characteristic of the works of this master. It was his own people whose sentiments and aspirations he sought to express through this symphony, for he sprang from the dwellers in the lower Rhine region and his thoughts often turned thither in his musical work. The music is full of tenderness, sympathy and strong feeling and what might be expected from a great composer inspired with a desire to put into musical form the emotions of the people he loved. The most impressive episode is the fourth movement based upon a festival in the great cathedral of Cologne.

Debussy's prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," though one of the earlier works of this composer, seems to have had greater permanence than any other of his productions. It is comparatively brief but exquisite in form and melody and reminiscent of the Greek feeling that is the basisis of the poem that inspired the musical setting. There are few selections better adapted to a program of the highest quality and it was rendered in a manner that left nothing to be desired.

The final orchestral number, the overture to Brahm's 'Academic Festival," is quite familiar to regular attendants upon Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, but always enjoyable. It is built upon traditional student songs, the occasion for its composition being the reception by Brahms of his doctor's degree from Breslau University. It is typical of the sort of music that formed its basis, being spirited and lively.

The concerto by Rachminioff was played by Mr. Gabrilowitsch in a brilliant and forceful manner. It offers special opportunity to reveal mastery of technique as well as skill of execution and that opportunity was fully embraced by the pianist. With the fine accompaniment by the orchestra the number was one of the best ever heard at one of these concerts.

om TOWN & COUNTRY
ddress: New York City
ate

A GALA concert was given at the Metropolitan Opera House on the evening of January sixteenth by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the auspices of the Vacation Association the organization of working girls headed by Miss Anne Morgan. This concert was distinctly out of the ordinary course of events, for the Bostonians had not played outside their own series of concerts in a great many years. Ignace Paderewski and Fritz Kreisler were the soloists. Mr. Paderewski played Schumann's concerto for piano forte in his most lyric and imaginative style, and Mr. Kreisler's performance of the Mendelssohn concerto for violin was delightful in tone and expression. The orchestral numbers were Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride," Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," and Enesco's Rumanian Rhapsody, Op. 11, No. 1. Dr. Muck conducted and the orchestra has rarely been heard to better advantage. The opera house was filled to its utmost capacity and the results were highly satisfactory, the total receipts being about $25,000. In the sale of seats preference was given to the working girls, but there was no lack of brilliancy in the horseshoe as society was well represented in the boxes.

Bulletin
ess: Providence, R. I.
1917

DR. MUCK DIRECTS BOSTON SYMPHONY IN CONCERT HERE

Gabrilowitsch, Pianist, Soloist of Infantry Hall Programme, Plays in Brilliant Fashion. Accompaniments Are in Excellent Accord.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conducting, gave its fourth concert in this city at Infantry Hall last evening. Ossip Gabrilowitsch was the soloist. The famous pianist played Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto in brilliant style. With the exception of the solo number, the Debussy "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune," aroused the greatest interest. Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony, while a fine work, is not one calculated to enthuse the hearer. It was interestingly if not brilliantly performed.

The programme was played as follows:

Schumann..Symphony in E-flat Major, No. 3, "Rhenish," Op. 97.
Lebhaft.
Sehr massig.
Nicht schnell.
Feierlich.
Lebhaft.
Debussy..."Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune"
Rachmaninoff..Second Concerto for Pianoforte with Orchestra, Op. 18.
Moderato.
Adagio sostenuto.
Allegro scherzando.
Brahms....Academic Festival Overture, Op. 80

Schumann's Symphony, No. 3, known as the "Rhenish," depicts the life of the folk along the Rhine. Although it is by no means the composer's best symphonic work, Schumann was particularly fond of it, possibly for the reason that it was an intimate reminder of scenes that he loved. The orchestra played it in splendid fashion, the last movement's joyous character being admirably portrayed.

Dr. Muck's clear and beautiful reading of Debussy's highly imaginative tone-picture was a feature of the programme. Needless to say it was played with faultless technique. Debussy's music gives a remarkably realistic impression of the imaginative flights of the poem by Stephane Mallarme. Its ever-changing color and spontaneous floating melodies fascinate and delight the ear.

In the concerto by Rachmaninoff Mr. Gabrilowitsch displayed a brilliant technique and abounding fire. This, of course, was true in the playing of the first and third movements, the second being calm and sustained in character. In such a work the pianist has little enough opportunity to show all round ability. It is largely a battle with superior numbers and fortunate indeed is he who can smite with sufficient power to be heard above the orchestral storm.

But there were many less strenuous occasions last evening when the soloist had a chance to delight his hearers with a beautiful tone, singing phrase and wonderfully clear finger work. Dr. Muck's accompaniment was in splendid accord with the solo part, and the fine performance was greeted with tremendous and deserved applause.

Brahm's "Academic Festival Overture" is academic in name only, as it is a work of decided melodic worth, built upon a number of student songs. It brought the concert to a brilliant close.

NORTH AMERICAN
s: Philadelphia, Pa.

MADAME STOKOWSKI IN HOSPITAL; ANKLE SPRAINED

Orchestra Leader's Wife Injured in New York While on Way to Boston

Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, had authorities in several cities yesterday searching for Mrs. Stokowski, who, as Olga Samaroff, the celebrated pianist, is known internationally.

Upon his return from the orchestra concert in the Academy of Music to his home, in Merion, yesterday, Mr. Stokowski became alarmed when he found his wife was not there. Word was sent to police in this city and in New York, who sent descriptions of Mrs. Stokowski broadcast.

Last night Mr. Stokowski was relieved when she wired to him from New York. Mrs. Stokowski has a concert engagement in Boston today with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and left home on a train earlier than the one she had planned to take, but in New York she sprained an ankle and went to the Roosevelt Hospital. She will not be able to fulfill her Boston engagement, as it will be several days before she can leave the hospital.

Journal
s: Providence, R. I.
1917

DR. MUCK CONDUCTS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Gabrilowitsch, Pianist, is Soloist at Infantry Hall.

PLAYS IN BRILLIANT STYLE

Famous Organization Gives Its Fourth Concert in This City. Tone Picture is Feature of Programme.—Accompaniments Are in Splendid Accord with Solos.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conducting, gave its fourth concert in this city at Infantry Hall last evening. Ossip Gabrilowitsch was the soloist. The famous pianist played Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto in brilliant style. With the exception of the solo number, the Debussy "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune," aroused the greatest interest. Schumann's "Rhenish" symphony, while a fine work, is not one calculated to enthuse the hearer. It was interestingly if not brilliantly performed.

The programme was played as follows:

Schumann..Symphony in E-flat Major, No. 3, "Rhenish," Op. 97.
Lebhaft.
Sehr massig.
Nicht schnell.
Feierlich.
Lebhaft.
Debussy..."Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune"
Rachmaninoff..Second Concerto for Pianoforte with Orchestra, Op. 18.
Moderato.
Adagio sostenuto.
Allegro scherzando.
Brahms....Academic Festival Overture, Op. 80

Schumann's Symphony, No. 3, known as the "Rhenish," depicts the life of the folk along the Rhine. Although it is by no means the composer's best symphonic work, Schumann was particularly fond of it, possibly for the reason that it was an intimate reminder of scenes that he loved. The orchestra played it in splendid fashion, the last movement's joyous character being admirably portrayed.

Dr. Muck's clear and beautiful reading of Debussy's highly imaginative tone-picture was a feature of the programme. Needless to say it was played with faultless technique. Debussy's music gives a remarkably realistic impression of the imaginative flights of the poem by Stephane Mallarme. Its ever-changing color and spontaneous floating melodies fascinate and delight the ear.

In the concerto by Rachmaninoff Mr. Gabrilowitsch displayed a brilliant technique and abounding fire. This, of course, was true in the playing of the first and third movements, the second being calm and sustained in character. In such a work the pianist has little enough opportunity to show all round ability. It is largely a battle with superior numbers and fortunate indeed is he who can smite with sufficient power to be heard above the orchestral storm.

But there were many less strenuous occasions last evening when the soloist had a chance to delight his hearers with a beautiful tone, singing phrase and wonderfully clear finger work. Dr. Muck's accompaniment was in splendid accord with the solo part, and the fine performance was greeted with tremendous and deserved applause.

Brahm's "Academic Festival Overture" is academic in name only, as it is a work of decided melodic worth, built upon a number of student songs. It brought the concert to a brilliant close.

rom
ddress: Providence, R. I.
ate

OSSIP GABRILOWITSCH TO PLAY WITH SYMPHONY

Attractive Programme Arranged for Concert Next Tuesday.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fourth concert here this year next Tuesday night in Infantry Hall. Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the young pianist, will be the soloist, and an unusually attractive programme will be played by the orchestra.

Dr. Muck has arranged for Schuman's Third Symphony, known as the "Rhenish" symphony, for the long piece of the programme. The symphony is called Rhenish because Schuman sought to make it an expression of the people of the lower Rhine region, from which he had sprung, and of whom he was always so fond. It is the symphony that contains the impressive episode inspired by a festival in the cathedral of Cologne, this being the fourth movement. Debussy's fanciful prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" will be an interesting selection, as will be Brahm's "Academic Festival" built on a foundation of traditional student songs.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch will play Rachmaninoff's Concerto, great music in matter and method.

rom
ddress: Providence, R. I.
ate

FOURTH SMYPHONY CONCERT PROVES VERY DELIGHTFUL

With their usual fire and deftness the Boston Symphony orchestra gave its fourth concert of this season in the present series in Infantry Hall last evening to a large and spontaneously responsive audience. The soloist of the evening was Ossip Gabrilowitsch who enthused his hearers with several characteristic selections allowing an excellent opportunity for the celebrated Russian to display his power and varied moods.

The orchestra was under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck which is always a criterion for a uniform interpretation even if slightly individualistic at times. The whole is more pleasing than otherwise.

Aside from the pianist's work, the number which aroused the most enthusism was the tone poem of Debussy which is haunting in its melody with a combination intermingling human emotions from faltering laughter to a sob, all so melancholy set forth and once in awhile awakened and superceded by boisterous romantic laughter. Debussy's prelude will always remain a favorite, not because of its wonderful soothing melody but because it stirs the imagination and softens and moulds it into an imagistic concept of wondrous unrealities. It was the best rendered number on the program.

The program follows:

Schuman .....
..... Symphony in E-flat Major No. 3, "Rhenish," Op. 97.
Lebhaft.
Sehr massig.
Nicht schnell.
Feierlich.
Lebhaft.
Debussy .....
"Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune"
Rachmaninoff .....
Second Concerto for Pianoforte with Orchestra, Op. 18.
Moderato.
Adagio sostenuto.
Allegro scherzando.
Brahms .....
Academic Festival Overture, Op. 80.

Schumann's symphony in E-flat, major, while it is a stirring and wholesome work has not the spirit and power of Debussy's composition and for this reason fails to secure an interpretive understanding from a homogeneous audience. There was nothing the matter with Dr. Muck's interpretation and the piece satisfied.

Mr. Gabrilowitsch gave the final two pieces on the program with his customary excellence with perhaps a better opportunity to display his wares in Brahm's overture. His touch is sure, he is certain of his own powers and this makes for a complet and satisfying interpretation of the works at hand. He can draw forth the thunreding power of a heavy storm as well as the velvet tread of lovers. He was warmly received and was forced to give an encore.

1 ..... ess: Providence, R. I.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist who married the daughter of Mark Twain, is to be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the fourth concert of the series to be given in Infantry Hall on next Tuesday evening. It is nearly a dozen years since he first came to this country and the exquisite delicacy of his art at that time is said to be still preserved. He will play the concerto in C-minor by Sergei Rachmaninoff. The seat sale will begin on Saturday at Seddon's news stand in the Butler Exchange.

From Monitor
Feb.3,1917.

JOHN M'CORMACK IS SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Boston Symphony Orchestra in thirteenth program of thirty-sixth season, Feb. 2 and 3, Dr. Karl Muck conducting. John McCormack, tenor, soloist. The program: Mozart, overture to "Le Nozze di Figaro"; Mozart, rondo, "Per Pieta, non Ricercate," written for Anfossi's opera, "Il Curioso Indiscreto"; Reger, variations and fugue on a merry theme of J. A. Hiller, op. 100; Handel, recitative, "Stay, Shepherd, Stay," and air, "Shepherd, What Art Thou Pursuing," from "Acis and Galatea"; Strauss, "Don Juan," tone poem (after Nicolaus Lenau), op. 20.

The advent of an artist into the ranks of those selected to appear before a Boston Symphony audience is always an occasion of interest, and especially when the artist is one who has, like Mr. McCormack, achieved immense popular acclaim. There is always a challenge in the polite applause of greeting and in the settling into places preparatory to listening to and estimating the value of the new message. Likewise there is on the part of the artist a pardonable anxiety to do his best, for here is no easy approbation to win. Of one thing he may be sure, and that is the help and support he will receive from conductor and orchestra.

So Mr. McCormack, appearing at these concerts for the first time, may be pardoned for his evident solicitude that he make a favorable impression on an audience of somewhat different caliber from those made up of the cheering throngs that are swept to their feet at his popular concerts. That the audience of Friday afternoon was not swept to its feet, but on the contrary took what was offered with rather perfunctory approval, may well afford the popular tenor, used to adulation, a chance to take stock of himself, and see whether he is measuring up to the standards of which he is capable, and which his ability and his reputation warrant an audience in expecting.

In one sense the arias which Mr. McCormack essayed to sing Friday may not have been a fair test of his artistry, for deprived of the opportunity to set forth the sentiments of a ballad through his matchless enunciation—no artist on our concert stage does more than he for the cause of songs in English—he had to fall back on beauty of tone, facility of phrasing, musical understanding or personal appeal. However, against the background of the orchestra his tone lacked sweetness, smoothness and volume. No one expects notable phrasing in a florid Handel air, but Mr. McCormack was more concerned in fitting syllables to notes and making sure that he came out even than in taking account of the words he sang. Indeed, he seemed handicapped by a lack of words that he could put emotion into. Occasionally in the Mozart aria he rose to an understanding adequate to present the music, for he sings Mozart unusually well; most of the time, however, he remained outside what he was singing. As to his personal appeal, he seemed singularity ill at ease and lacking in animation and notably cold to the assistance he was receiving from Dr. Muck. So he was rather coldly received by the audience, which was not a ballad audience.

There can be nothing but praise for the work of Dr. Muck and his men in the Reger variations and the Strauss tone poem. For many, the value of the entire set of variations lies in the glorious fugue at the end. There are few loose passages in the whole work, however, for though not parsimonious with ideas, Reger worked economically with his material. The Strauss piece as usual received an exact and illuminating reading, with no attempt to show the rascally Don Juan in any other guise than that belonging to him. Like a scintillant jewel the oboe solo of Mr. Longy stood out, calling attention again to the great value of the wood wind choir in this orchestra.

News
om Providence, R. I. ddress:
te 191

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Infantry Hall this (Tuesday) evening beginning at 8:15. The soloist will be Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist. The program is as follows:

Schuman, Symphony in E-flat Major No. 3, "Rhenish"; Debussy, Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faum"; Rachmaninoff, Concert for piano and orchestra in C-Minor, No. 2; Brahms, Overtures "Academic Festival." Soloist—Ossip Gabrilowitsch.

[78]

rom EVENING TRIBUNE

ddress: Providence, R. I.

ate

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

With Ossip Gabrilowitsch as soloist and with a program of unusual charm, the fourth concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, Feb. 6, holds the promise of being one of the most attractive of the present series. Gabrilowitsch is unquestionably pre-eminent among the younger generation of pianists. Now in his mid-thirties he has won a public in this country which is equalled in loyalty and numbers by few pianists of our time.

The program which Dr. Muck has arranged calls for the Third Symphony of Robert Schumann, the one which is called the "Rhenish" Symphony, Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto in C-minor for piano and orchestra, and the "Academic Festival" overture of Brahms. While the "Rhenish" Symphony is not played so often as those in D minor and B-flat, it is regarded by many as the most characteristic utterance of the composer in this form, and certainly even for Schumann it is unusually rich in melody. It is called the "Rhenish" Symphony because Schumann himself wrote it with the idea of making it an expression of the people of the Lower Rhine region, from which he had sprung and of whom he was always so fond. He has undoutedly been most successful in his effort. Moreover, it is this symphony that contains the impressive episode inspired by a festival in the great Cathedral of Cologne, this being the fourth movement.

Of the many works which have made Claude Debussy not only the most notable figure in modern French music but one of the most notable figures in modern music of all nations, the prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" seems to have the greatest lasting qualities. It is an exquisite bit of fancy, the performance of which takes but nine minutes. Yet in it he has expresed in a remarkable fashion not merely the feeling in the poem of Mallarme but the actual Greek feeling which is back of that poem. It is program music at its very best.

Rachmaninoff's Concerto, which Mr. Gabrilowitsch will play, is decidedly great music, great in matter and great in method.

Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture is familiar to Boston Symphony patrons. Written when the composer received the degree of Doctor from Breslau University, he cunningly built it on a foundation of traditional student songs.

The program in its proper form is as follows:

Symphony in E-flat Major, No. 3 "Rhenish" ..... Schumann
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" ..... Debussy
Concerto for pianoforte No. 2 in C-minor ..... Rachmaninoff
Overture, "Academic Festival" .. Brahms
Soloist, Ossip Gabrilowitsch.

rom TRIBUNE

ddress: New York City

TWO SYMPHONIC CONCERTS PLEASE SUNDAY AUDIENCES

Damrosch and Stransky Neglect Opportunity to Furnish Patriotic Music

As usual, there were two symphonic concerts yesterday afternoon—one by the Philharmonic Society in Carnegie Hall, another by the Symphony Society in Aeolian Hall. The comparative interest of the two entertainments is sufficiently disclosed by a mention of the compositions which were performed.

Mr. Stransky and his orchestra brought forward Weber's overture to "Oberon," Schumann's concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, with Mr. Ernest Schelling as the solo performer; the nocturne and scherzo from Mendelssohn's incidental music for "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and Tschaikoffsky's fifth symphony. Mr. Walter Damrosch gave his audience César Franck's Symphony in D minor, two movements from Robert Fuchs's Serenade for strings, four movements from Dvorak's Suite, Op. 39, and two arias ("Ach, ich liebti," from Mozart's opera "Die Entführung aus dem Serail," and "Charmant Oiseau," from Félicien David's opera, "Le Perle de Brasil"), sung by Mabel Garrison.

The Schumann concerto, agreeably played by Mr. Schelling, would have commanded a greater interest from the professional listener probably if it had not followed so closely upon the heels of the remarkable performance which it received at the hands of Paderewski and the Boston Orchestra at the Metropolitan Opera House. But, of course, the professional listener's standard cannot be set up for the Philharmonic Society's audience, as was once the case. The "pink tea" standard is now the proper one. Miss Garrison exhibited a high degree of intelligence, taste and skill in the singing of the two florid arias with which she entertained the Aeolian Hall audience, and plainly demonstrated what place she is entitled to occupy in the Metropolitan Opera Company's forces.

On Friday and Saturday afternoons Mr. Damrosch began his concerts by playing the American national hymns, bringing his listeners to their feet and evoking an enthusiastic expression of patriotic feeling on each occasion. He did not do so yesterday; neither did Mr. Stransky. Were not both neglectful of an opportunity to do good—if not a duty? Every theatre and concert room in the country ought to resound to patriotic music every day, if music has the inspiriting power which is universally attributed to it. H. E. K.

From the Transcript Feb.3,1917.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

REGER, STRAUSS, McCORMACK AND MUCK

The "Hiller Variations" After Six Years —"Don Juan" and a Tale That Is Told —The Perennial Overture to "Figaro's Wedding"—The Tenor Sings Eighteenth-Century Airs with Eighteenth-Century Perfections

As the event will sometimes go—and for no obvious reason—the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon yielded less than the anticipated excitements. The eighteenth and the twentieth centuries, Händel and Mozart, Strauss and Reger, Dr. Muck and Mr. McCormack divided programme, interest, expectation. For the first time in six years, conductor and orchestra were to play Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Theme of Hiller, and the long sweeps, the mounting sonorities and the dynamic energy of the finale had of old stirred stage and auditorium. Perhaps because recollection ran too high, that celebrated Fugue seemed to go somewhat tamely; whereas more than one of the preceding Variations sounded with a songfulness of speech and an intensity of mood that tricky memory had overlooked. The fires of Strauss's "Don Juan"—the heat of idea and imagery, march and manipulation—are more familiar; yet, as it seemed Friday afternoon, they have burned brighter in some of Dr. Muck's previous performances of the piece. Finally, Mr. McCormack was to sing for the first time at the Symphony Concerts. With Mr. Caruso, he is the most admired tenor of this day in this land, but not exactly by the public he was now to encounter or in the circumstances he was now to try. The quality of his voice, his skill in the arts of song, his distinctions in eighteenth-century airs, proved often in his own concerts, all warranted the call. Those that anticipated some anomaly in his presence by Dr. Muck's side could discover hint of none. He was as much in place and manner as Mme. Melba when in her prime she used to grace the concerts and his old airs from Mozart and Händel were more in accord with the orthodoxies of the occasion than some of the operatic numbers she used to choose. The mischance was that, for better or for worse, Mr. McCormack made no appreciable sensation. He was cordially received and heartily applauded; he sang with his wonted intelligence, taste, artistry and intuition in this ancient music; but many another "assisting artist" in the round of the season has given in kind, equal pleasure to equal acknowledgment.

The one item of the programme surpassing all expectation was that which seemed in anticipation merely to begin the concert and serve as congenial preluding to one of Mr. McCormack's airs—Mozart's overture to his operatic comedy, "Figaro's Wedding." The opera is not heard so often in Boston—it is ten years since it was last represented here—as to make the overture familiar, nor does it recur so frequently in the Symphony Concerts as, for example, the overture to "The Magic Flute." Moreover, if ever there was music proof against time and change, it is these gay and artful measures, as illusory preluding to light and artificial lyric comedy, as though they had been written in these days when "atmosphere" is one of the magic words of music. No less it is the work of the skilled and ready symphonic composer that Mozart—in his thirties, when he wrote the opera—had long been. The melodies sing out of the music; the running figures glint above, below, beside them; the contrasts are high spirits themselves. Yet the formal progress of the overture is as elastic and elegant as the most exacting purist of the Vienna that first heard it could have wished; while the Mozartean freshness and fecundity, light energy and light fancy shine in material and process. The books say that in "Figaro," Mozart first began to characterize personages and incidents with his music. In the overture he has characterized the whole comedy of gay intrigue, sentimental encounter, merry contretemps and polished presences. As he wrote, so conductor and orchestra played—at light swift pace; in elastic phrase and figure; elegant of intonation and euphony, sprightly, sunny, songful always. Never, after all, are they so much the virtuosi as in their finesse—and also their freedom—with eighteenth-century music.

Reger's Variations, if not his Fugue, fared as well from band and conductor. They renewed the charm of the pretty, flowing, lightly rhythmed theme—a happy discovery in Hiller's musical plays—and they gave the more songful and musing Variations a richness of tone, a warmth of color, a glow of sustained mood, that seemed at last the true voice of a music over-easy to depreciate. The Reger of the more declamatory and restless Variations is the Reger of what, now that he is untimely dead, may become the tradition—the strenuous and strident composer, sometimes harsh of idea, often incessant of modulation, acrid not seldom in harmonic and instrumental color, somewhat coarse-fibred in his tonal weaving, more remarkable for a workmanship of the mind than for an imagery or an emotion of the spirit. This Reger, however, wrote relatively few of the "Hiller Variations" but wrote them none the less with his wonted heady energy. Many more of them are music of meditative, intensifying and songful mood, warm of invention, soberly ardent of progress, full-voiced, lustrous, with not a little of the sentiment that quickens some of Reger's later pieces, like the Romantic Suite, and that deepens on occasion into a characteristic poetry and passion.

Reger was not the talent or the temperament to write in Straussian expanses of glowing and climacteric instrumental song or to drench his music in all the colors of the harmonic and the orchestral rainbows. Yet he had faculty and feeling that could flow from him in the melodic warmth and even the melodic intensity of the first, the eighth and the final Variation for example; that could sustain the contemplative and songful mood and enrich it with many an expressive and imaginative stroke. The Reger of such music, though he tends to make it over-long and to hold it too steadily in subdued voice and cadence, does persuade the ear and illude to answering emotion; while, played as it was yesterday, it does rise to tonal beauty. Nor is a Reger, who could have his fancies and give them rein in his music, absent from the Variations in the dry snap of the tarantella or the scholarly playfulness of the minuet. As for the Fugue it is of the Reger of an inexhaustible dynamic energy, flinging about in "subjects" and fragments of "subjects," tossing Hiller's theme and his own variations in showers of scraps and then catching them all in the net of a workmanship and resource, that binds the music in march, unity, solidity and climax. Never was a Fugue stouter—or more "jumpy"; seldom is there one more sumptuous and sonorous. There is more fanciful artifice in the Serenade, more glamor in the Romantic and the Ballet Suites; but the "Hiller Variations" seem upon each repetition the most characteristic and eloquent of Reger's orchestral pieces.

The contrast, with which the audience lingered to applaud, whereas it had been luke-warm with the Variations, was the familiar splendor of Strauss's "Don Juan." To hear it anew is half to believe the legend of Munich that he wrote it in the belief that tuberculosis was upon him; that at twenty-four he had but a few years in which to live and work; that it was "now or never" for a mind and spirit quick with ambition; and so flung into the tone-poem the wealth of resource, the passion of imagination and the passion of expression already his. Hence a music that seems to create itself at a white heat, in molten measure upon molten measure; that holds integral unfaltering, undiminished, to the last bar; that not only sees the end from the beginning but that fills and accomplishes it with a superb prescience and prodigality. Hence again, the glowing tonal projection of Don Juan at the beginning against a harmonic background and amid flashing timbers as opulent as the colors of Titian or Veronese when their Venetians sit banqueting. Hence the sensuous beauty, the thrilling impulsion of the music in which Don Juan loves and idealizes and the sensual tang—for Strauss was already the youth of mind as well as the youth of temperament—of the music in which he pursues, is satiated—and disgusted. Hence the flaming horns that goad the music anew into the chromatic orgy, the sharper and sharper colors, the fiercer and fiercer progressions, the sensual confusion before the final snap and dissonance—a master stroke—of the end. At twenty-four to have written not only one of his own masterpieces but one of the masterpieces of the music of our time! And not to die of tuberculosis, after all, though as that same legend goes, Strauss was more than ever sure of his fate when he writhed and blazed a year later, through "Death and Transfiguration." Yet somehow, Dr. Muck and the orchestra hardly "let themselves go" yesterday, as they have sometimes done with a "Don Juan" in which for years security has been the spark to eloquence.

Mr. McCormack, finally, who has affectionate curiosities over eighteenth-century music and who likes to make his own discoveries in it, sang one almost unknown air—a piece by Mozart written to oblige a friend who wished to interpolate it in an unpromising opera by another hand—and a second, little more familiar, from a boy's part that Händel wrote into his masque of "Acis and Galatea." In spite of the tenor's liking for them, it was possible for the mere listener to find neither notably interesting in itself or characteristic of the composer. In spite of the illustrious signatures both might readily have been the one early, and the other late, eighteenth century music written by nobody in particular. Yet by those same tokens, they gave Mr. McCormack tempting room for the soft lustres, the pure timbre, the vibrant sweetness of his tenor tones, the clear nicety of his diction, the flow of his phrases into the unbroken current, and the gentle undulation of the melody, the aptness of his vocal ornament, the justness of his sentiment, the poise and elegance of his appropriate style. To hear his Mozart and his Händel was to recall what the eighteenth-century writers set down of the technique and taste, the felicity and charm of those that sang such music to them. H. T. P.

From the Transcript Feb.1,191?.

Programmes in Prospect

At the Symphony Concerts of next week, Dr. Muck will revive the suite that Mr. Busoni put together and expanded from his incidental music to Gozzi's Chinese play, "Turandot," when it was fantastically reproduced, some years ago, in Berlin. Four numbers from the suite, which is a picturial, exotic and not too intricate music, were played at the Symphony Concerts in Mr. Fiedler's time. Next week Dr. Muck will add the other four to them. One requires a chorus of women, which has been picked from the Choral Music Society and the Musical Art Club and trained by Mr. Townsend. For the rest of the concert, Mr. Gebhard, the pianist, will play with the orchestra Franck's "Symphonic Variations" and Strauss's "Burlesque," both relatively unfamiliar pieces. In all the seven years through which Dr. Muck has led the Symphony Orchestra in none has he so well maintained the interest of his programmes as in the current season.

From the Herald Feb.3,1917.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S 13TH CONCERT

John McCormack, Tenor Soloist, Makes Deep Impression—Overture to Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" by Orchestra, Enjoyed by Audience—Dr. Karl Muck Conducts.

PROGRAM WILL HAVE REPETITION TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE.

The 13th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. John McCormack, tenor, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Mozart, overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"; Mozart, Rondo "Per pieta, non Ricercate"; Reger, variations and Fugue on a Theme by Hiller; Handel, Recitative, "Stay, Shepherd," and Air, "Shepherd, What Are Thou Pursuing?" from "Acis and Galatea"; Strauss, Tone poem, "Don Juan."

The sparkling overture, which was played crisply, delicately and with great verve, recalled for some of the hearers delightful performances of this charming opera: the unforgettable singing of the Letter Duet by Mmes. Eames and Sembrich; more than one rogush Cherubino with her Armorous ditties, and the sight of Edouard de Reszke, elephantine as the gallant Count, not at all at ease with his music. The last performance, in which Mme. Eames unfortunately did not appear, was made conspicuous by the conducting of Felix Mottl.

The most hardened concert-goer turns pale and shudders when he sees on the program a set of orchestral variations. More than once we have suffered from works of this kind, relieved slightly by trying to find the theme in the complex and long winded variation. "Theme, theme, who's got the theme?" may be asked of the groups of instruments. There were those variations by Koessler in which the composer fondly thought he pictured the excellent Johannes Brahms communing with nature, in the restaurant, with his friends, also the mind and purposes of Johannes. Then there is Georg Schumann, another industrious weaver of portentous variations.

Yesterday it was Reger's turn. His thunder-and-lightning variations on a merry little theme of Hiller remind us of an improving and historical anecdote. The sailor King, William IV of England, heard a Fantasia played by Miss Blaketka at a concert in St James's Palace in 1836. He said to Sir George Smart, afterwards characterized by Thackeray in "The Ravenswing": "The queen requests me to say something civil to the young lady, but I cannot make out what she is playing. It sounds like 'God Save the King' but then it goes off into something else. What do you call it?" Sir George explained to him that it was the national melody with variations. "Damn variations!" said the monarch, and he immediately left the concert room.

There was a brilliant performance of "Don Juan." Would that Strauss had always written in this manner! Would that in his later works he had invented melodies like the love song for the oboe played beautifully by Mr. Longy.

Mr. McCormack sang for the first time at these concerts. He should have been associated with the orchestra long before this. We know of no one, man or woman, in this country, with the possible exception of Miss Hempel, who is so accomplished a singer of Mozart's music as Mr. McCormack.

To sing Mozart's music is the supreme test. Many of us remember with pleasure Mr. McCormack's Don Otavio at the Boston Opera House four years ago. His performance then enraptured Mr. Weingartner, who wished to take him to German opera houses. The war prevented Mr. McCormack from taking part in the Mozart Festival organized by Lilli Lehmann at Salzburg.

Yesterday he sang an unfamiliar Rondo by Mozart written to be interpolated in an opera by Anfossi. The air of Handel was also unfamiliar to many. Mr. McCormack phrased the Rondo as a rare musician among singers, singing it as Mozart would have liked to hear it. In Handel's air the roulades were remarkably clear and even and the command of breath was noteworthy. Here is a singer who has not merely a beautiful voice; his art is as conspicuous as the natural tonal charm. Nor did a slip of the orchestra at the beginning of the reprise, quickly remedied by Dr. Muck, disconcert him. Nor should the distinctness of the singer's enunciation in Italian and English pass unnoted.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: The whole of Busoni's "Turandot" Suite in which a female chorus will take part; Franck's Symphonic Variations for piano and orchestra, and Strauss's Burleske for piano and orchestra (Mr. Gebhard, pianist), and the overture to "The Sold Bride," by Smetana.

From the Journal Feb.3,1917.

M'CORMACK AS SYMPHONY STAR FOR FIRST TIME

Tenor Warmly Applauded For His Singing of Two Classic Numbers.

John McCormack made his first appearance as Symphony soloist yesterday in numbers reminiscent of his bygone operatic days. These two solos, manifestly chosen for the purpose of showing the best part of his voice and the grace with which he can adorn classic song, were the Mozart rondo, "Per pieta, non ricercate," and the recitative, "Stay, shepherd, stay," and air, "Shepherd, what art thou pursuing?"—from Handel's pastoral opera, "Acis and Galatea."

These are characteristic but not popular McCormack pieces. No doubt his admirers would much prefer to hear his melting voice in "Mavis" or "The Old Refrain" or some such heart-reaching work. But the two selections happened to be in his repertory and they also happened to suit Symphony traditions in the matter of song. No other tenor sings this archaic music in so felicitous a manner, with so smooth a flow of tone and a diction so admirable. This Mr. McCormack has demonstrated here repeatedly, but with especial success in the memorable performance of "Don Giovanni" given at the Boston Opera House four years ago this month under Weingartner's direction.

The applause yesterday was enthusiastic enough in the circumstances. There will be twice as much enthusiasm, and deservedly so, when the most popular tenor of the day sings "Reynardine" or some other delectable ballad at Symphony Hall during McCormack week; and he will put just as much artistry into the old folk song then as he did into the Handel air yesterday.

To introduce these ornate old-fashioned songs, Dr. Muck heads the program with the overture from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro." The other orchestral numbers are Reger's "Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme of J. A. Hiller"—a work almost as long as the average symphony, and pedagogic as well as long-winded—and one of the early Strauss tone poems, "Don Juan," which adds a very welcome pinch of spice to a conservative program.

Dr. Muck conducted the orchestra through the usual brilliant performance, and the students and nonagenarians present waxed enthusiastic.

Heinrich Gebhard will be the soloist at next week's concerts, when the program will comprise Busoni's "Turandot" suite, Cesar Franck's symphonic variations for piano and orchestra, Richard Strauss' burlesque in D minor for piano and orchestra and a Smetana overture, "The Sold Bride."

[79]

rom EVENING TRIBUNE

ddress: Providence, R. I.

ate FEB 1

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

With Ossip Gabrilowitsch as soloist and with a program of unusual charm, the fourth concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, Feb. 6, holds the promise of being one of the most attractive of the present series. Gabrilowitsch is unquestionably pre-eminent among the younger generation of pianists. Now in his mid-thirties he has won a public in this country which is equalled in loyalty and numbers by few pianists of our time.

The program which Dr. Muck has arranged calls for the Third Symphony of Robert Schumann, the one which is called the "Rhenish" Symphony, Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," Rachmaninoff's Second Concerto in C-minor for piano and orchestra, and the "Academic Festival" overture of Brahms. While the "Rhenish" Symphony is not played so often as those in D minor and B-flat, it is regarded by many as the most characteristic utterance of the composer in this form, and certainly even for Schumann it is unusually rich in melody. It is called the "Rhenish" Symphony because Schumann himself wrote it with the idea of making it an expression of the people of the Lower Rhine region, from which he had sprung and of whom he was always so fond. He has undoutedly been most successful in his effort. Moreover, it is this symphony that contains the impressive episode inspired by a festival in the great Cathedral of Cologne, this being the fourth movement.

Of the many works which have made Claude Debussy not only the most notable figure in modern French music but one of the most notable figures in modern music of all nations, the prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" seems to have the greatest lasting qualities. It is an exquisite bit of fancy, the performance of which takes but nine minutes. Yet in it he has expresed in a remarkable fashion not merely the feeling in the poem of Mallarme but the actual Greek feeling which is back of that poem. It is program music at its very best.

Rachmaninoff's Concerto, which Mr. Gabrilowitsch will play, is decidedly great music, great in matter and great in method.

Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture is familiar to Boston Symphony patrons. Written when the composer received the degree of Doctor from Breslau University, he cunningly built it on a foundation of traditional student songs.

The program in its proper form is as follows:

Symphony in E-flat Major, No. 3 "Rhenish" ..... Schumann
Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" ..... Debussy
Concerto for pianoforte No. 2 in C-minor ..... Rachmaninoff
Overture, "Academic Festival"..Brahms
Soloist, Ossip Gabrilowitsch.

rom TRIBUNE

ddress: New York City

TWO SYMPHONIC CONCERTS PLEASE SUNDAY AUDIENCES

Damrosch and Stransky Neglect Opportunity to Furnish Patriotic Music

As usual, there were two symphonic concerts yesterday afternoon—one by the Philharmonic Society in Carnegie Hall, another by the Symphony Society in Aeolian Hall. The comparative interest of the two entertainments is sufficiently disclosed by a mention of the compositions which were performed.

Mr. Stransky and his orchestra brought forward Weber's overture to "Oberon," Schumann's concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, with Mr. Ernest Schelling as the solo performer; the nocturne and scherzo from Mendelssohn's incidental music for "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and Tschaikoffsky's fifth symphony. Mr. Walter Damrosch gave his audience César Franck's Symphony in D minor, two movements from Robert Fuchs's Serenade for strings, four movements from Dvorak's Suite, Op. 39, and two arias ("Ach, ich liebti," from Mozart's opera "Die Entführung aus dem Serail," and "Charmant Oiseau," from Félicien David's opera, "Le Perle de Brasil"), sung by Mabel Garrison.

The Schumann concerto, agreeably played by Mr. Schelling, would have commanded a greater interest from the professional listener probably if it had not followed so closely upon the heels of the remarkable performance which it received at the hands of Paderewski and the Boston Orchestra at the Metropolitan Opera House. But, of course, the professional listener's standard cannot be set up for the Philharmonic Society's audience, as was once the case. The "pink tea" standard is now the proper one. Miss Garrison exhibited a high degree of intelligence, taste and skill in the singing of the two florid arias with which she entertained the Aeolian Hall audience, and plainly demonstrated what place she is entitled to occupy in the Metropolitan Opera Company's forces.

On Friday and Saturday afternoons Mr. Damrosch began his concerts by playing the American national hymns, bringing his listeners to their feet and evoking an enthusiastic expression of patriotic feeling on each occasion. He did not do so yesterday; neither did Mr. Stransky. Were not both neglectful of an opportunity to do good—if not a duty? Every theatre and concert room in the country ought to resound to patriotic music every day, if music has the inspiriting power which is universally attributed to it. H. E. K.

From the Transcript Feb.3,1917.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

REGER, STRAUSS, McCORMACK AND MUCK

The "Hiller Variations" After Six Years —"Don Juan" and a Tale That Is Told —The Perennial Overture to "Figaro's Wedding"—The Tenor Sings Eighteenth-Century Airs with Eighteenth-Century Perfections

As the event will sometimes go—and for no obvious reason—the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon yielded less than the anticipated excitements. The eighteenth and the twentieth centuries, Händel and Mozart, Strauss and Reger, Dr. Muck and Mr. McCormack divided programme, interest, expectation. For the first time in six years, conductor and orchestra were to play Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Theme of Hiller, and the long sweeps, the mounting sonorities and the dynamic energy of the finale had of old stirred stage and auditorium. Perhaps because recollection ran too high, that celebrated Fugue seemed to go somewhat tamely; whereas more than one of the preceding Variations sounded with a songfulness of speech and an intensity of mood that tricky memory had overlooked. The fires of Strauss's "Don Juan"—the heat of idea and imagery, march and manipulation—are more familiar; yet, as it seemed Friday afternoon, they have burned brighter in some of Dr. Muck's previous performances of the piece. Finally, Mr. McCormack was to sing for the first time at the Symphony Concerts. With Mr. Caruso, he is the most admired tenor of this day in this land, but not exactly by the public he was now to encounter or in the circumstances he was now to try. The quality of his voice, his skill in the arts of song, his distinctions in eighteenth-century airs, proved often in his own concerts, all warranted the call. Those that anticipated some anomaly in his presence by Dr. Muck's side could discover hint of none. He was as much in place and manner as Mme. Melba when in her prime she used to grace the concerts and his old airs from Mozart and Händel were more in accord with the orthodoxies of the occasion than some of the operatic numbers she used to choose. The mischance was that, for better or for worse, Mr. McCormack made no appreciable sensation. He was cordially received and heartily applauded; he sang with his wonted intelligence, taste, artistry and intuition in this ancient music; but many another "assisting artist" in the round of the season has given in kind, equal pleasure to equal acknowledgment.

The one item of the programme surpassing all expectation was that which seemed in anticipation merely to begin the concert and serve as congenial preluding to one of Mr. McCormack's airs—Mozart's overture to his operatic comedy, "Figaro's Wedding." The opera is not heard so often in Boston—it is ten years since it was last represented here—as to make the overture familiar, nor does it recur so frequently in the Symphony Concerts as, for example, the overture to "The Magic Flute." Moreover, if ever there was music proof against time and change, it is these gay and artful measures, as illusory preluding to light and artificial lyric comedy, as though they had been written in these days when "atmosphere" is one of the magic words of music. No less it is the work of the skilled and ready symphonic composer that Mozart—in his thirties, when he wrote the opera—had long been. The melodies sing out of the music; the running figures glint above, below, beside them; the contrasts are high spirits themselves. Yet the formal progress of the overture is as elastic and elegant as the most exacting purist of the Vienna that first heard it could have wished; while the Mozartean freshness and fecundity, light energy and light fancy shine in material and process. The books say that in "Figaro," Mozart first began to characterize personages and incidents with his music. In the overture he has characterized the whole comedy of gay intrigue, sentimental encounter, merry contretemps and polished presences. As he wrote, so conductor and orchestra played—at light swift pace; in elastic phrase and figure; elegant of intonation and euphony, sprightly, sunny, songful always. Never, after all, are they so much the virtuosi as in their finesse—and also their freedom—with eighteenth-century music.

Reger's Variations, if not his Fugue, fared as well from band and conductor. They renewed the charm of the pretty, flowing, lightly rhythmed theme—a happy discovery in Hiller's musical plays—and they gave the more songful and musing Variations a richness of tone, a warmth of color, a glow of sustained mood, that seemed at last the true voice of a music over-easy to depreciate. The Reger of the more declamatory and restless Variations is the Reger of what, now that he is untimely dead, may become the tradition—the strenuous and strident composer, sometimes harsh of idea, often incessant of modulation, acrid not seldom in harmonic and instrumental color, somewhat coarse-fibred in his tonal weaving, more remarkable for a workmanship of the mind than for an imagery or an emotion of the spirit. This Reger, however, wrote relatively few of the "Hiller Variations" but wrote them none the less with his wonted heady energy. Many more of them are music of meditative, intensifying and songful mood, warm of invention, soberly ardent of progress, full-voiced, lustrous, with not a little of the sentiment that quickens some of Reger's later pieces, like the Romantic Suite, and that deepens on occasion into a characteristic poetry and passion.

Reger was not the talent or the temperament to write in Straussian expanses of glowing and climacteric instrumental song or to drench his music in all the colors of the harmonic and the orchestral rainbows. Yet he had faculty and feeling that could flow from him in the melodic warmth and even the melodic intensity of the first, the eighth and the final Variation for, example; that could sustain the contemplative and songful mood and enrich it with many an expressive and imaginative stroke. The Reger of such music, though he tends to make it over-long and to hold it too steadily in subdued voice and cadence, does persuade the ear and illude to answering emotion; while, played as it was yesterday, it does rise to tonal beauty. Nor is a Reger, who could have his fancies and give them rein in his music, absent from the Variations in the dry snap of the tarantella or the scholarly playfulness of the minuet. As for the Fugue it is of the Reger of an inexhaustible dynamic energy, flinging about in "subjects" and fragments of "subjects," tossing Hiller's theme and his own variations in showers of scraps and then catching them all in the net of a workmanship and resource, that binds the music in march, unity, solidity and climax. Never was a Fugue stouter—or more "jumpy"; seldom is there one more sumptuous and sonorous. There is more fanciful artifice in the Serenade, more glamor in the Romantic and the Ballet Suites; but the "Hiller Variations" seem upon each repetition the most characteristic and eloquent of Reger's orchestral pieces.

The contrast, with which the audience lingered to applaud, whereas it had been luke-warm with the Variations, was the familiar splendor of Strauss's "Don Juan." To hear it anew is half to believe the legend of Munich that he wrote it in the belief that tuberculosis was upon him; that at twenty-four he had but a few years in which to live and work; that it was "now or never" for a mind and spirit quick with ambition; and so flung into the tone-poem the wealth of resource, the passion of imagination and the passion of expression already his. Hence a music that seems to create itself at a white heat, in molten measure upon molten measure; that holds integral unfaltering, undiminished, to the last bar; that not only sees the end from the beginning but that fills and accomplishes it with a superb prescience and prodigality. Hence again, the glowing tonal projection of Don Juan at the beginning against a harmonic background and amid flashing timbers as opulent as the colors of Titian or Veronese when their Venetians sit banqueting. Hence the sensuous beauty, the thrilling impulsion of the music in which Don Juan loves and idealizes and the sensual tang—for Strauss was already the youth of mind as well as the youth of temperament—of the music in which he pursues, is satiated—and disgusted. Hence the flaming horns that goad the music anew into the chromatic orgy, the sharper and sharper colors, the fiercer and fiercer progressions, the sensual confusion before the final snap and dissonance—a master stroke—of the end. At twenty-four to have written not only one of his own masterpieces but one of the masterpieces of the music of our time! And not to die of tuberculosis, after all, though as that same legend goes, Strauss was more than ever sure of his fate when he writhed and blazed a year later, through "Death and Transfiguration." Yet somehow, Dr. Muck and the orchestra hardly "let themselves go" yesterday, as they have sometimes done with a "Don Juan" in which for years security has been the spark to eloquence.

Mr. McCormack, finally, who has affectionate curiosities over eighteenth-century music and who likes to make his own discoveries in it, sang one almost unknown air—a piece by Mozart written to oblige a friend who wished to interpolate it in an unpromising opera by another hand—and a second, little more familiar, from a boy's part that Händel wrote into his masque of "Acis and Galatea." In spite of the tenor's liking for them, it was possible for the mere listener to find neither notably interesting in itself or characteristic of the composer. In spite of the illustrious signatures both might readily have been the one early, and the other late, eighteenth century music written by nobody in particular. Yet by those same tokens, they gave Mr. McCormack tempting room for the soft lustres, the pure timbre, the vibrant sweetness of his tenor tones, the clear nicety of his diction, the flow of his phrases into the unbroken current, and the gentle undulation of the melody, the aptness of his vocal ornament, the justness of his sentiment, the poise and elegance of his appropriate style. To hear his Mozart and his Händel was to recall what the eighteenth-century writers set down of the technique and taste, the felicity and charm of those that sang such music to them. H. T. P.

From the Transcript Feb.1,1917.

Programmes in Prospect

At the Symphony Concerts of next week, Mr. Muck will revive the suite that Mr. Busoni put together and expanded from his incidental music to Gozzi's Chinese play, "Turandot," when it was fantastically reproduced, some years ago, in Berlin. Four numbers from the suite, which is a picturial, exotic and not too intricate music, were played at the Symphony Concerts in Mr. Fiedler's time. Next week Dr. Muck will add the other four to them. One requires a chorus of women, which has been picked from the Choral Music Society and the Musical Art Club and trained by Mr. Townsend. For the rest of the concert, Mr. Gebhard, the pianist, will play with the orchestra Franck's "Symphonic Variations" and Strauss's "Burlesque," both relatively unfamiliar pieces. In all the seven years through which Dr. Muck has led the Symphony Orchestra in none has he so well maintained the interest of his programmes as in the current season.

From the Herald Feb.3,1917.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S 13TH CONCERT

John McCormack, Tenor Soloist, Makes Deep Impression—Overture to Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" by Orchestra, Enjoyed by Audience—Dr. Karl Muck Conducts.

PROGRAM WILL HAVE REPETITION TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE.

The 13th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. John McCormack, tenor, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Mozart, overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"; Mozart, Rondo "Per pieta, non Ricercate"; Reger, variations and Fugue on a Theme by Hiller; Handel, Recitative, "Stay, Shepherd," and Air, "Shepherd, What Are Thou Pursuing?" from "Acis and Galatea"; Strauss, Tone poem, "Don Juan."

The sparkling overture, which was played crisply, delicately and with great verve, recalled for some of the hearers delightful performances of this charming opera: the unforgettable singing of the Letter Duet by Mmes. Eames and Sembrich; more than one rogush Cherubino with her Armorous ditties, and the sight of Edouard de Reszke, elephantine as the gallant Count, not at all at ease with his music. The last performance, in which Mme. Eames unfortunately did not appear, was made conspicuous by the conducting of Felix Mottl.

The most hardened concert-goer turns pale and shudders when he sees on the program a set of orchestral variations. More than once we have suffered from works of this kind, relieved slightly by trying to find the theme in the complex and long winded variation. "Theme, theme, who's got the theme?" may be asked of the groups of instruments. There were those variations by Koessler in which the composer fondly thought he pictured the excellent Johánnes Brahms communing with nature, in the restaurant, with his friends, also the mind and purposes of Johannes. Then there is Georg Schumann, another industrious weaver of portentous variations.

Yesterday it was Reger's turn. His thunder-and-lightning variations on a merry little theme of Hiller remind us of an improving and historical anecdote. The sailor King, William IV. of England, heard a Fantasia played by Miss Blaketka at a concert in St. James's Palace in 1836. He said to Sir George Smart, afterwards characterized by Thackeray in "The Ravenswing": "The queen requests me to say something civil to the young lady, but I cannot make out what she is playing. It sounds like 'God Save the King' but then it goes off into something else. What do you call it?" Sir George explained to him that it was the national melody with variations. "Damn variations!" said the monarch, and he immediately left the concert room.

There was a brilliant performance of "Don Juan." Would that Strauss had always written in this manner! Would that in his later works he had invented melodies like the love song for the oboe played beautifully by Mr. Longy.

Mr. McCormack sang for the first time at these concerts. He should have been associated with the orchestra long before this. We know of no one, man or woman, in this country, with the possible exception of Miss Hempel, who is so accomplished a singer of Mozart's music as Mr. McCormack.

To sing Mozart's music is the supreme test. Many of us remember with pleasure Mr. McCormack's Don Otavio at the Boston Opera House four years ago. His performance then enraptured Mr. Weingartner, who wished to take him to German opera houses. The war prevented Mr. McCormack from taking part in the Mozart Festival organized by Lilli Lehmann at Salzburg.

Yesterday he sang an unfamiliar Rondo by Mozart written to be interpolated in an opera by Anfossi. The air of Handel was also unfamiliar to many. Mr. McCormack phrased the Rondo as a rare musician among singers, singing it as Mozart would have liked to hear it. In Handel's air the roulades were remarkably clear and even and the command of breath was noteworthy. Here is a singer who has not merely a beautiful voice; his art is as conspicuous as the natural tonal charm. Nor did a slip of the orchestra at the beginning of the reprise; quickly remedied by Dr. Muck, disconcert him. Nor should the distinctness of the singer's enunciation in Italian and English pass unnoted.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: The whole of Busoni's "Turandot" Suite in which a female chorus will take part; Franck's Symphonic Variations for piano and orchestra, and Strauss's Burleske for piano and orchestra (Mr. Gebhard, pianist), and the overture to "The Sold Bride," by Smetana.

From the Journal Feb.3,1917.

M'CORMACK AS SYMPHONY STAR FOR FIRST TIME

Tenor Warmly Applauded For His Singing of Two Classic Numbers.

John McCormack made his first appearance as Symphony soloist yesterday in numbers reminiscent of his bygone operatic days. These two solos, manifestly chosen for the purpose of showing the best part of his voice and the grace with which he can adorn classic song, were the Mozart rondo, "Per pieta, non ricercate," and the recitative, "Stay, shepherd, stay," and air, "Shepherd, what art thou pursuing?"—from Handel's pastoral opera, "Acis and Galatea."

These are characteristic but not popular McCormack pieces. No doubt his admirers would much prefer to hear his melting voice in "Mavis" or "The Old Refrain" or some such heart-reaching work. But the two selections happened to be in his repertory and they also happened to suit Symphony traditions in the matter of song. No other tenor sings this archaic music in so felicitous a manner, with so smooth a flow of tone and a diction so admirable. This Mr. McCormack has demonstrated here repeatedly, but with especial success in the memorable performance of "Don Giovanni" given at the Boston Opera House four years ago this month under Weingartner's direction.

The applause yesterday was enthusiastic enough in the circumstances. There will be twice as much enthusiasm, and deservedly so, when the most popular tenor of the day sings "Reynardine" or some other delectable ballad at Symphony Hall during McCormack week; and he will put just as much artistry into the old folk song then as he did into the Handel air yesterday.

To introduce these ornate old-fashioned songs, Dr. Muck heads the program with the overture from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro." The other orchestral numbers are Reger's "Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme of J. A. Hiller"—a work almost as long as the average symphony, and pedagogic as well as long-winded—and one of the ly Strauss tone poems, "Don Juan," ch adds a very welcome pinch of to a conservative program.

Muck conducted the orchestra h the usual brilliant performance, students and nonagenarians it? vaxed enthusiastic.

Gebhard will be the soloist as to k's concerts, when the pro- today mprise Busoni's "Turandot" ranck's symphonic varia- and orchestra, Richard rger in ue in D minor for piano and a Smetana overture, Bride."

[79]

From the Record Feb.3,1917.

M'CORMACK STARS AT THE SYMPHONY

CHARMS IN ENGLISH AND ITALIAN ARIAS

Tenor Shows Himself More Versatile Than Is Generally Imagined

By LOUIS C. ELSON

Programme.

Mozart—"Marriage of Figaro." Overture.
Mozart—Aria from "Il Curioso Indiscreto."
Soloist—Mr. John McCormack.
...ger—Variations and Fugue on a Hiller Theme.
Handel Air from "Acis and Galatea."
Strauss—"Don Juan," Tone-poem.

When John McCormack appears with a Symphony Orchestra it is likely to become a vocal recital, with instrumental numbers added. He was undoubtedly the chief attraction yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. His delightful Irish folk-songs were, however, laid aside, and he appeared in an Italian and an English Aria, both works rather unfamiliar at that. Our recollections of this great tenor in Italian work are connected with stage performances of opera.

We prefer him on the concert platform, for his histrionic ability is not on a par with his vocal attainment. But, in his own field of folk-song and ballad, McCormack stands alone, while in this Italian and contrapuntal school he has at least many equals.

Musicians will look in vain for "Il Curioso Indiscreto" in a list of Mozart's operas. The work was by Anfossi, and Mozart obligingly added three arias to it when it was performed in Vienna in 1785. This particular aria, however, was not sung at the performance. Its title is "Per pieta non ricercate." It displayed Mr. McCormack's vocal technique very finely, but both this and the Handelian aria obscured the charm which lies in this singer's emotional power and the naivete of his direct simplicity. Nevertheless, it showed Mr. McCormack as more versatile than is generally imagined.

From "Acis and Galatea" we generally get the soprano "As when the Dove," and especially the bass, "O, Ruddier than the Cherry," but "Shepherd what art thou Pursuing?" is more rarely heard. If it were not for that long roulade on "Pleasure," it might be made a fairly simple melody, but the Handelian fireworks must needs come in at least once. The vocalist executed the difficult passage with clearness and did not dismember it, in spite of its length. To cut a Handelian phrase is, to the Englishman, as wicked as to cut an oyster, and Mr. McCorwack gave the long phrases with splendid breath-control. In all his work there was surety and fine tone quality. He was recalled after each number with great enthusiasm, and many regretted the stern non-encore rule of the concerts.

And now, having dismissed the singer, we may speak of the orchestra, which also appeared. All of its music had a jocund flavor. The pretty little sonatina-form overture to the "Marriage of Figaro" is as sprightly as anything in the overture repertoire. We should like a little less of whipping-up the pace in this, even though Mozart did mark it "Presto," and after all a Mozart Presto is not to be taken as a Strauss one. It was a delightful interpretation, however, a bright introduction to a lively concert.

Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" scarcely wears so well. His "Death and Transfiguration" and his "Till Eulenspiegel" gain steadily on repeated hearing, possibly also "Zarathustra," but "Don Juan" becomes somewhat weaker in spots, after one has become used to the glitter of its tone-colors. But this work also attempts joviality, at least during the moments of the Don's dissipation, even if the end preaches a sermon which even Billy Sunday would endorse.

Supposedly bright, also, were Reger's Variations on a 'Merry Theme,' by Hiller, but Reger's learning took some of the merriment out of it. The composition shows Reger in the zenith of his ingenuity and contrapuntal powers. These variations are a vastly different matter from the usual orchestral dress parade which takes place when this form is used. Generally each instrument is exploited in turn, from flutes to contra-basses. But Reger's work is on a much broader plane, and he makes a short symphonic movement out of each treatment. Everything is broadly planned even if it is not exactly as merry as old Hiller might have expected. The 7th, 10th and 11th variations seemed especially strong, but all were worthy. The fourth was a veritable canon foundry. But the most astonishing feat of all is the final fugue. It is possibly the finest modern fugue in existence. A splendid Exposition with a long and very characteristic subject, is followed by stretto after stretto, a monument to Reger's contrapuntal skill. In the final Coda the trombones fairly blow their lips off. It is all far more exciting than one would deem a fugue to be, and we imagine that if Browning could have heard it he would at once have revised his "Master Hugues, of Saxe-Gotha," in which he sneers at the complexities of fugal work

The work was gloriously played and it was well worth hearing again. It is better that the public should study such a great composition than be ever fed up on novelties. It was greatly applauded.

From the POST Feb.3,1917.

M'CORMACK SINGS WITH SYMPHONY

Tenor Heard in Arias From Mozart and Handel

BY OLIN DOWNES

John McCormack, tenor, was soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The announcement of his appearance caused the "rush line" to grow to proportions greatly exceeding the numbers of the lucky 525 who can be admitted to the 25-cent seats in the upper balcony. At the box office hundreds of requests for seats at any price were refused hours before the performance began.

MOZART AND HANDEL

Mr. McCormack sang Mozart's Rondo, "Pes Pieta, von Ricercate," written for Anfossi's opera, "Il Curioso Indiscreto," and Handel's recitative, "Stay, Shepherd, Stay," and aria, "Shepherd, What Are Thou Pursuing?" from "Acis and Galatea." The characteristic qualities of his voice have been long admired. Mr. McCormack is one of the few tenors now before the public who has the requisite flexibility and fluency in the delivery of florid music to do justice to the schools of vocal composition represented by Mozart and Handel. In the latter piece his clearness of enunciation was thrice admirable and he showed musicianship in his treatment of long phrases. How grateful is this music to the ear! Mozart's aria is effective in a rather modern manner, and the beautiful style of Handel is a thing which will long delight audiences of the 20th century.

The most delightful of all the orchestral compositions was the sparkling overture to Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," which was played in a superbly brilliant and vivacious manner. Probably, also, the crispness of the weather had its due effect in giving an added glow and vibrancy to the tone of the strings.

More remarkable, of course, from a technical point of view, was the performance of Max Reger's "Variations on a Merry Theme" of Hiller of 100. To say that these variations are of uniform interest and value would be mistating the fact. One is conscious a part of the time of the composer doing "stunts." The merry theme is manhandled. It is stretched and twisted without mercy. But there is in this work much of a beauty that is curiously and incongruously characteristic of Reger in his more lyrical moods, and by contrast a lusty humor, which in the fugue is a splendid development and accumulation of music over the booming B's in the bass has a very inspiring effect. But we like the "Don Juan" of Richard Strauss better when it is more sumptuously colored.

REPUBLICAN

ess: Springfield, Mass.

FEB 4 19

Boston Symphony Here the 20th

The fourth and final concert of the very successful series of subscription concerts inaugurated in Springfield this year by O. A. Ellis of Boston will be given in the city Auditorium Tuesday evening, the 20th. This will bring the second visit of the season by the Boston symphony orchestra under Dr Karl Muck. Particular importance is attached to this concert because the program will be devoted entirely to the music of Richard Wagner. All orchestras in the course of a season play more or less Wagner and all are sure to give a certain number of Wagner concerts, but a Wagner concert given by the Boston symphony orchestra, which is unquestionably the best orchestra in the world, with Karl Muck, the greatest living conductor of Wagner's music is an event of much more than ordinary importance. The program which he has arranged for Springfield calls for the "Rienzi" overture, the "Siegfried Idyl," the prelude to "Lohengrin," selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdaemmerung," selections from "Die Meistersinger" and the overture to "Tannhauser."

New York City

3 1917

Defense of the Philharmonic's Aims—A Letter from the President.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

In your last Sunday's edition, under the caption, "The Philharmonic Again," there appeared a long letter signed by Daniel Gregory Mason. It was a letter of criticism. Its main purpose was to point out that the President of the Philharmonic Society was not justified in declaring, as he had recently done before the members of the society on the occasion of their first jubilee concert, that the Philharmonic "had maintained high artistic standards." The letter objected to some other phrases of commendation which had been bestowed upon the society and declared in a general way that the society's programs were chosen with a view to increasing the box office receipts rather than to presenting the best music available and that its tendency was "to lower rather than to raise the standard of musical taste."

Without attempting here to point out the numerous contradictory statements in Mr. Mason's rather obviously biased letter, I would preface this brief rejoinder with an assurance to him as to all New York music lovers that the directors of the Philharmonic welcome at all times fair and intelligent criticism of the work of its orchestra and of the programs which it presents. It is unnecessary to remind a musical public that in the matter of the musical education of a great metropolis such as that for which the Philharmonic is laboring, opinions are as many as there are educated men to voice them, and Mr. Mason's rather positive views will be judged by this fact. My excuse for this reply is to supplement the data which he has given and to point out that he has drawn his illustrations from inadequate information. For example, he states that "only four works of Beethoven, one of Schubert, two of Schumann, and none of Bach, Haydn, or Mozart, nor of Brahms, or Franck, have been played," and this declaration is based upon the first thirteen programs of the season, which is less than one-third of the total number of programs (46) up to date. Now, on these forty-six programs the name of Bach has appeared three times; Beethoven, eleven times; Brahms, four; Saint-Saëns, three; Schubert, five, Schumann four; Weber, four, and in addition we find the names of Bruch, Cesar Franck, Tschaikowsky, Wagner, Liszt, Haydn, Gluck, Chabrier, Debussy, Delibes, Dukas, Gade, Glazounow, Goldmark, Grieg, Reger, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Sibelius, Smetana, Volkman, and the works of five American composers. Can any fair critic question the catholicity of Philharmonic programs?

Mr. Mason further questions "Why is it that you need a soloist when it is a Philharmonic?" This is a rather large question and the form of the inquiry is vague. For the sake of accuracy and general information, it should be known that the Philharmonic has steadily reduced the number of its soloists. On Sunday last its all-Wagner concert to a capacity house was given without a soloist. All its recent jubilee concerts were given without soloists. It is evident that the directors are not biased against this form of program, but it is also evident that they would not be prepared to adopt Mr. Mason's dictum of wholesale exclusion of soloists from their programs. The growth of musical taste in the metropolis is a matter of extreme importance to the community and to the country. Many factors and diverse interests play their part. None can without regret be lost to metropolitan life.

To come back to Mr. Mason, it might interest your readers to know that Mr. Stransky has received the following letter from Professor Cornelius Rubner, Head Professor of Music in Columbia, from which it would hardly appear the music department of that university shares the opinions of this all-knowing young composer:

"My Dear Mr. Stransky: Referring to the article D. G. Mason wrote against the Philharmonic in today's TIMES, I wish herewith to state to you that although Mr. Mason is Associate Professor in my department I have had nothing whatever to do with his article, and the first I have seen or known of it was today in the paper.

"I am very sorry that the article was written by one of my associates, and, assuring you of my continued esteem, I remain,

"Very cordially yours,
"CORNELIUS RUBNER.

"Jan. 28, 1917."

Finally, may I call your attention to the fact that the Kneisel Quartet to which Mr. Mason refers has recently on the occasion of our jubilee, sent us the following telegram, from which it may surely be deduced that these great artists do not share Mr. Mason's views as to the Philharmonic?

"Allow us to join the multitude of those who on today's festival occasion wish to express their admiration and respect for the present and past workers in the cause of music united as the Philharmonic Society of New York. With their never-ceasing striving for the highest ideals in art, they have made a matchless record in the world's history of music. KNEISEL QUARTET."

This dispatch is all the more significant in view of the fact that the leading members of this quartet are graduates of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD,
President the Philharmonic Society.
New York, Jan. 30, 1917.

ORCHESTRA AND SOLOISTS.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

It would seem as if the cold, clear facts so boldly and so ably set forth by Daniel Gregory Mason in his recent letter to THE NEW YORK TIMES could be disputed by none among the musical public who read it with interest last Sunday, save perhaps by those few who never feel disposed to question or take exception to anything that is done by such individuals or societies as stand out because they are pioneers.

Mr. Mason draws one conclusion from a fact that he states, however, which calls for comment from those "music lovers" who, in their logic, go a step further than he does. He writes:

"I cannot forget what a young man said to me as we sat on the floor of the dress circle among a crowd of more than a hundred people at a recent Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall. To my remark that it was encouraging to see so many assembled, even when there was no soloist, he replied: 'Oh, you don't need a soloist when it's the Boston Symphony.' Now to conclude, why is it that you do need a soloist when it is the Philharmonic? Briefly, because the directors no longer give the best music or give it at its best."

Would the Boston Symphony Orchestra be able to continue to play to such overfilled houses without resorting to the added attraction of great soloists on its programs if that organization came to New York for as many concerts as both the New York Symphony Society and the Philharmonic are won to give in their home town each Winter.

Should not the question also be considered here, even were our own high class orchestras quite as able, both artistically and financially speaking, to give the same number of concerts with an orchestra during its New York season, where would our many great and enjoyable artists come in, who need the very best orchestras to help them bring before the public their highest endeavors in the interpretation of concertos, arias, &c.?

In the judgment of genuine music lovers, any conductor and orchestra which prove themselves to be sufficiently artistic to give absolute satisfaction and joy to the soloists whom they accompany, as well as to their audiences, hold fully as high a place as does that orchestra with its conductor which stands out and shines only as chief performer on its programs.

To such of us, then, as reason from different premises than Mr. Mason evidently does, the ability of an orchestra to "go it alone" without the co-operation of other artists as soloists would not seem to be dependent alone upon the excellence of its work but also upon the demands made by its public.

Therefore, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with but comparatively few concerts in New York City, can risk doing without the added attractions of high-class soloists in connection with its work, our home orchestras, notwithstanding the fact that each has much that is enjoyable to its credit, with more than forty concerts during their respective New York seasons, must satisfy the natural desire of their patrons for variety of perfection in art if they wish to hold the interest of an appreciative and a versatile public.

A NEW YORK "MUSIC LOVER."
New York, Jan. 29, 1917.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The able article of Daniel Gregory Mason, that eminent musical authority and splendid musician, relative to the Philharmonic Society, that appeared in yesterday's edition of your valuable paper, commands respect for its candid statement of facts.

The article was much discussed by the audience at the Philharmonic concert yesterday afternoon. Unfortunately, the standards of genuine musical taste are partially sunk into oblivion. What is essentially required is a first-class conductor. Further, the elimination, in an advisory capacity for choosing conductors, of the ladies on the committee would be desirable.

Former members of the Philharmonic orchestra, like Henry Schmitt, ex-concert master, and Franz Kaltenborn, first violinist, most excellent musicians, protégés of the late lamented Anton Seidl, are all musically the equal of the present conductor, but unfortunately they were not made in Bohemia and imported, but born and reared in New York City. They had years and years of experience under those great masters of the baton, and have shown their competency, but they had no chance.

The New York critics have been very charitable toward the present conductor, for his conducting has been at times pedantic and perfunctory, such as one finds in the leader of a Sängerfest or Männergesangverein.

If it were not for the concert master, Mr. Pilzer; the first cellist, Mr. Schulz; the first hornist, Mr. Reiter, and numerous other masters of their instruments that constitute the beautiful orchestra it would be "bonne nuit."

Let us hope, for the benefit of the musical public at large, that a new policy and other imperative changes will see the re-establishing of the Philharmonic of yore; that a new era will dawn so that one can say, "Yes, the Philharmonic is not slumbering any more, the new standard of musical taste has been enunciated."

An old subscriber of the Philharmonic, with no ulterior motive in view, who has but the welfare of the society at heart but no voice in correcting its shortcomings, seeks this method through your columns to confirm facts and elucidate material questions overlooked by Daniel Gregory Mason, to whom great credit must be given for taking the bull by the horns.

JORGE MAURER.
New York, Jan. 29, 1917.

ONE SEASON'S PROGRAMS.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The feeling aroused in some musical quarters by the recent Philharmonic Jubilee—an innocent enough diversion, surely, if not of much importance—would be amusing if it were not so unworthy. Only one phase of the criticisms made is considered in this letter—that concerning the programs. Mr. Mason, in his contribution to the subject, in THE TIMES of last Sunday, takes for his basis the "first thirteen concerts of the present season." This is as unfair as to take a few phrases from the works of a writer. Why not take the entire list of compositions played during, say, the seventy-third season? It is true Wagner's works are the most numerous; they are short. A whole evening of Wagner will mean ten or twelve numbers, while three by Beethoven will fill the same time. Liszt's name appeared on the programs twenty-one times to Beethoven's thirty-eight. Mr. Stransky did not play the suite, "In a Perambulator," or the "Cape Cod Pageant," but he did give Beethoven's Fifth Symphony six times.

ELIZABETH REMINGTON.
New York, Jan. 29, 1917.

Providence, R. I.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

With Gabrilowitsch as soloist and with a program of unusual charm the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, Feb. 6, holds the promise of being one of the most attractive of the present series. Gabrilowitsch is unquestionably preeminent among the younger generation of pianists. Now in his mid-thirties he has won a public in this country which is equalled in loyalty and numbers by few pianists of our time.

The program which Dr. Muck has arranged calls for the third Symphony of Robert Schumann, the one which is called the "Rhenish" Symphony, Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," Rachmaninoff's second concerto in C-minor for piano and orchestra, and the "Academic Festival" overture of Brahms While the "Rhenish" symphony is not played so often as those in D-minor and B-flat, it is regarded by many as the most characteristic utterance of the composer in this form, and certainly even for Schumann it is unusually rich in melody. It is called the "Rhenish" symphony because Schumann himself wrote it with the idea of making it an expression of the people of the Lower Rhine region from which he had sprung and of whom he was always so fond. He has undoubtedly been most successful in his effort. Moreover, it is this symphony that contains the impressive episode inspired by a festival in the great cathedral of Calonge, this being the fourth movement.

Of the many works which have made Claude Debussy not only the most notable figure in modern French music but one of the most notable figures in modern music of all nations, the prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" seems to have the greatest lasting qualities. It is an esquisite bit of fancy, the performance of which takes but nine minutes. Yet in it he has expressed in a remarkable fashion not merely feeling in the poem of Mallarme but the actual Greek feeling which is back of that poem. It is program music at its very best.

Rachmaninoff's concerto, which Mr. Gabrilowitsch will play, is decidedly music, great in matter and great in method.

Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture is familiar to Boston Symphony patrons. Written when the composer received the degree of doctor from Breslau University, he cunningly built it on a foundation of traditional student songs.

The program in its proper form is as follows:

Schumann, Symphony in E-flat Major, No. 3, "Rhenish;" Debussy, prelude to The Afternoon of a Faun;" Rachmaninoff, concerto for pianoforte No. 2, in C-minor; Brahms, overture, "Academic Festival" soloists, Ossip Gabrilowitsch.

From the Journal Feb.8,1917.

WOMEN'S CHORUS AT SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The Symphony program for this week calls for two solo numbers and the employment of a women's chorus in the principal orchestral number. This will be the suite taken from the music written by Ferruccio Busoni for Goetz's fairy drama, "Turandot." All eight movements of the suite will be played, and in the sixth movement a women's chorus from the Musical Art Club and the Choral Music Society will be heard.

Heinrich Gebhard, the soloist, will play the symphonic variations of Cesar Franck and Richard Strauss' "Burleske." The final number will be Smetana's overture, "The Sold Bride."

From the Feb.1,1917 Traveler

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC

At the Symphony concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, tonight, the program will include the Cesar Franck Symphony in D-Minor, Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyl" and Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

John McCormack makes his debut as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. The program comprises Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," the air, "Per Pieta non ricercate," from Mozart's "Il Curioso Indiscreto"; Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Hiller; the Recitative, "Stay, Shepherd, Stay," and air, "Shepherd, What Art Thou Pursuing," from "Acis and Galatea," and Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan."

[80]

EVENING POST
New York City

SOME years ago a gang of musical cranks and rowdies in Paris demonstrated their artistic principles by going to orchestral concerts and indulging in persistent hisses and other noises whenever a soloist appeared. "No concertos!" was their war-cry; but, as ninety-nine per cent. of the concert-goers disagreed with them, they were soon taught better manners.

Anybody, of course, has a right to avoid concerts at which soloists appear, or to write to the newspapers and argue that it is discreditable to engage them. Daniel Gregory Mason has written to this effect, and, as he is associate professor of music at Columbia University and the author of some excellent books, his words deserve attention. To fully appreciate his candor, one must remember that he also writes the programme notes for the concerts of Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Society. Now here is what this eminent professor-author-annotator said in last Sunday's Times:

"Walter Damrosch, although he has free access to the purse of a multi-millionaire, seldom gives a concert without a soloist. In the prospectuses sent to the newspapers special emphasis is always placed on these soloists, and in the advertisements their names are conspicuously printed in large, fat type. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, also, seldom gives a concert in Boston without a soloist; this year, I have read, the number of soloists is larger than ever. Now, why is it that Damrosch and Muck need so many soloists? The answer is, briefly, because their organizations no longer give the best music or give it at its best. On the other hand, the New York Philharmonic frequently gives concerts without soloists, and yet to full houses."

: : :

NO, no, no! This is not what Professor Mason wrote. I simply read it that way, having, like Siegfried, just tasted a drop of the dragon's blood. The professor is silent about the Damrosch and Boston orchestras, but sneers at the Philharmonic for doing precisely what each of those other orchestras does in its home town! In New York, to be sure, no soloists seem to be forthcoming this season (for the first time) at the Boston Orchestra's concerts; but neither the newspapers nor the subscribers were informed of this in advance; the patrons renewed their subscriptions in the happy belief that the manager of that admirable organization would, as usual, generously throw in a few Paderewskis and Kreislers and great prima donnas, all of whom originally helped him to secure sold-out houses. I, for one, should feel extremely sorry, for myself and for the subscribers, if hereafter no more opportunities were to be offered to hear the world's greatest artists with the superb orchestral background supplied by Dr. Muck and his players. Will Mr. Ellis dare to repeat this experiment—to serve notice on the New York patrons of the Boston Orchestra that if they wish hereafter to hear Paderewski play his own concerto or Schumann's, Kreisler the Beethoven or Brahms, Hofmann the Chopin, Grainger the Grieg, Gabrilowitsch the Tchaikovsky, and so on, they will have to go to the concerts of the Philharmonic or the Symphony Society?

: : :

THE engagement of world-famed artists to play concertos by the greatest masters is not the only heinous crime charged against the New York Philharmonic. Another dastardly offence is the playing of more pieces of the sonorous, highly colored, and dramatic modern type than of the old classics, and playing them better too, horribile dictu. Professor Mason was disconsolate because he could not find the name of Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Brahms, or Franck on the first thirteen of this year's programmes. Had he looked up the Philharmonic records for last season he would have found these figures: Bach, 5 works; Beethoven, 8; Brahms, 3; Haydn, 2; Mendelssohn, 5; Schubert, 2; Schumann, 3; Weber, 5; Franck, 2. Comparing these figures with those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at home (in both cases for orchestral works and concertos) we find: Bach, 3; Beethoven, 10; Brahms, 4; Haydn, 3; Mendelssohn, 2; Mozart, 5; Schumann, 2; Schubert, 1; Weber, 4; Franck, 2. Summing up, we have in the New York list 35 works by these nine composers of the "classical" persuasion; and in the Boston list, 36! Yet Professor Mason complains that the music played by the Philharmonic is not that "which nourishes and delights the sense of beauty"—which seems rather hard on the classics just named, and on the Boston Symphony Orchestra!

In his eagerness to demonstrate the degradation of the Philharmonic, Professor Mason notes that of its first thirteen concerts this season, "one only had no attraction except that of music"—that is, no soloist. But before the date of his letter three pairs of concerts and three single concerts had been given without soloists, and to crowded houses—which takes all the wind out of his sails.

It is not to be imagined for the fraction of a second that Professor Mason's eagerness to pummel the Philharmonic is in any way connected with his duties as the programme annotator of a rival orchestra. There is a deeper—a much deeper—reason: Brahms. He is a Brahmsite.

Time was when the worst nuisance in the musical world was the Wagnerite (I was one myself). Now it is the Brahmsite. The Philharmonic does not play the works of the god-like Brahms as often or as affectionately as those of the Romantic Liszt—hinc illæ lachrymæ! However, cheer up! On February 8 and 9 Stransky will conduct Brahms's fourth symphony, his reading of which even Richard Aldrich has praised. Then all will be forgiven and forgotten.

From the
Globe
Feb.3,1917.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Brilliant Performance of Reger's Variations

The performance of Max Reger's variations on the theme from Hiller's operetta at the 13th Symphony concert yesterday afternoon by Dr Muck and the orchestra was euphonious, brilliant, sympathetic to the best qualities of the music, that of the concluding fugue one of supreme virtuosity. And yet how many of these 11 variations are a kind epitaph to the late composer? They are in many respects typical. There is the bluster, the boisterous haste, as though notes were flung upon the paper, without true perception, without reconsideration. Then there are the passages, as in the fifth, as in the graceful intermezzo, and particularly the finely serious, even poetic vein of the 11th and last, music in this which brings regret at the interruption of the noisy fugue at first clever, then stupendous.

Mozart's overture to "Figaro's Marriage" sparkled like champagne. The whirling opening figure went at a magical breath-taking pace, and all with a transforming spirit of lightness and zest, an illuminating testimonial to the fleet virtuosity of the strings. A performance of "Don Juan," which was more reflective than participative, brought the concert to a close.

Dividing these numbers, John McCormack, a singer who in ballads has given pleasure to many and who is remembered agreeably in lyric operatic music, sang twice, a rondo by Mozart, interpolated in Anfossi's opera, "Il Curioso Indiscreto," and the recitative, "Stay, Shepherd, Stay," with the air "Shepherd, What Art Thou Pursuing," from Handel's "Acis and Galatea." Mozart's music is amiable, but if not wholly distinctive, is of more dramatic character than it appeared yesterday. Handel's shepherd, whether he stays or pursues, is equally a harmless person, nor did Mr McCormack's singing disturb him. A clear enunciation is still a feature of the tenor's singing. He was warmly applauded.

The program next week will be as follows: Busoni's "Turandot" suite, Cesar Franck's Symphonic Variations and Strauss' Burleske in D minor, both for piano and orchestra (Heinrich Gebhard, soloist), Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride."

From the
Traveler
Feb.3,1917.

Next Week's Symphony.

A work dedicated to Dr. Muck will feature next week's Symphony program, the suite from the music composed by Ferrucio Busoni for Gozzi's Chinese drama, "Turandot." It calls for a woman's chorus which will consist of 80 voices from the Musical Art Club and Choral Music Society. The soloist will be Heinrich Gebhardt, pianist, who will play Cesar Franck, "Symphonic Variations," and Richard Strauss, "Burleske." The final number will be "The

PRESS
ress: Philadelphia, Pa.

FEB 11 19

NO NOVELTY appears on the fourth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be played in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening, February 12. All the works are well tried favorites whose popularity has long since been certain. The soloist will be that admirable virtuoso, Anton Witek, who occupies the post of concert-master in the orchestra. Mr. Witek has appeared in the last five years several times as soloist with the orchestra and Philadelphia is well aware of his very unusual gifts as a violinist. He will play the Scotch Fantasy for violin and orchestra of Max Bruch.

The orchestral numbers will be Smetana's Overture "The Sold Bride," Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" and Beethoven's Eighth Symphony. The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the great gala concert in the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, January 16 last, when the receipts ran close to $25,000, played as one of its numbers Smetana's brilliant Overture, and Dr. Muck and his men simply swept the audience off its feet with the breathless pace with which they took it and the clarity with which every part came out.

From the
Transcript
Feb.10,1917.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

ONE DULL PIECE, AND THREE FOR PLEASURE

The Blank "Burleske" of Strauss' Youth Revived — The Contrasting Charm and Fancy of Franck's Variations — Mr. Busoni's Suite of Stage Music; "Turandot" for New Revelation of His Qualities as Composer—The Vividness, Fancy and Humor of the Pieces—Dr. Muck and His Public

WITH two items in the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon precedent was piquantly reversed. For once Strauss, who is usually interesting, however sharply the hearer may quarrel with his music, was downright dull. For once, also, Mr. Busoni, who is often baffling or barren when he sets pen to music-paper, was amusing, stimulating, gay. The occasion of Strauss's mischance was the revival of his "Burleske" for piano and orchestra, which Mr. Gebhard, the "assisting artist" of the day, elected to play anew with the band as he had played it originally in 1903. The occasion of Mr. Busoni's happy fortunes was the first performance in Boston in entirety of the Suite for orchestra that he wove out of his incidental music to Gozzi's play of Chinese fantasy, "Turandot." Since one division of it requires momentarily a chorus of women, Dr. Muck, loyal to the slightest obligation a composer or his own artistic conscience may impose, had it assembled, eighty strong, from the Musical Art Club and the Choral Music Society, and trained to the minute by Mr. Townsend, even though its participation in the concert was of the briefest. Relatively light, too, were the other pieces of the afternoon—Franck's Symphonic Variations for pianoforte and orchestra, again for Mr. Gebhard, and the racing, smiling, almost gesticulating overture to Smetana's opera of "The Bartered Bride." A programme to pleasure the audience in all but the "Burleske"; a pianist whom it knew familiarly, heard gladly and rewarded heartily, and a concert without incident outside music and performance, except in the applause that seemed to single out the conductor as he came to his place and to testify to the good will of his public toward him. A week ago the audience of Saturday evening similarly and even more heartily received him. In view of this clear and sincere mood of his audiences at a time when the town simmers with anti-German feeling, is it quite wise or even tactful on his part to persist in the concert that he and Miss Gerhardt purpose to give a fortnight hence for the fund to despatch an American surgical unit to the armies of the empire? For those who must deal with the public, however intense their personal loyalties or however honorable and laudable their purpose, there is a discretion in times and seasons. The present—and in a perfervid and self-centred New England city—seems hardly such for a concert in behalf of a German war charity. By a single error of tact it would be a pity to see Dr. Muck lose in an evening even a measure of the respect, admiration and good will that shield him against many a gust of anti-Germany sentiment or folly.

The misfortune of the "Burleske" is to burlesque nothing an attentive ear can discover in performance; while the pianists who occasionally venture the piece would probably admit, did they open their secret hearts, that they only persuade themselves by a kind of auto-intoxication to find travesty in it. Even scrutiny of the score is no more enlightning. "With humor" or the like phrase Strauss time and again labels a measure; but few readers, for the life of them, can discover any "humor" in it. The truth is that the undated piece, which Strauss probably wrote in his nineteenth or his twentieth year, is no more than an excuse in which like a stripped and sinewy athlete, he shows his "development" in the resources and the processes of music-making on the academic model. Here and there, indeed, in the "Burleske"—to continue the figure—he is straining for the start into his own courses of imagination and expression, into the free play of his personality, that was to sweep him soon into "Don Juan," "Till" and "Death and Transfiguration"; but for the most part the piece of yesterday might have been written by any able youngster of the eighties with his Brahms and his lessons in the conservatory well in mind. Indeed it might have been written more brightly and amusingly and less dryly and laboriously by many a youth who was to prove no Strauss or even a shadow of a Strauss. Such a one, perhaps, would not have expected an audience to be diverted by tweaks of the piccolo, sudden stranglings of a motive or portentous interpositions of the kettle-drum

Yet, as chance would have it, Mr. Gebhard played this dull and clumsy piece more animatedly and eloquently than he did the lovely and enkindling Symphonic Variations of Franck, which were his other number. In them he was strangely dry and expository, unfolding theme and metamorphoses in the white light of pure precision with far too little suggestion of the airy and enwreathing motion with which the Parisian propels his music or the endless play of pianistic and orchestral color with which he glamors it. For the Symphonic Variations are a marvellously fluid music, in incessant motion upon the piano and through the orchestra. The separate variations comb and curl wave-like into the design of the piece; currents and cross-currents, eddies and momentary pools dapple them; while over them all and variously rippling them play the sunshine and the

[81]

Smetana's overture may be taken granted like a cocktail before dinner—the more because, in the flying pace, sharpened accents and the flashing pr sion in which Dr. Muck has schooled orchestra to play the piece, it has bec to the frequenters of the concerts lik cocktail of Czech melodies and rhyt swallowed in one tingling gulp. Perh however, there might be keener appre tion of the contributing Czech liqueurs spirits did the palate of the ear have more time to savor them. To whip overture forward a shade faster and snappingly at each repetition has now come one of the obligatory feats of ductor and band. So it was that ou the Franckian variations, the lively p ure of the concert sprang from Mr. Busoni's Suite. Of course, even in assemblage and adaptation for the concert-hall, it remains intrinsically music of the theatre, to be heard at particular moments, under particular circumstance and against particular scenic backgrounds upon the stage. Even the lights in the Deutsches Theater—Mr. Busoni used to say—contributed to the illusion of the music. The more the pity, then, that the programme-book, instead of heaping up chronological tables of the composer's appearances in Boston as pianist and lists of his published pieces, did not attempt to reconstitute a play known to the contemporary German, English and American stages and to describe the incidents or the personages—for which purpose there is much readily accessible material—that the music accompanies or suggests. As it was, the listener, even with the hints of Mr. Busoni's programme, needed lively imagination to feel the pictorial quality, the warmth, the fancy, the whole gay or graphic illusion of the music.

The play—Gozzi's, Schiller's, Vollmöller's MacKaye's "Turandot"—retells the Persian legend of the remote, proud, perverse and cerebrally wanton Chinese princess, who bade her lovers guess three riddles that she propounded, and if they so much as failed in one despatched them forthwith to execution. Upon a day there came so to woo her Kalaf, Prince of Astrakhan, youthful, but wise; high-hearted, but wary; comely as Turandot herself. And lo! he guessed the riddles; whereat the princess was perturbed, and the more since she could learn neither his name nor nativity. But already she loved him and was conquered, and so at last, after more ruses as is the way of women, he possessed her. In the Suite Mr. Busoni first sets the stage and preludes to the succeeding dramatic narrative. Distant drum beats in reiterated rhythms, entering instruments in Oriental interval hint the fantastic scene. Trumpets proclaim a prince come to a trial of amorous fate. Foreboding, sombre are the auspices; confused, menacing the tumult at the city gate, with the heads of the executed lovers stark upon it.

So, with the music, into the palace, where first it sketches Truffaldino, chief eunuch and also comic figure out of Italian commedia dell' arte, pittipatting and leering over his preparations for the trial of wits or teetering with his fellow-eunuchs through a squeaking march. Next the formidable fanfares that bring upon the stage that venerable emperor, Altoum, but he is by no means such a stupendous sovereign as the sonorous brass and the rolling drums would make him, but really a wabbling and comic old fellow (as a kind of intermezzo in the march hints) somewhat pensive of this new "crisis" in the amatory adventures of his daughter. Then Turandot herself in music that stirs out of hushed and mysterious preludings into the slow, still march of a gliding train of women; that swells into the stately clangors of august presence and ceremonial state; and then droops into dark-hued and sharp-set melody, yet with soft and pulsing underbody, as though Mr. Busoni would so delineate the moody and perverse princess, remote, self-absorbed, implacable, yet not insensitive to gentler impulses of passion. Mystery shrouds her in the advancing music; yet ceremony still attends her.

Forthwith from day and the great hall where Kalaf has guessed the riddles, into the night and the langurous and perfumed solitude of the women's apartments. Lusciously yet monotonously Mr. Busoni's suggests the scene; his rhythm is quasi-Oriental; his melody is quasi-Italianate—by sheer dint of blood in spite of scholarly resolution not to forsake his eastern motives and modulation. A dance of the women, titillating through monotonous repetitions; a song of the woman above it in the high range of their voices, in interrupted and sensuous phrases—both intensify atmosphere. Then in sudden shift to the chamber of the prince, where in ominous and sinister waltz of broken and lugubrious measures, darkling phantoms haunt his shallow sleep. For in and out of the chamber flit the emissaries of Turandot with ears pointed to hear him mutter his name. Measures, next, for her final ruse—the feigning of woe in the trappings of woe—music of melodious melancholy that harsh and dissonant instruments begin to mock; that professes wistfulness and then whips it and the deceit away for a wild and whirling, snapping, scintillant and sonorous Finale alla Turca, with all the personages clearly dancing down to the footlights with the orchestra twisting them in rhythms and festooning them with color, as though it were flinging confetti. After all this is a merry world.

A vivid music to [illegible] especially with a little knowledge of the course of legend and play and enough imagination withal to visualize setting, episode, personage upon a stage on which orchestra, chorus and piano hardly left room even for segments of fancy—a music quick with invention, instant (as it seemed) with means and procedure, bright with color, graphic with delineative suggestion, vibrant with implication of atmosphere. Throughout Mr. Busoni has courted oriental intervals, rhythms, melodies, and deployed no little scholarship in the search, the choice and the treatment of them; but steadfastly he has manipulated, colored, contrasted them as a composer of the West who did but seek Eastern suggestion and illusion. Where the circumstance of the stage bids he writes with shrewd, yet vivacious humor as in the music of the teetering eunuch, the senile emperor, the scintillant and snapping finale. His ceremonial music, though it is haunted by march rhythms, runs in energetically sonorous pomps of tone. Mystery, then sentiment and characterization always speak out of the music of Turandot, with little need or aid from extraneous suggestion. Yet more mysterious and fantastic are the broken phrases and rhythms of the nocturnal phantoms. Wholly atmospheric is the music of the harem in the soft and sensuous night. Yet through the whole Suite goes the capriciousness of mood, invention, method, means that is spice to a half-Chinese, half-Italian (and perhaps not a little German) fantasy. For once—to bring back beginnings—Mr. Busoni has been not only a singular but a stimulating composer. Largely and justly his hearers applauded him.

H. T. P.

EVENING POST
New York City

SOME years ago a gang of musical cranks and rowdies in Paris demonstrated their artistic principles by going to orchestral concerts and indulging in persistent hisses and other noises whenever a soloist appeared. "No concertos!" was their war-cry; but, as ninety-nine per cent. of the concert-goers disagreed with them, they were soon taught better manners.

Anybody, of course, has a right to avoid concerts at which soloists appear, or to write to the newspapers and argue that it is discreditable to engage them. Daniel Gregory Mason has written to this effect, and, as he is associate professor of music at Columbia University and the author of some excellent books, his words deserve attention. To fully appreciate his candor, one must remember that he also writes the programme notes for the concerts of Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Society. Now here is what this eminent professor-author-annotator said in last Sunday's Times:

"Walter Damroseh, although he has free access to the purse of a multi-millionaire, seldom gives a concert without a soloist. In the prospectuses sent to the newspapers special emphasis is always placed on these soloists, and in the advertisements their names are conspicuously printed in large, fat type. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, also, seldom gives a concert in Boston without a soloist; this year, I have read, the number of soloists is larger than ever. Now, why is it that Damrosch and Muck need so many soloists? The answer is, briefly, because their organizations no longer give the best music or give it at its best. On the other hand, the New York Philharmonic frequently gives concerts without soloists, and yet to full houses."

: : :

NO, no, no! This is not what Professor Mason wrote. I simply read it that way, having, like Siegfried, just tasted a drop of the dragon's blood. The professor is silent about the Damrosch and Boston orchestras, but sneers at the Philharmonic for doing precisely what each of those other orchestras does in its home town! In New York, to be sure, no soloists seem to be forthcoming this season (for the first time) at the Boston Orchestra's concerts; but neither the newspapers nor the subscribers were informed of this in advance; the patrons renewed their subscriptions in the happy belief that the manager of that admirable organization would, as usual, generously throw in a few Paderewskis and Kreislers and great prima donnas, all of whom originally helped him to secure sold-out houses. I, for one, should feel extremely sorry, for myself and for the subscribers, if hereafter no more opportunities were to be offered to hear the world's greatest artists with the superb orchestral background supplied by Dr. Muck and his players. Will Mr. Ellis dare to repeat this experiment—to serve notice on the New York patrons of the Boston Orchestra that if they wish hereafter to hear Paderewski play his own concerto or Schumann's, Kreisler the Beethoven or Brahms, Hofmann the Chopin, Grainger the Grieg, Gabrilowitsch the Tchaikovsky, and so on, they will have to go to the concerts of the Philharmonic or the Symphony Society?

: : :

THE engagement of world-famed artists to play concertos by the greatest masters is not the only heinous crime charged against the New York Philharmonic. Another dastardly offence is the playing of more pieces of the sonorous, highly colored, and dramatic modern type than of the old classics, and playing them better too, horribile dictu. Professor Mason was disconsolate because he could not find the name of Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Brahms, or Franck on the first thirteen of this year's programmes. Had he looked up the Philharmonic records for last season he would have found these figures: Bach, 5 works; Beethoven, 8; Brahms, 3; Haydn, 2; Mendelssohn, 5; Schubert, 2; Schumann, 3; Weber, 5; Franck, 2. Comparing these figures with those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at home (in both cases for orchestral works and concertos) we find: Bach, 3; Beethoven, 10; Brahms, 4; Haydn, 3; Mendelssohn, 2; Mozart, 5; Schumann, 2; Schubert, 1; Weber, 4; Franck, 2. Summing up, we have in the New York list 35 works by these nine composers of the "classical" persuasion; and in the Boston list, 36! Yet Professor Mason complains that the music played by the Philharmonic is not that "which nourishes and delights the sense of beauty"—which seems rather hard on the classics just named, and on the Boston Symphony Orchestra!

In his eagerness to demonstrate the degradation of the Philharmonic, Professor Mason notes that of its first thirteen concerts this season, "one only had no attraction except that of music"—that is, no soloist. But before the date of his letter three pairs of concerts and three single concerts had been given without soloists, and to crowded houses—which takes all the wind out of his sails.

It is not to be imagined for the fraction of a second that Professor Mason's eagerness to pummel the Philharmonic is in any way connected with his duties as the programme annotator of a rival orchestra. There is a deeper—a much deeper—reason: Brahms. He is a Brahmsite.

Time was when the worst nuisance in the musical world was the Wagnerite (I was one myself). Now it is the Brahmsite. The Philharmonic does not play the works of the god-like Brahms as often or as affectionately as those of the satanic Liszt—hinc illæ lachrymæ! However, cheer up! On February 8 and Stransky will conduct Brahms's fourth symphony, his reading of which even Richard Aldrich has praised. Then all will be forgiven and forgotten.

From the
Globe
Feb.3,1917.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Brilliant Performance of Reger's Variations

The performance of Max Reger's variations on the theme from Hiller's operetta at the 13th Symphony concert yesterday afternoon by Dr Muck and the orchestra was euphonious, brilliant, sympathetic to the best qualities of the music, that of the concluding fugue one of supreme virtuosity. And yet how many of these 11 variations are a kind epitaph to the late composer? They are in many respects typical. There is the bluster, the boisterous haste, as though notes were flung upon the paper, without true perception, without reconsideration. Then there are the passages, as in the fifth, as in the graceful intermezzo, and particularly the finely serious, even poetic vein of the 11th and last, music in this which brings regret at the interruption of the noisy fugue at first clever, then stupendous.

Mozart's overture to "Figaro's Marriage" sparkled like champagne. The whirling opening figure went at a magical breath-taking pace, and all with a transforming spirit of lightness and zest, an illuminating testimonial to the fleet virtuosity of the strings. A performance of "Don Juan," which was more reflective than participative, brought the concert to a close.

Dividing these numbers, John McCormack, a singer who in ballads has given pleasure to many and who is remembered agreeably in lyric operatic music, sang twice, a rondo by Mozart, interpolated in Anfossi's opera, "Il Curioso Indiscreto," and the recitative, "Stay, Shepherd, Stay," with the air "Shepherd, What Art Thou Pursuing," from Handel's "Acis and Galatea." Mozart's music is amiable, but if not wholly distinctive, is of more dramatic character than it appeared yesterday. Handel's shepherd, whether he stays or pursues, is equally a harmless person, nor did Mr McCormack's singing disturb him. A clear enunciation is still a feature of the tenor's singing. He was warmly applauded.

The program next week will be as follows: Busoni's "Turandot" suite, Cesar Franck's Symphonic Variations and Strauss' Burleske in D minor, both for piano and orchestra (Heinrich Gebhard, soloist). Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride."

From the
Traveler
Feb.3,1917.

Next Week's Symphony.

A work dedicated to Dr. Muck will feature next week's Symphony program, the suite from the music composed by Ferrucio Busoni for Gozzi's Chinese drama, "Turandot." It calls for a woman's chorus which will consist of 80 voices from the Musical Art Club and Choral Music Society. The soloist will be Heinrich Gebhardt, pianist, who will play Cesar Franck, "Symphonic Variations," and Richard Strauss, "Burleske." The final number will be "The n PRESS

ress: Philadelphia, Pa.

FEB 11 19

NO NOVELTY appears on the fourth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be played in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening, February 12. All the works are well tried favorites whose popularity has long since been certain. The soloist will be that admirable virtuoso, Anton Witek, who occupies the post of concert-master in the orchestra. Mr. Witek has appeared in the last five years several times as soloist with the orchestra and Philadelphia is well aware of his very unusual gifts as a violinist. He will play the Scotch Fantasy for violin and orchestra of Max Bruch.

The orchestral numbers will be Smetana's Overture "The Sold Bride," Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" and Beethoven's Eighth Symphony. The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the great gala concert in the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, January 16 last, when the receipts ran close to $25,000, played as one of its numbers Smetana's brilliant Overture, and Dr. Muck and his men simply swept the audience off its feet with the breathless pace with which they took it and the clarity with which every part came out.

From the
Transcript
Feb.10,1917.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

ONE DULL PIECE, AND THREE FOR PLEASURE

The Blank "Burleske" of Strauss' Youth Revived — The Contrasting Charm and Fancy of Franck's Variations — Mr. Busoni's Suite of Stage Music; "Turandot" for New Revelation of His Qualities as Composer—The Vividness, Fancy and Humor of the Pieces—Dr. Muck and His Public

WITH two items in the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon precedent was piquantly reversed. For once Strauss, who is usually interesting, however sharply the hearer may quarrel with his music, was downright dull. For once, also, Mr. Busoni, who is often baffling or barren when he sets pen to music-paper, was amusing, stimulating, gay. The occasion of Strauss's mischance was the revival of his "Burleske" for piano and orchestra, which Mr. Gebhard, the "assisting artist" of the day, elected to play anew with the band as he had played it originally in 1903. The occasion of Mr. Busoni's happy fortunes was the first performance in Boston in entirety of the Suite for orchestra that he wove out of his incidental music to Gozzi's play of Chinese fantasy, "Turandot." Since one division of it requires momentarily a chorus of women, Dr. Muck, loyal to the slightest obligation a composer or his own artistic conscience may impose, had it assembled, eighty strong, from the Musical Art Club and the Choral Music Society, and trained to the minute by Mr. Townsend, even though its participation in the concert was of the briefest. Relatively light, too, were the other pieces of the afternoon—Franck's Symphonic Variations for pianoforte and orchestra, again for Mr. Gebhard, and the racing, smiling, almost gesticulating overture to Smetana's opera of "The Bartered Bride." A programme to pleasure the audience in all but the "Burleske"; a pianist whom it knew familiarly, heard gladly and rewarded heartily, and a concert without incident outside music and performance, except in the applause that seemed to single out the conductor as he came to his place and to testify to the good will of his public toward him. A week ago the audience of Saturday evening similarly and even more heartily received him. In view of this clear and sincere mood of his audiences at a time when the town simmers with anti-German feeling, is it quite wise or even tactful on his part to persist in the concert that he and Miss Gerhardt purpose to give a fortnight hence for the fund to despatch an American surgical unit to the armies of the empire? For those who must deal with the public, however intense their personal loyalties or however honorable and laudable their purpose, there is a discretion in times and seasons. The present—and in a perfervid and self-centred New England city—seems hardly such for a concert in behalf of a German war charity. By a single error of tact it would be a pity to see Dr. Muck lose in an evening even a measure of the respect, admiration and good will that shield him against many a gust of anti-Germany sentiment or folly.

The misfortune of the "Burleske" is to burlesque nothing an attentive ear can discover in performance; while the pianists who occasionally venture the piece would probably admit, did they open their secret hearts, that they only persuade themselves by a kind of auto-intoxication to find travesty in it. Even scrutiny of the score is no more enlightning. "With humor" or the like phrase Strauss time and again labels a measure; but few readers, for the life of them, can discover any "humor" in it. The truth is that the undated piece, which Strauss probably wrote in his nineteenth or his twentieth year, is no more than an excuse in which like a stripped and sinewy athlete, he shows his "development" in the resources and the processes of music-making on the academic model. Here and there, indeed, in the "Burleske"—to continue the figure—he is straining for the start into his own courses of imagination and expression, into the free play of his personality, that was to sweep him soon into "Don Juan," "Till" and "Death and Transfiguration"; but for the most part the piece of yesterday might have been written by any able youngster of the eighties with his Brahms and his lessons in the conservatory well in mind. Indeed it might have been written more brightly and amusingly and less dryly and laboriously by many a youth who was to prove no Strauss or even a shadow of a Strauss. Such a one, perhaps, would not have expected an audience to be diverted by tweaks of the piccolo, sudden stranglings of a motive or portentous interpositions of the kettledrum

Yet, as chance would have it, Mr. Gebhard played this dull and clumsy piece more animatedly and eloquently than he did the lovely and enkindling Symphonic Variations of Franck, which were his other number. In them he was strangely dry and expository, unfolding theme and metamorphoses in the white light of pure precision with far too little suggestion of the airy and enwreathing motion with which the Parisian propels his music or the endless play of pianistic and orchestral color with which he glamors it. For the Symphonic Variations are a marvellously fluid music, in incessant motion upon the piano and through the orchestra. The separate variations comb and curl wave-like into the design of the piece; currents and cross-currents, eddies and momentary pools dapple them; while over them all and variously rippling them play the sunshine and the breeze of Franck's fancy, bright and fle... capricious and lyric. Or, to shift the figu... here is music of arabesque that ever fin... new convolutions of graceful and elega... line, while over it falls a whole palette ... gleaming color. Theme and variations a... of the very voice of the piano when ... sounds as no mere serviceable box of fe... and wires but speaks in fleeting loveline... of phrase and figure, in glints and glov... of color, in fantasies of run and rhyth... The music may be of the minor and not t... major Franck, but it teems with lyr... fancy and lyric ardor perfectly express... in a medium that it makes of like poe... voice and glamor. More than once Fran... in his graver music seems to fall short ... his aspiring purposes. The Symphor... Variations are completeness itself of m... ter, method and means. If Mr. Gebh... and Dr. Muck played a little masterpi... yesterday, it is none the less so becaus... is short, swift, luminous.

Smetana's overture may be taken ... granted like a cocktail before dinner—... the more because, in the flying pace, ... sharpened accents and the flashing pr... sion in which Dr. Muck has schooled ... orchestra to play the piece, it has bec... to the frequenters of the concerts lik... cocktail of Czech melodies and rhyt... swallowed in one tingling gulp. Perh... however, there might be keener appr... tion of the contributing Czech liqueurs ... spirits did the palate of the ear have ... more time to savor them. To whip ... overture forward a shade faster and ... snappingly at each repetition has now ... come one of the obligatory feats of ... ductor and band. So it was that ou... the Franckian variations, the lively p... ure of the concert sprang from Mr. Bu... soni's Suite. Of course, even in assemblage and adaptation for the concert-hall, it remains intrinsically music of the theatre, to be heard at particular moments, under particular circumstance and against particular scenic backgrounds upon the stage. Even the lights in the Deutsches Thea er—Mr. Busoni used to say—contributed to the illusion of the music. The more the pity, then, that the programme-book, instead of heaping up chronological tables of the composer's appearances in Boston as pianist and lists of his published pieces, did not attempt to reconstitute a play known to the contemporary German, English and American stages and to describe the incidents or the personages—for which purpose there is much readily accessible material—that the music accompanies or suggests. As it was, the listener, even with the hints of Mr. Busoni's programme, needed lively imagination to feel the pictorial quality, the warmth, the fancy, the whole gay or graphic illusion of the music.

The play—Gozzi's, Schiller's, Vollmöller's MacKaye's "Turandot"—retells the Persian legend of the remote, proud, perverse and cerebrally wanton Chinese princess, who bade her lovers guess three riddles that she propounded, and if they so much as failed in one despatched them forthwith to execution. Upon a day there came so to woo her Kalaf, Prince of Astrakhan, youthful, but wise; high-hearted, but wary; comely as Turandot herself. And lo! he guessed the riddles; whereat the princess was perturbed, and the more since she could learn neither his name nor nativity. But already she loved him and was conquered, and so at last, after more ruses as is the way of women, he possessed her. In the Suite Mr. Busoni first sets the stage and preludes to the succeeding dramatic narrative. Distant drum beats in reiterated rhythms, entering instruments in Oriental interval hint the fantastic scene. Trumpets proclaim a prince come to a trial of amorous fate. Foreboding, sombre are the auspices; confused, menacing the tumult at the city gate, with the heads of the executed lovers stark upon it.

So, with the music, into the palace, where first it sketches Truffaldino, chief eunuch and also comic figure out of Italian commedia dell' arte, pittipatting and leering over his preparations for the trial of wits or teetering with his fellow-eunuchs through a squeaking march. Next the formidable fanfares that bring upon the stage that venerable emperor, Altoum, but he is by no means such a stupendous sovereign as the sonorous brass and the rolling drums would make him, but really a wabbling and comic old fellow (as a kind of intermezzo in the march hints) somewhat pensive of this new "crisis" in the amatory adventures of his daughter. Then Turandot herself in music that stirs out of hushed and mysterious preludings into the slow, still march of a gliding train of women; that swells into the stately clangors of august presence and ceremonial state; and then droops into dark-hued and sharp-set melody, yet with soft and pulsing underbody, as though Mr. Busoni would so delineate the moody and perverse princess, remote, self-absorbed, implacable, yet not insensitive to gentler impulses of passion. Mystery shrouds her in the advancing music; yet ceremony still attends her.

Forthwith from day and the great hall, where Kalaf has guessed the riddles, into the night and the langurous and perfumed solitude of the women's apartments. Lusciously yet monotonously Mr. Busoni's suggests the scene; his rhythm is quasi-Oriental; his melody is quasi-Italianate—by sheer dint of blood in spite of scholarly resolution not to forsake his eastern motives and modulation. A dance of the women, titillating through monotonous repetitions; a song of the women above it in the high range of their voices, in interrupted and sensuous phrases—both intensify atmosphere. Then in sudden shift to the chamber of the prince, where in ominous and sinister waltz of broken and lugubrious measures, darkling phantoms haunt his shallow sleep. For in and out of the chamber flit the emissaries of Turandot with ears pointed to hear him mutter his name. Measures, next, for her final ruse—the feigning of woe in the trappings of woe—music of melodious melancholy that harsh and dissonant instruments begin to mock; that professes wistfulness and then whips it and the deceit away for a wild and whirling, snapping, scintillant and sonorous Finale alla Turca, with all the personages clearly dancing down to the footlights with the orchestra twisting them in rhythms and festooning them with color, as though it were flinging confetti. After all this is a merry world.

A vivid music to hear, especially with a little knowledge of the course of legend and play and enough imagination withal to visualize setting, episode, personage upon a stage on which orchestra, chorus and piano hardly left room even for figments of fancy—a music quick with invention, instant (as it seemed) with means and procedure, bright with color, graphic with delineative suggestion, vibrant with implication of atmosphere. Throughout Mr. Busoni has courted oriental intervals, rhythms, melodies, and deployed no little scholarship in the search, the choice and the treatment of them; but steadfastly he has manipulated, colored, contrasted them as a composer of the West who did but seek Eastern suggestion and illusion. Where the circumstance of the stage bids he writes with shrewd, yet vivacious humor as in the music of the teetering eunuch, the senile emperor, the scintillant and snapping finale. His ceremonial music, though it is haunted by march rhythms, runs in energetically sonorous pomps of tone. Mystery, then sentiment and characterization always speak out of the music of Turandot, with little need or aid from extraneous suggestion. Yet more mysterious and fantastic are the broken phrases and rhythms of the nocturnal phantoms. Wholly atmospheric is the music of the harem in the soft and sensuous night. Yet through the whole Suite goes the capriciousness of mood, invention, method, means that is spice to a half-Chinese, half-Italian (and perhaps not a little German) fantasy. For once—to bring back beginnings—Mr. Busoni has been not only a singular but a stimulating composer. Largely and justly his hearers applauded him.

H. T. P.

[81]

EVENING POST
New York City

SOME years ago a gang of musical cranks and rowdies in Paris demonstrated their artistic principles by going to orchestral concerts and indulging in persistent hisses and other noises whenever a soloist appeared. "No concertos!" was their war-cry; but, as ninety-nine per cent. of the concert-goers disagreed with them, they were soon taught better manners.

Anybody, of course, has a right to avoid concerts at which soloists appear, or to write to the newspapers and argue that it is discreditable to engage them. Daniel Gregory Mason has written to this effect, and, as he is associate professor of music at Columbia University and the author of some excellent books, his words deserve attention. To fully appreciate his candor, one must remember that he also writes the programme notes for the concerts of Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Society. Now here is what this eminent professor-author-annotator said in last Sunday's Times:

"Walter Damroseh, although he has free access to the purse of a multi-millionaire, seldom gives a concert without a soloist. In the prospectuses sent to the newspapers special emphasis is always placed on these soloists, and in the advertisements their names are conspicuously printed in large, fat type. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, also, seldom gives a concert in Boston without a soloist; this year, I have read, the number of soloists is larger than ever. Now, why is it that Damrosch and Muck need so many soloists? The answer is, briefly, because their organizations no longer give the best music or give it at its best. On the other hand, the New York Philharmonic frequently gives concerts without soloists, and yet to full houses."

: : :

NO, no, no! This is not what Professor Mason wrote. I simply read it that way, having, like Siegfried, just tasted a drop of the dragon's blood. The professor is silent about the Damrosch and Boston orchestras, but sneers at the Philharmonic for doing precisely what each of those other orchestras does in its home town! In New York, to be sure, no soloists seem to be forthcoming this season (for the first time) at the Boston Orchestra's concerts; but neither the newspapers nor the subscribers were informed of this in advance; the patrons renewed their subscriptions in the happy belief that the manager of that admirable organization would, as usual, generously throw in a few Paderewskis and Kreislers and great prima donnas, all of whom originally helped him to secure sold-out houses. I, for one, should feel extremely sorry, for myself and for the subscribers, if hereafter no more opportunities were to be offered to hear the world's greatest artists with the superb orchestral background supplied by Dr. Muck and his players. Will Mr. Ellis dare to repeat this experiment—to serve notice on the New York patrons of the Boston Orchestra that if they wish hereafter to hear Paderewski play his own concerto or Schumann's, Kreisler the Beethoven or Brahms, Hofmann the Chopin, Grainger the Grieg, Gabrilowitsch the Tchaikovsky, and so on, they will have to go to the concerts of the Philharmonic or the Symphony Society?

: : :

THE engagement of world-famed artists to play concertos by the greatest masters is not the only heinous crime charged against the New York Philharmonic. Another dastardly offence is the playing of more pieces of the sonorous, highly colored, and dramatic modern type than of the old classics, and playing them better too, horribile dictu. Professor Mason was disconsolate because he could not find the name of Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Brahms, or Franck on the first thirteen of this year's programmes. Had he looked up the Philharmonic records for last season he would have found these figures: Bach, 5 works; Beethoven, 8; Brahms, 3; Haydn, 2; Mendelssohn, 5; Schubert, 2; Schumann, 3; Weber, 5; Franck, 2. Comparing these figures with those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at home (in both cases for orchestral works and concertos) we find; Bach, 3; Beethoven, 10; Brahms, 4; Haydn, 3; Mendelssohn, 2; Mozart, 5; Schumann, 2; Schubert, 1; Weber, 4; Franck, 2. Summing up, we have in the New York list 35 works by these nine composers of the "classical" persuasion; and in the Boston list, 36! Yet Professor Mason complains that the music played by the Philharmonic is not that "which nourishes and delights the sense of beauty"—which seems rather hard on the classics just named, and on the Boston Symphony Orchestra!

In his eagerness to demonstrate the degradation of the Philharmonic, Professor Mason notes that of its first thirteen concerts this season, "one only had no attraction except that of music"—that is, no soloist. But before the date of his letter three pairs of concerts and three single concerts had been given without soloists, and to crowded houses—which takes all the wind out of his sails.

It is not to be imagined for the fraction of a second that Professor Mason's eagerness to pummel the Philharmonic is in any way connected with his duties as the programme annotator of a rival orchestra. There is a deeper—a much deeper—reason: Brahms. He is a Brahmsite.

Time was when the worst nuisance in t musical world was the Wagnerite (I w one myself). Now it is the Brahmsi The Philharmonic does not play t works of the god-like Brahms as eff or as affectionately as those of the s tanic Liszt—hinc illæ lachrymæ! How ever, cheer up! On February 8 and Stransky will conduct Brahms's four symphony, his reading of which eve Richard Aldrich has praised. Then will be forgiven and forgotten.

From the
Globe
Feb.3,1917.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Brilliant Performance of Reger's Variations

The performance of Max Reger's variations on the theme from Hiller's operetta at the 13th Symphony concert yesterday afternoon by Dr Muck and the orchestra was euphonious, brilliant, sympathetic to the best qualities of the music, that of the concluding fugue one of supreme virtuosity. And yet how many of these 11 variations are a kind epitaph to the late composer? They are in many respects typical. There is the bluster, the boisterous haste, as though notes were flung upon the paper, without true perception, without reconsideration. Then there are the passages, as in the fifth, as in the graceful intermezzo, and particularly the finely serious, even poetic vein of the 11th and last, music in this which brings regret at the interruption of the noisy fugue at first clever, then stupendous.

Mozart's overture to "Figaro's Marriage" sparkled like champagne. The whirling opening figure went at a magical breath-taking pace, and all with a transforming spirit of lightness and zest, an illuminating testimonial to the fleet virtuosity of the strings. A performance of "Don Juan," which was more reflective than participative, brought the concert to a close.

Dividing these numbers, John McCormack, a singer who in ballads has given pleasure to many and who is remembered agreeably in lyric operatic music, sang twice, a rondo by Mozart, interpolated in Anfossi's opera, "Il Curioso Indiscreto," and the recitative, "Stay, Shepherd, Stay," with the air "Shepherd, What Art Thou Pursuing," from Handel's "Acis and Galatea." Mozart's music is amiable, but if not wholly distinctive, is of more dramatic character than it appeared yesterday. Handel's shepherd, whether he stays or pursues, is equally a harmless person, nor did Mr McCormack's singing disturb him. A clear enunciation is still a feature of the tenor's singing. He was warmly applauded.

The program next week will be as follows: Busoni's "Turandot" suite, Cesar Franck's Symphonic Variations and Strauss' Burleske in D minor, both for piano and orchestra (Heinrich Gebhard, soloist), Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride."

From the
Traveler
Feb.3,1917.

Next Week's Symphony.

A work dedicated to Dr. Muck will feature next week's Symphony program, the suite from the music composed by Ferrucio Busoni for Gozzi's Chinese drama, "Turandot." It calls for a woman's chorus which will consist of 80 voices from the Musical Art Club and Choral Music Society. The soloist will be Heinrich Gebhardt, pianist, who will play Cesar Franck, "Symphonic Variations," and Richard Strauss, "Burleske." The final number will be "The

n PRESS

ress: Philadelphia, Pa.

FEB 11 19

NO NOVELTY appears on the fourth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be played in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening, February 12. All the works are well tried favorites whose popularity has long since been certain. The soloist will be that admirable virtuoso, Anton Witek, who occupies the post of concert-master in the orchestra. Mr. Witek has appeared in the last five years several times as soloist with the orchestra and Philadelphia is well aware of his very unusual gifts as a violinist. He will play the Scotch Fantasy for violin and orchestra of Max Bruch.

The orchestral numbers will be Smetana's Overture "The Sold Bride," Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" and Beethoven's Eighth Symphony. The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the great gala concert in the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, January 16 last, when the receipts ran close to $25,000, played as one of its numbers Smetana's brilliant Overture, and Dr. Muck and his men simply swept the audience off its feet with the breathless pace with which they took it and the clarity with which every part came out.

From the
Transcript
Feb.10,1917.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

ONE DULL PIECE, AND THREE FOR PLEASURE

The Blank "Burleske" of Strauss' Youth Revived — The Contrasting Charm and Fancy of Franck's Variations — Mr. Busoni's Suite of Stage Music; "Turandot" for New Revelation of His Qualities as Composer—The Vividness, Fancy and Humor of the Pieces—Dr. Muck and His Public

WITH two items in the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon precedent was piquantly reversed. For once Strauss, who is usually interesting, however sharply the hearer may quarrel with his music, was downright dull. For once, also, Mr. Busoni, who is often baffling or barren when he sets pen to music-paper, was amusing, stimulating, gay. The occasion of Strauss's mischance was the revival of his "Burleske" for piano and orchestra, which Mr. Gebhard, the "assisting artist" of the day, elected to play anew with the band as he had played it originally in 1903. The occasion of Mr. Busoni's happy fortunes was the first performance in Boston in entirety of the Suite for orchestra that he wove out of his incidental music to Gozzi's play of Chinese fantasy, "Turandot." Since one division of it requires momentarily a chorus of women, Dr. Muck, loyal to the slightest obligation a composer or his own artistic conscience may impose, had it assembled, eighty strong, from the Musical Art Club and the Choral Music Society, and trained to the minute by Mr. Townsend, even though its participation in the concert was of the briefest. Relatively light, too, were the other pieces of the afternoon—Franck's Symphonic Variations for pianoforte and orchestra, again for Mr. Gebhard, and the racing, smiling, almost gesticulating overture to Smetana's opera of "The Bartered Bride." A programme to pleasure the audience in all but the "Burleske"; a pianist whom it knew familiarly, heard gladly and rewarded heartily, and a concert without incident outside music and performance, except in the applause that seemed to single out the conductor as he came to his place and to testify to the good will of his public toward him. A week ago the audience of Saturday evening similarly and even more heartily received him. In view of this clear and sincere mood of his audiences at a time when the town simmers with anti-German feeling, is it quite wise or even tactful on his part to persist in the concert that he and Miss Gerhardt purpose to give a fortnight hence for the fund to despatch an American surgical unit to the armies of the empire? For those who must deal with the public, however intense their personal loyalties or however honorable and laudable their purpose, there is a discretion in times and seasons. The present—and in a perfervid and self-centred New England city—seems hardly such for a concert in behalf of a German war charity. By a single error of tact it would be a pity to see Dr. Muck lose in an evening even a measure of the respect, admiration and good will that shield him against many a gust of anti-Germany sentiment or folly.

The misfortune of the "Burleske" is to burlesque nothing an attentive ear can discover in performance; while the pianists who occasionally venture the piece would probably admit, did they open their secret hearts, that they only persuade themselves by a kind of auto-intoxication to find travesty in it. Even scrutiny of the score is no more enlightning. "With humor" or the like phrase Strauss time and again labels a measure; but few readers, for the life of them, can discover any "humor" in it. The truth is that the undated piece, which Strauss probably wrote in his nineteenth or his twentieth year, is no more than an excuse in which like a stripped and sinewy athlete, he shows his "development" in the resources and the processes of music-making on the academic model. Here and there, indeed, in the "Burleske"—to continue the figure—he is straining for the start into his own courses of imagination and expression, into the free play of his personality, that was to sweep him soon into "Don Juan," "Till" and "Death and Transfiguration"; but for the most part the piece of yesterday might have been written by any able youngster of the eighties with his Brahms and his lessons in the conservatory well in mind. Indeed it might have been written more brightly and amusingly and less dryly and laboriously by many a youth who was to prove no Strauss or even a shadow of a Strauss. Such a one, perhaps, would not have expected an audience to be diverted by tweaks of the piccolo, sudden stranglings of a motive or portentous interpositions of the kettle-drum

Yet, as chance would have it, Mr. Gebhard played this dull and clumsy piece more animatedly and eloquently than he did the lovely and enkindling Symphonic Variations of Franck, which were his other number. In them he was strangely dry and expository, unfolding theme and metamorphoses in the white light of pure precision with far too little suggestion of the airy and enwreathing motion with which the Parisian propels his music or the endless play of pianistic and orchestral color with which he glamors it. For the Symphonic Variations are a marvellously fluid music, in incessant motion upon the piano and through the orchestra. The separate variations comb and curl wave-like into the design of the piece; currents and cross-currents, eddies and momentary pools dapple them; while over them all and variously rippling them play the sunshine and the breeze of Franck's fancy, bright and fl capricious and lyric. Or, to shift the figu here is music of arabesque that ever fin new convolutions of graceful and elega line, while over it falls a whole palette gleaming color. Theme and variations of the very voice of the piano when sounds as no mere serviceable box of fe and wires but speaks in fleeting lovelines of phrase and figure, in glints and glows of color, in fantasies of run and rhythm The music may be of the minor and not the major Franck, but it teems with lyric fancy and lyric ardor perfectly expressed in a medium that it makes of like poetic voice and glamor. More than once Franck in his graver music seems to fall short of his aspiring purposes. The Symphonic Variations are completeness itself of matter, method and means. If Mr. Gebhard and Dr. Muck played a little masterpiece yesterday, it is none the less so because it is short, swift, luminous.

Smetana's overture may be taken for granted like a cocktail before dinner—and the more because, in the flying pace, the sharpened accents and the flashing precision in which Dr. Muck has schooled the orchestra to play the piece, it has become to the frequenters of the concerts like a cocktail of Czech melodies and rhythms swallowed in one tingling gulp. Perhaps however, there might be keener appreciation of the contributing Czech liqueurs and spirits did the palate of the ear have a bit more time to savor them. To whip the overture forward a shade faster and more snappingly at each repetition has now become one of the obligatory feats of conductor and band. So it was that outside the Franckian variations, the lively pleasure of the concert sprang from Mr. Busoni's Suite. Of course, even in assemblage and adaptation for the concert-hall, it remains intrinsically music of the theatre, to be heard at particular moments, under particular circumstance and against particular scenic backgrounds upon the stage. Even the lights in the Deutsches Theater—Mr. Busoni used to say—contributed to the illusion of the music. The more the pity, then, that the programme-book, instead of heaping up chronological tables of the composer's appearances in Boston as pianist and lists of his published pieces, did not attempt to reconstitute a play known to the contemporary German, English and American stages and to describe the incidents or the personages—for which purpose there is much readily accessible material—that the music accompanies or suggests. As it was, the listener, even with the hints of Mr. Busoni's programme, needed lively imagination to feel the pictorial quality, the warmth, the fancy, the whole gay or graphic illusion of the music.

The play—Gozzi's, Schiller's, Vollmöller's MacKaye's "Turandot"—retells the Persian legend of the remote, proud, perverse and cerebrally wanton Chinese princess, who bade her lovers guess three riddles that she propounded, and if they so much as failed in one despatched them forthwith to execution. Upon a day there came so to woo her Kalaf, Prince of Astrakhan, youthful, but wise; high-hearted, but wary; comely as Turandot herself. And lo! he guessed the riddles; whereat the princess was perturbed, and the more since she could learn neither his name nor nativity. But already she loved him and was conquered, and so at last, after more ruses as is the way of women, he possessed her. In the Suite Mr. Busoni first sets the stage and preludes to the succeeding dramatic narrative. Distant drum beats in reiterated rhythms, entering instruments in Oriental interval hint the fantastic scene. Trumpets proclaim a prince come to a trial of amorous fate. Foreboding, sombre are the auspices; confused, menacing the tumult at the city gate, with the heads of the executed lovers stark upon it.

So, with the music, into the palace, where first it sketches Truffaldino, chief eunuch and also comic figure out of Italian commedia dell' arte, pittipatting and leering over his preparations for the trial of wits or teetering with his fellow-eunuchs through a squeaking march. Next the formidable fanfares that bring upon the stage that venerable emperor, Altoum, but he is by no means such a stupendous sovereign as the sonorous brass and the rolling drums would make him, but really a wabbling and comic old fellow (as a kind of intermezzo in the march hints) somewhat pensive of this new "crisis" in the amatory adventures of his daughter. Then Turandot herself in music that stirs out of hushed and mysterious preludings into the slow, still march of a gliding train of women; that swells into the stately clangors of august presence and ceremonial state; and then droops into dark-hued and sharp-set melody, yet with soft and pulsing underbody, as though Mr. Busoni would so delineate the moody and perverse princess, remote, self-absorbed, implacable, yet not insensitive to gentler impulses of passion. Mystery shrouds her in the advancing music; yet ceremony still attends her.

Forthwith from day and the great hall where Kalaf has guessed the riddles, into the night and the langurous and perfumed solitude of the women's apartments. Lusciously yet monotonously Mr. Busoni's suggests the scene; his rhythm is quasi-Oriental; his melody is quasi-Italianate by sheer dint of blood in spite of scholarly resolution not to forsake his eastern motives and modulation. A dance of the women, titillating through monotonous repetitions; a song of the women above it in the high range of their voices, in interrupted and sensuous phrases—both intensify atmosphere. Then in sudden shift to the chamber of the prince, where in ominous and sinister waltz of broken and lugubrious measures, darkling phantoms haunt his shallow sleep. For in and out of the chamber flit the emissaries of Turandot with ears pointed to hear him mutter his name. Measures, next, for her final ruse—the feigning of woe in the trappings of woe—music of melodious melancholy that harsh and dissonant instruments begin to mock; that professes wistfulness and then whips it and the deceit away for a wild and whirling, snapping, scintillant and sonorous Finale alla Turca, with all the personages clearly dancing down to the footlights with the orchestra twisting them in rhythms and festooning them with color, as though it were flinging confetti. After all this is a merry world.

A vivid music to hear, especially with a little knowledge of the course of legend and play and enough imagination withal to visualize setting, episode, personage upon a stage on which orchestra, chorus and piano hardly left room even for figments of fancy—a music quick with invention, instant (as it seemed) with means and procedure, bright with color, graphic with delineative suggestion, vibrant with application of atmosphere. Throughout Busoni has courted oriental intervals, hms, melodies, and deployed no little arship in the search, the choice and eatment of them; but steadfastly he anipulated, colored, contrasted them omposer of the West who did but astern suggestion and illusion. he circumstance of the stage bids with shrewd, yet vivacious in the music of the teetering e senile emperor, the scintillant g finale. His ceremonial music, haunted by march rhythms, rgetically sonorous pomps of y, then sentiment and char- always speak out of the andot, with little need or neous suggestion. Yet more fantastic are the broken hythms of the nocturnal olly atmospheric is the em in the soft and sensu- through the whole Suite sness of mood, invention, at is spice to a half- n (and perhaps not a sy. For once—to bring . Busoni has been not a stimulating com- justly his hearers ap-

H. T. P.

[81]

om AMERICAN
dress: New York City
FEB 16 191
te

Boston Orchestra's Inspiriting Playing Warmly Applauded

By MAX SMITH.

At the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, disciple of Wagner, highly honored by the Kaiser, and unquestionably one of the most distinguished wielders of the baton now living, appeared in New York last night for the first time since diplomatic relations with his Fatherland were broken off.

He was greeted with great enthusiasm, as were the men who responded so inspiringly to his baton. On one occasion, in fact, some enthusiasts in the gallery gave clamorous approval. But Dr. Muck acknowledged the applause of one of the biggest crowds he had faced this season with even more reserve than usual. Dignified in his bearing, he was scrupulously polite in his manner. But evidently he desired to be as little in the limelight as his professional functions permitted.

Dr. Muck had chosen a programme that taxed the musical intelligence and concentration of his auditors. It is not easy to pay unflagging attention to Reger's lengthy variations and fugue on a merry theme of Hiller after listening to Beethoven's symphony in F major, No. 8.

But if the conductor offered the Boston orchestra's Manhattan subscribers a menu which not all of them could digest, neither did he spare himself or his men.

What the opening overture to Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro" and the closing overture to Smetana's "The Sold Bride," which was taken at a speed that must have well-nigh paralyzed the wrists of wielders of the bow, the concert surely put the orchestra and its virtuoso conductor to a physical as well as nervous strain.

To discuss the concert in detail seems hardly necessary. It may be said, however, that the Boston orchestra has not often given a more amazing exhibition of its bravura powers than it did last night in the extremely complicated and difficult Variations of Hiller; also that Dr. Muck has rarely revealed in a manner more striking his keen intelligence, his analytical penetration, his grasp of detail and his extraordinary command of the technique of the baton. No wonder that even his most violent political opponents in Boston are anxious to keep the German conductor in the "Hub" indefinitely. The only question is, "How long will he stay?"

rom POST
ddress: Washington, D. C.
FEB 14 191
ate

BOSTON PLAYERS SCORE IN CLASSIC

Symphony Orchestra, Under Dr. Muck, Wins Praise at National.

The following program was excellently gone through at the National yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conducting: Beethoven's "Eroica," symphony, overture, Smetana's "The Bartered Bride," Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Strauss' "Don Juan."

By reason of its strength, beauty and marked individuality and its historical significance, the "Eroica" will always stand out among symphonies. It is an imprishable monument to the genius of Beethoven and a magnificent dedication to the memory of Napoleon. In the reading of this composition, Dr. Muck emphasized his own genius, its glorious themes, superb musical thoughts and profound impressiveness.

The overture to Smetana's "The Bartered Bride" was characteristically played with all Bohemian national flavor, full of the gay spirit of holiday dancing and singing. Richard Strauss' magnificent tone poem, "Don Juan," marvelously effective in its extreme and highly colored instrumentation, contrasted curiously with the "impressionistic" Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun." This music, made familiar to Washington by the recent visits of the Russian ballet, subtle and refined in outline, vague and haunting in its singular beauty, at times fantastic in an eerie sense, falls strangely on the casual ear. But its elusive loveliness nevertheless enthralls and the emotional impression it makes is deeply fascinating.

There was no soloist at yesterday's concert, but the beauty and variety of the program more than made up for this omission.

From the Post Feb.10,1917.

VOICES OF WOMEN AID SYMPHONY

Busoni's Suite, Dedicated to Dr. Muck, Given

BY OLIN DOWNES

Ferruccio Busoni's orchestral suite, "Turandot," made of incidental music composed for a play of Gozzi and first performed in 1905, was the novel item of the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

The suite is dedicated to Dr. Muck. The 1st, 2d, 4th and 8th movements were played at these concerts, under the direction of Max Fiedler, Feb. 18, 1911.

WOMEN'S CHORUS AIDS

Yesterday the work was heard for the first time in its entirety, and the women's chorus in the sixth movement was sung by members of the Musical Art Club and the Choral Music Society, Stephen S. Townsend conductor. Heinrich Gebhard, pianist, was the soloist. He played the "Symphonic Variations" of Cesar Franck and Richard Strauss' "Burlesque" for piano and orchestra. Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride" ended the concert.

Busoni has stated that he has employed oriental melodies as the sole melodic material of this suite. Curiously enough, one of the tunes has an exact resemblance to a familiar English folk-tune, "Greensleaves." but the origins of many folk-tunes are matters of mystery. They travel through many countries and are appropriated by various peoples, although usually modified in the process. The lyrical theme of Turandot's march is an adapted Chinese melody, and the song of the women in the movement "Dance and Song" is, according to the composers' statement, "the oldest known Arabian song."

Clever Yet Boresome

The first movement of Busoni's suite pleases because of the indubitable orientalism of the themes, the ingenuity and the characteristic quality of the orchestration, and also a more truly imaginative quality than is found in the later movements.

The second movement, "Truffaldivo," has a rather ordinary kind of humor. After this the music becomes "deucedly clever," and in its cleverness very much of a bore. Is this the best Mr. Busoni, a past master of the art of musical composition, and one of the greatest musical intellects in the world today—is this the best he could do with his material? The rhythms are monotonously alike. The orchestral combinations have a family resemblance which ultimately becomes irritating. What is the use in quoting themes if the themes awaken no response in the imagination of the composer—if, in other words, the themes do not call out in him that which is himself? Not only is the greater part of this score, with all its clever tricks, barren of anything but the most unrelieved literalism, but most of it is common in the last degree. Who has not marvelled at the sounds of the circus band as the ladies rode forth on the tigers and the Indian rajahs bestrode the elephants in high estate? Mr. Busoni's music would serve admirably for such an occasion. It would thus be in place.

FERRUCCIO BUSONI,
Composer of suite dedicated to Dr. Karl Muck and performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday.

At the bottom of it all is a hideous lack of taste. But the difference between the first movement and the other seven is mainly a difference of detail and a lamentable difference in the amount of imagination displayed. The voices of the women give the offering a pretty effect. But by that time one has had nearly enough of effects, and hoped for a little inspired music—in vain. The performance, however, was a feat of virtuosity, and this, with the picturesqueness of the instrumentation and the jolly orientalism of the tunes, interested and amused the audience, which bestowed a tribute of applause well deserved by the orchestra, if not by the composition.

The other performances, too, were of exceptional brilliancy. Mr. Gebhard had never played more authoritatively, with more broad or a bigger, fuller tone. Not all pianists could understand so well at one and the same time Cesar Franck and Richard Strauss. Franck's charming variations need no comment at this time.

A welcome foil to this was the virtuoso performance of the delightful overture to "The Sold Bride," which was played with the utmost clearness and brilliancy at a breath-taking pace. In fact, a little too fast, in our opinion, for the composer's purpose. But if it was naughty, it was nice, and the open-air feeling and humor of the music made this an ideal concluding performance.

PRESS
ss: Philadelphia, Pa.
Feb. 12

BOSTON ORCHESTRA WITEK SOLOIST

Dr. Muck Presents a Delightful Program, Contrasting Old and Modern Composition.

PROGRAM.

Smetana ...Overture to "The Sold Bride"
Bruch.....Fantasia on Scottish Airs, for violin and orchestra, Op. 46.
Strauss..."Don Juan," a Tone-poem (after Nicolaus Lenau), Op. 20.
Beethoven Symphony No. 8, F major, Op.93
Conductor ..... Dr. Karl Muck
Soloist .....Anton Witek

It seems unfortunate that there is no understanding among the directors of the various orchestras in the make-up of their programs, in order to avoid repetitions, as so frequently has been the case this season. And this might apply also in the engagement of the artists. The argument on the other side may be that it is interesting to contrast the different interpretations of the great works, and the hearing of eminent soloists in works of a widely different character.

This might be a laudable desire was the orchestra concert season not so limited. But there is a great library of symphonies, as well as other big orchestral works, which are forbidden a hearing on account of opportunity; while, as to the artists, it limits the number to appear, and there are at least sufficient great artists on the concert platform, so that, for the sake of variety, and to hear as many of them as possible, through a prearranged understanding, it would not be necessary to bring more than one of them in an orchestra concert each season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, last evening at the Academy of Music, presented Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, which was played here by the Philadelphia Orchestra at its pair of concerts last week. At the Boston Symphony's January concert the soloist was Gabrilowitsch, the pianist, who had been the soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra at the previous concert but one. Similar duplications have not been infrequent and a co-operative spirit would be most gratifying to the public who are thirsting to get at least a partial quench of the musical flow from the masters during each season.

Brilliant Interpretation.

Dr. Muck and his Boston musicians were in uncommonly fine spirit last evening and gave a peerless reading of the Eighth, one which drove away the certain element of monotony which encompasses this great work in the sometimes handling. Especially was the second movement voluptuous in its dainty tonal quality. And to compensate in the way of newness, Strauss' "Don Juan" and Smetana's overture to the opera "The Sold Bride" suffiied in their modern scoring, and both numbers were encompassed with an unusual brilliance and a striking reading on the part of the conductor.

It is the absolute rounding out of all the choirs that made the playing of the Boston Symphony last evening so striking. There is never noticeable the absence of a required uniformity. The great volume of the violins is emphatic, but not more so than the 'cellos, the violas, or, in fact, any section. It was therefore that the second movement of the symphony—the tantalizingly tuneful section of the work—was played, as it probably never before has been here, with the fine emphasis of the 'cello section, which is always so reliable; and in the "Don Juan" there was a similar striking individuality in the response of the oboes, the French horn, the flutes, and, in fact, every collective or individual effort was given just the proper attention, and the large audience gave an appreciative response to every part of the program.

Bruch's Fantasia Not Brilliant.

This response was especially warm to the soloist, Anton Witek, not probably for the delight of his work, as for the years of satisfactory service he has given as the concertmeister of the orchestra. There is not much glory for the soloist in Bruch's "Fantasia on Scottish Airs," but Mr. Witek's substantial playing showed evidence that time has dealt leniently with his efforts, and in combination with the fine reading by Dr. Muck, it was a pleasant feature of the program.

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony will be given on March 12, with Elena Gerhardt the soloist.

From the Herald Feb.10,1917

SYMPHONY GIVES VARIED PERFORMANCE

Busoni's Suite from the Music for 'Turandot,' Though Aided by a Female Chorus, Fails to Please in Concert Because of Constant Straining After the Exotic.

MR. GEBHARD DELIGHTFUL IN PIANO SELECTIONS

By PHILIP HALE.

The 14th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Heinrich Gebhard was the pianist. The program was as follows: Busoni, Suite from the music for Gozzi's play "Turandot"; Cesar Franck, Symphonic Variations for piano and orchestra; Strauss, Burleske for piano and orchestra; Smetana, overture to "The Sold Bride." A female chorus from the Musical Art Club and Choral Musical Society sang the little song in Busoni's Suite.

Four movements of this Suite were performed here six years ago. Yesterday the whole Suite was played. However effective the music may be in the theatre, as concert music the Suite suffers from the constant straining after the exotic. Busoni has been quoted as saying that all his thematic material was borrowed from Oriental melodies. Strange to say, one of the themes is wholly occidental in character; it bears a striking resemblance to an old English carol. The music as a whole excites at first curiosity, then surprise. The curiosity is soon satisfied; the surprise is not repeated. There are ingenious effects, but the chief end of music is not merely to display ingenuity. The compositions of Busoni that we have heard resemble his piano playing; the music is without heart and without imagination. Perhaps this Suite fits the play, which is fantastical. The song that accompanies the dancers, may be "the oldest known Arabian song"; it is certainly uninteresting, nor was this the fault of the singers who kept to it bravely in spite of the discordant and distracting music of the dances.

Smetana's overture was first played here 30 years ago. When it was performed the next season a music critic of the town declared that the overture would not stand intimate acquaintance. This shows the folly of prophecy and the vanity of criticism. The overture has been often heard at these concerts, always with pleasure, and not merely because the performance by this orchestra is a tour de force of surpassing brilliance.

Franck's variations were played for the first time at these concerts. Mr. Gebhard was the first to play them in Boston, at a Jordan Hall orchestral concert 10 years ago. He was also the first to play Strauss's Burleske in this city. Why he thought it worth while to revise the latter is a question not easily answered.

Strauss himself—he was then a sworn follower of Johannes Brahms—thought little of it, was unwilling to have it published, although a publisher stood consenting and Strauss needed the money. How changed from the Strauss of the later years! Buelow, for whom the piano part was intended, thought the piece ugly. Probably Mr. Gebhard found the Burleske a suitable companion as regards length for Franck's Variations.

These Variations are beautiful, and for once Franck did not write at undue length. Last Saturday, apropos of Reger's Variations on a theme of Hiller, we quoted a profane remark of England's Sailor King. The remark applies in general; but there are variations by Beethoven that might have pleased even the disgusted monarch. There are a few other sets—among them this of Franck's—that are beautiful in spite of their form; or it might be said that in these variations Franck had woven charming thoughts and varied them so skilfully that while the theme stands out in recognizable beauty the comment or the changes of costume enhance the natural loveliness. Mr. Gebhard played delightfully as musician and virtuoso. He even gave some importance to the Burleske. His performance might serve Strauss as a defence for having written the piece.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week. The program of Feb. 23, 24 will be as follows: Cherubini, overture to "The Abencerrages"; Brahms, Concerto for violin and violoncello (Messrs. Witek and Warnke); Mozart, "Jupiter" symphony.

[8a]

rom REPUBLICAN
ddress: Springfield, Mass.
ate FEB 11 1917

AN HISTORICAL SKETCH

Of the Wagner Pieces Which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to Play in Springfield

It is a most comprehensive program which Dr Karl Muck has made for the Wagner concert, which the Boston symphony orchestra will give in the Auditorium Tuesday evening, the 20th, as the closing of the first series of subscription concerts in Springfield conducted by Charles A. Ellis of Boston. Wagner's activity as a composer is generally reckoned from the end of the '30s, when he wrote "Rienzi" to the first years of the '80s, when he finished "Parsifal." As a matter of fact, he had written considerable before "Rienzi," including a symphony and an opera called "Die Feen." These youthful works, however, have only an historical value and the great Wagner began with "Rienzi," the opera which he drew from Bulwer's popular novel.

It is the overture to "Rienzi" with which Dr Muck begins his program. It is characteristic of the real Wagner only in parts. Wagner at that time still used as his model the stilted form of grand opera which had become standardized (to use a modern word) by Meyerbeer, Auber and Rossini in the grand opera of Paris.

In "Tannhaeuser," the second opera after "Rienzi," Wagner decidedly found himself and "Tannhaeuser" is as characteristic of his genius as any of the music dramas of "The Ring." If he does not use the leit-motif in the same manner in which he uses it in his latest works, "Tannhaeuser" is filled with characteristic phrases full of significance.

Dr Muck has not arranged his program in historical order for the very obvious reason that such would detract from the musical interest of the evening. He begins it with "Rienzi" and ends it with the "Tannhaeuser" overture. He follows the "Rienzi" with the exquisite "Siegfried Idyl" which was written in 1870, 25 years after "Tannhaeuser." This charming piece for small orchestra exhibits Wagner in a very personal mood for he wrote it as a Christmas present for his wife following the birth of his son, Siegfried, and built it chiefly on the love music from the final scene of the music drama of "Siegfried."

It has always been the belief of Dr Muck that in the later music dramas of Wagner, the music, the action and the decoration are so firmly welded together that to transpose the music alone to a concert stage with the idea of reproducing in any measure its original success, is a hopeless task and he has consistently refused to play excerpts, particularly from any of the music dramas of "The Ring." He has, however, yielded so far as to play the very cunning arrangement of selections from "Siegfried and Goetterdaemmerung" which were made by the great Hans Richter. Richter has taken the opening of the final scene of "Siegfried" portraying Siegfried's passage through the wall of fire to the rock where lies the sleeping Brunnhilde, and joined to it the coming of dawn and Siegfried's Rhine journey from the prolog to "Goetterdaemmerung." In none of these selections in the music dramas themselves is the voice used and, in fact, through the greater part of them the stage is dark. In these selections, however, are heard many of the principal motifs of "The Ring" and they contain some of the most beautiful music that Wagner has written.

The other selection on the program is from the last act of "Die Meistersinger" and this music stands separation from the stage without much loss. It comprises the introduction to the third act, built on the solliloquy of Hans Sachs over the follies of humanity, the dance of the townspeople at the festival on the banks of the river Pegnitz, the entrance of the pompous mastersingers and finally the chorale-like homage paid to Hans Sachs, which virtually brings the opera to an end.

The other number on the program will be the prelude to "Lohengrin," which although written at the end of the '40s (the opera having been produced in 1850) contains the germ of mysticism and transcendentalism in Wagner which gave to the world 30 years later the wondrous drama of the Holy Grail, "Parsifal." Tickets for the Wagner concert go on sale at Otto Baab's music house Monday morning, February 12.

rom NORTH AMERICAN
ddress: Philadelphia, Pa.
ate FEB 11 1917

No novelty appears on the fourth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be played in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. All the works are well-tried favorites. The soloist will be Anton Witek, who occupies the post of concertmaster in the orchestra. Mr. Witek has appeared here as soloist several times in the last five years and Philadelphia is well aware of his gifts. He will play "The Scotch Fantasy" for violin and orchestra of Max Bruch, an unusual composition.

1884

om AMERICAN
dress: New York City
FEB 16 191
te

Boston Orchestra's Inspiriting Playing Warmly Applauded

By MAX SMITH.

At the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, disciple of Wagner, highly honored by the Kaiser, and unquestionably one of the most distinguished wielders of the baton now living, appeared in New York last night for the first time since diplomatic relations with his Fatherland were broken off.

He was greeted with great enthusiasm, as were the men who responded so inspiringly to his baton. On one occasion, in fact, some enthusiasts in the gallery gave clamorous approval. But Dr. Muck acknowledged the applause of one of the biggest crowds he had faced this season with even more reserve than usual. Dignified in his bearing, he was scrupulously polite in his manner. But evidently he desired to be as little in the limelight as his professional functions permitted.

Dr. Muck had chosen a programme that taxed the musical intelligence and concentration of his auditors. It is not easy to pay unflagging attention to Reger's lengthy variations and fugue on a merry theme of Hiller after listening to Beethoven's symphony in F major, No. 8.

But if the conductor offered the Boston orchestra's Manhattan subscribers a menu which not all of them could digest, neither did he spare himself or his men.

What the opening overture to Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro" and the closing overture to Smetana's "The Sold Bride," which was taken at a speed that must have well-nigh paralyzed the wrists of wielders of the bow, the concert surely put the orchestra and its virtuoso conductor to a physical as well as nervous strain.

To discuss the concert in detail seems hardly necessary. It may be said, however, that the Boston orchestra has not often given a more amazing exhibition of its bravura powers than it did last night in the extremely complicated and difficult Variations of Hiller; also that Dr. Muck has rarely revealed in a manner more striking his keen intelligence, his analytical penetration, his grasp of detail and his extraordinary command of the technique of the baton. No wonder that even his most violent political opponents in Boston are anxious to keep the German conductor in the "Hub" indefinitely. The only question is, "How long will he stay?"

rom POST
ddress: Washington, D. C.
ate FEB 14 1917

BOSTON PLAYERS SCORE IN CLASSIC

Symphony Orchestra, Under Dr. Muck, Wins Praise at National.

The following program was excellently gone through at the National yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conducting: Beethoven's "Eroica," symphony, overture, Smetana's "The Bartered Bride," Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun" and Strauss' "Don Juan."

By reason of its strength, beauty and marked individuality and its historical significance, the "Eroica" will always stand out among symphonies. It is an imprishable monument to the genius of Beethoven and a magnificent dedication to the memory of Napoleon. In the reading of this composition, Dr. Muck emphasized his own genius, its glorious themes, superb musical thoughts and profound impressiveness.

The overture to Smetana's "The Bartered Bride" was characteristically played with all Bohemian national flavor, full of the gay spirit of holiday dancing and singing. Richard Strauss' magnificent tone poem, "Don Juan," marvelously effective in its extreme and highly colored instrumentation, contrasted curiously with the "impressionistic" Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun." This music, made familiar to Washington by the recent visits of the Russian ballet, subtle and refined in outline, vague and haunting in its singular beauty, at times fantastic in an eerie sense, falls strangely on the casual ear. But its elusive loveliness nevertheless enthralls and the emotional impression it makes is deeply fascinating.

There was no soloist at yesterday's concert, but the beauty and variety of the program more than made up for this omission.

From the Post Feb.10,1917.

VOICES OF WOMEN AID SYMPHONY

Busoni's Suite, Dedicated to Dr. Muck, Given

BY OLIN DOWNES

Ferruccio Busoni's orchestral suite, "Turandot," made of incidental music composed for a play of Gozzi and first performed in 1905, was the novel item of the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

The suite is dedicated to Dr. Muck. The 1st, 2d, 4th and 8th movements were played at these concerts, under the direction of Max Fiedler, Feb. 18, 1911.

WOMEN'S CHORUS AIDS

Yesterday the work was heard for the first time in its entirety, and the women's chorus in the sixth movement was sung by members of the Musical Art Club and the Choral Music Society, Stephen S. Townsend conductor. Heinrich Gebhard, pianist, was the soloist. He played the "Symphonic Variations" of Cesar Franck and Richard Strauss' "Burlesque" for piano and orchestra. Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride" ended the concert.

Busoni has stated that he has employed oriental melodies as the sole melodic material of this suite. Curiously enough, one of the tunes has an exact resemblance to a familiar English folk-tune, "Greensleaves." but the origins of many folk-tunes are matters of mystery. They travel through many countries and are appropriated by various peoples, although usually modified in the process. The lyrical theme of Turandot's march is an adapted Chinese melody, and the song of the women in the movement "Dance and Song" is, according to the composers' statement, "the oldest known Arabian song."

Clever Yet Boresome

The first movement of Busoni's suite pleases because of the indubitable orientalism of the themes, the ingenuity and the characteristic quality of the orchestration, and also a more truly imaginative quality than is found in the later movements.

The second movement, "Truffaldivo," has a rather ordinary kind of humor. After this the music becomes "deucedly clever," and in its cleverness very much of a bore. Is this the best Mr. Busoni, a past master of the art of musical composition, and one of the greatest musical intellects in the world today—is this the best he could do with his material? The rhythms are monotonously alike. The orchestral combinations have a family resemblance which ultimately becomes irritating. What is the use in quoting themes if the themes awaken no response in the imagination of the composer—if, in other words, the themes do not call out in him that which is himself? Not only is the greater part of this score, with all its clever tricks, barren of anything but the most unrelieved literalism, but most of it is common in the last degree. Who has not marvelled at the sounds of the circus band as the ladies rode forth on the tigers and the Indian rajahs bestrode the elephants in high estate? Mr. Busoni's music would serve admirably for such an occasion. It would thus be in place.

FERRUCCIO BUSONI,
Composer of suite dedicated to Dr. Karl Muck and performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday.

At the bottom of it all is a hideous lack of taste. But the difference between the first movement and the other seven is mainly a difference of detail, and a lamentable difference in the amount of imagination displayed. The voices of the women give the offering a pretty effect. But by that time one has had nearly enough of effects, and hoped for a little inspired music—in vain. The performance, however, was a feat of virtuosity, and this, with the picturesqueness of the instrumentation and the jolly orientalism of the tunes, interested and amused the audience, which bestowed a tribute of applause well deserved by the orchestra, if not by the composition.

The other performances, too, were of exceptional brilliancy. Mr. Gebhard had never played more authoritatively, with more broad or a bigger, fuller tone. Not all pianists could understand so well at one and the same time Cesar Franck and Richard Strauss. Franck's charming variations need no comment at this time.

A welcome foil to this was the virtuoso performance of the delightful overture to "The Sold Bride," which was played with the utmost clearness and brilliancy at a breath-taking pace. In fact, a little too fast, in our opinion, for the composer's purpose. But if it was naughty, it was nice, and the open-air feeling and humor of the music made this an ideal concluding performance.

PRESS
ss: Philadelphia, Pa.
Feb. 2 1917

BOSTON ORCHESTRA WITEK SOLOIST

Dr. Muck Presents a Delightful Program, Contrasting Old and Modern Composition.

PROGRAM.

Smetana ...Overture to "The Sold Bride"
Bruch.....Fantasia on Scottish Airs, for violin and orchestra, Op. 46.
Strauss..."Don Juan," a Tone-poem (after Nicolaus Lenau), Op. 20.
Beethoven Symphony No. 8, F major, Op.93
Conductor ..... Dr. Karl Muck
Soloist .....Anton Witek

It seems unfortunate that there is no understanding among the directors of the various orchestras in the make-up of their programs, in order to avoid repetitions, as so frequently has been the case this season. And this might apply also in the engagement of the artists. The argument on the other side may be that it is interesting to contrast the different interpretations of the great works, and the hearing of eminent soloists in works of a widely different character.

This might be a laudable desire was the orchestra concert season not so limited. But there is a great library of symphonies, as well as other big orchestral works, which are forbidden a hearing on account of opportunity; while, as to the artists, it limits the number to appear, and there are at least sufficient great artists on the concert platform, so that, for the sake of variety, and to hear as many of them as possible, through a prearranged understanding, it would not be necessary to bring more than one of them in an orchestra concert each season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, last evening at the Academy of Music, presented Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, which was played here by the Philadelphia Orchestra at its pair of concerts last week. At the Boston Symphony's January concert the soloist was Gabrilowitsch, the pianist, who had been the soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra at the previous concert but one. Similar duplications have not been infrequent and a co-operative spirit would be most gratifying to the public who are thirsting to get at least a partial quench of the musical flow from the masters during each season.

Brilliant Interpretation.

Dr. Muck and his Boston musicians were in uncommonly fine spirit last evening and gave a peerless reading of the Eighth, one which drove away the certain element of monotony which encompasses this great work in the sometimes handling. Especially was the second movement voluptuous in its dainty tonal quality. And to compensate in the way of newness, Strauss' "Don Juan" and Smetana's overture to the opera "The Sold Bride" sufficed in their modern scoring, and both numbers were encompassed with an unusual brilliance and a striking reading on the part of the conductor.

It is the absolute rounding out of all the choirs that made the playing of the Boston Symphony last evening so striking. There is never noticeable the absence of a required uniformity. The great volume of the violins is emphatic, but not more so than the 'cellos, the violas, or, in fact, any section. It was therefore that the second movement of the symphony—the tantalizingly tuneful section of the work—was played, as it probably never before has been here, with the fine emphasis of the 'cello section, which is always so reliable; and in the "Don Juan" there was a similar striking individuality in the response of the oboes, the French horn, the flutes, and, in fact, every collective or individual effort was given just the proper attention, and the large audience gave an appreciative response to every part of the program.

Bruch's Fantasia Not Brilliant.

This response was especially warm to the soloist, Anton Witek, not probably for the delight of his work, as for the years of satisfactory service he has given as the [illegible]tmeister of the or- is not much glory for ch's "Fantasia on Mr. Witek's sub- owed evidence that ently with his ef- ation with the fine it was a pleasant ram.

the season by the will be given on Gerhardt the solo-

From the Herald Feb.10,1917

SYMPHONY GIVES VARIED PERFORMANCE

Busoni's Suite from the Music for 'Turandot,' Though Aided by a Female Chorus, Fails to Please in Concert Because of Constant Straining After the Exotic.

MR. GEBHARD DELIGHTFUL IN PIANO SELECTIONS

By PHILIP HALE.

The 14th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Heinrich Gebhard was the pianist. The program was as follows: Busoni, Suite from the music for Gozzi's play "Turandot"; Cesar Franck, Symphonic Variations for piano and orchestra; Strauss, Burleske for piano and orchestra; Smetana, overture to "The Sold Bride." A female chorus from the Musical Art Club and Choral Musical Society sang the little song in Busoni's Suite.

Four movements of this Suite were performed here six years ago. Yesterday the whole Suite was played. However effective the music may be in the theatre, as concert music the Suite suffers from the constant straining after the exotic. Busoni has been quoted as saying that all his thematic material was borrowed from Oriental melodies. Strange to say, one of the themes is wholly occidental in character; it bears a striking resemblance to an old English carol. The music as a whole excites at first curiosity, then surprise. The curiosity is soon satisfied; the surprise is not repeated. There are ingenious effects, but the chief end of music is not merely to display ingenuity. The compositions of Busoni that we have heard resemble his piano playing; the music is without heart and without imagination. Perhaps this Suite fits the play, which is fantastical. The song that accompanies the dancers, may be "the oldest known Arabian song"; it is certainly uninteresting, nor was this the fault of the singers who kept to it bravely in spite of the discordant and distracting music of the dances.

Smetana's overture was first played here 30 years ago. When it was performed the next season a music critic of the town declared that the overture would not stand intimate acquaintance. This shows the folly of prophecy and the vanity of criticism. The overture has been often heard at these concerts, always with pleasure, and not merely because the performance by this orchestra is a tour de force of surpassing brilliance.

Franck's variations were played for the first time at these concerts. Mr. Gebhard was the first to play them in Boston, at a Jordan Hall orchestral concert 10 years ago. He was also the first to play Strauss's Burleske in this city. Why he thought it worth while to revise the latter is a question not easily answered.

Strauss himself—he was then a sworn follower of Johannes Brahms—thought little of it, was unwilling to have it published, although a publisher stood consenting and Strauss needed the money. How changed from the Strauss of the later years! Buelow, for whom the piano part was intended, thought the piece ugly. Probably Mr. Gebhard found the Burleske a suitable companion as regards length for Franck's Variations.

These Variations are beautiful, and for once Franck did not write at undue length. Last Saturday, apropos of Reger's Variations on a theme of Hiller, we quoted a profane remark of England's Sailor King. The remark applies in general; but there are variations by Beethoven that might have pleased even the disgusted monarch. There are a few other sets—among them this of Franck's—that are beautiful in spite of their form; or it might be said that in these variations Franck had woven charming thoughts and varied them so skilfully that while the theme stands out in recognizable beauty the comment or the changes of costume enhance the natural loveliness. Mr. Gebhard played delightfully as musician and virtuoso. He even gave some importance to the Burleske. His performance might serve Strauss as a defence for having written the piece.

The concert will be repeated tonight. There will be no concerts next week. The program of Feb. 23, 24 will be as follows: Cherubini, overture to "The Abencerrages"; Brahms, Concerto for violin and violoncello (Messrs. Witek and Warnke); Mozart, "Jupiter" symphony.

[82]

rom REPUBLICAN
ddress: Springfield, Mass.
ate FEB 11 1917

AN HISTORICAL SKETCH

Of the Wagner Pieces Which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to Play in Springfield

It is a most comprehensive program which Dr Karl Muck has made for the Wagner concert, which the Boston symphony orchestra will give in the Auditorium Tuesday evening, the 20th, as the closing of the first series of subscription concerts in Springfield conducted by Charles A. Ellis of Boston. Wagner's activity as a composer is generally reckoned from the end of the '30s, when he wrote "Rienzi" to the first years of the '80s, when he finished "Parsifal." As a matter of fact, he had written considerable before "Rienzi," including a symphony and an opera called "Die Feen." These youthful works, however, have only an historical value and the great Wagner began with "Rienzi," the opera which he drew from Bulwer's popular novel.

It is the overture to "Rienzi" with which Dr Muck begins his program. It is characteristic of the real Wagner only in parts. Wagner at that time still used as his model the stilted form of grand opera which had become standardized (to use a modern word) by Meyerbeer, Auber and Rossini in the grand opera of Paris.

In "Tannhaeuser," the second opera after "Rienzi," Wagner decidedly found himself and "Tannhaueser" is as characteristic of his genius as any of the music dramas of "The Ring." If he does not use the leit-motif in the same manner in which he uses it in his latest works, "Tannhaeuser" is filled with characteristic phrases full of significance.

Dr Muck has not arranged his program in historical order for the very obvious reason that such would detract from the musical interest of the evening. He begins it with "Rienzi" and ends it with the "Tannhaeuser" overture. He follows the "Rienzi" with the exquisite "Siegfried Idyl" which was written in 1870, 25 years after "Tannhaeuser." This charming piece for small orchestra exhibits Wagner in a very personal mood for he wrote it as a Christmas present for his wife following the birth of his son, Siegfried, and built it chiefly on the love music from the final scene of the music drama of "Siegfried."

It has always been the belief of Dr Muck that in the later music dramas of Wagner, the music, the action and the decoration are so firmly welded together that to transpose the music alone to a concert stage with the idea of reproducing in any measure its original success, is a hopeless task and he has consistently refused to play excerpts, particularly from any of the music dramas of "The Ring." He has, however, yielded so far as to play the very cunning arrangement of selections from "Siegfried and Goetterdaemmerung" which were made by the great Hans Richter. Richter has taken the opening of the final scene of "Siegfried" portraying Siegfried's passage through the wall of fire to the rock where lies the sleeping Brunnhilde, and joined to it the coming of dawn and Siegfried's Rhine journey from the prolog to "Goetterdaemmerung." In none of these selections in the music dramas themselves is the voice used and, in fact, through the greater part of them the stage is dark. In these selections, however, are heard many of the principal motifs of "The Ring" and they contain some of the most beautiful music that Wagner has written.

The other selection on the program is from the last act of "Die Meistersinger" and this music stands separation from the stage without much loss. It comprises the introduction to the third act, built on the soliloquy of Hans Sachs over the follies of humanity, the dance of the townspeople at the festival on the banks of the river Pegnitz, the entrance of the pompous mastersingers and finally the chorale-like homage paid to Hans Sachs, which virtually brings the opera to an end.

The other number on the program will be the prelude to "Lohengrin," which although written at the end of the '40s (the opera having been produced in 1850) contains the germ of mysticism and transcendentalism in Wagner which gave to the world 30 years later the wondrous drama of the Holy Grail, "Parsifal." Tickets for the Wagner concert go on sale at Otto Baab's music house Monday morning, February 12.

rom NORTH AMERICAN
ddress: Philadelphia, Pa.
ate FEB 11 1917

No novelty appears on the fourth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be played in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. All the works are well-tried favorites. The soloist will be Anton Witek, who occupies the post of concertmaster in the orchestra. Mr. Witek has appeared here as soloist several times in the last five years and Philadelphia is well aware of his gifts. He will play "The Scotch Fantasy" for violin and orchestra of Max Bruch, an unusual composition.

1884

REDUCTION

RATIO

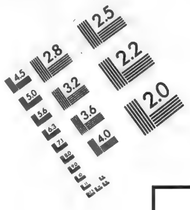
14x

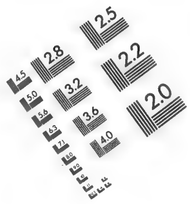
2.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

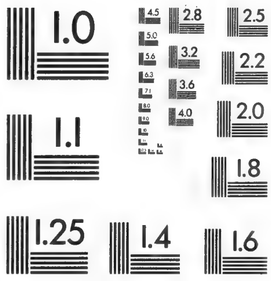
PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC





150 mm

100 mm



ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

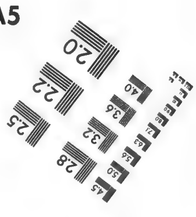
2.0 mm

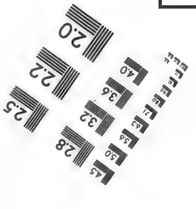
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.5 mm

A5

A4





PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

3.5 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

A Busoni Whom Audiences Seldom Hear

The Composer of Orchestral and Piano Pieces as Singular, Individual and Characteristic as His Familiar Playing

The performance at the Symphony Concerts yesterday afternoon and again this evening of the Suite that Mr. Busoni assembled from his incidental music to Gozzi's Chinese play of "Turandot" make one of the rare occasions on which an orchestral piece from his hand has been heard in Boston or, indeed, in all America. As a pianist of remarkable technical and mental power and of distinctive cast of imagination and emotion, he has more than once gone up and down the United States. As a composer of music for orchestra or for pianoforte of as singular voice and as personal quality, even the practised public of symphony concerts hardly knows him. Relatively seldom, unless he was the pianist, have such pieces from his pen been played in the Berlin that professes to set him high; while in New York, Chicago or Boston, performances have been still fewer. Even among the musically informed there is no more than a vague impression that Mr. Busoni is a composer with a theory, a practice and a substantial accomplishment of his own. The moment is ripe, then, for a brief survey of him as such and the glass is at hand in an article that Dr. Hugo Leichtentritt, the able and astute Berlinese writer about music, contributed to The Musical Quarterly for January last. By the generous permission of the editor, Dr. O. G. Sonneck of Washington, and the publishers, Messrs. Schirmer of New York, a considerable part of the essay is reprinted hereunder.

IT is a common experience in the history of arts that the world will fail to appreciate an artist, however famous he may be, as soon as he shows an ambition to distinguish himself in a field of activity alien to the one in which he acquired his first fame. Thus it happened to Franz Liszt. His pianistic genius was admired without reserve, unanimously, all the world over, but in his capacity as a composer he had to combat most serious opposition throughout his life, and even now there is a considerable divergence of opinion on this topic, although the importance of Liszt the composer has become sufficiently manifest. Similarly, Ferruccio Busoni is esteemed as a pianist of the first order, but his remarkable achievements as a composer are hardly appreciated at their full value. It is the purpose of the present essay to analyze the rather complicated character of Busoni the composer, to characterize his art, to show its development and to appraise its importance.

Ferruccio Benedetto Busoni

Beginnings

Dr. Leichtentritt then traverses various early music of Busoni for piano or other instruments and speedily reaches his first orchestral pieces. Two (he says) deserve special attention. The "Symphonic Tonepoem" (Symphonisches Tongedicht, Breitkopf & Härtel, Op. 32a,) dedicated to Arthur Nikisch, was written during the American sojourn of Busoni. I remember having heard the initial performance under Nikisch's direction at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1893. This date will help to explain the nature of the composition. Busoni's personality is hardly visible here. The score has a marked resemblance to the early works of Richard Strauss and this resemblance is perhaps less due to a direct influence, than to the models and starting-points at that time common to Busoni and Strauss: the traces of Berlioz, Liszt, Wagner are easily discernible in both. Busoni's work is not lacking in interesting traits, both in symphonic development and orchestral treatment: one may adjudge it, if not a "Meisterstück," at all events an excellent "Gesellenstück" which proves its author's fitness to be promoted to the dignity of a master in due time.

A decided step forward toward this magistral dignity is taken in the Second Orchestral Suite, Op. 34a (Breitkopf & Härtel). This "Geharnischte Suite," composed in 1895, shows (especially in its remodelled version of 1903) unmistakably the hand of Busoni. The four movements are dedicated to friends from Helsingfors, Jean Sibelius Adolf Paul, Armas Järnefelt, Eero Järnefelt. Recollections from northern shores are discernible in the spirit which breathes in these martial sounds, these rhythms full of obstinate northern energy, these austere, plastic melodies. Technically there is a great advance in the terse form, the economical use of harmonic and orchestral resources, the sureness with which the effects aimed at are reached, the clearness of construction and development. The whole manner of writing shows a considerable resemblance to Sibelius's symphonic work. In all four parts there is a power of working up to impressive climaxes which always assures the effect of this suite. The first piece, "Vorspiel" (Introduction), is severe in measured, march-like rhythms, rather dark in coloring. No. 2, "Kriegstanz" (War-dance), is perhaps the most original part of the whole suite; only the composer of the "Turandot" music could have written this brilliant piece. No. 3, "Grabdenkmal" (Funeral Monument), in the rhythms of a funeral-march, very northern in sentiment and coloring; the climax in the middle has a splendid effect, and no less impressive is the gradual descent from it to the close in softest pianissimo. The fourth part, "Ansturm" (Assault), is a finale of impetuous energy. The soft intermezzo is a wise trait. This Allegretto marziale, with its introduction, sounding as if it were a faint echo of far-off fighting, forms a happy contrast to the stormy motion and fiery energy of the close, at the same time preserving the unity of sentiment.

The Concertos

The violin concerto has of late become somewhat familiar through frequent performance. The young Hungarian violinists Szigeti and Telmanyi especially have played it often. The composition dates back to 1898; it was published years afterwards as Op. 35. The rather simple harmony, the less progressive treatment, compared with the piano concerto, and the influence of Brahms and Liszt, are the outward signs of the early date of composition. Of Brahms's violin concerto one is reminded by the key, D major, and the rather Brahms-like principal theme with its effective entrance in the highest octave after extended passagework on the organ-point of the dominant at the very beginning. In form the concerto follows the model of Liszt's concertos; though written in one movement only, the three sections of the sonata-form Allegro, Andante, Finale are marked clearly and the thematic material in all three parts flows from a common source. The second section, Quasi andante, a hymn-like piece of broad melodic outlines with an agitato intermezzo, is the most striking part of the whole, musically. It has the austere beauty characteristic of Busoni, an elevation of sentiment which approaches the splendid beginning of the piano concerto. The introductory allegro and the finale are brilliant, effective and spirited violin music, though hardly fully expressive of their author's individuality.

I have a vivid recollection of the first performance of Busoni's piano concerto in Berlin in 1904. Dr. Muck conducted the Philharmonic Orchestra, Busoni played the piano part. The public was dumbfounded at the startling "ugliness" of the music; the verdict of the press was almost unanimous against the composition, which was found barren in invention, a scandalous outgrowth of modernism. Ten years later, the same concerto was greeted with enthusiasm, its ugliness, its modernism seemed no longer offensive, a wealth of imagination was seen in it which contrasted strangely to the "barrenness" formerly attributed to it. In short, musical people saw that a rare masterpiece was laid before them which they could not understand a decade before, but which seemed intelligible now, after Strauss's "Salome," after Debussy, Skriabin and Schönberg had been heard and more or less appreciated. Nowadays it seems strange that one should ever have had a doubt about the value of this monumental composition, so convincing and logical does it seem. As a concerto this symphonic work forms a class for itself. It is not, like the Chopin concertos, a solo piece with orchestral accompaniment, nor does it resemble the Mozart or Beethoven concerto as a contest between piano and orchestra; while in spite of the importance of the orchestral part it cannot be called a symphony with piano obbligato, like Brahms's concertos. Busoni takes "concertos" in the older sense of the word, as a coöperation of several bodies of sound; the piano, a large orchestra, and a six-part male chorus collaborate to produce a symphonic whole.

The solo part is, of course, sparkling with virtuosity, yet without assuming the principal place in the ensemble; in an original, novel way it is rather of coloristic, ornamental effect. The thematic framework of this symphony in five movements is furnished by the orchestra. The piano throws over it a flexible, glittering, ample veil, dazzling, brilliant reflexes of light and color. The real character of piano style, constant motion, has nowhere been brought out in so brilliant a manner, except by Liszt. There is nothing massive, nothing inflexible, everything is resolved into motion, into flowing figuration. The artistico-technical motive of this style of writing is not the straight line, but the manifoldly broken line. Scale-figures, broken-chord figures, the tremolo, the trill in many new variations, are the elements of this figural technique. A second characteristic trait of Busoni's piano-treatment is his peculiar use of chord-playing, octaves and the martellato element, which is of prime importance in piano technique; herein the plastic expression, the sharply marked rhythm, has its source, being derived from chords, octaves, martellato, wristwork and armwork in contradistinction to the gliding manner of playing necessitated by the smooth flow of running passages. This combination of vertical and horizontal lines, this complicated design, obtains shades of colors by the extraordinary art of pedal treatment which this score demands. The ear hears much more than the notes show: long-sustained tones, the intermingling of different resounding chords, produce various new harmonic effects, a sonority rich in gradations of strength and color. The original sound-effects of this score come from the peculiar combination of piano and orchestra, from the manner in which the piano dives into the waves of the orchestra, works its way to the surface again and glides along, as it were, caressingly; then rushes on like a foaming mountain-stream, challenging the orchestra with an expression now imperious, now plaintive, or alluring, or sobbing, or imploring, or jubilant, while the orchestra pursues its way calmly.

The construction of the concerto is similar to that of a sonata. In place of the regular first "movement" form, a "prologo e introito" is put. The "pezzo giocoso" corresponds to the scherzo, the "pezzo serioso" to the adagio. The fourth movement, "All' italiana," has the character of a brilliant finale. To close the concerto with the entire bacchantic piece did not, however, agree with the idea of the entire composition. The serious groundtone of the whole was to be brought out yet more strongly, and so the composer added a fifth movement, a solemn male chorus (to pantheistic verses from Oehlenschläger's drama "Aladin"), this "cantico" corresponding to the calm and solemn "prologo."

Maturity and Innovation

Dr. Leichtentritt then describes Busoni's incidental music to Gozzi's Chinese fairy-play of "Turandot," heard at the Symphony Concerts yesterday and noted elsewhere in this paper; lingers over various piano pieces and so reaches the orchestral music of the composer's present innovating and sharply individualized years. Two such pieces, he says, the "Berceuse Elegiaque" and the "Nocturne Symphonique," show the fully developed, mature style of Busoni. The orchestral mass is dissolved here into individual elements. The intimacy, perspicuous clearness, delicacy of tone-colors desired necessitate the suppression of the massive, loud-sounding instruments, like trumpets and trombones. A new kind of "polyphonic harmony" is used. Not one part is written against the other, not one group of instruments balanced against another, but tone against tone, every single instrument against some other. The music looks very simple, but its proper performance demands an infinite subtlety, otherwise pieces of this kind are easily turned into caricatures. Different chords run into each other, major and minor are sounded at the same time, unexpected chord-combinations clash one upon another. In the "Berceuse," for instance, towards the end the celesta plays in A major and the harp at the same time in C minor. The resulting sonority is not, as in arithmetic, the simple sum of the component parts, but something new, totally different, due to the shading of the single values of colors, as the painters call it. As in the second Sonatina, new chords composed of seconds, fourths, sevenths abound here, showing that chord-effects are possible in ways different from the ordinary superposition of thirds.

The "Berceuse" is an elegiac piece of extremely delicate sound, in fact, perhaps the most delicate piece to be found in orchestral literature, more so, even Berlioz's "Queen Mab" scherzo, or o' the Wisp" minuet, although n sembling these pieces in the least wise. The melody is plaintive, sor frequently interrupted as if by sobbi moaning, here and there swelled by den, but quickly subdued outburst o These cries of woe wander from o strument to another; towards the clo piece exhales its breath, so to say dying. From beginning to end the r rhythm of the accompaniment fig maintained, calm in its monotonou tion. "Cradle-song of the man Coffin of His Mother" is the sub-t this extraordinary composition; it ser throw a light on the emotional atmo and suggestion poured forth from tones.

Different from the dusky, twilight of this piece are the still darker sha night which seem to envelop the to the "Nocturne Symphonique." The p

Within Busoni's Music a

Turandot, Princess of C

As Acted by Miss Evelyn d'Alroy, at St. James's Th

TIMES
ess: New York City

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Reger's Variations, Mozart, Beethoven and Smetana Heard.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert in Carnegie Hall last evening presented a program containing nothing unfamiliar to its audiences. It began with the overture to Mozart's opera, "Le Nozze di Figaro," which is in the season's repertory at the Metropolitan Opera House, and continued with Beethoven's eighth symphony, Max Reger's "Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme of J. A. Hiller," Op. 100, and the overture to Smetana's opera, "The Bartered Bride," also in recent years played at the Metropolitan.

Reger's variations and fugue were first given in New York by the Boston orchestra, and seemed then, as they do now, one of his most important and successful compositions. It may be assumed that their performance was in some way a reminder of the composer's death, which occurred last Spring. It does not seem likely that Reger's fame will be a lasting one, but he was one of the curious products of the most modern developments of music, looking backward and at the same time forward. His command of the most recondite forms of contrapuntal art is nowhere more conspicuously or skillfully shown than in these variations, and especially in the double fugue at the end, with its imposing and elaborately wrought climax. The variations are of great length—too great—and there are pages that show the desultory, at times almost uncertain, manner of Reger's musical thinking. There are pages of real beauty, of felicitous expression, of mood evoked and sustained. He has a characteristic instrumental utterance of his own, not brilliant and highly colored, but often subtle and ingenious. It was well that these variations should be heard again, and they were listened to with interest. The performance was one of Dr. Muck's most remarkable ones in the perfection and finish with which Reger's involved score was set forth.

As to the transparent brilliancy and vivacity of the performance of Mozart's overture, the spirit and rhythmic buoyancy, the polished phrasing with which Beethoven's symphony was reproduced, they were characteristic of the fines things the Boston players do under Dr. Muck's conducting.

From TRIBUNE
Address: New York City
Date

Boston Symphony Gives Beethoven's Eighth Symphony

Crowded Carnegie Hall Receives Programme of Color, Variety and General Interest

The Boston Symphony's programme last night was, all things considered, a relief from some of Dr. Muck's recent offerings. It was far from being unconventional and it possessed no novelties, but it was not a bore. It possessed color, variety and general interest. It opened with the overtime to "Le Nozze di Figaro," in which Dr. Muck's understanding of the classic style was most grateful. Of it he gave a reading light as air, sparking as champagne.

The piece de resistance was the Beethoven Eighth Symphony and here again the band was altogether at home. It was a performance of exquisite dynamic adjustment, beautifully articulated, fanciful, yet free from exaggeration. The closing numbers were Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme of J. A. Hiller and the overtime to "Smetana's "The Bartered Bride." It is not necessary to add that Carnegie Hall was filled to the limit. The New York musical public knows the highest in music, all the Jeremiahs in the land notwithstanding.

From STAATS-ZEITUNG
Address: New York City
Date FEB 1 6

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Die stets willkommenen Bostoner Gäste erfreuten uns gestern abend in Carnegie Hall mit den reifsten Proben ihrer herrlichen Kunst. Man kann sagen, daß Dr. Muck und seine Meisterspieler gestern einen „besonders guten Abend" hatten, denn sie strahlten in fast tadelloser Reinheit und farbigstem Glanz. Da gab es eine von allen Huldinnen der Anmut geküßte Aufführung von Mozarts Ouverture zur „Hochzeit des Figaro", deren feine Rokokograzie in lebhaftestem Kontakt stand zu der ursprünglichen Kraft und dem etwas derben Humor, der in Muck's Wiedergabe der Smetana'schen Ouverture zur „Verkauften Braut" zu Worte kam. Es waren Gegensätze in Stil und Farbigkeit, aber beides wirkliche Kunstwerke.

Muck's Wiedergabe von Beethovens Achter Symphonie war der Inbegriff unwiderstehlichen Humors, wirklichster Behaglichkeit, ja ausgelassenster Fröhlichkeit. Das Orchester folgte seinem Führer mit herzerquickender Frische und einer Klarheit der Form, die Bewunderung heischen mußte. Einen orchestralen Höhepunkt ohne Gleichen bedeutete die strahlend virtuos durchgeführte Wiedergabe von Regers „Variationen und Fuge" über ein Hiller'sches Thema. Namentlich die Fuge war mit einer durchsichtigen Klarheit ausgelegt, die einen stolzen Gipfel emotioneller Instrumental-Kunst bildete. Das Publikum konnte sich in Ovationen dem Dirigenten und dem Meisterorchester gegenüber nicht genug tun.

From SUN
dress: New York City

From HERALD
ddress: New York City

ate

BOSTONIANS HEARD.

Symphony Orchestra Well Received in Fourth Subscription Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fourth of its evening subscription concerts in Carnegie Hall last evening. The programme comprised the overture to Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," Beethoven's eighth symphony, Max Reger's variations and fugue on a theme by Hiller and Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride."

It is difficult to determine what scheme was in the mind of the distinguished Dr. Muck when he arranged this list. Perhaps he offered the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" as a delicate compliment to the local opera house for its recent revival of the opera. There are compliments and compliments of course, and one is that the Metropolitan orchestra can play the overture excellently.

The eighth symphony is always welcome. It is so familiar to music lovers that its simple and melodious measures bring with them a feeling of repose which so much modern music is not kind enough to give. Reger's variations too have been heard here several times, but are naturally not the common property of music lovers. They are good variations on a good theme and they belong to the kinds of music in which Dr. Muck and his virtuosi are very much at home.

Smetana's overture is a very old friend, and its brilliant, swinging measures, rushing along like a sparkling mountain torrent, served well to refresh minds which had been listening to somewhat more serious matters. The playing of the Boston orchestra is always good to hear. It does not call for special comment at this time. The audience was of the type always seen at these concerts and the applause betokened a lively satisfaction.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCE

Despite the storm Carnegie Hall rowded last night for the Boston phony concert.

A spirit of comedy disp ved the n hat austerity is characteristic of a ton Orchestra programme. There fun in the overture to "Le Nozze d garo," wit and drollery in the overtu "The Bartered Bride." Beethoven's e symphony, too, is full of merry c Any one of these numbers would put audience into good humor. The delic the archness, the light-hearted and vacity with which they were played n say optimists of all present. As a ma f comedy, Dr. Karl Muck in his spark performances might rank with molier aristophanes.

The Beethoven symphony was supe ly played. All the precious qualities the orchestra came to the fore in serando and particularly in the a ro vivace. Exquisite in tone color for mand vigorous in rhythm, plastic phrasing, Dr. Muck's reading evo much praise. The overture to " Bartered Bride" was taken at a brea ss tempo.

In the rarely played Reger variati and fugue on a merry theme by Hil the harmonization was rich and color the technical resource of Reger—th were eleven variations—compelled a mination. The interweaving of melo with contra puntal elaborations was only skilful but interesting, a qual not always associated with Reger. Muck's reading was noteworthy for clarity and wealth of orchestral col ing. After it there was a great demo stration.

[83]

REDUCTION

RATIO

12x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

thin Busoni's Music and Gozzi's Play

Turandot, Princess of China

As Acted by Miss Evelyn d'Alroy, at St. James's Theatre, in London, in 1913

ent against some other. simple, but its proper is an infinite subtlety, this kind are easily res. Different chords major and minor are ne time, unexpected lash one upon another. for instance, towards plays in A major and time in C minor. The not, as in arithmetic, e component parts, but ly different, due to the e values of colors, as s in the second Sona- composed of seconds, bound here, showing re possible in ways ordinary superposition

s an elegiac piece of ound, in fact, perhaps iece to be found in orchestral literature, more so, even, than Berlioz's "Queen Mab" scherzo, or "Will o' the Wisp" minuet, although not resembling these pieces in the least otherwise. The melody is plaintive, sorrowful, frequently interrupted as if by sobbing and moaning, here and there swelled by a sudden, but quickly subdued outburst of grief. These cries of woe wander from one instrument to another; towards the close the piece exhales its breath, so to say, as if dying. From beginning to end the rocking rhythm of the accompaniment figures is maintained, calm in its monotonous motion. "Cradle-song of the man at the Coffin of His Mother" is the sub-title of this extraordinary composition; it serves to throw a light on the emotional atmosphere and suggestion poured forth from these tones.

Different from the dusky, twilight colors of this piece are the still darker shades of night which seem to envelop the tones of the "Nocturne Symphonique." The polyphonic texture of the nocturne is still denser. The breath of Southern skies pervades both pieces. The "Berceuse' 'is more in the manner of a monologue, the "Nocturne" more like a dialogue. Sad, low, trembling in painful emotion, is the speech of both. Just as the eye needs special adaptation in oorder to perceive gradually the contours of objects in the darkness, so the ear must get accustomed to the dense network of tone-threads which is spun around these melodic fragments, to the peculiar manner in which the tone-colors flow into each other.

To the same group of compositions of Busoni's latest phase belongs "The Indian Fantasy" for piano and orchestra. It is, however, of a much more popular stamp, despite its complexity. A brilliant piano-piece on genuine Indian motives, distinguished by a plastic clearness hard as steel. Three parts passing one into the other form the entire composition: A fantasy, a canzone (of a quite enchanting beauty), and a finale on three Indian motives and an original melody. The endless sweep of the North American prairies is placed before the imagination in this picturesque composition; the father of rivers, the mighty Mississippi; the melancholy of the vast plains; against the distant horizon the silhouettes of the redskins; we hear the trampling of horses onrushing in furious gallop, the war whoops; we see the glitter of menacing tomahawks; we almost smell the fresh breeze of the prairie, the cool morning air.

The One Opera

One of Busoni's most important and characteristic works is his opera "Die Brautwahl." The first performance took place at the Hamburg Opera, April 13, 1912. Afterwards it was heard in Mannheim, but in spite of these performances it is as yet almost unknown and did not meet with the success it deserves. This "musical-fantastic comedy" is still awaiting a sympathetic performance; only then can an adequate judgment be pronounced. All criticisms of the Hamburg première agreed in the opinion that a wealth of music was lavished on a subject which did not repay the labor spent on it. Busoni has his own ideas, however, about the nature of a dramatic text and its musical treatment, which differ from the commonly accepted opinions on this subject. At all events, it is certain that the text (by Busoni himself) also shows the hand of an unusual artist, a soulful and thoughtful poet. Perhaps the theatrical verve is not strong enough for the taste of the average theatre-goer, but its artistic qualities are beyond all doubt. What attracted Busoni in the story of E. T. A. Hoffmann, the Berlin romantic novelist of a century ago, is the atmosphere of a supernatural, fantastic element in its mixture with reality. The scene is laid in the Berlin of 1820, with its atmosphere of well-ordered rationalism; a bright, daylight scene with which the demoniac, mysterious, nocturnal visions of the characters engaged contrast strangely. Here Busoni has found an occasion to give vent to his strong sense for fantastic humor, grotesque, bizarre imagination. And in all these respects the score of the opera is a masterpiece of the first rank—in fact one of the most admirable of his orchestral scores in the exuberant wealth of original ideas, sounds of picturesque novelty, imagery of the most brilliant kind, powerful and enchanting in its mystic depth and the purity of its emotional strength.

The orchestral suite of five pieces, published separately, will give a good idea of the "Brautwahl" music when transferred to the concert room, No. 1, "Spukhaftes Stück," is the musical description of a magic trick played by the goldsmith Leonard. He bewitches the entire company, so that they begin a galop, dancing more and more wildly till they are completely exhausted. No. 2, "Lyrisches Stück," is a composition of Fouqué's poem, "Ein Flüstern, Rauschen, Klingen geht durch den Frühlingshain"—a most delicate melody, characteristic of Busoni's austere tenderness; in the opera it is sung by the heroine at her spinet. No. 3, "Mystisches Stück," comprises the mystic, solemn actions of the opera. It includes the apparition of the unknown bride to the bridegroom at midnight of a certain autumn day, a piece of music which is also included in the "Elegies" for piano. No. 4, "Hebräisches Stück," gives the portrait of Manasse, the mysterious old Jew who plays such a conspicuous part in Hoffmann's novel. The orthodox and demoniac traits of this fantastic character are expressed in the music, in which a complicated, meditative, sombre fantasy on Hebrew synagogue-melodies is particularly conspicuous, with its strange murmurings, groans, and wild, weird outcries. No. 5, "Heiteres Stück," is brimful of life and motion, descriptive of the first scene of the opera (which is laid in the Berlin park, the Thiergarten); the band playing jolly tunes, while the crowd is listening, drinking coffee and eating cake. To this is attached the brilliant "Feuergaukelspiel," which ends the first act, descriptive of magic tricks.

Another piece of the "Brautwahl" music, not contained in the suite, but nevertheless suitable for the concert-hall, is the prelude to the third act, to which may be joined the first scene: a sombre night by the frog pond in the Berlin Thiergarten; the desolate lover, about to end his life by jumping into the pond, is rescued at the last moment. There is a mixture of imrived mainly from Mozart. Wagner has influenced him only during a limited period of his youth, less than all the other noted musicians of equal age. His artistic creed has later on rather put him into opposition towards Wagner, felt instinctively at first, expressed logically afterwards. From about 1890 the progressive tendencies become more and more manifest. Slowly Busoni turns towards a new horizon, yet never losing the ground under his feet, always remaining firmly rooted in the past. This circumstance gives a legitimate, natural aspect to his most daring innovations; they are a necessary growth, not whimsical, sensational, or forced.

Continued on Following Page

The sense for new combinations of simultaneous tones, for delicate shadings of tone, is a peculiarity of our nervous age and its most salient characteristic. To this modern development of harmony Busoni has made some very important contributions. Step by step his innovations can be traced. The compositions up to about 1895 hardly go beyond the practice of modern chromatic harmony as we find it in Liszt's and Wagner's works. But from about 1900 new elements of harmony make their appearance in his music. He first exercises his ingenuity to find new effects within the system of chords generally accepted. Some of his processes are the following: Major and minor triad simultaneously, progressions of parallel fifths and fourths, different chords sounding together, different keys at the same time, chords formed by a conglomeration of seconds and fourths, new scales, new forms of cadence and modulation, a more liberal aspect of tonality, disregard for the commonly accepted idea of tonality, a striving aimed at evolving third-tones and quarter-tones.

Beside His Fellows

With the Finnish composers, especially Sibelius, the modern French school around Debussy, and Delius, Skriabin, Schönberg, Busoni has some traits in common. Though a superficial observer might perhaps consider him a follower of these musicians, still the differences between his way of writing and theirs are greater than the similarities. The most striking resemblance between Debussy and Busoni is their predilection for exotic scales. The possibilities of our major and minor scale in a melodic and harmonic way are apparently exhausted. Hence the desire of progressive minds to procure new material for music. The mediæval church scales have been utilized more or less by modern composers, Beethoven, Brahms, Chopin, Franck, the modern Russians and Frenchmen. As the music of the Oriental nations became more familiar in Europe, it exercised a certain influence. The Pentatonic scale of the Chinese, the ancient Scotch and the North American Indians, the whole-tone scale of the Siamese, found its way into French music, partly by the way of Russia. By experiment, Busoni has found out that there are more than a hundred scales possible, many of which have doubtless never yet been used in composition. Though Busoni and the modern French and Russian writers occasionally meet on common ground in the use of such scales, still, his manner of employing them, his thematic invention, his spiritual capacities and temperament are considerably, in fact fundamentally, different from theirs. Busoni is more austere, more masculine, more exalted and of greater energy, less enchanting, less soft and flexible than Debussy. From Schönberg and Skriabin, the two most radical modern musicians—apart from the futurists in Italy, who so far have not been accepted seriously—Busoni differs by his more organic and sounder art, by the stronger, more legitimate, broader basis, musically as well as spiritually and intellectually. He continues in a straight line the series of the older masters, whereas most of the radical modernists run the risk of losing their way in a side-path which leads into a wilderness. In musical erudition and polyphonic art, he surpasses all the other modernists, in fact, he deserves in all these respects the title of "master" in the sense in which it is commonly applied.

Goal and Gospel

Among these masters there has always existed, as the history of art shows, a marked difference as regards their attitude towards expression and means of expression. All real masters have always had to express something personal, unique, new. Many of them have found it possible to express their individual feelings within the range of the technical means in use at their time, or without considerable departure from this technical basis. Others have sought their ideal by trying to develop new means of expression, new harmonies, rhythms, forms, sounds. And among these again there are some who come to their discoveries in a naive way, by inspiration, others by a systematic, scientific investigation, by labor of the intellect. Busoni seems to belong to the last class, most emphatically. He meditates profoundly on the possibilities of a change, an advance in form, color, harmony, rhythm. Like a great inventor he experiments in all these directions, not at haphazard, but with superior intelligence—in this way far superior to revolutionary anarchists like Schönberg and Skriabin—with a certain end in view. With passionate energy he works at his problems. Occasionally, it may seem as if this intellectual labor overbalanced the emotional essence the soul, as if the means of expression were ahead of the inspiration. But always, so far, he has succeeded in mastering his own progressive ideas, so that his inspiration regains its due prominence; his invention, his ideas, become such that they need just those novel ways of expression. Thus the balance is restored, the basis is found which might be sufficient for a whole series of years. But his restless mind is not content with the result thus gained; he does not care to rest on his laurels; in his next work he is urged forward to try something new. Again he begins experimenting, his fertile mind finds new technical devices, and before long his creative imagination is enflamed, he breathes naturally in the new atmosphere.

Busoni's art has often been critised by superficial observers as being too intellectual, too cool, somewhat soulless. This criticism I consider altogether unjust. He is "problematic," no doubt, because he is in advance of the standard of the day. But his music ceases to be problematic as soon as his listeners have become familiar with his way of expression. He has written some eloquent words on feeling and emotion in his "Sketch of a New Esthetic of Music," and I quote a few of these sentences at the end of this essay, because they throw light on his ideas of art:

"In art, feeling is held to be the highest moral qualification. In music, however, feeling requires two consorts, taste and style. Now, in life, one encounters real taste as seldom as deep and true feeling: as for style, it is a province of art. 'Feeling' is generally understood to mean tenderness, pathos, and extravagance of expression. But how much more does the marvellous flower 'Emotion' unfold! Restraint and forbearance, renunciation, power, activity, patience, magnanimity, joyousness, and that all-controlling intelligence wherein feeling actually takes its rise. What the amateur and the mediocre artist attempt to express, is feeling in little, in detail, for a short stretch. Feeling on a grand scale is mistaken by the amateur, the semi-artist, the public (and the critics, too, unhappily) for a want of emotion, because they all are unable to hear the longer reaches as parts of a yet more extended whole. Feeling, therefore, is likewise economy. Hence, I distinguish feeling as Taste, as Style, as Economy. Each a whole in itself, and each one-third of the whole. Within and over them rules a subjective trinity: Temperament, Intelligence and the instinct of Equipoise. These six carry on a dance of such subtility in the choice of partners and intertwining of figures, in the bearing and the being borne, in advancing and curtseying, in motion and repose, that no loftier height of artistry is conceivable."

om HERALD

idress: New York City

ate

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

Despite the storm Carnegie Hall was crowded last night for the Boston Symphony concert.

A spirit of comedy disproved the notion that austerity is characteristic of a Boston Orchestra programme. There was fun in the overture to "Le Nozze di Figaro," wit and drollery in the overture to "The Bartered Bride." Beethoven's eighth symphony, too, is full of merry cheer. Any one of these numbers would put an audience into good humor. The delicacy the archness, the light-hearted and vivacity with which they were played made gay optimists of all present. As a master of comedy, Dr. Karl Muck in his sparkling performances might rank with moliere or aristophanes.

The Beethoven symphony was superbly played. All the precious qualities of the orchestra came to the fore in the scherando and particularly in the allegro vivace. Exquisite in tone coloring, fir mand vigorous in rhythm, plastic in phrasing, Dr. Muck's reading evoked much praise. The overture to "The Bartered Bride" was taken at a breathless tempo.

In the rarely played Reger variations and fugue on a merry theme by Hiller, the harmonization was rich and colorful. The technical resource of Reger—there were eleven variations—compelled admiration. The interweaving of melody with contra puntal elaborations was not only skilful but interesting, a quality not always associated with Reger. Dr. Muck's reading was noteworthy for its clarity and wealth of orchestral coloring. After it there was a great demonstration.

From the Traveler Feb. 10, 1917.

Not for many moons has a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra afforded more plesaure than that of yesterday afternoon. Dr. Muck was particularly happy in his choice of numbers, and as added attractions there was the chorus of women's voices from the ranks of the Musical Art Society and Choral Music Society and Heinrich Gebhard, pianist, as soloist. The program was: Busoni, Suite from the music for Gozzi's play "Turandot"; Cesar Franck, Symphonic Variations for piano and orchestra; Strauss, Burleske for piano and orchestra; Smetana, overture to "The Sold Bride."

The Busoni Suite was given here in its entirety for the first time and was played as probably no other orchestra in the world could play it. The selection affords grand opportunities for the various choirs of the orchestra and these choirs made the most of them. Notably fine was the work of Mr. Neumann with his array of "kettles." The comparatively small part falling to the women's chorus was in keeping with the high standard of their organization. Fortunate is Dr. Muck to have such talent as Mr. Townsend's singers to draw upon.

Mr. Gebhard, ever heard with pleasure, is never so much in his element as when playing as soloist with this orchestra.

Enthusiasm ran high throughout the afternoon.

[84]

[illegible] and Strauss's "Don Juan."

thin Busoni's Music and Gozzi's Play

Turandot, Princess of China

As Acted by Miss Evelyn d'Alroy, at St. James's Theatre, in London, in 1913

ent against some other. simple, but its proper s an infinite subtlety, this kind are easily res. Different chords major and minor are ne time, unexpected lash one upon another. for instance, towards plays in A major and time in C minor. The not, as in arithmetic, e component parts, but ly different, due to the le values of colors, as As in the second Sona- composed of seconds, abound here, showing are possible in ways ordinary superposition

s an elegiac piece of ound, in fact, perhaps iece to be found in orchestral literature, more so, even, than Berlioz's "Queen Mab" scherzo, or "Will o' the Wisp" minuet, although not resembling these pieces in the least otherwise. The melody is plaintive, sorrowful, frequently interrupted as if by sobbing and moaning, here and there swelled by a sudden, but quickly subdued outburst of grief. These cries of woe wander from one instrument to another; towards the close the piece exhales its breath, so to say, as if dying. From beginning to end the rocking rhythm of the accompaniment figures is maintained, calm in its monotonous motion. "Cradle-song of the man at the Coffin of His Mother" is the sub-title of this extraordinary composition; it serves to throw a light on the emotional atmosphere and suggestion poured forth from these tones.

Different from the dusky, twilight colors of this piece are the still darker shades of night which seem to envelop the tones of the "Nocturne Symphonique." The polyphonic texture of the nocturne is still denser. The breath of Southern skies pervades both pieces. The "Berceuse" is more in the manner of a monologue, the "Nocturne" more like a dialogue. Sad, low, trembling in painful emotion, is the speech of both. Just as the eye needs special adaptation in oorder to perceive gradually the contours of objects in the darkness, so the ear must get accustomed to the dense network of tone-threads which is spun around these melodic fragments, to the peculiar manner in which the tone-colors flow into each other.

To the same group of compositions of Busoni's latest phase belongs "The Indian Fantasy" for piano and orchestra. It is, however, of a much more popular stamp, despite its complexity. A brilliant piano-piece on genuine Indian motives, distinguished by a plastic clearness hard as steel. Three parts passing one into the other form the entire composition: A fantasy, a canzone (of a quite enchanting beauty), and a finale on three Indian motives and an original melody. The endless sweep of the North American prairies is placed before the imagination in this picturesque composition; the father of rivers, the mighty Mississippi; the melancholy of the vast plains; against the distant horizon the silhouettes of the redskins; we hear the trampling of horses onrushing in furious gallop, the war whoops; we see the glitter of menacing tomahawks; we almost smell the fresh breeze of the prairie, the cool morning air.

The One Opera

One of Busoni's most important and characteristic works is his opera "Die Brautwahl." The first performance took place at the Hamburg Opera, April 13, 1912. Afterwards it was heard in Mannheim, but in spite of these performances it is as yet almost unknown and did not meet with the success it deserves. This "musical-fantastic comedy" is still awaiting a sympathetic performance; only then can an adequate judgment be pronounced. All criticisms of the Hamburg première agreed in the opinion that a wealth of music was lavished on a subject which did not repay the labor spent on it. Busoni has his own ideas, however, about the nature of a dramatic text and its musical treatment, which differ from the commonly accepted opinions on this subject. At all events, it is certain that the text (by Busoni himself) also shows the hand of an unusual artist, a soulful and thoughtful poet. Perhaps the theatrical verve is not strong enough for the taste of the average theatre-goer, but its artistic qualities are beyond all doubt. What attracted Busoni in the story of E. T. A. Hoffmann, the Berlin romantic novelist of a century ago, is the atmosphere of a supernatural, fantastic element in its mixture with reality. The scene is laid in the Berlin of 1820, with its atmosphere of well-ordered rationalism; a bright, daylight scene with which the demoniac, mysterious, nocturnal visions of the characters engaged contrast strangely. Here Busoni has found an occasion to give vent to his strong sense for fantastic humor, grotesque, bizarre imagination. And in all these respects the score of the opera is a masterpiece of the first rank—in fact one of the most admirable of his orchestral scores in the exuberant wealth of original ideas, sounds of picturesque novelty, imagery of the most brilliant kind; powerful and expressiev landscape painting and plaintive humor in the tragi-comical situation. The post-horn, sounding from far off, opens the symphonic prelude in a romantic manner. Voices of the night accompany this post-horn melody; the sighing of the wind, the murmurings of the foliage, strange sounds of the rippling water and of animals, the croakings of frogs. A symphony in green, as one critic has fitly characterized this piece of music.

The Innovator

Dr. Leichtentritt then passes in review Busoni's transcriptions from Bach, his superhumanly intricate Fantasia Contrapunttistica—the completion and amplification of a fragment found among Bach's manuscripts; and other music which he has written in paraphrase or subjected to editorial revision. Surveying then—the essayist proceeds—the entire work of Busoni up to his fiftieth year, his development becomes clear. His main characteristics from the start are an Italian sense of clearness, of vivid rhythmical energy, form and proportion, combined with the German sense of architecture, of composition in the proper sense of the word, of endless striving after an ideal of perfection. The source of his creative ability is vivid, passionate southern temperament, an instinct of making music like a fanciful play, and combined with this a gift of profound meditation, an intelligence of the highest stamp, a tendency toward intricate speculation.

In a simple formula: Gay dance-rhythm and learned polyphony, light, graceful motion and weighty thought; Brahms, Liszt, Wagner, the last Beethoven, Bach—these are the masters whose influence is most marked in his earlier works. But his whole love and unbounded admiration from the start up to the present day has always belonged to Mozart. The clearness of form, the economical use of means, the power of presenting complicated things in the simplest possible manner, traits which strongly characterize Busoni's art, are derived mainly from Mozart. Wagner has influenced him only during a limited period of his youth, less than all the other noted musicians of equal age. His artistic creed has later on rather put him into opposition towards Wagner, felt instinctively at first, expressed logically afterwards. From about 1890 the progressive tendencies become more and more manifest. Slowly Busoni turns towards a new horizon, yet never losing the ground under his feet, always remaining firmly rooted in the past. This circumstance gives a legitimate, natural aspect to his most daring innovations; they are a necessary growth, not whimsical, sensational, or forced.

The sense for new combinations of simultaneous tones, for delicate shadings of tone, is a peculiarity of our nervous age and its most salient characteristic. To this modern development of harmony Busoni has made some very important contributions. Step by step his innovations can be traced. The compositions up to about 1895 hardly go beyond the practice of modern chromatic harmony as we find it in Liszt's and Wagner's works. But from about 1900 new elements of harmony make their appearance in his music. He first exercises his ingenuity to find new effects within the system of chords generally accepted. Some of his processes are the following: Major and minor triad simultaneously, progressions of parallel fifths and fourths, different chords sounding together, different keys at the same time, chords formed by a conglomeration of seconds and fourths, new scales, new forms of cadence and modulation, a more liberal aspect of tonality, disregard for the commonly accepted idea of tonality, a striving aimed at evolving third-tones and quarter-tones.

Beside His Fellows

With the Finnish composers, especially Sibelius, the modern French school around Debussy, and Delius, Skriabin, Schönberg, Busoni has some traits in common. Though a superficial observer might perhaps consider him a follower of these musicians, still the differences between his way of writing and theirs are greater than the similarities. The most striking resemblance between Debussy and Busoni is their predilection for exotic scales. The possibilities of our major and minor scale in a melodic and harmonic way are apparently exhausted. Hence the desire of progressive minds to procure new material for music. The mediæval church scales have been utilized more or less by modern composers, Beethoven, Brahms, Chopin, Franck, the modern Russians and Frenchmen. As the music of the Oriental nations became more familiar in Europe, it exercised a certain influence. The Pentatonic scale of the Chinese, the ancient Scotch and the North American Indians, the whole-tone scale of the Siamese, found its way into French music, partly by the way of Russia. By experiment, Busoni has found out that there are more than a hundred scales possible, many of which have doubtless never yet been used in composition. Though Busoni and the modern French and Russian writers occasionally meet on common ground in the use of such scales, still, his manner of employing them, his thematic invention, his spiritual capacities and temperament are considerably, in fact fundamentally, different from theirs. Busoni is more austere, more masculine, more exalted and of greater energy, less enchanting, less soft and flexible than Debussy. From Schönberg and Skriabin, the two most radical modern musicians—apart from the futurists in Italy, who so far have not been accepted seriously—Busoni differs by his more organic and sounder art, by the stronger, more legitimate, broader basis, musically as well as spiritually and intellectually. He continues in a straight line the series of the older masters, whereas most of the radical modernists run the risk of losing their way in a side-path which leads into a wilderness. In [illegible] musical erudition and polyphonic art, he surpasses all the other modernists, in fact, he deserves in all these respects the title of "master" in the sense in which it is commonly applied.

Goal and Gospel

Among these masters there has always existed, as the history of art shows, a marked difference as regards their attitude towards expression and means of expression. All real masters have always had to express something personal, unique, new. Many of them have found it possible to express their individual feelings within the range of the technical means in use at their time, or without considerable departure from this technical basis. Others have sought their ideal by trying to develop new means of expression, new harmonies, rhythms, forms, sounds. And among these again there are some who come to their discoveries in a naive way, by inspiration, others by a systematic, scientific investigation, by labor of the intellect. Busoni seems to belong to the last class, most emphatically. He meditates profoundly on the possibilities of a change, an advance in form, color, harmony, rhythm. Like a great inventor he experiments in all these directions, not at haphazard, but with superior intelligence—in this way far superior to revolutionary anarchists like Schönberg and Skriabin—with a certain end in view. With passionate energy he works at his problems. Occasionally, it may seem as if this intellectual labor overbalanced the emotional essence the soul, as if the means of expression were ahead of the inspiration. But always, so far, he has succeeded in mastering his own progressive ideas, so that his inspiration regains its due prominence; his invention, his ideas, become such that they need just those novel ways of expression. Thus the balance is restored, the basis is found which might be sufficient for a whole series of years. But his restless mind is not content with the result thus gained; he does not care to rest on his laurels; in his next work he is urged forward to try something new. Again he begins experimenting, his fertile mind finds new technical devices, and before long his creative imagination is enflamed, he breathes naturally in the new atmosphere.

Busoni's art has often been critised by superficial observers as being too intellectual, too cool, somewhat soulless. This criticism I consider altogether unjust. He is "problematic," no doubt, because he is in advance of the standard of the day. But his music ceases to be problematic as soon as his listeners have become familiar with his way of expression. He has written some eloquent words on feeling and emotion in his "Sketch of a New Esthetic of Music," and I quote a few of these sentences at the end of this essay, because they throw light on his ideas of art:

"In art, feeling is held to be the highest moral qualification. In music, however, feeling requires two consorts, taste and style. Now, in life, one encounters real taste as seldom as deep and true feeling; as for style, it is a province of art. 'Feeling' is generally understood to mean tenderness, pathos, and extravagance of expression. But how much more does the marvellous flower 'Emotion' unfold! Restraint and forbearance, renunciation, power, activity, patience, magnanimity, joyousness, and that all-controlling intelligence wherein feeling actually takes its rise. What the amateur and the mediocre artist attempt to express, is feeling in little, in detail, for a short stretch. Feeling on a grand scale is mistaken by the amateur, the semi-artist, the public (and the critics, too, unhappily) for a want of emotion, because they all are unable to hear the longer reaches as parts of a yet more extended whole. Feeling, therefore, is likewise economy. Hence, I distinguish feeling as Taste, as Style, as Economy. Each a whole in itself, and each one-third of the whole. Within and over them rules a subjective trinity: Temperament, Intelligence and the instinct of Equipoise. These six carry on a dance of such subtility in the choice of partners and intertwining of figures, in the bearing and the being borne, in advancing and curtseying, in motion and repose, that no loftier height of artistry is conceivable."

om HERALD

ddress: New York City

ate

BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

Despite the storm Carnegie Hall was crowded last night for the Boston Symphony concert.

A spirit of comedy disproved the notion that austerity is characteristic of a Boston Orchestra programme. There was fun in the overture to "Le Nozze di Figaro," wit and drollery in the overture to "The Bartered Bride." Beethoven's eighth symphony, too, is full of merry cheer. Any one of these numbers would put an audience into good humor. The delicacy, the archness, the light-hearted and vivacity with which they were played made gay optimists of all present. As a master of comedy, Dr. Karl Muck in his sparkling performances might rank with moliere or aristophanes.

The Beethoven symphony was superbly played. All the precious qualities of the orchestra came to the fore in the scherando and particularly in the allegro vivace. Exquisite in tone coloring, fir mand vigorous in rhythm, plastic in phrasing, Dr. Muck's reading evoked much praise. The overture to "The Bartered Bride" was taken at a breathless tempo.

In the rarely played Reger variations and fugue on a merry theme by Hiller, the harmonization was rich and colorful. The technical resource of Reger—there were eleven variations—compelled admiration. The interweaving of melody with contra puntal elaborations was not only skilful but interesting, a quality not always associated with Reger. Dr. Muck's reading was noteworthy for its clarity and wealth of orchestral coloring. After it there was a great demonstration.

From the Traveler Feb. 10, 1917.

Not for many moons has a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra afforded more plesaure than that of yesterday afternoon. Dr. Muck was particularly happy in his choice of numbers, and as added attractions there was the chorus of women's voices from the ranks of the Musical Art Society and Choral Music Society and Heinrich Gebhard, pianist, as soloist. The program was: Busoni, Suite from the music for Gozzi's play "Turandot"; Cesar Franck, Symphonic Variations for piano and orchestra; Strauss, Burleske for piano and orchestra; Smetana, overture to "The Sold Bride."

The Busoni Suite was given here in its entirety for the first time and was played as probably no other orchestra in the world could play it. The selection affords grand opportunities for the various choirs of the orchestra and these choirs made the most of them. Notably fine was the work of Mr. Neumann with his array of "kettles." The comparatively small part falling to the women's chorus was in keeping with the high standard of their organization. Fortunate is Dr. Muck to have such talent as Mr. Townsend's singers to draw upon.

Mr. Gebhard, ever heard with pleasure, is never so much in his element as when playing as soloist with this orchestra.

Enthusiasm ran high throughout the afternoon.

[84]

From the Advertiser Feb. 10, 1917.

"TURANDOT" AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Work by Busoni, Dedicated t Dr. Muck, Given in Its Entirety

ENTIRELY MODERN PROGRA[M] GIVEN

Music of International Char acter—Mr. Gebhardt Is the Soloist

By LOUIS C. ELSON

Program.

Busoni. Suite for Orchestra. "Turandot."
Franck. Symphonis Variations for Pian and Orchestra.
Strauss. Burleske, for Piano and Orchestra
Smetana. "The Sold Bride" Overture.
Pianist, Mr. Heinrich Gebhardt.

Italian, Belgian, German and Bohemian were the nationalities presented in this most modern program, and it showed the international character of music that no one could have discovered the nation of origin of any of the works save by consulting the program-book, except possibly in the case of the ponderous Burleske.

Busoni is an Italian, but even when masquerading as a Chinaman, as in the "Turandot" Suite, he might be judged a disciple and countryman of Reger. Six years ago we heard part of this suite, when the composer himself was present. Now Dr. Muck, to whom the work is dedicated, determined to give the composition in its entirety.

The present suite is not in the least akin to the music which Weber and Reissiger evolved from Schiller's play of "Turandot." (Schiller took his plot from Gozzi, the Italian). Weber went at once to original sources and used a Chinese melody for the substratum of his numbers, beginning his overture with it. Busoni also used Oriental melodies, but he idealizes them grandly. One finds the atmosphere of Oriental music, sometimes a touch of the pentatonic scale, which is the foundation of Chineses music, as Debussy's six-note scale is the essence of Siamese music; but the composer does not attempt a servile imitation, which would only have failed, but allows his imagination to suggest the Chinese phases of "Turandot, Princess of China." But he gives all the strongly rhythmic effects which are present in Oriental music, and he employs every possible kind of drum almost continuously.

It seems to us even more than that; it is one of the great triumphs of modern tone-coloring. By many this suite is considered Busoni's best work. It is of course scored for an extensive orchestra, but has not the prolixity of many modern scores. It may be considered a fault that there are four marches in the seven movements, but these marches are of different emotional content, all the way from a funeral march to a Marcia Grottesca. There is much that is bizarre in the composition and almost every part of it is exotic.

The first movement, "The Execution, the City Gate, Taking Leave," is sinister enough. A Masso Ostinato with wailing phrases above it and a very quaint bit of ascending and descending scale work at the close make a very original introduction to the subject; and the little drum begins what Falstaff would have call d "damnable iteration "even from the first.

The second movement, "Truffaldino," is grotesque. Here we have a march which is oddly scored, the wind instruments only against all kinds of drums, and bells and triangle. There is a thin, acid quality achieved here, and a constant bustle that speaks of a chattering busybody.

The third movement is a march of wholly different character; it ushers in the Emperor, and is appropriately solemn, even bombastic. But the fourth movement is the gem of the work, a picture of the Princess. It is another march, but so different from the preceding two that it seems as if Busoni had purposely set himself to show what variety he could achieve within a limited form. Majesty, caprice, tenderness, passion, are all displayed in this character sketch. Yet there is fascinating melody to be found here, and some good canonic writing too, but the difficult rythmic changes make the melodic effects anything but restful, and there is a degree of clatter on all kinds of percussive instruments, so that we may not forget that we are in China. We had enough drum playing in this to last us a year.

No. 5 is a picture of the Women's Palace, and here we get some contrasted delicacy, although kettle-drums and triangle still pulsate softly, but harp and flute are in the foreground, with some telling trumpet phrases. There is a certain soft voluptuousness attained here that is well suited to the subject.

Now follows an Oriental Dance and Song (No. 6), which carries on this sensuous, languid style and has a very bright chorus for female voices as its central episode. This chorus was well sung by female members of Mr. Stephen S. Townsend's Choral Music Society and Musical Art Club, and the short passages was creditable to the singers and to Mr. Townsend, who had trained them. The chorus in upon an Arabian theme and pictures night changing to day, and love changing from absence to reunion and happiness.

After so much of marching and Oriental dancing it was quite a good contrast to have a Waltz. No. 7 was a waltz that Strauss (Johann, this time, not Richard) would have disowned, for it was weird and sombre, with much work for the deep wind instruments, as if the waltz had taken place while there was a corpse in the house, or at least a funeral next door.

No. 8 began in the same lugubrious manner, but it had warrant for doing so, since it was a funeral march, but now a charming surprise came in as a bright and joyous theme, began opposing the gloom and finally overcame it, so that the work ended very cheerily and triumphantly, a jolly "Alla Turca" movement and much more Turkish than Beethoven or Mozart ever succeeded in being. If this music could be heard in connection with Gozzi's play it would be even more wonderful, far it fits it like a glove. But as it was, it scored a triumph, for it was superbly read by Dr. Muck and awakened very great enthusiasm. The orchestra deserves several fonts of laudatory adjectives all printed in red ink.

We have dwelt so long upon the new and most important work by Busoni that we must be somewhat less detailed in speaking of Mr. Gebhardt and the compositions in which he appeared. He did not give a concerto but made "small change" by offering two orchestral works with piano obbligato instead. The Franck variations are very brilliant and interesting, which is not often the case when a very learned composer gets at variation work. The theme is attractive in itself, and the variations are as much in the nature of real thematic development as formal variations. Mr. Gebhardt showed himself a valuable ensemble player and paid more attention to the general effect than to displaying himself unduly.

The variations too, are intrinsically beautiful, therefore the work won a great success in spite of coming after Busoni's masterpiece, and Mr. Gebhardt was most vehemently recalled several times. He was equally artistic in the Strauss Burleske, but Strauss did not shine by the side of the more modest Franck.

In the first place the Burleske is too long; in the next place we need a guidebook to show us where the "burlesque" comes in. It may have been in the display of the kettle-drum, for that instrument begins the work by playing an entire melodic phrase quite alone, and ends the work with other phrases and an unaccompanied note. But Meyerbeer did more than this for the kettle-drum in "Robert le Diable," where he gave an entire march as a solo on the instrument, and he did not claim it to be burlesque either.

There was also a duet between the kettle-drum and the piano, and the kettle-drummer ought to have shared the honors which were given to Mr. Gebhardt. He certainly played excellently throughout. There is also some striking bassoon work in the piece, and here too praise may be given. But we can find as much fun in a volume of the Congressional Record or in the city directory, as in this Burleske, and it is as long as if Strauss were an after-dinner speaker who knows that he is making a failure and therefore keeps on and on, hoping that he may chance to make a hit somewhere, . . . a hit that never comes.

Mr. Gebhardt's splendid playing, however, deserves all praise. He overcame many difficulties, in the most self-contained manner possible. Few of the auditors realized what a herculean task he had accompli ed. He was called and recalled nevertheless, and with a great show of enthusiasm, after each work, even after the depressing Burleske. We cannot imagine why Dr. Muck should have chosen two compositions each full of drum effects. Perhaps he wishes to train patriotic Americans to follow the drum.

Then came the chattering, brisk, contrapuntal Smetana Overture, which showed what musical fun might be like, in the classical forms, and emphasized the solemnity of the humor of Strauss. Yet we must remember that this same composer, who has failed in his Burlesque, created the greatest piece of modern orchestral humor—"Till Eulenspiegel."

---

rom PUBLIC LEDGER

ddress: Philadelphia,

ate Feb 13

DR. MUCK DESERVES PRAISE FOR PROGRAM

Boston Orchestra Leader Shows Critics of His Previous Lists He Knows a Thing or Two

Critics here and at home in the Hub who have cried "monotony" and other things at the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this and last season were answered by Dr. Karl Muck last night in the fourth concert of the thirty-second Philadelphia series, which brought out the band's faithful clientele to the capacity of the Academy of Music. Mr. Stokowski could not figure out a more varied and better proportioned list than that which included for symphonic piece de resistance Beethoven's eighth; for solo number, Bruch's fantasia on Scotch airs, with Anton Witek, the distinguished-looking and distinguished concertmeister of the organization, as executant, and the Smetana "Bartered Bride" overture and the Strauss symphonic poem, "Don Juan," as complementary numbers.

The performance was invariably one of beautiful mechanics and generally of beautiful art. The metriculous precision of the physical movements of the fiddlers in the forepart of the stage picture was one to win the eye, and the exact evaluation of each note captivated the ear with its nicety. Here in everything was the perfection of a Greek statue in contour, but it was often as marmoreally cold as a Pheidian masterpiece. There was none of the rapturous romance of a Benevenuto Cellini. Greek gods in marble, established on Olympus in dignified estate, not Greek gods, the young and beautiful gods, roaming and wantoning as in the days when myths were vital—this comparison torn from one of Music's sister arts still characterizes the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Doctor Muck.

Momentarily, while Mr. Witek played, there was added an individuality and distinctiveness that took the band out of its olassic calm. The Bruch fantasy, seldom played here and if memory serves aright last done by Kathleen Parlow, is undoubtedly the masterwork of its octogenarian composer. In the familiar G minor concerto and in the symphonies Bruch is a master of counterpoint, but lacking in inventiveness. He is not inspired in them. In all the range of his work there is a deficiency of subjective inspiration. When, however as in this work of last night, he has objective inspiration, he can achieve marvelous effects. Mr. Witek showed these effects at their best. His playing was masterly, never exuberant, but vivid even in its continence.

The Smetana was played sheerly as lovely music. There was no comic feeling, no tang of the soil such as befitted racy folk music. It was all romantic "national" music seen through Mozartean glasses.

The early Strauss, the opus number of Don Juan is twenty, no longer contains shock even for a conservative Boston Symphony Orchestra. Stravinsky and Scriabine and others have relegated what was once a musical sensation of the classics, almost. It is not music temperamentally adapted to Doctor Muck or the training he has given his orchestra. Last night's performances will breed no lasting memories.

But in Beethoven the Boston Orchestra was in its element. Possibly some of the midwestern bands would do this late Beethoven with more elan—and crassly by that token. The Boston Orchestra has other ideas about Beethoven. It regards him as a classic of form as well as a classic of time. The thought of Doctor Muck's performance of the Eighth will abide.

W. R. M.

---

m ress: New York City

FEB 10/17

DAMROSCH CHANGES PROGRAM IN COURTESY TO BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Will Not Play Reger's Variations to Avoid Conflict of Numbers.

The Symphony Society of New York had announced the performance of Max Reger's "Varjations on a Theme by Hiller" for its concerts of February 16 and 18. The management has just learned that this work will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the evening of February 15, and in deference to the visiting orchestra, feels that the performances by the Symphoney Society should be postponed. Consequently the program for the concerts of February 16 and 18 will be as follows:

1. Tragic Overture.....Brahms
2. Symphony No. 1 in B Flat.....Schumann
3. Concerto for Piano with Orchestra in D Minor.....Mozart

Ossip Gabrilowitsch.

4. Symphonic Poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale" Saint-Saens
5. Concertstueck for Piano with Orchestra. Weber

Ossip Gabrilowitsch.

[85]

From the Globe Feb. 10, 1917.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

"Turandot" Suite First Time Complete

Mr Gebhard Soloist In Franck's Variations and Strauss Burlesque

Dr Muck and the orchestra gave a performance even of unusual brilliance yesterday. Busoni's suite for orchestra from music to Gozzi's "Turandot" was played complete for the first time in Boston. Of the eight numbers, 1, 2, 4 and 8 had been played in Mr Fiedler's day.

The score is dedicated to Dr Muck. It is based upon the story of the proud, passionate and beautiful Chinese Princess Turandot, who invites woocrs, but demands that the accepted shall guess correctly three riddles she will propound, with his head as forfeit for his failure. Kalaf, a foreign Prince, although a good guesser and socially eligible to the best Chinese society, is denied his reward by the capricious Turandot. Like a gentleman, he will waive his claim if the Princess will guess his real name.

One night carelessly exclaiming "O, un happy Kalaf," in his sleep, he betrays his secret, but the triumph of the Princess yields to the love she will no longer conceal and all ends with rejoicing.

From Oriental Sources

There is surprise at finding the scholastic Mr Busoni, a herculean pianist in black and white, a fashioner of ponderous and noisy transcriptions for the piano from music Bach intended to be played on the organ, engaged now in a study in colors upon this Oriental conceit. He has said that in choice of themes he has drawn upon Oriental sources other than China.

Judging from performances by Chinese men and women singers and players upon instruments, their folk song literature would not be of great service to the Occidental. There is more often the suggestion of a more sensuous Orientalism, a thing which a Russian named Rimsky-Korsakoff did far better.

The idea of elemental rhythm, making the tam-tam and drums share great responsibility in the orchestra, is worked diligently. Its expression is the most primitive in the musical evolution.

There are characterizations of the doddering eunuch, and of the pompous Emperor. The haughty young Princess is not to be mistaken. The sixth number of dance and song has little character in the music for the women's voices, which was well sung by members from the choruses of the Musical Art Club and Choral Music Society. The closing festivities have the note of barbarous splendor, as the opening number did of severed heads with ghastly grin.

Franck's Variations

Cesar Franck's symphonic variations for piano and orchestra are too fine in structure, too much of interior beauty rather than display, for popular favor or frequent performance. In one movement, they are to short to take the place of a concerto. Mr Heinrich Gebhard, the soloist of the week, surpassed himself in this music. There was spirituality, a keen sense of its inwardness, a luminous technic and admirable proportion.

It would indeed be an extraordinary pianist who could compass this music of deepest perceptions, and the amiably superficial bombast of Strauss' youthful Burleske in which the piano is as a member of the orchestra; a score much overdeveloped for its inherent ideas, but with a stimulating assumption, a certain garish exterior. Here a style more bold, more obvious, more daring with abandon less carefully and sensitively considered would have been truer to the vein.

The closing performance of Smetana's overture to his "Sold Bride" was challenging in its breath-taking pace. Yet what clearness in the upper strings in the whirlwind fugue. The slower vibration of the contrabass tone reasonably would make its figure acoustically blurred at such a tempo. The whole piece sparkled with the spirit of comedy.

rom SUN

ddress: Baltimore, Md.

FEB 11

FRIEDBERG SOLOIST BOSTON SYMPHONY

CARL FRIEDBERG, the gifted and eminent pianist, who has appeared with success a number of times this season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and with Fritz Kreisler, will be the soloist at the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Lyric Theatre Wednesday evening, February 14. Mr. Friedberg will play Schumann's concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in A minor.

The symphony will be the first (that in E minor) of the Finnish composer, Sibelius. This is in many respects the most characteristic work of this very remarkable composer. Sibelius has originality of imagination and individuality of method. In one sense his music is exceedingly personal in that it is so completely an expression of his own individuality.

There will be but three numbers on the program. The first will be the Sibelius symphony, then will come the Schumann concerto. The last number will be the introduction and bacchanale from the Paris version of "Tannhauser."

It will be remembered that when Wagner prepared "Tannhauser" for its first performance in Paris in 1861 he elided the coda of the overture and greatly enlarged the first scene of the opera in order to make way for the remarkable ballet which is generally known as the "Bacchanale." In this version the overture runs right into the music of the first scene without a break.

NORTH AMERICAN

s: Philadelphia, Pa.

Feb 13/17

FOURTH CONCERT GIVEN BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Dr. Karl Muck and His Men Present Satisfying Program

ANTON WITEK SOLOIST

TO music lovers, the program of the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given at the Academy of Music last night, was absolutely satisfying. Added to the perfection of interpretative genius and an orchestra which responded as one man to his every variation of expression, Dr. Karl Muck gave for good measure a program so carefully chosen that there was nothing to mar the evening's pleasure.

Every selection was full enough of melody to satisfy the amateur. For the technical musician, the numbers were full of passages delightfully executed. From the overture to the "Sold Bride," by Smetana, to the symphony number 8, in F major, by Beethoven, the audience sat spellbound.

Perhaps the greatest treat of the evening was the masterly playing of Anton Witek, concertmaster of the orchestra, who was the soloist in Bruch's Fantasia on Scottish airs, for violin and orchestra. Developed from four simple Scottish folk melodies, "Auld Robert Morris," "There Was a Lad," "Who'll Buy My Caller Herring" and "Scots Wha Hae Wi' Wallace Bled," the fantasia brings out the spirit of the music, and of the Scotch characteristics, in strains now unearthly sweet and again filled with the rugged mirth of the Highlands.

Witek's perfection of technique was overshadowed by his power of interpreting the spirit of the music, and of carrying his audience with him wherever he wished to take it. The program also included a tone-poem by Richard Strauss, "Don Juan," a virile, unusual presentation of one of the most popular themes for composers. Altho like no other "Don Juan," the tone-poem, which was after Nicolaus Lenau, stirred the imagination and satisfied the ear.

From the Journal Feb. 10, 1917

SYMPHONY GIVES UNUSUAL CONCERT

Gebhard and a Chorus of Women Assist—Brilliant Performance.

This week's Symphony program is noteworthy for its unconventional makeup and for its employment of a Boston soloist, Heinrich Gebhard, the pianist, and a female chorus from two resident organizations, the Musical Art Club and the Choral Music Society.

Three of the four numbers on the program are unfamiliar. The first, a suite comprising the music written by Ferruccio Busoni for an old fairy play, "Turandot," is offered in its entirety for the first time here. "Turandot" is an Oriental story by Gozzi, an Italian dramatist who flourished in the eighteeth century. It was presented, in pantomimic form, at one of the Boston theatres several years ago in the vivid, poetical style of production devised by Reinhardt.

Busoni's music is intellectualy and technically impressive, as always, and the authenticity of the Oriental themes that he employs is vouched for, but the fact that the suite is tragic in mood, for most part, must for the present militate against its popularity. Nevertheless, it is one of the most interesting of the twentieth century orchestral works, and its superb performance yesterday was roundly applauded. The chorus did its little part well indeed, and Dr. Muck insisted that all should share the ovation with him.

Ceasar Franck's "Variations Symphoniques" and Richard Strauss' "Burleske" are the two pieces calling for soloist. Both have long been absent from Symphony programs. Mr. Gebhard's performance was brilliant.

The concert, which will be repeated tonight, closes with a performance of the popular Smetana overture, "The Sold Bride."

From the Adcertiser Feb. 10, 1917.

"TURANDOT" AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Work by Busoni, Dedicated t Dr. Muck, Given in Its Entirety

ENTIRELY MODERN PROGRA[M] GIVEN

Music of International Char acter—Mr. Gebhardt Is the Soloist

By LOUIS C. ELSON

Program.

Busoni. Suite for Orchestra. "Turandot."
Franck. Symphonis Variations for Pian and Orchestra.
Strauss. Burleske, for Piano and Orchestra
Smetana. "The Sold Bride" Overture.
Pianist, Mr. Heinrich Gebhardt.

Italian, Belgian, German and Bohemian were the nationalities presented in this most modern program, and it showed the international character of music that no one could have discovered the nation of origin of any of the works save by consulting the program-book, except possibly in the case of the ponderous Burleske.

Busoni is an Italian, but even when masquerading as a Chinaman, as in the "Turandot" Suite, he might be judged a disciple and countryman of Reger. Six years ago we heard part of this suite, when the composer himself was present. Now Dr. Muck, to whom the work is dedicated, determined to give the composition in its entirety.

The present suite is not in the least akin to the music which Weber and Reissiger evolved from Schiller's play of "Turandot." (Schiller took his plot from Gozzi, the Italian). Weber went at once to original sources and used a Chinese melody for the substratum of his numbers, beginning his overture with it. Busoni also used Oriental melodies, but he idealizes them grandly. One finds the atmosphere of Oriental music, sometimes a touch of the pentatonic scale, which is the foundation of Chineses music, as Debussy's six-note scale is the essence of Siamese music; but the composer does not attempt a servile imitation, which would only have failed, but allows his imagination to suggest the Chinese phases of "Turandot, Princess of China." But he gives all the strongly rhythmic effects which are present in Oriental music, and he employs every possible kind of drum almost continuously.

It seems to us even more than that; it is one of the great triumphs of modern tone-coloring. By many this suite is considered Busoni's best work. It is of course scored for an extensive orchestra, but has not the prolixity of many modern scores. It may be considered a fault that there are four marches in the seven movements, but these marches are of different emotional content, all the way from a funeral march to a Marcia Grottesca. There is much that is bizarre in the composition and almost every part of it is exotic.

The first movement, "The Execution, the City Gate, Taking Leave," is sinister enough. A Masso Ostinato with wailing phrases above it and a very quaint bit of ascending and descending scale work at the close make a very original introduction to the subject; and the little drum begins what Falstaff would have cal' d "damnable iteration "even from the first.

The second movement, "Truffaldino," is grotesque. Here we have a march which is oddly scored, the wind instruments only against all kinds of drums, and bells and triangle. There is a thin, acid quality achieved here, and a constant bustle that speaks of a chattering busybody.

The third movement is a march of wholly different character; it ushers in the Emperor, and is appropriately solemn, even bombastic. But the fourth movement is the gem of the work, a picture of the Princess. It is another march, but so different from the preceding two that it seems as if Busoni had purposely set himself to show what variety he could achieve within a limited form. Majesty, caprice, tenderness, passion, are all displayed in this character sketch. Yet there is fascinating melody to be found here, and some good canonic writing too, but the difficult rythmic changes make the melodic effects anything but restful, and there is a degree of clatter on all kinds of percussive instrumenta, so that we may not forget that we are in China. We had enough drum playing in this to last us a year.

No. 5 is a picture of the Women's Palace, and here we get some contrasted delicacy, although kettle-drums and triangle still pulsate softly; but harp and flute are in the foreground, with some telling trumpet phrases. There is a certain soft voluptuousness attained here that is well suited to the subject.

Now follows an Oriental Dance and Song (No. 6), which carries on this sensuous, languid style and has a very bright chorus for female voices as its central episode. This chorus was well sung by female members of Mr. Stephen S. Townsend's Choral Music Society and Musical Art Club, and the short passages was creditable to the singers and to Mr. Townsend, who had trained them. The chorus in upon an Arabian theme and pictures night changing to day, and love changing from absence to reunion and happiness.

After so much of marching and Oriental dancing it was quite a good contrast to have a Waltz. No. 7 was a waltz that Strauss (Johann, this time, not Richard) would have disowned, for it was weird and sombre, with much work for the deep wind instruments, as if the waltz had taken place while there was a corpse in the house, or at least a funeral next door.

No. 8 began in the same lugubrious manner, but it had warrant for doing so, since it was a funeral march, but now a charming surprise came in as a bright and joyous theme, began opposing the gloom and finally overcame it, so that the work ended very cheerily and triumphantly, a jolly "Alla Turca" movement and much more Turkish than Beethoven or Mozart ever succeeded in being. If this music could be heard in connection with Gozzi's play it would be even more wonderful, far it fits it like a glove. But as it was, it scored a triumph, for it was superbly read by Dr. Muck and awakened very great enthusiasm. The orchestra deserves several fonts of laudatory adjectives all printed in red ink.

We have dwelt so long upon the new and most important work by Busoni that we must be somewhat less detailed in speaking of Mr. Gebhardt and the compositions in which he appeared. He did not give a concerto but made "small change" by offering two orchestral works with piano obbligato instead. The Franck variations are very brilliant and interesting, which is not often the case when a very learned composer gets at variation work. The theme is attractive in itself, and the variations are as much in the nature of real thematic development as formal variations. Mr. Gebhardt showed himself a valuable ensemble player and paid more attention to the general effect than to displaying himself unduly.

The variations too, are intrinsically beautiful, therefore the work won a great success in spite of coming after Busoni's masterpiece, and Mr. Gebhardt was most vehemently recalled several times. He was equally artistic in the Strauss Burleske, but Strauss did not shine by the side of the more modest Franck.

In the first place the Burleske is too long; in the next place we need a guidebook to show us where the "burlesque" comes in. It may have been in the display of the kettle-drum, for that instrument begins the work by playing an entire melodic phrase quite alone, and ends the work with other phrases and an unaccompanied note. But Meyerbeer did more than this for the kettle-drum in "Robert le Diable," where he gave an entire march as a solo on the instrument, and he did not claim it to be burlesque either.

There was also a duet between the kettle-drum and the piano, and the kettle-drummer ought to have shared the honors which were given to Mr. Gebhardt. He certainly played excellently throughout. There is also some striking bassoon work in the piece, and here too praise may be given. But we can find as much fun in a volume of the Congressional Record or in the city directory, as in this Burleske, and it is as long as if Strauss were an after-dinner speaker who knows that he is making a failure and therefore keeps on and on, hoping that he may chance to make a hit somewhere, . . . a hit that never comes.

Mr. Gebhardt's splendid playing, however, deserves all praise. He overcame many difficulties, in the most self-contained manner possible. Few of the auditors realized what a herculean task he had accompli ed. He was called and recalled nevertheless, and with a great show of enthusiasm, after each work, even after the depressing Burleske. We cannot imagine why Dr. Muck should have chosen two compositions each full of drum effects. Perhaps he wishes to train patriotic Americans to follow the drum.

Then came the chattering, brisk, contrapuntal Smetana Overture, which showed what musical fun might be like, in the classical forms, and emphasized the solemnity of the humor of Strauss. Yet we must remember that this same composer, who has failed in his Burlesque, created the greatest piece of modern orchestral humor—"Till Eulenspiegel."

---

rom PUBLIC LEDGER

ddress: Philadelphia,

ate Feb. 13/17

DR. MUCK DESERVES PRAISE FOR PROGRAM

Boston Orchestra Leader Shows Critics of His Previous Lists He Knows a Thing or Two

Critics here and at home in the Hub who have cried "monotony" and other things at the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this and last season were answered by Dr. Karl Muck last night in the fourth concert of the thirty-second Philadelphia series, which brought out the band's faithful clientele to the capacity of the Academy of Music. Mr. Stokowski could not figure out a more varied and better proportioned list than that which included for symphonic piece de resistance Beethoven's eighth; for solo number, Bruch's fantasia on Scotch airs, with Anton Witek, the distinguished-looking and distinguished concertmeister of the organization, as executant, and the Smetana "Bartered Bride" overture and the Strauss symphonic poem, "Don Juan," as complementary numbers.

The performance was invariably one of beautiful mechanics and generally of beautiful art. The metriculous precision of the physical movements of the fiddlers in the forepart of the stage picture was one to win the eye, and the exact evaluation of each note captivated the ear with its nicety. Here in everything was the perfection of a Greek statue in contour, but it was often as marmoreally cold as a Pheidian masterpiece. There was none of the rapturous romance of a Benevenuto Cellini. Greek gods in marble, established on Olympus in dignified estate, not Greek gods, the young and beautiful gods, roaming and wantoning as in the days when myths were vital—this comparison torn from one of Music's sister arts still characterizes the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Doctor Muck.

Momentarily, while Mr. Witek played, there was added an individuality and distinctiveness that took the band out of its classic calm. The Bruch fantasy, seldom played here and if memory serves aright last done by Kathleen Parlow, is undoubtedly the masterwork of its octogenarian composer. In the familiar G minor concerto and in the symphonies Bruch is a master of counterpoint, but lacking in inventiveness. He is not inspired in them. In all the range of his work there is a deficiency of subjective inspiration. When, however as in this work of last night, he has objective inspiration, he can achieve marvelous effects. Mr. Witek showed these effects at their best. His playing was masterly, never exuberant, but vivid even in its continence.

The Smetana was played sheerly as lovely music. There was no comic feeling, no tang of the soil such as befitted racy folk music. It was all romantic "national" music seen through Mozartean glasses.

The early Strauss, the opus number of Don Juan is twenty, no longer contains shock even for a conservative Boston Symphony Orchestra. Stravinsky and Scriabine and others have relegated what was once a musical sensation of the classics, almost. It is not music temperamentally adapted to Doctor Muck or the training he has given his orchestra. Last night's performances will breed no lasting memories.

But in Beethoven the Boston Orchestra was in its element. Possibly some of the midwestern bands would do this late Beethoven with more elan—and crassly by that token. The Boston Orchestra has other ideas about Beethoven. It regards him as a classic of form as well as a classic of time. The thought of Doctor Muck's performance of the Eighth will abide.

W. R. M.

---

m

ress: New York City

DEC 10/16

DAMROSCH CHANGES PROGRAM IN COURTESY TO BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Will Not Play Reger's Variations to Avoid Conflict of Numbers.

The Symphony Society of New York had announced the performance of Max Reger's "Varjations on a Theme by Hiller" for its concerts of February 16 and 18. The management has just learned that this work will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the evening of February 15, and in deference to the visiting orchestra, feels that the performances by the Symphoney Society should be postponed. Consequently the program for the concerts of February 16 and 18 will be as follows:

1. Tragic Overture.....Brahms
2. Symphony No. 1 in B Flat.....Schumann
3. Concerto for Piano with Orchestra in D Minor.....Mozart
   Ossip Gabrilowitsch.
4. Symphonic Poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale" Saint-Saens
5. Concertstueck for Piano with Orchestra. Weber
   Ossip Gabrilowitsch.

85

From the Globe Feb.10,1917.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

"Turandot" Suite First Time Complete

Mr Gebhard Soloist in Franck's Variations and Strauss Burlesque

Dr Muck and the orchestra gave a performance even of unusual brilliance yesterday. Busoni's suite for orchestra from music to Gozzi's "Turandot" was played complete for the first time in Boston. Of the eight numbers, 1, 2, 4 and 8 had been played in Mr Fiedler's day.

The score is dedicated to Dr Muck. It is based upon the story of the proud, passionate and beautiful Chinese Princess Turandot, who invites wooers, but demands that the accepted shall guess correctly three riddles she will propound, with his head as forfeit for his failure. Kalaf, a foreign Prince, although a good guesser and socially eligible to the best Chinese society, is denied his reward by the capricious Turandot. Like a gentleman, he will waive his claim if the Princess will guess his real name.

One night carelessly exclaiming "O, un happy Kalaf," in his sleep, he betrays his secret, but the triumph of the Princess yields to the love she will no longer conceal and all ends with rejoicing.

From Oriental Sources

There is surprise at finding the scholastic Mr Busoni, a herculean pianist in black and white, a fashioner of ponderous and noisy transcriptions for the piano from music Bach intended to be played on the organ, engaged now in a study in colors upon this Oriental conceit. He has said that in choice of themes he has drawn upon Oriental sources other than China.

Judging from performances by Chinese men and women singers and players upon instruments, their folk song literature would not be of great service to the Occidental. There is more often the suggestion of a more sensuous Orientalism, a thing which a Russian named Rimsky-Korsakoff did far better.

The idea of elemental rhythm, making the tam-tam and drums share great responsibility in the orchestra, is worked diligently. Its expression is the most primitive in the musical evolution.

There are characterizations of the doddering eunuch, and of the pompous Emperor. The haughty young Princess is not to be mistaken. The sixth number of dance and song has little character in the music for the women's voices, which was well sung by members from the choruses of the Musical Art Club and Choral Music Society. The closing festivities have the note of barbarous splendor, as the opening number did of severed heads with ghastly grin.

Franck's Variations

Cesar Franck's symphonic variations for piano and orchestra are too fine in structure, too much of interior beauty rather than display, for popular favor or frequent performance. In one movement, they are to short to take the place of a concerto. Mr Heinrich Gebhard, the soloist of the week, surpassed himself in this music. There was spirituality, a keen sense of its inwardness, a luminous technic and admirable proportion.

It would indeed be an extraordinary pianist who could compass this music of deepest perceptions, and the amiably superficial bombast of Strauss' youthful Burleske in which the piano is as a member of the orchestra; a score much overdeveloped for its inherent ideas, but with a stimulating assumption, a certain garish exterior. Here a style more bold, more obvious, more daring with abandon less carefully and sensitively considered would have been truer to the vein.

The closing performance of Smetana's overture to his "Sold Bride" was challenging in its breath-taking pace. Yet what clearness in the upper strings in the whirlwind fugue. The slower vibration of the contrabass tone reasonably would make its figure acoustically blurred at such a tempo. The whole piece sparkled with the spirit of comedy.

rom SUN

ddress: Baltimore, Md.

FEB 11

FRIEDBERG SOLOIST BOSTON SYMPHONY

CARL FRIEDBERG, the gifted and eminent pianist, who has appeared with success a number of times this season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and with Fritz Kreisler, will be the soloist at the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the Lyric Theatre Wednesday evening, February 14. Mr. Friedberg will play Schumann's concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in A minor.

The symphony will be the first (that in E minor) of the Finnish composer, Sibelius. This is in many respects the most characteristic work of this very remarkable composer. Sibelius has originality of imagination and individuality of method. In one sense his music is exceedingly personal in that it is so completely an expression of his own individuality.

There will be but three numbers on the program. The first will be the Sibelius symphony, then will come the Schumann concerto. The last number will be the introduction and bacchanale from the Paris version of "Tannhauser."

It will be remembered that when Wagner prepared "Tannhauser" for its first performance in Paris in 1861 he elided the coda of the overture and greatly enlarged the first scene of the opera in order to make way for the remarkable ballet which is generally known as the "Bacchanale." In this version the overture runs right into the music of the first scene without a break.

NORTH AMERICAN

s: Philadelphia, Pa.

Feb 13/17

FOURTH CONCERT GIVEN BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Dr. Karl Muck and His Men Present Satisfying Program

ANTON WITEK SOLOIST

TO music lovers, the program of the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given at the Academy of Music last night, was absolutely satisfying. Added to the perfection of interpretative genius and an orchestra which responded as one man to his every variation of expression, Dr. Karl Muck gave for good measure a program so carefully chosen that there was nothing to mar the evening's pleasure.

Every selection was full enough of melody to satisfy the amateur. For the technical musician, the numbers were full of passages delightfully executed. From the overture to the "Sold Bride," by Smetana, to the symphony number 8, in F major, by Beethoven, the audience sat spellbound.

Perhaps the greatest treat of the evening was the masterly playing of Anton Witek, concertmaster of the orchestra, who was the soloist in Bruch's Fantasia on Scottish airs, for violin and orchestra. Developed from four simple Scottish folk melodies, "Auld Robert Morris," "There Was a Lad," "Who'll Buy My Caller Herring" and "Scots Wha Hae Wi' Wallace Bled," the fantasia brings out the spirit of the music, and of the Scotch characteristics, in strains now unearthly sweet and again filled with the rugged mirth of the Highlands.

Witek's perfection of technique was overshadowed by his power of interpreting the spirit of the music, and of carrying his audience with him wherever he wished to take it. The program also included a tone-poem by Richard Strauss, "Don Juan," a virile, unusual presentation of one of the most popular themes for composers. Altho like no other "Don Juan," the tone-poem, which was after Nicolaus Lenau, stirred the imagination and satisfied the ear.

From the Journal Feb.10,1917

SYMPHONY GIVES UNUSUAL CONCERT

Gebhard and a Chorus of Women Assist—Brilliant Performance.

This week's Symphony program is noteworthy for its unconventional make-up and for its employment of a Boston soloist, Heinrich Gebhard, the pianist, and a female chorus from two resident organizations, the Musical Art Club and the Choral Music Society.

Three of the four numbers on the program are unfamiliar. The first, a suite comprising the music written by Ferruccio Busoni for an old fairy play, "Turandot," is offered in its entirety for the first time here. "Turandot" is an Oriental story by Gozzi, an Italian dramatist who flourished in the eighteeth century. It was presented, in pantomimic form, at one of the Boston theatres several years ago in the vivid, poetical style of production devised by Reinhardt.

Busoni's music is intellectualy and technically impressive, as always, and the authenticity of the Oriental themes that he employs is vouched for, but the fact that the suite is tragic in mood, for most part, must for the present militate against its popularity. Nevertheless, it is one of the most interesting of the twentieth century orchestral works, and its superb performance yesterday was roundly applauded. The chorus did its little part well indeed, and Dr. Muck insisted that all should share the ovation with him.

Ceasar Franck's "Variations Symphoniques" and Richard Strauss' "Burleske" are the two pieces calling for soloist. Both have long been absent from Symphony programs. Mr. Gebhard's performance was brilliant.

The concert, which will be repeated tonight, closes with a performaneo of the popular Smetana overture, "The Sold Bride."

om TIMES
dress: Washington, D. C. e FEB 11 19

CONCERTS FOR CAPITAL

Musical Treats Provided for Residents and Visitors.

The fourth Boston Symphony concert is to be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon, February 13, at 4:30.

The symphony will be the "Eroica," of Beethoven, the third in the series of nine, and by many considered the noblest of them all.

There will be no soloist, and the program contains a wide variety of interesting music. After the symphony will be played the glittering overture of Smerana, "The Sold Bride." Debussy's exquisite prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan."

The program in its entirety is as follows: Symphony in E flat major, No. 3, "Eroica" (Beethoven); prelude to "The Sold Bride" (Debussy); tone poem; "Don Juan" (Strauss)

RECORD
ss: Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Eighth Symphony of Beethoven. Anton Witek as Soloist.

The fourth concert of the Boston Orchestra's Philadelphia season attracted a capacity audience to the Academy of Music last night. The program comprised Smetana's Overture to "The Bartered Bride;" the Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan," and the Beethoven Eighth Symphony. Anton Witek, concertmeister of the orchestra, appeared as soloist, playing the Bruch Fantasia on Scottish airs. The Strauss work and the Beethoven Symphony naturally were the most interesting and attractive things on the list. The elegance and finish of the Beethoven playing were the most striking features of the performance. Dr. Muck read the symphony with emphasis in the delivery and grace of its style, and succeeded in producing some beautiful and effective orchestration. The Strauss work, with the exception of the exquisite passages for oboe, was taken in a dramatic, temptuous manner, and proved impressive as well as fascinating in its volatile mercurial style.

Witek has done much finer playing than that of last night. The Bruch Fantasie is not a work likely to transport the average musician. The folk airs are well enough in their simple state, but are not improved by elaborate embellishment. Witek frequently played flat, and it was apparent that he was not swayed by the inoperation that usually distinguishes his public work. He was given a great ovation, however, and was recalled many times.

The tuneful "Bartered Bride" overture was much enjoyed.

PUBLIC LEDGER
s: Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY WITH ANTON WITEK

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony Played With Bruch's Scottish Violin Fantasia

PROGRAM

Smetana—Overture to "The Bartered Bride."
Bruch—Fantasia on Scottish Airs.
Strauss—Tone-poem, "Don Juan."
Beethoven—Eighth Symphony.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy last night, which brought out the usual large audience, was of uneven interest and at times the listener was more conscious of the playing than of the music played. Anton Witek, the concertmeister, was the soloist, and instead of awaiting his turn in the gloomy isolation of the green room he chose to play through the overture which preceded his participation as soloist. This fantasia of Bruch's, which elaborates "Auld Robert Morris," "There Was a Lad," "Caller Herrin'" and "Scots Wha Hae," is not Bruch at his best, and Mr. Witek's performance was that of accurate mechanism rather than glowing temperament. The tone flowed purely, albeit in a stream too thin at times, and the player was self-possessed and at ease, but one would have forgotten lapses in technique had there been the compensating dash and fire that make violin playing memorable and distinctive. As it is, a creditable, if not an inspiring, performance is to be recorded.

The Smetana overture went like lightning, the strings, entering fugue-wise, effecting a dizzy tremolo with the smallest possible segment of the middle of the bow. The "Don Juan" music was given with justice to its variegated tone color. The best part of the program, beyond doubt, was the symphony, born in distressful personal circumstances and yet abounding in fun and even frolic. The whole work—which had left the hands of our own orchestra but forty-eight hours before—was admirably performed. The feathery lightness of the finale rivaled that of the deft application of the bows at the outset of the music of Smetana, and the allegretto scherzando was pure, irresistible delight. Instead of being vexed because two performances of this masterwork have been vouchsafed us in so brief a period we might be grateful for the intensified impression of its loveliness.

F. L. W.

Transcript
Feb. 13, 1917,
THE CONCERT-CHRONICLE

WEEK-END PLEASURES OF MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

The Pianists and Franck's Neglected Variations — Mr. Gabrilowitsch as Unflecked and Undistorting Mirror to Chopin—Mr. Bauer in Old Talents and Miss Stanley in New

At the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening, Franck's Symphonic Variations, in which Mr. Gebhard played the piano part more plastically, colorfully and animatedly than he had on Friday afternoon, renewed the impression of music, rarely lovely in contour, motion and substance, rarely fanciful in melodic invention and pianistic or orchestral ornament. The piece dates from 1885; Franck's music began to be known in the United States in the nineties; yet never before had the Symphonic Variations been played at the Symphony Concerts in Boston and only once in any others. As seldom have they had place on the programmes of the orchestras of New York or Chicago and when the conductors there have made room for them, a minor pianist—as the inevitable ranking of virtuosi goes—has almost invariably played them. Now the major pianists are wont to repine at the relatively few concertos they can advisedly play when they appear in orchestral concerts. The fourth and the fifth of Beethoven, Schumann's, the first and the second of Liszt, Tschaikovsky's in B-flat, one or another from Saint-Saëns and the list is done unless the pianist and the conductor agree to the abstruse and symphonic Brahms or to the primitive and playful Mozart. They profess also to be eager for pieces that depart from the form and the moods of the orthodox concerto. Yet not one of them, so far as the records go, seems ever to have taken thought of these Symphonic Variations. There is Mr. Bauer, Franckian specialist as it were; yet never in America has he essayed them. There is Mr. Gabrilowitsch, whose touch, tone, ear and imagination, seem what the doctors call the indicated medium for such music—a pianist, besides, eager for the unfamiliar—yet he plays them not. Mr. Paderewski might kindle to the poetry of Franck's music; Mr. Hofmann could heighten the exquisite fluidity of movement; yet they cling to the orthodox concertos or oblige friends by the playing of pieces forgotten almost before they are ended. Franck's symphony is now a modern classic, firm set in every orchestral repertory in America by the will of the public no less than by the will of the conductor. His Symphonic Variations deserve like place; and it is the obligation of the illustrious pianists to put them there. The liking of the public, by every test of past or present, is assured.

From BULLETIN
Address: Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Anton Witek as Soloist of the Fourth Concert

For its fourth concert of the present season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music last evening, offered nothing that was new and little that was striking. In fact, the symphony, Beethoven's No. 8, in F major, was played here as late as last Friday and Saturday by the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra. Nor can it be said that Dr Muck's program was all that one expects from his splendid organization.

True, there was genuine beauty in the playing of the sparkling passages of the symphony. If anything it was given too musicianly, a little too classically correct, lacking a bit of the shading and the emphasis of personal interpretation, true to form, but cold. Yet there was abundant satisfaction to be found in the playing of the strings, which maintained a high standard of performance throughout the entire evening.

This was noticeably true of the playing of the tone-poem "Don Juan," by Richard Strauss, the most gratifying number on the program. In the sweep of the strings there was a veritable whirlwind of passion, the interplay of the reeds and brasses in the wild love story, its soft strains of longing and its thunderous crashes being given with splendid effect.

Anton Witek, the concert-master of the orchestra, appeared as the soloist in a rendition of Max Bruch's Fantasia on Scottish Folk-melodies. Mr. Witek's playing is masterful in its technique and was well received, but the Bruch composition is not one that calls for any show of emotional feeling, it reaches no depths nor does it call for any great display of skill. The concert opened with an altogether creditable performance of the familiar overture to "The Sold Bride," by Smetana.

From the Monitor Feb. 10, 1917.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The program of the Symphony concerts of Feb. 23 and 24 is announced as follows:

Cherubini, overture, "The Abencerrages"; Brahms, concerto for violin, violoncello and orchestra, in A minor, op. 102 (Anton Witek and Heinrich Warnke, soloists); Mozart, symphony in C major ("Jupiter").

Next week the orchestra will be away on its fourth monthly trip, giving concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn. Anton Witek will be the soloist in Philadelphia; Carl Friedberg in Baltimore and Brooklyn.

AMERICAN
Baltimore, Md.
FEB 11 1917

BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Carl Friedberg, the gifted and eminent pianist, who has appeared with success a number of times this season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and with Fritz Kreisler, will be the soloist at the fourth Boston Symphony concert which will be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, February 14.

Mr. Friedberg will play Schumann's Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in A minor.

The symphony will be the first (that in E minor) of the Finnish composer, Sibelius.

ENQUIRER
ss: Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Its Fourth Concert for the Season at the Academy of Music

The proceedings at the Academy of Music last evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra made its fourth visit to this city for the present season, were not of a kind to require or inspire any extended comment. Only familiar things were included in the programme, which was rendered under Dr. Muck's masterly direction with so much brilliancy of execution, beauty of tone and refinement of manner.

By one of those curious coincidences which are of such frequent occurrence, and of which there have been at least four within the past four months, the symphony was the one by Beethoven No. 8, which was done by the Philadelphia Orchestra last week. This is an exceptionally bright and melodious work, which it was a pleasure to hear, played as it was under Dr. Muck's direction, with so much sharpness of outline and delicacy of detail, but probably those in the audience, of whom there must have been many, who heard the same thing last week, would sooner have heard something else upon the occasion under comment.

Other orchestral numbers were Smetana's overture to his opera of "The Borrowed Bride," which was taken prestissimo with a really wonderful brio, and the "Don Juan" tone poem of Richard Strauss, which was also given by our own orchestra earlier in the season. Mr. Anton Witek, the assisting artist, exhibited his consummate virtuosity in a superb performance of Max Bruch's Fantasia of Scottish Airs for orchestra and violin.

The audience was of the usual fine dimensions and it was not chary of its applause. The next and last of these concerts will be given on Monday evening, March 12.

EVENING TELEGRAM
Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Witek is Soloist with Orchestra at Academy.

Anton Witek, concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appeared as soloist with that organization at the fourth concert of the season, last night, in the Academy of Music. He chose as his medium Bruch's fantasia on Scottish airs, a work with much colorful orchestration as a background and with considerable chance for a display of virtuosity for the soloist, and yet by no means an altogether satisfying work musically.

Witek succeeded in arousing a flattering enthusiasm in the audience. They were evidently predisposed to be friendly because of their long acquaintance with the man at the first stand, and his playing obviously carried along this friendly feeling to the end. Disdaining the usual concertmeister's practice of appearing only as soloist while another occupies his chair, Witek played his usual part in the first number, rose and stepped forward for his solo, and then democratically returned to his stand to play through the rest of the program with the orchestra.

Witek's playing is not at all inspired or inspiring, and he has a marked tendency to flat many of his high notes, but he is a thorough musician, and last night displayed both depth of feeling and artistic understanding in his interpretation.

The orchestra, under Dr. Muck, gave an interesting reading of Smetana's familiar "Bartered Bride" overture, and a stirring rendition of the "Don Juan" poem by Strauss. The symphony was Beethoven's eighth, unfortunately the same one given at the two concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra last week. This duplication of selections has taken place several times between the two orchestras, and suggests a lack of good taste on the part of one or the other, quite as though it were a deliberate attempt to force the public to judge between the two organizations. But such judgment is wholly unnecessary. There is ample room for both, and the public would be better served by the presentation of as wide a variety as possible in a short season.

om RECORD
dress: Philadelphia, Pa. FEB 11
te

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAS FINE PROGRAM

Anton Witek, Concert-Master, to Play Bruch's Famous Scotch Fantasy.

SCHMIDT STRING QUARTET

Mischa Elman in a Recital. Arrangements Under Way for Eugene Ysaye's Visit.

—No novelty appears on the fourth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, but all the works are well tried favorites. The soloist will be Anton Witek, concert-meister. He has appeared in the last five years several times as soloist with the orchestra. He will play The Scotch Fantasy for violin and orchestra of Max Bruch. The orchestral selections will be Smetana's overture, "The Sold Bride;" Richard Strauss' "Don Juan" and Beethoven's Eighth Symphony. The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the gala concert in the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, on January 16 played Smetana's brilliant overture, and Dr. Muck and his men aroused the greatest enthusiasm by the breathless pace with which the music was played.

From the Transcript Feb. 10, 1917.

...day evening, Feb. 22, in Symphony Hall, a third concert by Mr. McCormack, he applauded tenor, along the lines above ecified.

Thursday evening, Feb. 22, in Sanders heatre, at Cambridge, a concert by the ymphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck, with Miss Nash for assisting pianist.

Friday afternoon, Feb. 23, in Symphony Hall, the fifteenth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck, with Mr. Witek and Mr. Warnke of the string choir playing the solo parts in Brahms's concerto for violin and violoncello. Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony and Cherubini's overture to his Moorish opera, "The Abencerrages," complete the programme.

m INQUIRER
dress: Philadelphia, Pa.
FEB 11
e

Boston Symphony Orchestra

No novelty appears on the fourth programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be played in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. All the works are well-tried favorites whose popularity has long since been certain. The soloist will be that admirable virtuoso, Anto Witek, who occupies the post of concert-master in the orchestra. Mr. Witek has appeared in the last five years several times as soloist with the orchestra, and Philadelphia is well aware of his very unusual gifts as a violinist. He will play the Scotch Fantasy for violin and orchestra of Max Bruch.

The orchestral numbers will be Smetana's Overture, "The Sold Bride," Richard Strauss' "Don Juan," and Beethoven's Eighth Symphony. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the great gala concert in the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, January 16 last, when the receipts ran close to $25,000, played as one of its numbers Smetana's brilliant overture, and Dr. Muck and his men simply swept the audience off its feet with the breathless pace with which they took it and the clarity with which every part came out.

The programme in its proper form is as follows:

Overture to "The Sold Bride".....Smetana
Fantasia on Scottish Airs for Violin and Orchestra .....Bruch
Tone Poem, "Don Juan".....Strauss Symphony in F Major, No. 8.....Beethoven
Soloist, Anton Witek.

om MORNING TELEGRAPH
ddress: New York City
te 2/10/17

BOSTON SYMPHONY PAYS FOURTH VISIT

Joyous and Spirited Interpretations Rendered to Delight of Carnegie Hall Audience.

The Boston Symphony Society paid its fourth visit of the season to New York last night, and the usual large audience greeted them at Carnegie Hall.

Dr. Muck gave a joyous and spirited interpretation of Beethoven's eighth symphony, while Smetana's "Bartered Bride," Rogers's "Variations" and fugue on a theme by Hiller and the overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" completed the program.

To-morrow afternoon at 2.30 the second concert will begin with Sibelius's symphony in E minor, followed by Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," "A Siegfried Idyll" and Strauss's "Don Juan."

UNION
Springfield, Mass.
FEB 11 1917

The closing concert of the Ellis subscription-series comes to the Auditorium, Tuesday evening, Feb. 20, when the Boston Smyphony Orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck, makes its second and final appearance here this season. Tickets will go on sale tomorrow morning at Otto Baab's piano store. This concert is to be entirely made up of the compositions of Richard Wagner, and the fact that Dr. Muck is the greatest living authority on the music of Wagner, makes this a musical event of uncommon importance. He has the fixed belief that Wagner often suffers when translated from the operatic to the concert stage; and that the music, poetry and decoration, so consistently worked together in Wagner's theory of opera, makes it difficult to play excerpts in a concert hall without serious loss. On the other hand, Dr. Muck realizes that outside of New York opportunities for the public to see these music-dramas in proper adequacy are so few for the general public that it is advisable to put occasionally on the concert program he gives throughout the country a fair sampling of Wagnerian themes. He uses freely the preludes and overtures of Wagner operas, and a very limited number of selections not connected with dramatic action.

In the Springfield concert Dr. Muck has included that remarkable arrangement by the late Hans Richter of characteristic music from "The Ring," "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung." First comes the interlude between the first and second scenes of the last act of "Siegfried," in which the hero, having broken the magic spear ascends through the wall of fire where the sleeping Burnhilda lies, one of the most thrilling and effective of the weird and picturesque writings of the great master of Beyreuth. To this is cunningly joined the "Morning Dawn" and the "Rhine Journey" episodes from "Gotterdammerung."

From AMERICAN
Address: Baltimore, Md.
FEB 1
Date

PLAY FINNISH SYMPHONY

Boston Orchestra Presents Jan Sibelius Work—Carl Friedburg the Soloist.

One of the most significant programs offered here this season was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, in the Lyric last evening, the notable features of the evening being the playing of the first symphony of Jan Sibelius, the great Finnish composer, and the appearance of Carl Friedburg, a distinguished pianist, as soloist.

The symphony made a powerful impression, and at its close there were enthusiastic recalls, until finally Dr. Muck had all his band rise to acknowledge the applause. It is truly a remarkable composition, this symphony, constructed along most advanced ideas, yet employing the melodic and rhythmic idioms of ancient Scandinavian folksongs. Sibelius is the most towering musical figure of the North, and one of the giants among modern composers, and has been described as the flowering of the genius of his land. Yet, hearing the wild, passionate music of this symphony last evening, one listened in vain for any essential resemblance to the other great Scandivanians, to Niels Gade, Helfdan Kjerulf, Grieg, Svendsen, Sinding or even Aulin. He is a law until himself; there is the impress of his own virile individuality and vividness of imagination in every measure.

It is moving, primeval music that he has given in this symphony; it has the directness and simplicity of genius, its themes being developed without wearying involution, yet with the technical resourcefulness of a master. There is the definite suggestion of the folksong always apparent, especially in the second and final movements. There is much of the Northland in its spirit. First to last it is mysterious and passionately yearning and sometimes inexpressibly solemn. It was given a clear-cut reading—the Boston Symphony Orchestra is always to be depended upon for that. Dr. Muck conducted as if he were the composer and rejoiced in its every note.

Carl Friedburg impressed the audience at once as a scholarly and musicianly man, and his playing of the gracious Schumann Concerto in A Minor confirmed this.

[86]

n EVENING JOURNAL
ess: New York City

FEB 16 1917

BOSTON BAND IN CARNEGIE HALL CONCERT

Dr. Carl Muck, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for these players' fourth visit of the season, last evening at Carnegie Hall had the wholly admirable idea of giving voice to Beethoven's Eighth Symphony. The symphony is altogether too seldom chosen for performance by orchestral conductors, who play the "Eroca" and the C minor—and generally with flat, unresilient uninspiration—in perfunctory iteration. Even the "Pastoral" and the A major symphonies are too frequently heard—truly adequate performances of the tumultuous Seventh do not seem to be possible except at rare intervals. But the Fourth and the Eighth are permitted to remain silent for several seasons running.

Yet there is compact in this Eighth Symphony some of the most winningly beautiful music this supreme genius himself ever wrote. Its middle two movements in general scheme of sequence, giving to the whole work a character not unreminiscent of the older suite form, all of a dulcet graciousness. And there is here something that we can hardly call other than a soaring vocal quality. One may even imagine the melodic picture of "Fidelio" having passed across Beethoven's mind when he was at work on this part of the symphony. And the invention revealed in the opening movement, as well as in the finale, is of the true heroic Beethoven cast.

It is difficult to imagine Dr. Muck ever descending to the perfunctory. Yet one was forced to suspect that he had given no new consideration to the Eighth Symphony in preparation for last night's performance. There was a lack of the rhythmic sparkle, the incisiveness of accent, the variety of mood that there should have been. There was left merely a good technical performance by the Boston Orchestra.

The rest of Dr. Muck's programme consisted of Max Roger's "Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme of J. A. Hiller," the overture to Smetana's "Bartered Bride," and, at the beginning, the overture to Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro." The Reger variations were played, in some sort, as a memoriam to the composer, who died about a year ago.

Hiller was an industrious composer, teacher and writer on music of the late eighteenth century, whose work has been largely forgotten. Among much other music he wrote a number of singspiele, not far different from the better sort of operetta. The theme chosen by Reger is taken from one of these, "Der Aerndtekranz," and is a jolly bit of an air of the heroine who knows her sweetheart is held in the hollow of her hand. The variations and fugue may be believed to be a development in symphonic idiom of the spirit of this little picture, for the key to which one is largely indebted to the indefatigable Philip Hale. The music has its dull spots, sometimes spreading to rather large dimensions, but much of it is interesting, some of it is cerebrally diverting and all of it is excessively well made. Dr. Muck apparently had given it more careful and penetrating preparation than he had the Beethoven Symphony, and the result was a brilliant performance.

TRIBUNE

FEB 18 191

ess: New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES CARNEGIE HALL MATINEE

Dr. Muck's Band Heard to Best Advantage in Strauss's Composition

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth New York matinee yesterday in Carnegie Hall. The programme contained greater contrast than is usual with Dr. Muck, though again there were no novelties or anything approaching a novelty. The Sibelius Symphony No. 1 is a favorite of Dr. Muck's, and it is a work of freshness and spontaneity of spirit. Then followed Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Wagner's "A Siegfried Idyl," and Strauss's "Don Juan." It was in the two latter that the band gave the treat of the afternoon.

Dr. Muck is at times undeniably dry in his readings, but when he deigns to become emotional he rises to the heights. Such was the case yesterday in his "Don Juan." It was a veritable efflorescence of what is best in Strauss, glowing with warmth and color, exquisitely varied, forceful, brilliant. "A Siegfried Idyl" was equally fine, and throughout the great band responded to its master's baton as if it were but one beautifully adjusted organism. Such orchestral music we in New York hear [illegible] Major Higginson's musicians

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City

ate FEB 16 1917

Dr. Muck and Wagner.

Dr. Muck, the highly esteemed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a man of Bayreuth, one of the leading interpreters of Wagner. As such he is naturally expected to subscribe to the tenets of Wagner. One of the most important of these is that in the playing of Beethoven's symphonies there should be frequent modifications of pace, as subtle and varied as his thematic treatment of the melodies. Of these modifications there was hardly a trace last night in his reading of the eighth symphony, which consequently made little impression on the audience. It is, to be sure, the weakest of the nine, excepting the first, and it ends with a dozen banal chords that Rossini would have been ashamed of.

In the two overtures that opened and ended yesterday's Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Orchestra, Dr. Muck, on the other hand, gave a brilliant demonstration of the truth of another one of Wagner's tenets: that fast movements can hardly be played too fast. Of course this has to be taken with a grain of chloride of sodium, but in the main it is true. It is related of one of the old Italian male sopranos, Farinelli, that he could sing so fast that no orchestra could keep pace with him. Dr. Muck and his skilled musicians could have done it, judging by the way they hustled through Mozart's "Figaro" overture, and that to Smetana's "Bartered Bride," which is one of this orchestra's greatest feats of virtuosity.

Dr. Muck has often been adversely criticised, both in New York and Boston, for his programmes. Great improvement in this respect has been shown lately, but last night's programme was not exhilarating. It included one of the depressing algebraic works of the late Max Reger, who is what the boys call "the limit." His craftsmanship was almost as marvellous as Bach's, but he lacked, alas! that great cantor's gift of creating ideas worthy of such elaborate treatment. Even when he borrows ideas to work up into variations he spoils everything because he knows not when to stop.

EVENING SUN
ress: Baltimore, Md.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The penultimate Boston Symphony concert of the current season took place last evening at the Lyric, Dr. Karl Muck conducting. The soloist was Carl Friedberg, a German pianist who has not hitherto played here and who was heard in the Schumann concerto in A minor.

The orchestra played the first Sibelius symphony, the one in E minor, Op. 39, a noble if somewhat turbulent work that seems to express in a marked way the hidden fires that burn so unceasingly under cover of the colder northern temperament. This music of the Finnish composer is an expansive tonal picture drawn in with very broad strokes of the brush, a work replete with shading. The folk strains which occasionally occur in it are strangely nationalistic and isolated. Indeed, this music scarcely suggests that of any other nation at all, except that its rhythms are sometimes like those of Slavic dances. It is a curiously pictorial symphony, music that conjures up visions in the mind's eye of barren wastes, wild reaches, storms, the beating of the sea against rocks.

There are occasional outbursts of pure but very sombre melody that seem to supply the note of human appeal in the composition, which has many passages of the deepest beauty and interest. Throughout the impression of deep feeling seeking expression in song is suggested, the work in its finale rising to broad spiritual planes. One rarely hears a more emotional piece of writing. The instrumentation is very rich, the way in which the instruments are used very interesting. It is a magnificent work of which the orchestra gave a magnificent performance. It is music, though, that one should hear often to enjoy to the fullest extent.

Friedberg's Performance Marred.

Mr. Friedberg's performance of the concerto had many interesting and brilliant features. He is a virile player, whose reading was tempered by the romantic spirit, but it was a reading that was marred considerably by a too frequent hastening of the tempo. This constant acceleration seemed to deprive the player's interpretation almost entirely of that graceful tenderness that is the most striking characteristic of this exquisite bit of Schumann. Indeed the whole performance seemed strangely nervous last evening, colorful and full of accent, to be sure, but lacking in that broadly poetic calm and delicate grace that one looks for in readings of this classic number. For this reason the concerto was a little disappointing, an interpretation that was not always entirely clear, although it was suggestive and vital throughout.

The concert closed with a superb presentation of the "Tannhauser" baccanale, the kind of thing in which the Boston Orchestra is supreme. J. O. L.

From EAGLE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Carl Friedberg Plays the Schumann Concerto.

Dr. Muck gave a program of old-fashioned music for the March concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy last night. The selections were of the romantic period of the last century, Beethoven's "Egmont" overture serving as a prelude to it and Wagner's "Tannhaeuser" marking its passage into the following great dramatic period. There was, however, no sense of monotony, because each of the selections chosen was so strong and highly individual as to fix attention upon itself and not to serve merely as the type of a school or period.

The "Egmont" overture would serve as a noble introduction to any concert. Its breadth and power set a standard and created an atmosphere in which nothing trivial could hope to survive. It was followed by the two movements of Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony." No public can get too much of this inspired and pulsating music, but an illustration of the passion of conductors for following each other in program pieces is noted by the fact that this great work, sometimes neglected for years, should be played in Brooklyn by the Philharmonic on Sunday and by the Boston Symphony on Friday. As the two audiences do not widely overlap no harm was done and each had the benefit of hearing noble music. There is, however, no occasion to repeat or amplify the comment made on the work earlier in the week.

The next number was Schumann's "Piano Concerto in A Minor" which introduced the soloist, Carl Friedberg. The concerto has much of Schumann's fantasy and grace and it is especially grateful to a pianist for the abundant opportunities which it gives to demonstrate the mastery of all the earlier technic of the instrument. But it is not much played in these days probably because it is more distinctly "dated" than anything on last night's bill. It is as far apart as the poles, for example, from the Rachmaninoff Concerto, which Gabrilowitsch played with this orchestra, two months ago. And Rachmaninoff is a voice of our own time. We understand him by instinct, not by study. Nevertheless the Schumann concerto is interesting when played as Friedberg played it, with wonderful clearness of tone and with a full appreciation of the composer's delicate turns of feeling, especially in the second movement. His performance stamped him as an easy master of the keyboard and he was recalled again and again for his playing, which was pretty nearly perfect of its own kind.

Then came the Tannhaeuser overture, in the Paris version, which cuts out the return of the "Pilgrims' Chorus" and swings into the bacchanal scene of the first act. No more hackneyed music ever finds its way to a symphony program, but its presence served to mark the superiority of the Boston players above all other orchestrans. Dr. Muck is sometimes cold, but in this music he glowed and, at the climaxes, he flamed. The shrieking violins made nerves shiver and the glorious brasses set pulses jumping. It was such a performance of the familiar work as one hears three or four times in a lifetime—if he is fortunate.

MORNING TELEGRAPH
1917

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS HEARD ONCE MORE

Feb 18.17

Excellent Musical Organization Delights Audience at Second Concert of Its Fourth Visit.

The Boston Symphony Society was heard again yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall in the second concert of its fourth visit to New York this season.

Dr. Muck, at the head of his excellent forces, gave a poetic and forceful interpretation of Sibelius's Symphony in E minor, while the playing of Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont" was all that could be desired. Even "A Siegfried Idyll," that has had several hearings here this season, took on a new light under the gifted baton of Dr. Muck. A tone poem by Richard Strauss, "Don Juan," completed the program.

A joint recital by Hafold Bauer and Pablo Casals, a combination that has been heard here several times before, was given simultaneously at Aeolean Hall.

[87]

om EVENING SUN
idress: New York City

FEB 16 191

te

For the fifth time this season the cohorts of Dr. Muck and the pride of Boston invaded Gothamite psalms, and, by the blasting of their trumpets, threw down all walls of coldness. It was the fourth of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's regular subscription concerts, and by every reason known to musical weighing it was the finest of them, too. One piece indeed—the Reger Variations—rose to such heights that many of the old subscribers, whose memberships are legacies and whose memories go back beyond the generation, declared they had rarely heard so monumental a piece of playing.

Four days upon the heels of the Metropolitan's last repetition of "The Marriage of Figaro" the Bostonians began their concert with the overture to that opera. There must be a difference of course, between the very purposes which emanate from an orchestra pit and a concert platform, and it would be useless to make comparisons between the two overtures. Suffice it that, under Dr. Muck, the old Mozart confection took on last night a sharpness of rhythm, a recognition of discipline which brought out all of its merriment if not its sweetness. There was a swing and smartness to it which made one prick up his ears for whatever was to follow.

And that was the evening's symphony—the eighth of Beethoven, in F major. Those famous nine, which are the very Bibles of our present day music, contain no strains more romantic than those which compose the first allegro movement of the eighth. To those strains, battling and almost barbaric in their deliberate simplicity, the orchestra could give a bulk and power immediately stupendous. There could be no hesitation to such an impression. The following and lighter movements full of grace and virtuosity as they were, were but the gay trailers to a kite already soaring.

There was the evening's feature in reserve, however, that hundredth piece of work from Reger, not so long ago composed. These variations and fugue are on "a merry theme by J. A. Hiller"—plucked, in fact, from one of the latter's mostly forgotten operettas. The slight wisp of an idea (for it is no more than that) becomes in Reger's hands a bridge for the marching of mood upon mood, invention upon invention, alternately repressive and expressive, passionate and gloomy, dainty and darkling, working strongly up to a climax for full orchestra, which must tax the resources of even the Boston Symphony. As played last night, it became as blasting as war, as vast as all armies of the world, yet as thoroughly controlled and trained as any battalion of that one which needs no naming. There was artistry, not cold and contented, but pulsingly warm, in every one of these variations. The finale, with its blare of brasses, had as much of it as the tenderest interlude. It was the Boston orchestra at its best.

The concluding number was the Smetana, "Bartered Bride" overture played with excellent effect.

rom HERALD
ddress: New York City

FEB 18.

ate

Plays the First Symphony of Sibelius and Shorter Works—Harold Bauer and Pablo Casals Give Recital.

Among the numerous musical entertainments of yesterday the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall in the afternoon stood out prominently.

The programmes of this orchestra in New York have been none too interesting this season, although no complaint as to the playing of the men could be made, but yesterday a thoroughly enjoyable entertainment was offered. The symphony was the first of Sibelius. There are many lovers of music who do not care for this intense Finnish composer, but his first symphony has had frequent hearings in the last ten years and it seems to be gaining in popularity. It is good music, well written. There is more emotion, more seriousness in it than in a dozen of the ordinary symphonies of to-day, most of which pass into oblivion after a few scattered hearings.

Following the symphony Dr. Karl Muck directed his men through three delightful shorter works. Beethoven's "Egmont" overture is one of his best shorter works and few orchestras play Beethoven's music as does that from Boston. Wagner's beautiful "Siegfried" idyll was likewise presented with lovely tone, especially in the strings, and with many little refinements not usually heard at orchestra concerts in this city. Even more enjoyable was Dr. Muck's reading of "Don Juan," the first important tone poem of Richard Strauss. In this work is foreshadowed all that is most attractive in the later works of Strauss—his uncanny cleverness in orchestrating, his contrapuntal skill and his ability to make even a trivial theme sound well.

TIMES
ress: Washington, D. C.

FEB 17 1917

CONCERT SCORES HIT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Fourth Program of Year.

A program of great beauty, vitality and interest was given a faultless interpretation by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck, at their fourth concert of the season, at the National Theater yesterday afternoon before a capacity audience.

It was an all-orchestral concert, without soloist, whose opening and closing numbers gave tone-portraits of heroes—Beethoven's ideal of the young Napoleon told in his "Eroica" symphony and Richard Strauss' recital of the romance of "Don Juan."

High Degree of Expression.

And Dr. Muck seems never to have given so high a degree of emotional expression. It was potent, it touched his hearers deeply, and it was rarely executed. The spirit of the "Eroica," Beethoven's third symphony, was dominantly martial, yet it held, and was vitally developed in the last movement, a Viennese quality in which a folk spirit of the dance was closely knit with that of a tense and tragic "Fate." The bitter sadness of the "Funeral March" foreshadowed this, with its impressive reading and its somber hue. The scherzo with its amazing lightness and shading sustained also this covered tone, while throughout a broad and rhythmic rendition, one felt a dignity in both graceful phrases and in tragic ones.

Overture Delights.

Smetana's overture to "The Sold Bride" was a delightful thing, executed with the finest of work by the strings in what might have been a rare "Spinning Song" that swept broadly into a syncopated festival of rugged charm. A wind choral was particularly effective as was a final crescendo of the strings.

One felt that the idyl of the fauns and pipes, and of vibrant nature, in the Debussy, "Afternoon of A Faun," prelude, was given absolutely "con amore" by Dr. Muck. With rarest of intonation in this French idyl of the fields with a feeling of placid spaces under the blue, he gave too a grotesque element that quite completed the picture. The winds in the finale were most notable.

Vivid Interpretation.

Again fate and gayety, the hero and romance, were interwoven in the beauties of the Strauss' "Don Juan." Dr. Muck made vivid and dramatic the march of events in the life of the hero, telling his romance with the beauty as also the pastoral touch, and building the exquisite personal theme of "Don Juan" up to a triumphant climax with all the splendors of its orchestration, then resolving it to an impressive close. It was a rich program in import and variety and was given with mastery in all its parts. J. MacB.

rom STANDARD UNION
ddress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

ate

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS WITH FRIEDBERG SOLOIST

Devoting its whole evening to revealing new beauties in well-worn classics, the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid its fourth visit of the season to Brooklyn last evening. Practically everything on the programme played at the Academy of Music had already been heard in the same hall this season. Accordingly, the attention of the hearers was paid directly to the performers weaving their melodic spells—for nine-tenths of the evening these were unruffled, serene, placid spells—and not to the selections from the composers.

Beethoven's "Egmont" overture was first, read by Conductor Karl Muck in straightforward and pleasant—even if featureless—fashion. Next was the perennial favorite "Unfinished Symphony" of Schubert, given with exquisite lyric charm. Never was a better instrumental balance afforded this historic work.

Carl Friedberg, pianist, was soloist in the Schumann A minor concerto. He had already played it in Brooklyn two or three months ago. In the present instance he seemed willing to go to great lengths to subordinate his solo instrument to the wondrous ensemble of the orchestra. The intermezzo, a most famous melodic passage, was indeed "grazioso," as its title described it.

The fireworks were reserved for the final number, in which the "Tannhauser" bacchanale, following the sombre pilgrim music, was given in its Paris version. Here was an instrumental pagan riot in unexpurgated form, with a wealth of dynamics that had remained unsuspected throughout the calm of the early part of the programme.

Dr. Muck and his musicians won generous and deserved applause.

EVENING GLOBE
New York City

FEB 14 1917

Music.

Boston Symphony Orchestra in Comedy Concert.

My accomplished colleague Mr. Sherwin said to me recently in his forthright manner, "Can you tell me why on earth anybody plays variations to-day?" (He had been hearing, I think, some virtuoso or other of the pianoforte in one of those colossally difficult sets of variations that the late Johannes Brahms so loved to rear on a foundation of otherwise harmless melody by almost any composer, including himself.) I did not attempt to answer my colleague otherwise than by reminding him that the last movement of the "Eroica" symphony happens to be a set of variations, that there are some "Symphonic Variations" for piano and orchestra by César Franck, that there are the "Istar" variations for orchestra by Vincent d'Indy, for which in particular I had even been doing such missionary work with my pen as lies within the possibilities of that modest instrument.

The query of my colleague leaped into the centre of my mind last evening as in Carnegie Hall I sat listening to the Boston Symphony Orchestra steering a gallant course through the late Max Reger's variations and fugue on a theme by Hiller—those "thunder-and-lightning variations on a merry little theme of Hiller," as Mr. Philip Hale of Boston remarked after finding himself in a predicament similar to mine in Boston's Symphony Hall not long ago.

The incident recalled to Mr. Hale a pleasant anecdote of that bluff monarch William IV., England's earlier sailor king, on the occasion of a Miss Blaketka's playing a fantasy at a concert in St. James's Palace in 1836. The king said to Sir George Smart:

"The queen requests me to say something civil to the young lady, but I cannot make out what she is playing. It sounds like 'God Save the King,' but then it goes off into something else. What do you call it?"

Sir George explained to his majesty that it was in fact the national melody with variations.

"Damn variations!" said the king, and it is recorded that he left the concert room immediately, in which detail the seafaring monarch was luckier than Mr. Sherwin and myself.

Dr. Muck is notoriously an obstinate practitioner of the "unified" programme. Perhaps he chose his programme last evening with a view to illustrating some manifestations of the comic spirit. Mr. Hale has emphasized the merriment of the germinal theme by Hiller. The concert opened with a celebrated comedy overture, that to "The Marriage of Figaro"; it closed with a celebrated comedy overture, that to "The Sold Bride." Sharing the body of the programme with the Reger variations was the comedy symphony of Beethoven, the Eighth. Is such unification a good thing—for the music, for the listener (I shall not presume to speak for the performers)? The question has been asked before. Dr. Muck must think it is, since no amount of verbal torpedoing has yet shivered him from his course.

In any case, the orchestra plays with a virtuosity that is astounding, and New Yorkers still pack Carnegie Hall for its every visit, applauding always liberally, at times ecstatically. And few listeners could be so obtuse or misguided as to attempt to deny that such a performance of the Eighth Symphony as Dr. Muck conducted last night is one of the real privileges of life on Manhattan Island in this troubled year of grace.

PITTS SANBORN.

m CITIZEN
ress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

e Feb 17 1917

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HERE.

Big Audience Attends Concert at the Academy.

Last evening in the Opera House at the Academy of Music, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fourth in a series of five philharmonic concerts. Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, received an ovation for his masterly interpretation of the various numbers, especially of Beethoven's overture to Goethe's "Egmont," op. 84, with which the evening's music opened.

Next on the programme was Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor, allegro moderato, andante con moto—the rendition of which was perfect, more especially the portion for strings. The sudden ending leaves one with a desire for more of this masterpiece.

The soloist of the evening was Carl Friedberg, pianist, and his artistic rendition of Schuman's concerto in A minor for pianoforte with orchestra accompaniment evidenced his mastery of the piano. He also received liberal applause and gave an encore.

The Opera House was packed with music lovers and every number received liberal applause. The programme follows:

Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," op. (Beethoven); unfinished symphony in minor—(1) allegro moderato, (2) andante con moto—(Schubert); concerto A minor, for pianoforte and orchestra, op. 54—(1) allegro affetfuoso, (2) scherniezzo, andantino grazioso, (3) allegro vivace—(Schumann); introduction and bacchanale, "Tannhauser," 1 (Paris verson) (Wagner).

om HERALD
dress: Washington, D. C.

FEB 14 1917

te

HEARERS ARE CHARMED BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

President's Wife Entertains Guests at Musicale.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Dr. Karl Muck, gave its fourth concert of the season at the National Theater, yesterday afternoon before a large audience.

The program opened with the Symphony, No. 3, in E flat major, "Eroica," Opp. 55, by Beethoven. Though this symphony is longer than the ordinary one, Dr. Muck's extraordinary conducting made it a thing to be remembered as one of the best numbers. This symphony is written on the life of Napoleon Bonaparte and has four movements: Allegro con brio, Marcia funebre, Adagio assai, Scherzo, Allegro vivace, and finale, Allegro Molto.

The overture to the opera, "The Sold Bride," by Frederick Smetana followed the symphony. The prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," by Claude DeBussy, was perhaps the most interesting number of the afternoon. By it one was transported into the woods where the frollicking naiads and nymphs dwell. The music is vague, though cool and shadowy, and full of descriptive possibilities.

"Don Juan," a tone-poem, by Richard Strauss, completed the program. "Don Juan" was the first of Strauss's symphonic poems to be published.

Mrs. Wilson entertained a few guests in her box.

m EVENING POST
dress: New York City

e

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony concert Saturday afternoon presented an interesting programme, although there was nothing new thereon. The Sibelius Symphony—the first one, in E minor—is not very familiar, but it has been played here before, and by the same masterly organization. The applause was such that the whole orchestra rose in acknowledgment, a phenomenon repeated after the Siegfried Idyll, which Dr. Muck takes more slowly than most conductors, but not enough so to rob it of its beauty. The other two numbers were the Beethoven Egmont overture, and Strauss's "Don Juan," both played in Dr. Muck's well known and efficient manner. Nothing really new can be said of the playing of the entire programme, Dr. Muck and the orchestra were in their usual "good form"—and that means much.

It is well-known that the only first-class audiences in New York are those which attend the concerts of the Boston orchestra. The following stray remarks heard on Saturday prove this:

"The symphony is in D minor—I just love a minor."

"I don't care what they play. I just love to listen to the sound of the orchestra."

"No, I don't care to read the programme notes, I love to interpret the music in my own way—it may be crude, but it suits me."

"I suppose almost every one here is a real lover of music."

From SUN
Address: New York City

Date

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD AT ITS BEST

Large Audience Enjoys Fourth Matinee Concert in Carnegie Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth matinee concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The list of compositions offered for the enjoyment of the large audience was Sibelius's first symphony, Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Strauss's "Don Juan."

Possible complaint as to the length of the programme was forestalled by a line on the house bill tersely stating that it would be one hour and forty-five minutes. We hope that Dr. Muck will fix this as a permanent limit.

As in the case of the Thursday evening concert the music of yesterday invited no comment. The Sibelius symphony was played by the same orchestra at its matinee of February 20, 1915, and has rested since that. The work is evidently congenial to Dr. Muck and he conducts it with imagination as well as with his customary high technical skill.

The whole concert was one in which orchestra and conductor were at their best. What more need be said?

[88

MES
New York City

FEB 18 1917

Letters on the Philharmonic's Policies---Mr. Finck Answers Mr. Whiting.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

In a letter printed in your columns last Sunday, Arthur Whiting accuses me of being "assiduous in preaching the theory that "thinking is not a part of musical experience, and that any mental effort in connection with the enjoyment of beautiful tonal effects is pedantic."

This statement is so diametrically the opposite of what I [illegible] preach, that I cannot account for it except on the theory that Mr. Whiting has mixed up with the late Count Leo Tolstoy, who did preach that preposterously asinine doctrine.

In the seven books on musical topics I have written, and in the countless contributions from my pen that have appeared in newspapers and periodicals there is not a line bearing out that accusation. I have, on the contrary, often sneered at those who want to enjoy music passively, like a hot bath.

There are twenty world-famed composers for the popularization of whose works I have labored assiduously for forty years—Bach, Schubert, Schumann, Weber, Franz, Chopin, Wagner, Saint Saëns, Bizet, Grieg, Rubinstein, Tschaikowsky, Rimsky-Korsakof, Dvorák Verdi, Humperdinck, MacDowell, Paderewski, and Percy Grainger. Mr. Whiting's startling discovery that the works of these twenty men—including Bach—can be enjoyed "without thinking" surely ought to entitle him to the next Nobel Prize.

In the same letter Mr. Whiting comments on the awful havoc created in the Philharmonic Society by the request of its benefactor, Joseph Pulitzer, that the programme should be "not too severely classical." The result of this truly satanic injunction has been that the Board of Directors "shamelessly advocates a depreciation of music values, and adopts for its watchword: 'To be proud to think.'"

This is dreadfully clever. Mr. Whiting does not go into details, but if he has taken the trouble to examine the figures he would have seen that the Philharmonic, last season, in its hideous war on "thinking," played thirty-six works by Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Mozart, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Schubert, Weber, and the "Belgian Brahms," César Franck—or exactly the same number of works by these masters that were played at home by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For shame, Dr. Muck! Have you, too, joined this vile assault on "thinking" in music?

Concerning Dr. Muck's share in this diabolical conspiracy Mr. Whiting is discreetly silent. He fairly seethes with indignation, however, because the Philharmonic gives so many performances of the symphonies of Tschaikowsky, a man who, not being a German, will, of course, never become a classic. To be sure, he must know that if the symphonies of Haydn and Mozart were played in place of Tschaikowsky's masterworks of melody and emotion, the receipts for a concert would be discreased by about $1,000. That would soon end the career of the Philharmonic—but is not that a consummation devoutly to be wished?

Personally, I get more pleasure from the Philharmonic concerts than from any other musical entertainments given in New York. But that, presumably, is because I do not "think."

HENRY T. FINCK.

New York, Feb. 14, 1917.

A SUBSCRIBER'S VIEW.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

For some time past I have read the criticisms of your musical editor and the letters from a number of your "contributing editors" on the Philharmonic Society, its conductor, its orchestra, and its programs with mingled feelings of amusement and disgust. So far as your music critic is concerned there is little to be said. It is to be regretted that we are so lamentably lacking in constructive criticism; the aim of many of our critics seems to be to destroy and decry rather than to build.

Such a condition could not exist abroad; here it indubitably and unfortunately does, and therefore we who have some knowledge and experience of our own have learned to make our own judgments and give our encouragement to that which is most truly worth while.

But the letter published in your paper this morning and signed "Old Philharmonic Subscriber" has moved me to forget my amusement and express what I feel to be the point of view of most real lovers of good music and its worthy rendering.

I, too, am an old subscriber to the Philharmonic. For twenty years I have attended the Friday concerts regularly, and other performances frequently. I have sat under the baton of the great Seidl, and heard him produce great results from an instrument which we all knew left much to be desired. Since that time its history, its ups and downs, are as well known to your readers as to me. When Mahler left the Metropolitan, where he had been hailed by the critics as a great conductor, to take its leadership, they turned and, with of course some exceptions, rent him tooth and nail.

It puzzled him, hurt him, and of course he could not understand the antagonism that exists to an organization which should be the proud possession of every New Yorker.

It is quite true that the orchestra at Mahler's time had fallen from its high estate, and his great gifts did not include the building up of such a body; also he was an ill, a dying man.

It remained for Mr. Stransky to take up that work, which he has so magnificently carried through.

The strings, which before his time were rough and uneven, have grown to a perfection of tone and restraint which I consider unexcelled, and the development of the rest of the orchestra is in just proportion and balance. The playing of the accompaniment of the Grieg concerto with Miss Novaes, of which your correspondent complains, was in my judgment one of unusual beauty, and there can be no doubt in the mind of any one who heard the Beethoven D major symphony last night that Mr. Stransky's reading was by far the broader and nobler and utterly lacking the unclassical sentimentality which marred Mr. Elman's.

Mr. Stransky's genius for program making is so well known, and so freely acknowledged by his peers, of whom there are not many, that while criticisms expressing individual taste are always in order, such a criticism as that of an "Old Philharmonic Subscriber" is worth neither discussion nor refutation. Mr. Stransky is a great artist, constructive, with breadth of taste, and wide understanding, giving always of his best and at the height of his powers.

He has done for the Philharmonic, and through it for New York, a magnificent work, and given us pride in a thing which we have always loved; and it is to be regretted that so many people should choose the present to decry and wait to praise until the time when he has left us. A sad but prevalent habit.

I, too, sign myself an "Old Philharmonic Subscriber," but am glad to add to that my name.

ELEANOR SCOTT TEW.

New York, Feb. 11, 1917.

Satisfied with Mr. Stransky.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

A letter signed "Old Philharmonic Subscriber," dated the 9th of this month and published in your valuable paper of this date, contains so great an injustice toward the conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra, Mr. Stransky, that I cannot refrain from entering a protest against it.

It has been my privilege and my pleasure to play under the conductorship of all the greatest conductors, both in America and in Europe, of the last twenty-five years—perhaps a longer period, even, than this quarter of a century—and have had also the pleasure of playing under Mr. Stransky's leadership upon several occasions. I have never been better accompanied than I have been under Mr. Stransky's baton.

May I beg you, in justice to Mr. Stransky, to give this protest publication in your valuable paper?

AN OLD ARTIST.

New York, Feb. 11, 1917.

THE BASIS OF CRITICISM.

Mr. Whiting's Remarks Applied to the Regular Philharmonic Concerts.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Two letters of protest against my recent communication to THE TIMES on the Philharmonic question have been received, together with a demand that I acknowledge the injustice of judging the policy of the society by what is done at the extra or popular concerts.

I hasten to reply that I was not criticising, in any way, the quite proper character of this series, for one feels confident that the Philharmonic's "not too severely classical" standard will always be appropriate to avowedly popular concerts; but my criticism was directed entirely and exclusively to the programs and performances of the regular Thursday and Friday Symphony Series.

ARTHUR WHITING.

New York, Feb. 16, 1917.

MR. PULITZER'S WILL.

Too Much Consideration for His Wishes by the Philharmonic Society

To the Editor of The New York Times:

If the real reason why the New York Philharmonic Society has decided not to make its programs "too severely classical" is that the late Joseph Pulitzer, who gave the society a certain amount of money, had expressed his wish that his favorite composers of modern origin should predominate in those programs, then it seems to me that the society has entered into a bargain which it had no authority to make.

There are many music lovers who, like Mr. Pulitzer, are fond of the works of Wagner, Liszt, and Tschaikowsky without making themselves great factors in our musical life. Mr. Pulitzer undoubtedly made himself more conspicuous as a music lover by giving a good deal of money to the New York Philharmonic Society, but I do not think that the society ever has been in such financial distress that it had to sell its birthright to a millionaire music lover.

It is a pity that we always should have to be dictated to by laymen whenever we make some great efforts to advance art and music in America. Either it is a donor of money or an ambitious layman-President to whom we must bow down. Why should not an organization like the New York Philharmonic have a thorough musician for President? He might not care, or deem it necessary, to deliver high-sounding phrases to the members, but would undoubtedly, as a musician, better understand the aims of such a society, which are, or should be, the same here as in Europe. The society, of course, first should be an educational institution. As such, it should give as much of Bach, Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven as time for rehearsals would permit. A thorough knowledge of the classics would make the public better understand and enjoy Wagner and Liszt, just as the educated musician does; and the demand of such a public would then surely not be for an exclusively modern répertoire. Take all the great orchestra leaders, pianists, and violinists; examine their programs. They are overwhelmingly classical today, as they were fifty years ago. Why? Because of the increasing education of the public! Being a musician, I have made it my duty to study the musical taste of the American musical student and musician for twenty-five years, and I have found the love of Bach and Beethoven is here as undying as it is in Germany. Moreover, if the American music lover should be compelled to give up one or the other, he would surely let Liszt or Tschaikowsky go rather than the classics.

Authority is necessary in all educational endeavors; the Philharmonic Society of New York should be conducted by authority, and the system which has developed musical Europe is good enough for us. Amateurishness does not belong in such a society. As I have said, there are plenty of amateurs who are fond of Liszt and Tschaikowsky, but a musician knows that if those enthusiasts had been properly acquainted with the classics they would—probably including Mr. Pulitzer—have been satisfied with those charming musicmakers' contributions if served just as a dessert or entrée to a good classical menu. As for the student, he has very little to learn from Wagner, Liszt, or Tschaikowsky. If he studies Berlioz he does not need them in his orchestration. I hope that amateurishness will be abolished from the Philharmonic, even if Mr. Pulitzer's donation should be morally forfeited.

ERNST BYSTROM.

Brooklyn, Feb. 12, 1917.

Why Not More Brahms?

To the Editor of The New York Times:

For the inclusion of Brahms's noble symphony in the Philharmonic programs of this afternoon a grateful acknowledgment is due from those of the subscribers who feel that it is at least part of the function of that largely endowed institution to lead the public to an appreciation of the finest music. And realizing that this appreciation cannot be fully gained unless we have somewhat frequent opportunity to hear it rendered, we wonder that such opportunity is not more often vouchsafed to us.

HENRY RUTGERS MARSHALL.

New York, Feb. 15, 1917.

EVENING POST
New York City

FEB 17 1917

GEORGE MOORE introduces in one of his novels a famous and eccentric musician, Arnold Dolmetsch, who visited this country a few years ago in an effort to interest Americans in his hobbies, which are mediæval instruments. He prefers the old recorder to the modern flute, the viol to the violin, the harpsichord to the grand piano of our day, the organ of the time of Handel and Bach to the degenerate improved instruments we play on.

There are a few Arnold Dolmetsches on this side of the Atlantic, and always they are Brahmsites, too, which makes the matter considerably worse. There is Arthur Whiting, for example, who plays the harpsichord with passionate zeal. Now, a harpsichord is very pretty to listen to once in a while, but it is ahead of a real pianoforte in the same way that a wheelbarrow is ahead of an automobile.

Mr. Whiting dotes also on the "severely classical" music of Germany and Austria, and harbors a superlative contempt for popular music. In a letter to the New York Times printed last Sunday, he falls foul of the New York Philharmonic, its conductor, its directors, and its president. He is particularly angry with President Villard for having said that the Philharmonic of to-day is the peer of the Metropolitan Museum of Fine Arts and the Public Library as an educational institution. It was so formerly, Mr. Whiting admits, but is so no longer, because it has adopted for its motto the request of its benefactor, Joseph Pulitzer, that the programmes should be "not too severely classical." The consequence is that the music played at its concerts is chiefly "enjoyed through the senses," no appeal being made to the thinking faculties.

Mr. Whiting reminds one of the metaphysician who said that if facts did not agree with his theory, so much the worse for the facts. Unfortunately for him, facts are as stubborn as mules, and sometimes they deliver a knock-out kick below the belt.

As a matter of fact, the Philharmonic has not paid the slightest attention to Mr. Pulitzer's remark regarding programmes "not too severely classical." It plays just as large a proportion of classical music as it ever did or as any other orchestra does. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, for instance, which the harpsichord-Brahms gang holds up as the very pink of perfection, played last season exactly the same number of pieces, thirty-six, as the Philharmonic did, of composers of the classical persuasion, Bach, Beethoven, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Weber, and the neo-classics, Brahms and César Franck.

The only innovation made because of the generous bequest of the editor of the New York World is that the Philharmonic occasionally offers a "Pulitzer programme," made up of pieces by his three favorite composers: Beethoven, Wagner, and Liszt. But these three masters have always been featured by the Philharmonic. It opened its career in 1842 with a Beethoven symphony. Wagner concerts soon followed galore, and as for Liszt, see page 92 of the History of the New York Philharmonic, by H. E. Krehbiel and Richard Aldrich, and pages 68-9 of Mrs. Theodore Thomas's biography of her husband, to realize how the Philharmonic labored for that great Hungarian long before Seidl and Stransky.

In a word, Mr. Whiting has performed the old, old trick of setting up a man of straw and pummelling him with all the valor with which Don Quixote charged the windmills.

One thing must be admitted. Conductor Stransky does not give over his programmes entirely to the German composers of the "severely classical" style, but gives a hearing also to the leading composers of other countries. Last season, for instance, his selections included works by the Russians: Tchaikovsky, Rubinstein, Dargomiszky, Rimsky-Korsakoff; the French: Berlioz, Bizet, Charpentier, Debussy, Dukas, Gounod, Massénet, Saint-Saëns; the Italians: Boccherini, Verdi; the Americans: McDowell, Kramer, Severn; while Poland was represented by Paderewski; Finland by Sibelius; England by Delius and Grainger, and so on.

Is this such a damning record that the president of the Philharmonic should be called down for comparing this Society to the Metropolitan Museum and the Public Library?

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

ONE DULL PIECE, AND THREE FOR PLEASURE

The Blank "Burleske" of Strauss' Youth Revived — The Contrasting Charm and Fancy of Franck's Variations — Mr. Busoni's Suite of Stage Music; "Turandot" for New Revelation of His Qualities as Composer—The Vividness, Fancy and Humor of the Pieces—Dr. Muck and His Public

WITH two items in the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon precedent was piquantly reversed. For once Strauss, who is usually interesting, however sharply the hearer may quarrel with his music, was downright dull. For once, also, Mr. Busoni, who is often baffling or barren when he sets pen to music-paper, was amusing, stimulating, gay. The occasion of Strauss's mischance was the revival of his "Burleske" for piano and orchestra, which Mr. Gebhard, the "assisting artist" of the day, elected to play anew with the band as he had played it originally in 1903. The occasion of Mr. Busoni's happy fortunes was the first performance in Boston in entirety of the Suite for orchestra that he wove out of his incidental music to Gozzi's play of Chinese fantasy, "Turandot." Since one division of it requires momentarily a chorus of women, Dr. Muck, loyal to the slightest obligation a composer or his own artistic conscience may impose, had it assembled, eighty strong, from the Musical Art Club and the Choral Music Society, and trained to the minute by Mr. Townsend, even though its participation in the concert was of the briefest. Relatively light, too, were the other pieces of the afternoon—Franck's Symphonic Variations for pianoforte and orchestra, again for Mr. Gebhard, and the racing, smiling, almost gesticulating overture to Smetana's opera of "The Bartered Bride." A programme to pleasure the audience in all but the "Burleske"; a pianist whom it knew familiarly, heard gladly and rewarded heartily, and a concert without incident outside music and performance, except in the applause that seemed to single out the conductor as he came to his place and to testify to the good will of his public toward him. A week ago the audience of Saturday evening similarly and even more heartily received him. In view of this clear and sincere mood of his audiences at a time when the town simmers with anti-German feeling, is it quite wise or even tactful on his part to persist in the concert that he and Miss Gerhardt purpose to give a fortnight hence for the fund to despatch an American surgical unit to the armies of the empire? For those who must deal with the public, however intense their personal loyalties or however honorable and laudable their purpose, there is a discretion in times and seasons. The present—and in a perfervid and self-centred New England city—seems hardly such for a concert in behalf of a German war charity. By a single error of tact it would be a pity to see Dr. Muck lose in an evening even a measure of the respect, admiration and good will that shield him against many a gust of anti-Germany sentiment or folly.

The misfortune of the "Burleske" is to burlesque nothing an attentive ear can discover in performance; while the pianists who occasionally venture the piece would probably admit, did they open their secret hearts, that they only persuade themselves by a kind of auto-intoxication to find travesty in it. Even scrutiny of the score is no more enlightning. "With humor" or the like phrase Strauss time and again labels a measure; but few readers, for the life of them, can discover any "humor" in it. The truth is that the undated piece, which Strauss probably wrote in his nineteenth or his twentieth year, is no more than an excuse in which like a stripped and sinewy athlete, he shows his "development" in the resources and the processes of music-making on the academic model. Here and there, indeed, in the "Burleske"—to continue the figure—he is straining for the start into his own courses of imagination and expression, into the free play of his personality, that was to sweep him soon into "Don Juan," "Till" and "Death and Transfiguration"; but for the most part the piece of yesterday might have been written by any able youngster of the eighties with his Brahms and his lessons in the conservatory well in mind. Indeed it might have been written more brightly and amusingly and less dryly and laboriously by many a youth who was to prove no Strauss or even a shadow of a Strauss. Such a one, perhaps, would not have expected an audience to be diverted by tweaks of the piccolo, sudden stranglings of a motive or portentous interpositions of the kettledrum

Yet, as chance would have it, Mr. Gebhard played this dull and clumsy piece more animatedly and eloquently than he did the lovely and enkindling Symphonic Variations of Franck, which were his other number. In them he was strangely dry and expository, unfolding theme and metamorphoses in the white light of pure precision with far too little suggestion of the airy and enwreathing motion with which the Parisian propels his music or the endless play of pianistic and orchestral color with which he glamors it. For the Symphonic Variations are a marvellously fluid music, in incessant motion upon the piano and through the orchestra. The separate variations comb and curl wave-like into the design of the piece; currents and cross-currents, eddies and momentary pools dapple them; while over them all and variously rippling them play the sunshine and the breeze of Franck's fancy, bright and light, capricious and lyric. Or, to shift the figure, here is music of arabesque that ever finds new convolutions of graceful and elegant line, while over it falls a whole palette of gleaming color. Theme and variations are of the very voice of the piano when it sounds as no mere serviceable box of felt and wires but speaks in fleeting loveliness of phrase and figure, in glints and glows of color, in fantasies of run and rhythm. The music may be of the minor and not the major Franck, but it teems with lyric fancy and lyric ardor perfectly expressed in a medium that it makes of like poetic voice and glamor. More than once Franck in his graver music seems to fall short of his aspiring purposes. The Symphonic Variations are completeness itself of matter, method and means. If Mr. Gebhard and Dr. Muck played a little masterpiece yesterday, it is none the less so because it is short, swift, luminous.

Smetana's overture may be taken for granted like a cocktail before dinner—and the more because, in the flying pace, the sharpened accents and the flashing precision in which Dr. Muck has schooled the orchestra to play the piece, it has become to the frequenters of the concerts like a cocktail of Czech melodies and rhythms swallowed in one tingling gulp. Perhaps however, there might be keener appreciation of the contributing Czech liqueurs and spirits did the palate of the ear have a bit more time to savor them. To whip the overture forward a shade faster and more snappingly at each repetition has now become one of the obligatory feats of conductor and band. So it was that outside the Franckian variations, the lively pleasure of the concert sprang from Mr. Busoni's Suite. Of course, even in assemblage and adaptation for the concert-hall, it remains intrinsically music of the theatre, to be heard at particular moments, under particular circumstance and against particular scenic backgrounds upon the stage. Even the lights in the Deutsches Theater—Mr. Busoni used to say—contributed to the illusion of the music. The more the pity, then, that the programme-book, instead of heaping up chronological tables of the composer's appearances in Boston as pianist and lists of his published pieces, did not attempt to reconstitute a play known to the contemporary German, English and American stages and to describe the incidents or the personages—for which purpose there is much readily accessible material—that the music accompanies or suggests. As it was, the listener, even with the hints of Mr. Busoni's programme, needed lively imagination to feel the pictorial quality, the warmth, the fancy, the whole gay or graphic illusion of the music.

The play—Gozzi's, Schiller's, Vollmöller's MacKaye's "Turandot"—retells the Persian legend of the remote, proud, perverse and cerebrally wanton Chinese princess, who bade her lovers guess three riddles that she propounded, and if they so much as failed in one despatched them forthwith to execution. Upon a day there came so to woo her Kalaf, Prince of Astrakhan, youthful, but wise; high-hearted, but wary; comely as Turandot herself. And lo! he guessed the riddles; whereat the princess was perturbed, and the more since she could learn neither his name nor nativity. But already she loved him and was conquered, and so at last, after more ruses as is the way of women, he possessed her. In the Suite Mr. Busoni first sets the stage and preludes to the succeeding dramatic narrative. Distant drum beats in reiterated rhythms, entering instruments in Oriental interval hint the fantastic scene. Trumpets proclaim a prince come to a trial of amorous fate. Foreboding, sombre are the auspices; confused, menacing the tumult at the city gate, with the heads of the executed lovers stark upon it.

So, with the music, into the palace, where first it sketches Truffaldino, chief eunuch and also comic figure out of Italian commedia dell' arte, pittipatting and leering over his preparations for the trial of wits or teetering with his fellow-eunuchs through a squeaking march. Next the formidable fanfares that bring upon the stage that venerable emperor, Altoum, but he is by no means such a stupendous sovereign as the sonorous brass and the rolling drums would make him, but really a wabbling and comic old fellow (as a kind of intermezzo in the march hints) somewhat pensive of this new "crisis" in the amatory adventures of his daughter. Then Turandot herself in music that stirs out of hushed and mysterious preludings into the slow, still march of a gliding train of women; that swells into the stately clangors of august presence and ceremonial state; and then droops into dark-hued and sharp-set melody, yet with soft and pulsing underbody, as though Mr. Busoni would so delineate the moody and perverse princess, remote, self-absorbed, implacable, yet not insensitive to gentler impulses of passion. Mystery shrouds her in the advancing music; yet ceremony still attends her.

Forthwith from day and the great hall, where Kalaf has guessed the riddles, into the night and the langurous and perfumed solitude of the women's apartments. Lusciously yet monotonously Mr. Busoni's suggests the scene; his rhythm is quasi-Oriental; his melody is quasi-Italianate - by sheer dint of blood in spite of scholarly resolution not to forsake his eastern motives and modulation. A dance of the women, titillating through monotonous repetitions; a song of the women above it in the high range of their voices, in interrupted and sensuous phrases—both intensify atmosphere. Then in sudden shift to the chamber of the prince, where in ominous and sinister waltz of broken and lugubrious measures, darkling phantoms haunt his shallow sleep. For in and out of the chamber flit the emissaries of Turandot with ears pointed to hear him mutter his name Measures, next, for her final ruse—the feigning of woe in the trappings of woe—music of melodious melancholy that harsh and dissonant instruments begin to mock; that professes wistfulness and then whips it and the deceit away for a wild and whirling, snapping, scintillant and sonorous Finale alla Turca, with all the personages clearly dancing down to the footlights with the orchestra twisting them in rhythms and festooning them with color, as though it were flinging confetti. After all this is a merry world.

A vivid music to hear, especially with a little knowledge of the course of legend and play and enough imagination withal to visualize setting, episode, personage upon a stage on which orchestra, chorus and piano hardly left room even for figments of fancy—a music quick with invention, instant (as it seemed) with means and procedure, bright with color, graphic with delineative suggestion, vibrant with implication of atmosphere. Throughout Mr. Busoni has courted oriental intervals, rhythms, melodies, and deployed no little scholarship in the search, the choice and the treatment of them; but steadfastly he has manipulated, colored, contrasted them as a composer of the West who did but seek Eastern suggestion and illusion. Where the circumstance of the stage bids he writes with shrewd, yet vivacious humor as in the music of the teetering eunuch, the senile emperor, the scintillant and snapping finale. His ceremonial music, though it is haunted by march rhythms, runs in energetically sonorous pomps of tone. Mystery, then sentiment and characterization always speak out of the music of Turandot, with little need or aid from extraneous suggestion. Yet more mysterious and fantastic are the broken phrases and rhythms of the nocturnal phantoms. Wholly atmospheric is the music of the harem in the soft and sensuous night. Yet through the whole Suite goes the capriciousness of mood, invention, method, means that is spice to a half-Chinese, half-Italian (and perhaps not a little German) fantasy. For once—to bring back beginnings—Mr. Busoni has been not only a singular but a stimulating composer. Largely and justly his hearers applauded him.

H. T. P.

From EVENING WORLD

Address: New York

Date 2/18/17

Boston Men Play, Frenchmen Also; Julia Culp Sings

By Sylvester Rawling.

BOSTON Symphony Orchestra concerts at Carnegie Hall, of which there was one last night, have a thing in common with Caruso nights at the opera—they are inevitably sold out. But the Boston organization has an advantage even over Caruso, in that the seats are paid for weeks before the season begins, leaving the subscribers at the mercy of Dr. Karl Muck, the conductor, for the musical provender he shall offer them. It seemed to many of us last night that Dr. Muck made too great use of his privilege when he inflicted upon us thirty-nine minutes of Max Reger's variations and fugue on a merry theme by J. A. Hiller (1770), for full orchestra. Let the "merry" pass. The theme was commonplace at that. But when it was followed by eleven variations and the fugue it became the most boresome thing imaginable. Long years of worship at the shrine of Major Higginson's superb orchestra could not make me refrain from the sacrilege of laughing at it, not with it, and most of the audience seemed to share my mood.

show the virtuosity of your unexcelled musicians, Dr. Muck? That was unnecessary. Hats off to your personal genius; but great conductors before you have led this band and, under the immutable decrees of Providence, great conductors will follow you. Peace still prevails between Germany and America. Why precipitate a campaign of musical frightfulness?

Beethoven's eighth symphony, Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" and Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride," all played with the splendid sonority and the exquisite musicianship that characterize the orchestra, helped to soothe us in retrospection of the Reger work.

From the Globe Feb. 18, 1917.

Witek and Warnke Soloists at the Symphony Concerts

The 15th program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall this week will present as soloists Heinrich Warnke, the admirable first cellist of the orchestra, and Anton Witek, the concertmaster. These two artists will play Brahms' concerto for violin and cello in A Minor. This will come almost as a novelty for it is very seldom heard. Its last performance here was by Alwin Schroeder and Willy Hess in 1910.

The program in its entirety comprises Cherubini's overture, "The Abencerrages"; Brahms' double concerto and Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony.

Cambridge Symphony Concert

Frances Nash, a young American pianist, who has already appeared here in recital with much success, will be the soloist at the sixth Symphony concert in Cambridge next Thursday evening. Miss Nash will play Sain-Saens' concerto in G Minor, No. 2. The program in its entirety comprises Brahms' First Symphony in C Minor, Saint-Saens' concerto and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

[89]

From EVENING NEWS

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date FEB 19 1917

BOSTON SYMPHONY

One of the most successful and wholly satisfying of this season's so numerous musical events was the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric Wednesday night. The program was particularly pleasing and well balanced, consisting of Sibelius' First Symphony, the Schumann Piano Concerto and the Paris version of Wagner's "Introduction and Bacchanale" from "Tannhauser."

The playing of the latter was a revelation of such intensity and emotional force, always, however dominated by powerful intellect, as Dr. Muck has never before given us. It was fortunate that this, some of the greatest music Wagner ever wrote, came at the end of the concert, as anything following would have been in the nature of an anti-climax.

The Sibelius symphony in E minor belongs essentially to that class of composition so apt to be overrated by some and underrated by others; for, while replete with beautiful suggestions, these never develop into anything really tangible, and as a result at the conclusion of the symphony the listener is vaguely conscious of tantalizing dreams never quite realized and climaxes never quite reached. The first movement is about as barren of interesting themes as any in existence, but the second is altogether appealing; for, though both melodies and harmonies are almost daringly obvious, in such days as these all is pervaded with so much atmosphere and individual coloring, as is also so often the case with Tschaikowsky, that what would in other hands be commonplace is covered with a sort of magic veil and becomes highly suggestive and poetic.

Of considerable interest to Baltimoreans was the first appearance here of the pianist, Carl Friedberg, who was heard Wednesday night in the Schumann A minor concerto. This is a composition demanding little in the way of pure virtuoso achievement, but more perhaps than any other of its kind, poetic imagery, tenderness and romance. Mr. Friedberg played the first movement in particular with a sympathy and intimate understanding of its subtle and delicate beauty altogether exceptional, and even if the rubato was a times somewhat unduly exaggerated the result was at any rate a vivid expression of the emotional side of the work. Considering how many pianists of eminence have played the composition here, this is high praise, indeed.

H. D. P.

STAR

Baltimore, Md.

FRIEDBERG SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Carl Friedberg, pianist, was the special attraction last night at the fourth local concert of the season at the Lyric Theater of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He played the Schumann concerto. The orchestral numbers were Sibelius' first symphony and the overture and bacchanale from Wagner's opera Tannhauser, Act I., Paris version. The usual capacity audience was present. Throughout the work of the orchestra was exceedingly well done, and the handling of the accompaniment to the concerto by both Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, and the orchestra deserves especial praise. In spite of Mr. Friedberg's nervous and exaggerated physical movements and his unfamiliar and, possibly, questionable translations upon occasion, he conveyed the impression of sincerity, and his reading of the concerto had an individuality which more than interested.

J. N. H.

TIMES

s: New York City

FEB 18 1917

The Boston Orchestra Plays.

At the second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts in Carnegie Hall, yesterday afternoon, the symphony was the first of Sibelius in E minor, a work of real beauty and substance, one that has well survived the seventeen or eighteen years since its production, and that may well be considered one of the best among modern symphonies. A truly creative imagination was stirred in this music, and its expression is something that can still give pleasure to listeners. It was splendidly played under Dr. Muck's direction, who had seriously searched for all the composer's intentions and realized them. The symphony was much applauded. The rest of the program was familiar matter—familiar in the Boston Orchestra's performance as well as in the performance of others—Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," Strauss's "Don Juan."

STAATS-ZEITUNG
New York City
FEB [illegible] 1917

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Vor dem üblichen ausverkauften Saal in Carnegie Hall spielte das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester gestern nachmittag ein sehr schönes Programm in der gewohnten meisterhaften Weise. Der Ersten Symphonie von Sibelius verlieh Dr. Muck das gebührend dunkle und eigenartige Kolorit, wodurch er die zahlreichen Schönheiten der Komposition in feinster Weise hob. Die Beethovensche „Egmont"-Ouverture wuchtete und hielt das Interesse bis zum Schluß fest, das Wagnersche „Siegfried-Idyll", so recht natürlich-einfach und wohlig angebracht, entfesselte den ganzen aparten Klangreiz des Orchesters, und der Straußsche „Don Juan" gestaltete sich zu einer Leistung von glühender Farbe, Stimmung und Virtuosität. Es ist ganz wunderbar, wie fein die einzelnen Gruppen wirkten und wie virtuos und ungezwungen sich alles zum Vollakkord zusammenfügte. Nach allen Nummern gab es einen begeisterten Beifall.

TIMES
ss: Washington, D. C.
FEB 17 19

Mrs. Wilson at Theater.

Mrs. Wilson occupied a box at the National yesterday afternoon at the Boston Symphony concert. She had with her Mrs. Lansing, wife of the Secretary of State; Mrs. Baker, wife of the Secretary of War; Mrs. E. T. Brown, of Atlanta, a guest at the White House; and Miss Helen Woodrow Bones. The Rev. Ward Denys, and Miss Dorothy Denys had in their box Mrs. George Barnett, Mrs. Arthur T. Brice and the Rev. Edward Dunlap. Mr. Vouros, charge d' affaires of Greece, was among the guests of Mrs. Calderon Carlisle, and Mr. and Mrs. Lisner had a large company in their box

EVENING JOURNAL
ss: New York City
FEB 19 '17

OTHER CONCERTS OF TWO DAYS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, for its Saturday matinee at Carnegie Hall, was concerned with the First Symphony of Jan Sibelius, played with much sympathy and real understanding by Dr. Muck; Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Richard Strauss's "Don Juan."

om EVENING TELEGRAM
dress: New York City
ate B 16

Beethoven's Eighth Symphony was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night in a manner befitting its golden beauty.

Why should this great orchestra devote part of its programme, as it did last night, to the overture to Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," when that work is now played so frequently in the opera house?

Another puzzling feature of last night's concert was the playing, faultless but wearisome, of Reger's variations on an insignificant little tune.

There were eleven variations, but they seemed as interminable as one hundred and eleven. Dr. Karl Muck is famous as a conductor. He is also notorious as a poor programme builder, and his shortcomings in this direction were in full evidence last night.

m EVENING TELEGRAM
ress: New York City
FEB 18
e

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon crowded much musical richness into the brief space of an hour and forty-five minutes.

Sibelius' First Symphony, played here by this organization at an earlier concert; Beethoven's "Egmond" overture, Wagner's "Siegfried" idyll and Strauss' "Don Juan" completed the programme, Dr. Karl Muck conducted.

[90]

From the Transcript Feb.24,1917.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

BRAHMS DULL VERSUS MOZART INSPIRED

The Contrasts of Dr. Muck's Classical Programme, Which Revived a Sterile Double Concerto and Set Against It the Fruitful "Jupiter Symphony"—Cherubini for Preface

IN programme-making, Dr. Muck has his little ironies. If a local work comes along, wading in amateurish muddiness, you may be sure that he will set directly against it some brilliant gem of orchestration. Prolixity brings conciseness on its head; triviality, inspired thought, tediousness, light gaiety, and so forth. Nor is this unfair, for the Symphony Concerts are justly grounds of Spartan testing, where the weak must brave the worst weathers and direct comparison with the strong. The results are often subtly humorous—and also instructive. The concert of yesterday was a beautiful example, with a double concerto of Brahms at his most tedious, put in the stocks between a brilliant overture, and a more brilliant symphony. Next week's programme may also have its antitheses.

Why this Double Concerto has been revived once more, is not to be explained. Suffice it that, the date once set, Dr. Muck made an object-lesson of it. For if any one has made a more labored, profuse, unvaried, and solidly conscientious concerto than this, it was not Brahms. The best that can be said of it is a touch of poetry here and there—a pleasing rhythmic idea, or a strain of songful melody. But these passages soon relapse into tedious thematic development, as reasoned, tiresomely deliberate, and as forced as the themes themselves are entirely lacking in remarkable or memorable characteristics. The first movement has cadenzas without even the lure of virtuosity. (For it is still a lure to some.) The Andante promises to be ingratiating at least, but it does not fulfill the promise; the finale starts with an enlivened rhythm—and again disappoints. Through it all, Mr. Witek and Mr. Warnke played their full scored parts with conscientious industry, and as much spirit as was grudgingly allowed to them. There was no diversity, no distinctiveness of orchestral coloring; in fact, scarcely any observable coloring at all, except that of the solo instruments standing to rich tonal advantage against an orchestral background. To use two, indeed to use any at all, seemed unnecessary; the themes and the elaborate working-out, humanity could have perfectly well dispensed with, in fact, there is no reason at all—except possibly the value of object-lessons, for the being of the concerto or for the quinquennial resurrection of it at the Symphony Concerts.

Cherubini preceded Brahms in the overture to his opera, "Les Abencérages," sparkling, witty, concise and light-mannered; definite and engaging of theme, and with crystalline clarity of orchestration. It is unpretentious, perhaps inconsequential yet with a certain fine dignity and with an unmistakable theatrical tang; it has the brevity of a composer, unweighted with any sense of his own importance, who has a keen eye on a definite and limited result, and it makes a stimulating swallow to throw one into a genial, musically expectant mood. And then the Double Concerto! What a blessing it is to be able to conquer one's gravity. Cherubini was an aging, poor, and disappointed man, famous for his choleric disposition; he was eminently contrapuntal, and musically learned; one-half of his composition was church-music. But the overture has not a shadow to mar its brightness.

After the unfortunate Concerto came a masterpiece at the very opposite pole, the "Jupiter Symphony" of Mozart. If some Germans are noted for their ponderous absence of humor, there are other Germans to tip the balance. Mozart knew suffering and neglect, and he did not know appreciation. He had to compose by courtesy or contract such uncongenial hybrids as double concertos. He, too, had his Joachims and his Hausmanns to oblige. But he did not devote laborious, conscientious and earnest months to his concerto-making, and having finished one he did not anxiously tramp Germany with the manuscript in his hand. He met the matter as lightly as you please, turned forth the music in two sittings to warm the hearts of simple-minded virtuosi and gratify their pomposity. They never suspected that he was having his little joke and tossing them a sop, scarcely disturbed in the process of his real and creative work. The concertos are duly forgotten, and everybody is let off easily. But with Brahms it is far different, and the result of his intense seriousness and tediously important application is a musical world loaded with burdens and duties it has not even yet been able to shake off, owing to the influence of unreasonable, fond and immoderate Brahmsites.

Mozart treated his world the more easily, while it treated him the more hardly, with its stupidity and unhandsome indifference. He always had his fun with it; it never knew whether he was giving them a masterpiece or merely an order well fulfilled, and it was usually the latter. When a masterpiece did come along, such as the "Jupiter Symphony," he clothed it in the semblance of the accepted ways and mannerisms, and it passed among a hundred others, a little less agreeably by virtue of its innovations. That same world was peacefully oblivious of the fact that each little added detail or flourish—a soft note from the flutes, or a counter-melody from the 'celli—was a wondrous and unprecedented stroke of genius; that outward pomposity, "to tickle long ears" as Mozart said, was in reality the dignity and nobility and immortal serenity which some one since associated with Olympus; that the elaborating figures of the slow movement in reality breathed in every delicate nate the elation of great genius; that the delicate course of the whole pivoted again and again on gleams of the most delicate coloring. The Finale was to some a good burlesque on a sober cantus firmus, to some an interesting turn in contrapuntal ingenuity, to most, a merely repetitious and circumstantial string of clap-trap, to be yawned at as the approved and unnoteworthy way to wind up a symphony. While its intricate canonical and fugal manipulations, with inversions and stretti and all the rest, five deep, absorb the pedagogues, they pass the layman unnoticed in a few scintillating moments, while both are smug enough to believe that they have heard it all.

No one could hear it all with live appreciation except the master himself, with his superhuman clarity and fineness of musical conception. So intricacy passes for simplicity—the supreme joke of all; while the supremacy of genius is to make the most profuse elaboration heighten with every stroke the elemental melodic and rhythmic structural lines, intensifying instead of concealing them. It is genius making sport of the learned contrapuntalists. (Wagner had his laugh, too, in the "Meistersinger" Prelude.) Brahms belongs to that learned kind. Play Mozart's bubbling Finale as a slow movement, emphasizing every voice and pointing out every cog of its machinery, and you would produce something akin to Brahms, who in a certain Double Concerto at least laid bare the "insides" and spread forth his counterpoint with the most painstaking deliberation. Thus the "Jupiter Symphony" is still playing its pranks and pointing its morals, to the discomfiture of another unfortunate pedant, and to the enjoyment of another conductor, inasmuch as Dr. Muck is with Mozart in those marvellous details of genius, balancing and proportioning them to perfect advantage, combining breathless speed with a translucent nicety of every turning and tripping phrase, transfixing all with the pervading mood which mingles unaccountably the highest spirits and the loftiest inspiration. For it is indeed a divine joke, the subtler for that reason. And Mozart at his best gazing directly upon Brahms at his worst is God's sunshine looking down upon a struggling mortal of a toiler, who has set his plough to stony ground and is bound to see it through.

J. N. B.

From the Transcript Feb.23,1917

THE CONCERT RECORD

A Symphony Concert at Cambridge with Miss Nash for an Able and Interesting Young Pianist—Mr. McCormack in American Songs, or Sentiment Upon Sentiment

THE Symphony Concert at Cambridge, last night, was divided between two classics, the First Symphony of Brahms and the Egmont Overture, and a novelty, Miss Frances Nash, playing in Saint-Saëns's piano Concerto in G minor. As for the Symphony and the Overture, they are of the sort that successive seasons and many hearings confirm as masterpieces to live and grow with; that never wear out, but are always welcome at every return with the resilience and life which Dr. Muck always gives to them. If we have come to take the familiar figures of the Egmont Overture and its theatrical orchestration as a matter of course, it is like the permanently standing works of genius that, as it seems, always have been and always will be. And the huge and expansive Symphony of Brahms, with his most pregnant themes, his best development, and his best inspiration, shows, in its long and varied course, no parts that wear. All of the movements vie for supremacy, from the introduction of the manifold first, to the culmination of the impassioned last, through many pages to a magnificently graduated climax, and ending seemingly by its own gathered impetus.

Miss Nash did not have fair judgment at her introductory recital in Boston, early in the season. A calumny was circulated that she was a society girl, whose parents had directed her into pianistic occupation for want of another. This rumor, added to her extremely comely appearance, prejudiced against her those who would judge her from a purely musical standpoint, but who tend to regard with suspicion a musician who gives some care to her looks. All of this is beside the point, for music speaks eloquently for itself. It tells in a moment about character, motives, sincerity, and artistic devotion, and in Miss Nash it bespeaks beyond doubt her truly musical nature, her devotion, her intent application and thoroughness, her intelligence and emotional eagerness which will inevitably guide her to excellent place in her calling. In the Concerto of Saint-Saëns she set herself a difficult task, for the work is a swift one, which Dr. Muck gave no thought to slackening in the least, and a large-voiced one of virile chords and octaves beyond the strength of young and slight femininity. Miss Nash accordingly had to race through it at the top of her bent and the utmost of her muscle. She came through it, not as commandingly and clearly as might be, but nevertheless, with alert and instantaneous response to its requirements, with efficiency, skill, good generalship, and emotional comprehension and expression; in short, with captivating success. Her recital, in more quiet and thoughtful vein, revealed in her a poise and self-sufficiency in individual expression not called for in a concerto of Saint-Saëns, and an emotional penetration beyond her years and beyond the limited potentialities which the French composer offers.

Sentiment Upon Sentiment

Old airs from Händel and Mozart, songs from German and Russian composers, all indeed of the usual matter of Mr. McCormack's programmes, except the Irish folk-tunes which his audiences cannot be persuaded to spare, made way at his third concert in Symphony Hall last evening for pieces by American composers. The tenor sang them—from McDowell, from Nevin, from Chadwick, from Burleigh and various minor others. The assisting violinist, Mr. McBeath, played them—from Cottehet (which in this instance was diluted Massenet) and from Burleigh again, twice over.

Perhaps such a programme was the chosen way of Mr. McCormack to note the national holiday upon which the concert fell; perhaps for good measure in his United States citizenry, he would add these many American pages to the "first papers" now stowed in his strong box. More probably, the twelve songs from American pens that preceded or followed the Irish melodies gave him congenial exercise for not a few of his abilities and predilections. If he might not sing the coiling arabesques and the moulded or the melting phrases of Händel and Mozart with his wonted suppleness and adeptness, sentiment and elegance in such music, the more or less straightforward mellifluousness of the chosen American composers awaited him—the clear melody, the long ascending progressions, the fluent phrases, the climax that either swells loud or whispers low, the rhythms and the modulations that no attentive ear may escape.

No, the songs of American composers as Mr. McCormack's programme exemplified them, the songs of American composers in general, are not yet the lyric offspring of a sophisticated breed. Only the quasi-Europeanized, imitative, or as some say "degenerate," youth (with an elder or two, like the resident, "very personal" and by no means native Loeffler to point the way) try to do as the Parisians do with esoteric moods, ironic introspection, melancholy vision or fantastic symbol. No more, because it is even less thair nature to do so, do they walk in the ways of the erotic, the disillusioned or the vivid Germans—of Strauss, or Weingartner or even Wolf. And scarcely one, unless negro blood runs in him, is wise enough to seek and transmute, Russian-fashion, the folk-song we Americans may obscurely and questioningly possess. The average American song, as the pieces from Nevin, Chadwick and minor hands went over and over again last evening, is a thing of average sentiment, touched with good-natured humor, a pretty fancy, each as average in kind, climbing easily up mellifluous measures to obvious and "effective" climax. No bitter moods disturb, no "illicit" longings fire it; no folk-note makes it pungent. It is the common sentiment (or sentimentality) in the common vernacular of tones, sure to kindle a like tempered audience when the uncommon voice, skill and sentiment of a McCormack sings it in excelsis, and every crowded corner of Symphony or Carnegie halls vibrates to both. But the exception—it is easy to hear in protesting whisper—were the songs and violin pieces of Mr. Burleigh, who at least has his background of negro folk-pieces; but in his Afro-American strain, it is the latter and not the former element that comes uppermost when he sets pen to music-paper. But—and the whisper is now stout affirmation—the exception was MacDowell, and all the world knows it. Perhaps in some of his songs, but in those that Mr. McCormack sang yesterday, he is no more than a sentimental composer with a happier imagination than some of his fellows.

From the Record Feb.22,1917.

Boston Music Lovers to Hear Noted Soloists at Concerts Current Week

Soloists With the Symphony This Week

Anton Witek, left, concert master of the Symphony Orchestra, and Heinrich Warnke, right, this week's featured players.

It has always been one of the glories of Boston's great orchestra that from its ranks could step at any time virtuosi who well can stand comparison with the greatest artists that travel up and down the country in solitary grandeur.

It is no less true today than it has been in the past and this week's concerts, tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening, will present as soloists Anton Witek, the concert-master, and Heinrich Warnke, the leading 'cellist.

Each of these is justly admired for his accomplishments as an artist. They will play the rarely beautiful and seldom-heard Double Concerto for violin and violoncello by Brahms.

From the Monitor Feb.24,1917.

MUSIC NOTES

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, pianist, will be the soloist at the Symphony concerts of March 2 and 3. She will take part in a revival of her own piano concerto in C sharp minor. At these concerts the "Hora Mystica" symphony of Charles M. Loeffler will be performed for the first time in Boston. The work calls for a large modern orchestra and a chorus of men's voices. Singers from the Choral Music Society will assist in its presentation. Mr. Loeffler wrote the work in the summer of 1915 and produced it at the Norfolk, Conn., music festival last year. The program will begin with Goldmark's "Spring" overture, the concerto will be the second number, the symphony will come at the end.

From the Monitor Feb.24,1917.

MESSRS. WITEK AND WARNKE PLAY IN BRAHMS PIECE

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Karl Muck, Conductor; Anton Witek and Heinrich Warnke, Soloists—Fifteenth program, presented in Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass., afternoon of Feb. 23: Cherubini, overture to the opera, "Les Abencérages"; Brahms, concerto in A minor for violin and violoncello, with orchestra (Mr. Witek, violinist, and Mr. Warnke, violoncellist); Mozart, symphony in C major, "Jupiter."

Dr. Muck maneuvered well to win the attention of his public to a dry classic. For in choosing concerts at which to present the work of Brahms for solo violin, solo violoncello and orchestra, he took the pair falling after the fortnight's interim caused by a monthly tour. He could thus expect fresh and keen audiences. In addition to this, when arranging his program he permitted nothing to precede the piece but a curtain-raising overture by Cherubini. So, whether the Symphony conductor shines or not in the grand strategy of the show business, whether in the long run he is a brilliant program-maker or, as some say, but an indifferent one, he must at least be accepted as a good field tactician.

He probably knew from his own experience and from that of other orchestra leaders, too, that the ponderous Brahms work, in order to be successful, at all events in the United States, must not only be the most important number as far as position on the program goes, but must furthermore be the main thing to which the house is to turn its afternoon's or evening's thinking. He, perhaps, knew how far the piece fell short of the desired effect when Max Fiedler, in the Boston Symphony concerts of seven seasons ago, treated it as a breezy introduction to the "Zarathustra" tone poem of Strauss; and he must have known how, according to report, it missed the mark when Frederick Stock, at a recent Chicago Symphony concert, made it a light diversion, following the second "Leonora" overture and the fifth symphony of Beethoven.

Shrewdly and honestly the conductor brought the double concerto forward as a sufficient task in listening for the Symphony public for one day. To his great praise, he acknowledged it to be what its outward design plainly declares it, an intellectual crossways.

It were only a revival of civil and flattering phrases to tell how the concertmaster and the first violoncellist, taking their desks out to the front of the platform, read the solo parts in the massive opening movement of this composition. It were a long story to tell how one minute the lighter toned instrument called listeners down the road to the left, how the next minute the heavier toned one called them to the right, and finally how the two grew disputatious, leaving wayfarers on the musical highway uncertain which way to turn.

The Brahms music, in particular the far from breezy, yet interesting and elevating allegro, gave the matinee such acclaim as it had. The Cherubini overture had too roughshod a presentation to count significantly in the year's record. The Mozart symphony was played with the big, distorted sonority of all Eighteenth Century works in the orchestra's repertory. But no doubt the "Jupiter" symphony keeps its proportions when magnified to the modern standard of sound better than most old masterpieces.

From he Post Feb.25,1917.

Charles Martin Loeffler's new symphony, "Hora Mystica," will be played for the first time in Boston next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At the same pair of concerts Mrs. H. H. A. Beach will play her own violin concerto. Mr. Loeffler's symphony had its first performance in Norfolk, Conn., last June. This symphony is scored for full orchestra and men's voices. It will enlist the services of the admirable male chorus which took part in the performances of Liszt's "Faust" Symphony at Christmas time. This chorus consists of 80 singers from the Choral Music Society, trained by Stephen S. Townsend.

Here follows Mr. Loeffler's own explanation of his symphony: "The mood is one of religious meditation and adoration of nature. A lonely pilgrim winds his way through a land of ever-changing enchantments, a land where clouds move like a procession of nuns over the hills or descend upon a lake, changing it into a mysterious gray sea—a land where shepherds still pipe to their flocks. From far away comes a curious tolling of village church bells. At last the wanderer stands before the cathedral of a Benedictine monastery contemplating its beauty—even the grotesque beauty of the gargoyles, placed on the house of worship to ward off evil spirits. In the church, with its rose-window still aglow with the last evening light, the office of compline—known to the Benedictine monks as Hora Mystica—is tendered to God, and peace descends into the soul of the pilgrim."

The symphony is woven around the recitation of the capitulum, "Tu autem in nobis es, Domine," the chant, "In manus tuas, Domine, commendo spiritum meum" and the antiphone, "Salve Regina."

The principal theme of the symphony is inspired by the response of the capitulum, "Deo gratias." In the first part, preceding the principal allegro, the different motives gradually develop into themes; the exposition of themes takes place in this introduction. The allegro is followed by an adagio, which in turn leads back to the allegro and the recitation of the capitulum, "Tu autem in nobis es, Domine." Then follow the chants in unison, "In manus tuas" and "Salve Regina." The symphonic part is closely interwoven with these chants. The antiphone, "Salve Regina," is the cantus firmus of the adagio, with the repetition of which the work closes.

The succession of notes on the bells, B-flat, D-flat, E-flat, F, A-flat, B-flat, comes from an old Benedictine monastery, near which the composer also noted the curious tolling of smaller village church bells. This motive is rendered in the beginning of the work by the harps, and recurs repeatedly.

The orchestra employed is as follows: Three flutes (third interchangeable with piccolo); three oboes, English horn, three clarinets and bass clarinet, three bassoons, four horns, four trumpets, three trombones, bass tuba, four kettle-drums, seven bells, two harps, piano, celesta, strings.

The symphony was written in the summer of 1915.

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, who for many years was a resident of Boston, spent several years preceding the beginning of the war in Germany, where she was highly honored by musicians of that country. Since her return to America she has been doing much work as a pianist. She played her concerto for piano in C-sharp minor with the orchestra under Mr. Gericke in 1900.

From the Globe Feb.25,1917.

Mr Loeffler's Symphony This Week

Dr Muck has put on his program for this week Friday and Saturday Charles Martin Loeffler's new symphony, "Hora Mystica," which has been anticipated as an important novelty of the year. The symphony was first played last June at the Norfolk (Conn) festival. It is in one movement, scored for full orchestra and men's voices, again employing the admirable male choir of the Choral Music Society, of which Stephen S. Townsend is conductor.

Mr Loeffler has supplied this as the program of his symphony:

"The mood is one of religious meditation and adoration of Nature. A lonely pilgrim winds his way through a land of ever-changing enchantments, a land where clouds move like a procession of nuns over the hills or descend upon a lake, changing it into a mysterious gray sea—a land where shepherds still pipe to their flocks. From far away comes a curious tolling of village church bells. At last the wanderer stands before the cathedral of a Benedictine monastery, contemplating its beauty—even the grotesque beauty of the gargoyles, placed on the house of worship to ward off evil spirits. In the church, with its rose-window still aglow with the last evening light, the office of compline—known to the Benedictine monks as Hora Mystica—is tendered to God, and peace descends into the soul of the pilgrim.

"The symphony is woven round the recitation of the capitulum, 'Tu autem in nobis es, Domine,' the chant, 'In manus tuas, Domine,' commendo spiritum meum' and the antiphone, 'Salve Regina.' The principal theme of the symphony is inspired by the response of the capitulum: 'Deo gratias.' In the first part, preceding the principal allegro, the different motives gradually develop into themes; the exposition of themes takes place in this introduction. The allegro is followed by an adagio, which in turn leads back to the allegro, and the recitation of the capitulum, 'Tu autem in nobis es Domine.' Then follow the chants in unison: 'In manus tuas' and 'Salve Regina.' The symphonic part is closely interwoven with these chants. The antiphone, 'Salve Regina,' is the cantus firmus of the adagio with the repetition of which the work closes."

The succession of notes on the bells, B-flat, D-flat, E-flat, F, A-flat, B-flat, comes from an old Benedictine monastery, near which the composer also noted the curious tolling of smaller village church bells. This motive is rendered in the beginning of the work by the harps and recurs repeatedly.

The orchestra employed is as follows: Three flutes (third interchangeable with piccolo), 3 oboes, English horn, 3 clarinets and bass clarinet, 3 bassoons, 4 horns, 4 trumpets, 3 trombones, bass tuba, 4 kettle-drums, 7 bells, 2 harps, piano, celesta, strings. The symphony was written in the Summer of 1915.

At these concerts Mrs H. H. A. Beach, the composer-pianist, who long made Boston her home, will appear as soloist with the orchestra, playing her own concerto in C-sharp minor, which she played also under Mr Gericke in 1900. Preceding the war Mrs Beach spent several years in Germany, where she enjoyed many honors from the musicians of that country.

The program entire will be: Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring"; Mrs Beach's concerto, herself as pianist, and Mr Loeffler's symphony.

From the Herald Feb.25,1917.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The program of the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening contains one of the most important novelties of the year, Mr. Loeffler's new symphony, "Hora Mystica." It had its first performance in Norfolk, Ct., last June. Its title is "Hora Mystica," symphony in one movement for full orchestra and men's voices. This last requirement will bring to the concerts a chorus that pleased greatly in the performances of Liszt's "Faust" symphony at Christmas time.

The following is Mr. Loeffler's explanation of his symphony:

"Hora Mystica": Symphony in one movement for full orchestra and men's voices. The mood is one of religious meditation and adoration of nature. A lonely pilgrim winds his way through a land of ever-changing enchantments, a land where clouds move like a procession of nuns over the hills or descend upon a lake, changing it into a mysterious gray sea—a land where shepherds still pipe to their flocks. From far away comes a curious tolling of village church bells. At last the wanderer stands before the cathedral of a Benedictine monastery, contemplating its beauty—even the grotesque beauty of the gargoyles, placed on the house of worship to ward off evil spirits. In the church, with its rose-window still aglow with the last evening light, the office of compline—known to Benedictine monks as Hora Mystica—is tendered to God, and peace descends into the soul of the pilgrim.

Mrs. Beach, for many years a resident of Boston, spent several years preceding the beginning of the war in Germany. Since her return she has been doing much work as a pianist. Her piano concerto was played by her with the orchestra under Mr. Gericke in 1900.

The program is as follows:

Goldmark—Overture, "In the Spring."
Beach—Concerto in C sharp minor for piano and orchestra.
Loeffler—"Hora Mystica": Symphony in one movement.

The length of this concert is one hour and 45 minutes.

From the Transcript Feb.24,1917.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Mr. Loeffler's New Symphony and Mrs. Beach's Concerto for Piano Upon Dr. Muck's Programme — Mr. Ornstein in Music by Chopin and Ravel—Miss Stanley and Mrs. Baker for Singers—Three New Violinists

FOR the first times in public performance, Mr. Loeffler's symphony for full orchestra and men's voices, "Hora Mystica," will be heard at the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening after a fortnight of sedulous rehearsal and much longer private study by Dr. Muck himself. The piece runs in a single movement without pause; it is written for full but not inflated modern orchestra, augmented by seven bells and for a choir of male voices which, toward the end chants the holy hymn, "Salve Regina." The symphony is the first that Mr. Loeffler has written; he composed it in the summer and the autumn of 1915; and it was played for the first time, with the composer conducting, in semi-private performance in the Music Festival at Norfolk last June, making deep impression alike through singularity of idiom and high imaginative and poetic quality. At that time the music was described at length in the Transcript and before the performances of next week, there will be occasion to return to it. For the time being suffice it to say that no novel piece of the season is likely to excite or deserve keener interest. On Dr. Muck's programme it will be preceded by Goldmark's spirited and fanciful overture, "In the Spring"—by which sign inclement weather may be expected next Friday and Saturday—and by Mrs. Beach's concerto in C-sharp minor for piano and orchestra, in which the composer, reappearing at the Symphony Concerts for the first time in sixteen years, will play the solo part. In Mr. Loeffler's music, the admirable choir, assembled and trained by Mr. Stephen Townsend and well tested in the performance of Liszt's Faust Symphony at Christmas time, will again assist the orchestra.

From REPUBLICAN Address: Springfield, Mass. Date FEB 18 191

BOSTON SYMPHONY

To Play Wagner Program Here on Tuesday Night

The musical event of the coming week will be the last of the Ellis subscription concerts in the Auditorium. This brings the second visit of the season of the Boston symphony orchestra under Dr Karl Muck and in response to the urgent requests of a large number of the subscribers of Springfield Dr Muck has made a program composed entirely of music by Richard Wagner. The orchestra leaves Boston Tuesday afternoon by special train and returns to Boston directly after the concert. It brings its entire personnel of 100 men for the program, as the "Siegfried" and "Goetterdaemmerung" selections require practically the entire force of the orchestra.

As already announced, the program comprises the "Rienzi" overture, the "Siegfried Idyl," Hans Richter's arrangement of selections from "Siegfried and Goetterdaemmerung," the "Lohengrin" prelude, selections from "Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg" and the "Tannhaeuser" overture. This makes a program which lasts about an hour and three-quarters. For a public which has practically no opportunity to hear Wagner's works in their proper form on the operatic stage and only limited opportunities to hear excerpts from the music dramas in concert form, this fourth Ellis concert assumes at once unusual importance.

The day has long since passed when the artistic value of Wagner's mus was under discussion. He is regar ed to-day as the crowning genius o the mid-19th century, the highest point reached in the development of the so-called "romantic period." As such a genius he is unique. He has had many followers and many imitators, but none has even approached him. His influence in absolute music was only less than his influence in opera. The development started by Berlioz and Liszt was completed by him and it may be truthfully said that despite Richard Strauss and Claude Debussy, there has been since Wagner practically no advance in music. In him culminated the slow growth of modern music which began with Bach.

The program which Dr Muck has made for this concert is not only interesting in itself, but is interesting from a historical point of view in that it displays the most striking periods of Wagner's development. "Rienzi," the overture of which will be played, was his first successful opera; "Tannhaeuser," of which the overture will be heard, shows him for the first time complete master of his own individual mode of expression; the prelude to "Lohengrin" gives us the germ of the wonderful "Parsifal" which was to follow 30 years later; while the selections from "Siegfried and Goetterdaemmerung" and "Die Meistersinger" show him at the very flower of his genius. Finally, the "Siegfried Idyl" gives us an interesting view of the devoted husband and fond father.

The program in its proper form is as follows:—

Overture to "Rienzi."
"A Siegfred Idyl."
Selections from "Siegfried" and Goetterdaemmerung."
Prelude to "Lohengrin."
Selections from "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."
Overture to "Tannhaeuser."

From REPUBLICAN Address: Springfield, Mass. Date FEB 19

Series of Ellis Concerts Planned for Next Season

The series of concerts given in the Auditorium this season under the direction of C. A. Ellis of Symphony hall, Boston, which come to a close to-morrow evening with a special Wagner concert by the Boston symphony orchestra, has been very successful and Mr Ellis is so well pleased with the results that he has already completed plans for a similar series next season, an announcement of which will be made shortly. The plan of concluding the present series with a special Wagner program rendered by the orchestra has met with popular approval and the advance sale of tickets has been considerably larger than that of any previous symphony concert in Springfield.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau Journal

Address: Providence, R.

The season of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is rapidly approaching its end. The fifth concert, which is announced to be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, March 6, will be the last but one of the series 1916-1917. The soloist at this concert will be Elena Gerhardt, who will sing two groups of songs with orchestra. The first group will consist of four songs by Beethoven and the second of three songs by Hugo Wolf. The rest of the programme is yet to be announced.

From REPUBLICAN Address: Springfield, Mass. Date FEB 17 1

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Success of Organization in Large Cities —Final in Ellis Course

Dr. Karl Muck, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, who comes here with the orchestra at the last of the Ellis concerts Tuesday evening, in a Wagner program, has recently had a series of demonstrations of cordiality from his audiences which have been most remarkable from every point of view. They began in Boston on Saturday evening, the 3d. He was applauded warmly for over three minutes on his appearance at the beginning of the concert. This was repeated at the following Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts and in the present week when the orchestra has been giving its fourth series of concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Brooklyn and New York, the demonstrations for him and for the orchestra have been even warmer. This has been gratifying to all the friends of the orchestra to say nothing of Dr Muck himself, for it shows that the loyal-hearted American public is not to be disturbed in its attitude toward music by the prevailing political crisis.

The sale of tickets has been much ahead of the previous concert given by the orchestra earlier in the course and the audience Tuesday evening is expected to be the largest that has ever attended a Boston symphony concert in Springfield.

[91]

From UNION Address: Springfield, Mass. Date FEB 18 1917

MUSICAL NOTES

The final concert of the Ellis series is to come in the Auditorium Tuesday night, when Dr. Karl Muck and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give, in response to numerous requests, an all-Wagner program, beginning at 8.15 and lasting about one and three quarters hours. For a public which has but little opportunity to hear Wagner's works as they should be heard, with adequate scenery and in their operatic form and only limited opportunities to hear excerpts from the music dramas in concert form, this fourth Ellis concert assumes at once unusual importance.

The day has long since passed when the artistic value of Wagner's music was under discussion. He is recognized today as the crowning genius of the mid-nineteenth century, the highest point reached in the development of the so-called "Romantic Period." As such a genius he is unique. He has had many followers and many imitators, but none has ever approached him. His influence in absolute music was only less than his influence in opera. The development started by Berlioz and Liszt was completed by him and it may be truthfully said, that despite Richard Strauss and Claude Debussy, there has been since Wagner practically no advance in music. In him culminated the slow growth of modern music which began with Bach.

The program which Dr. Muck has made for this concert is not only interesting in itself, including much that is most beautiful and thrilling music, but is interesting from an historical point of view in that it displays the most stirring periods of Wagner's development. "Rienzi," the Overture of which opens the program, was his first successful opera; "Tannhauser," of which the overture will be heard, shows him for the first time complete master of his individual mode of expression; the prelude to "Lohengrin" gives us the germ of the wonderful "Parsifal" which was to follow 30 years later; while the selections from "Siegfried and Gotterdammerung" and "Die Meistersinger" show him at the very flower of his genius. Finally the "Siegfried Idyl" gives us an interesting view of the devoted husband and fond father.

Mme. Schumann-Heink, Contralto.

The Auditorium on Friday, March 2, will have a good audience to hear the singer who is unquestionably the world's greatest contralto, Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink, the third artist in the remarkable series which has already included Amato and Elman. Her program will be designed to show her wonderful versatility, and will undoubtedly contain one or more of the famous Wagnerian arias, which her interpretations have done much to make famous. She has appeared with all the world's most famous conductors; and in her present season she is featured at several of the big symphony concerts in New York, Chicago, Philadelphia and St. Louis. The symphony orchestras in each of these cities have contracted for two concerts by the famous artist. It is worth noting that directors like Walter Damrosch, Frederic Stock, Leopold Stokowski and Max Zach in selecting the soloists for orchestra concerts are guided by judgment and experience; they know the artists upon whom absolute dependence can be placed, and they know which of the many artists can be relied upon to attract the public. Schumann-Heink is always elected to fill the most important solo engagements; the glory of her voice is no whit diminished, her hold upon the public is stronger than ever.

From EVENING TRIBUNE Address: Providence, R. I. Date

Coming Boston Symphony Concert.

The fifth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is announced to be given in Infantry Hall Tuesday evening, March 6, and this will be the last but one of the series of 1916-1917.

The soloist at this concert will be Elena Gerhardt. Miss Gerhardt is no stranger in Providence and she has here a large body of admirers as wherever she has sung, for she is not only the possessor of a voice of great beauty, but she sings with very unusual skill and taste. She will sing two groups of songs with orchestra. The first group will be four songs by Beethoven and the second group three songs by Hugo Wolf. The rest of the program is yet to be announced.

The program to be given at the Russian tea to be held in Churchill House by the Chopin Club on March 1 is to be one of unusual interest. Miss Claire Forbes, pianist, of Boston and Mr. Josef Slenczynski, violinist, will be heard in the following numbers: "Romance," from Concerto in D-minor, Wieniawski; "Tarantelle," op. 16, Wieniawski, for violin, and "Bigarrue," Avensky; "Songe d'une Mere," Alsimenko; "Humereske," Rachmaninow; "Berceuse," Stawinsky; "Calenza and Finale," from B-minor Concerto, Tschaikowsky, for piano.

The talk to be given by Mrs. John R. MacArthur in the Bridgham auditorium on Thursday evening, March 1, under the auspices of the Chopin Club, will do much to stimulate the interest in community singing. Mrs. MacArthur is interested in the community work for the city, the hospitals, the prisons and the settlements, and she brings the growing need of it before us most vividly. The Community Chorus will sing under its director, Mr. John B. Archer, among other songs: "Annie Laurie," "Sweet and Low" and "The Pilgrims' Chorus," beside "America," "My Old Kentucky Home," "Old Black Joe" and "Auld Lang Syne," which will be sung by the chorus and audience. The quintet from the Chopin Club, under the direction of Virginia B. Anderson, will play "Three County Dances," from the English suite by George St. George and two of the dances from the "Egyptian Ballet," by Luigini.

Miss Harriet Eudora Barrows will give the first of a series of song recitals by her pupils in Churchill House to-morrow evening. Those who will give the program to-morrow evening are Mrs. Frederic W. Howe, Mrs. Hope Williams Shaw, Mrs. Marguerite Watson Shaftoe, Mrs. Gertrude McCrackan Mitchell, Mrs. Helen Shepard Udell, Miss Minnette Sutherland, Miss Hope Heyworth, Miss Bertha Monast, Miss Ethel Watt[illegible], Harry Hughes.

Plain Dealer
Cleveland
FEB 26 1917

The yearly visit of the Boston symphony orchestra always brings with it a sort of festive spirit of expectation, somewhat akin to the flutter of excitement that the coming of a famous prima donna calls forth.

There is good reason for this anticipatory pleasure, for though this organization never, in Cleveland, at any rate, calls upon a soloist to add to the interest of the occasion, it can be depended upon to fill an evening to repletion with good things, musically speaking, and without extraneous aid. So could others of our visiting orchestras, but we should be sorry to miss the many solo performers of distinction who are heard with them. However, once in a way, and when it is, furthermore, so excellent a way as the Bostonians provide, an evening of purely orchestral music is very delightful.

The large and enthusiastic audience at the Grays armory last night found it so, and showed its interest and pleasure in no uncertain fashion.

A program of great brilliancy was presented, beginning with Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor, which was the most extended work played, and closing with a magnificient performance of Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," in which the 100 virtuosos of the Boston company of players reveled merrily in the solution of the baffling intricacies and stupendous difficulties of the score.

There was an ease in the doing of this that, given less alert, authoritative and plastic leading than that of Dr. Carl Muck might carry its own peril of perfunctoriness. But there was no suggestion of this in any of last night's performances. Along with confidence in assured and masterful ability there was also splendid zest and fine animation, and with it all a tone of surpassing warmth and thrilling intensity.

The Franck symphony is a work of unusual interest, and a work, too, of much more evenly sustained inspiration than most of the composer's productions. There are few moments that fail to hold the attention, and there are passages of enthralling beauty, as, for example, the second theme of the first movement, a melody of really haunting loveliness.

There was great applause after the grandiose finale, and after Dr. Muck had responded to recalls to the stage he called upon the men of the orchestra to rise for their richly earned share in the plaudits.

Other orchestral numbers were the overture to "The Corsair" by Berlioz and Borodin's sketch "On the Steppes of Middle Asia." Of the first it may be said that the rendition of it was an astonishing tour de force on the part of the orchestra, and, especially, the string section.

But not all the art of the Bostonians can win beauty from the music of Berlioz, whose pen was as facile as his muse was reluctant. The Borodin composition is not a vastly important work, but very attractive in its quasi-oriental coloring, and characteristically Russian in outline and structure, albeit less plangent and impetuous than most of the music of Slavic origin with which we are familiar.

From REPUBLICAN
Address: Springfield, Mass.
Date FEB 21

basketball.

AT WAGNER CONCERT

E SCHMIDT AS CONDUCTOR

STRONG SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Dr Muck Prevented by Illness from Leading Boston Orchestra at Final Ellis Concert

On account of the illness of Dr Muck, the concert by the Boston symphony orchestra given in the Auditorium last evening in the Ellis course was conducted by Ernst Schmidt, assistant conductor. It was his first appearance in this city, and the audience fully appreciated his merits, even while regretting the absence of Dr Muck on so special an occasion as this—a Wagner program of notable quality which had been prepared long in advance, and of which much was expected. Twenty years ago orchestras were still giving Wagner programs by way of propaganda. The need for that has long since gone by, and such a concert as this serves rather for review and reappraisal, with a certain element of challenge from both sides, the old and the ultra-modern. It is the more important to have the performance as vitalizing as it can be made.

From this point of view doubtless something was lost; an assistant conductor, no matter how capable, cannot fully replace his chief. He has not so free a hand, and the interpretation which he executes is the creation of another with which his own ideas may not precisely correspond. The situation is one calling for competence, tact, and a degree of self-subordination rather than for the full measure of the conductor's power. When the instrument is so perfect as the Boston symphony orchestra, nothing worse happens than a slight check, hardly noticeable except to a close listener, upon the surplus energy which makes the difference between an ordinary and an inspired performance. Neither an individual nor an organized group can be always in the upper ether, and the chances of such an uplift are at a minimum when the conductor is neither the regular head of the orchestra nor a celebrated outsider whose masterful will is challenging the men to follow him in the paths of adventure. This handicap aside, Mr Schmidt's work was excellent, and the orchestra as always played with consummate perfection; nothing was lacking but a little of the extra intensity and force of which Dr Muck is at times capable, as in his notable reading of the "Eroica" at Smith college last season, and to which this Wagner program would no doubt have inspired him.

It was a program admirably chosen to show Wagner's music at its best and in its development. It began with a very familiar early work, the "Rienzi" overture, in which looking backward we may see the germs of Wagnerism, but which would have had not great significance, and very likely would by this time have been shelved along with much fine 19th century music if his growth had stopped there. The finale is sonorous and effective, but it gathers way slowly, and in the period of "watchful waiting" through which many fine works pass there is not a little that is commonplace and immature. It is a stirring concert piece, but it would be idle to claim that it adequately represents the vast and original genius of Wagner. Then came the exquisite "Siegfried Idyl," a favorite with many who do not profess themselves Wagnerites, and surely one of the loveliest things from its composer's pen. Would it have survived from what now seems a remote past if Wagner had been but a composer of delicately charming idyls? It may be doubted; his resounding fame has given the world ears even for this by-product of his art, otherwise the idyl would be caviare to the general.

The real Wagner, the Wagner that turned the world upside down, came upon the stage with the superb selection made by his disciple and foremost interpreter, Hans Richter, from two of the "Ring" dramas, "Siegfried" and "Goetterdaemmerung," including Siegfried's approach to Bruennhilde's rock, "Morning Dawn," and Siegfried's Rhine journey. Here we are treading on old battlefields, the horrors of which it does not seem well to renew. To the survivors of that day, every bar seems to bristle with controversial bayonets; the younger generation, with no standards of taste which it would be possible to affront by aggressive novelty, listens and marvels that so much pother could have been made about it. The more interesting question is how this theater music stands on its own merits in the concert room when heard by an age which, if it does not reverence the classics, does not abjectly reverence Wagner either, and has in great measure escaped from the hypnotic spell that bound the later 19th century. The answer is that the music stands the test very, very well, and is heard with delight even by those who do not know the operas and have not the slightest interest in hunting the elusive Leitmotiv. Here the true Wagner wells up out of the orchestral deep, and the waves roll shimmering to horizons never before imagined.

The "Lohengrin" prelude, it must be owned, is wearing thin; this with the greater part of Wagner's music should be kept to the theater, where it fills its place to perfection. Its famous crescendo-diminuendo was of course admirably brought out, but the effect is one of which the hearer tires unless it is kept to its proper place—the cue for the raising of the curtain. It is otherwise with the fine selections from "Die Meistersinger," including the introduction to the third act, the dance of the apprentices, the entrance of the mastersingers, and the homage of Hans Sachs. Here then we have rich variety, and the stirring bustle and vivacity of spirit which is part of the charm of this genial tone picture of the Middle Ages with its "singing masons building roofs of gold." This was one of the finest things on a program which closed brilliantly with the "Tannhaeuser" overture, which unlike the prelude to "Lohengrin" is a true concert piece, written on the old lines, but with a stronger assertion of individuality than in "Rienzi." It should have served to give the world warning that the new generation was knocking at the door, even if Wagner had not had the knack of setting the world by the ears with his controversial pamphlets. With "Tannhaeuser" we come to music which would probably have made an enduring reputation even if the "Ring," "Tristan," "Parsifal," and the rest had not followed to swell its composer's fame till it filled the four corners of the earth.

The audience was large and enthusiastic as at all these concerts, the success of which has been great and well deserved. The Springfield public will rejoice at the announcement of a second series for next season to include a concert by the Metropolitan quartet of New York with Mabel Garrison, Sophie Braslau, Giovanni Martinelli and Arthur Middleton, a violin recital by Fritz Kreisler, a joint recital by Louise Homer and the pianist, Ossip Gabrilowitsch and to close a concert by the Boston symphony orchestra. It will make a very good foundation for next season's music.

EVENING Bulletin
Providence, R. I.
FEB 28 1917

Elena Gerhardt

Concert Soprano Soloist Who is to be Here with Boston Symphony Orchestra at Fifth Concert in Infantry Hall Next Tuesday Evening

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony series in this city will be held in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening and Elena Gerhardt will be the soloist. She is a soprano who has proved very popular in concert work. She will sing four songs of Beethoven and three by Wolf, all with orchestra accompaniment, while the orchestral numbers will be the first symphony of Jan Sibelius, Borodin's "On the Steppes of Middle Asia," and Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan." Seats will be on sale at Seddon's in the Butler Exchange on Saturday.

TIMES
New York City

EMOTION AND INTELLECT.

Philharmonic Standards Compared With Some Views of Critics.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I have noticed with considerable interest the recent adverse criticisms of the work of the Philharmonic Orchestra and more particularly of the make-up of its program. I had thought that Mr. Mason's charge that the Philharmonic programs did not measure up to the high standard of the Boston Symphony's had been most convincingly traversed by Mr. Finck, but Mr. Whiting, while not mentioning the Boston Symphony, has repeated Mr. Mason's charge that the Philharmonic ministers too largely to a depraved taste for the sensational and emotional in music. Do not these gentlemen fail to take into consideration the fact that the nature and disposition of the listener largely determine his reaction to a piece of music, and is it not conceivable that a deeper intellectual comprehension of a composition will increase its power to thrill? I must confess that I am unregenerate enough to be thrilled at times by a Beethoven symphony!

Mr. Whiting compares the Philharmonic Orchestra with the Metropolitan Museum of Art to the great advantage of the latter. Now every artist knows that the museum contains many second-rate works, judged by the high intellectual standard that Mr. Whiting applies to the Philharmonic.

Messrs. Mason and Whiting do well to inveigh against emotionalism; there is only one thing worse than too much emotion, and that is too much intellect! Why should the Philharmonic be expected to pander to their intellect?

Only as a work of art appeals both to the emotion and to the intellect can it attain to immortality. A program must be regarded as a work of art, and while those of the Philharmonic Society may not always be faultless, they certainly do reach a high degree of excellence.

To deny any intellectuality in Tschaikowsky is as futile as to deny any emotional content in the symphonies of Beethoven. Any one taking such a position as that would seem to be unfit to act as a guide to public opinion.

There are now advertised at Carnegie Hall a Bach-Haydn-Beethoven program by the Philharmonic Orchestra and an all-Wagner program by the New York Symphony Society. This only shows to what depths an orchestra can descend even if it is not under the baleful influence of a Pulitzer bequest!

One critic has commented on the poor quality of the Philharmonic violin tone; quite true, but what would you? We can no more expect every orchestra to equal the Boston Symphony than we can expect that all of our days will be filled with sunshine.

The truth is that, after the Boston Symphony, the Philharmonic is the best orchestra in the country. Let us appreciate it instead of making it the object of captious criticism.

N. TRACY STONE.

South Orange, N. J., Feb. 19, 1917.

UNION
From
Address: Springfield, Mass.
Date FEB 20 1917

SYMPHONY CONCERT TONIGHT.

Tonight in the Auditorium, Dr. Karl Muck and his superb Boston Symphony Orchestra of nearly 100 pieces is to give an all-Wagner program, with features from the operatic scores of "Rienzi," "Tannhauser," "Siegfried," "Lohengrin," "The Meistersingers," "Gotterdammerung," and the "Siegfried Idyll," included in the unusual offering. The presence of the greatest interpreter of Wagnerian music in the world, with what is by many considered the world's most perfect orchestral body, in such a remarkable program, should bring out for this final concert of the magnificent Ellis series a record attendance.

So cordial has been the support of the present season's series in Springfield, that on the announcement of a new and even greater series of concerts for next season, already practically decided upon, may be expected within the next few days. The sale of tickets, which continues until this evening at Otto Baab's music store, has been large, insuring the best audience this orchestra has ever played to in Springfield. The members of the orchestra will arrive here this afternoon by a special train from Boston, returning immediately after the concert.

From the Record
Feb.28,1917.

Boston Music Lovers Ready to Welcome Home One of City's Own Musical Stars

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach

The famous Boston musician who appears as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra after an absence of 16 years.

No artist will step on the stage of Symphony Hall this season, as soloist, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will receive so hearty, so spontaneous a greeting as Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, who plays her own concerto in C-sharp minor with the orchestra at its concerts this week.

Of all the world famous musicians on whom Boston has a claim, none has a finer place in the world of music than Mrs. Beach.

Boston was Mrs. Beach's home for many years, although the city cannot claim the honor of being her birthplace. It was here that she made her reputation both as a fine pianist and a composer of great talent.

Her orchestral works have been played in many music centers, she has appeared as soloist with many of the world's great orchestras and, as for her songs, what singer, professional or amateur, has not sung "The Year's at the Spring?"

Boston is proud of Mrs. Beach and will show its pride at her home coming Friday.

[92]

From the Transcript Feb. 10,1917.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A WHOLE PROGRAMME TO A SINGLE PIECE

One More Repetition of Liszt's "Faust Symphony" with the Wonted Achievement of Orchestra, Chorus and Conductor and the Wonted Impression of the Music

THE seventh performance of Liszt's "Faust Symphony" in two seasons of the Symphony Concerts took place yesterday afternoon, making an unprecedented record in the way of repetitions by general request. The magnitude of the piece and the accomplishment of the orchestra in its performance have become familiar now, but to making the symphony fill an entire concert, as in the present pair, is a new step, and a distinct advantage to all but those who measure their music by the hour. A complete drama in itself, large in conception and execution, it certainly is ample musical food for an afternoon or evening, and like "Das Rheingold," for instance, deserves the dignity of standing alone for hearing, with no distracting elements from different periods and peoples. Music, being discursive, cannot be viewed as a whole in the direct absorption of it, as is a static work of art, but must be assimilated part by part, and contemplated in entirety only in afterreflection. It is for this reason that a concerto or a closing piece, hot on the heels of the great choral climax which is the accumulation and culmination of the whole work, mars and shatters in large degree an important after-effect.

Such frequent repetition is a severe test of the wearing qualities of any music and a searching scrutiny of its weaknesses. The test of yesterday indicated that the "Faust Symphony" does wear well—remarkably well for Liszt, and that while it is not as "Tristan," should be to any well-ordered opera house, it may continue recurrently in the repertory of the concerts, as the happy combination of a masterpiece, largely neglected, and an achievement of the conductor and orchestra which would make it a rare opportunity for enjoyment, even if it were not the music that it is. The performance probes every corner and every talent of the orchestra, from the mysterious depths of the bass clarinet at the start to the celestial harmonies at the close, exacting in the Faust section the most brilliant abilities of the brass, and in the Mephistopheles section lighter, swifter, and subtler use of that choir. Similarly the music of Gretchen requires wood-winds, solo viola and horns of great proficiency, and delicate individual power of expression. The clever, suave jeers of the devil, with their lightning incisiveness, and faultless effect exact also a diabolic skill in the telling. Yesterday the chorus was voluminous and alert, and may well be the first step in greater choral accomplishments to come. But most important of all, Dr. Muck, viewing the entire expanse of the drama, was the general that gave it coherence, unity, force, guarding and polishing its every detail, proportioning the intensity of the tonal masses, preparing climaxes and contrasts, and stimulating his orchestra to each rise, burst and cataclysm.

There are those who do not like Liszt, and cannot reconcile themselves to certain of his inborn traits which are never to be wholly escaped. But to be unmoved and unadmiring before the "Faust Symphony" indicates rather a lack in the hearer, for in it the composer not only appears to his best advantage, but actually exceeds himself, revealing rounding qualities that make the piece a masterpiece of very broad appeal. One might have predicted that Goethe's "Faust" would bring forth the utmost from Liszt. It gave him a limitless field for large, imaginative creation, without which Liszt's sort could not be content. It gave him universal figures in conflict and contrast under stress of as universal human passion. (The "Divine Comedy" of the "Dante Symphony" was much less suited to him, being impersonal, symbolic, and idealistic, too unworldly in subject to fire such a mind as Liszt's, whatever his pretensions, and in subject too vast and unmusical in structure). But Liszt knew his Goethe; he grasped the magnitude of Goethe's conception; he succeeded in turning congenial subject-matter to his own totally different medium and style, while he treated his orchestration and his programme making as never before or after. Of coures Liszt had closer affiliation with the First Part than with the Second Part of "Faust," which he utilizes for his choral redemption; he was no doubt entirely sincere, but Liszt's religious fervor is one of his hardest attributes to understand and accept, and, with all respect to his remarkable personality, Liszt diabolic is apt to be more convincing than Liszt sanctified. The form and continuity of the symphony were foreordained, in that it follows the procedure and ordering of Goethe, added to which is the integral and sound conception of Liszt, dividing the tale into three parts as the main actors in turn assert themselves. Thus the whole music is carried by logical procedure to a logical conclusion. From first to last Faust is the central figure and the ego; Gretchen comes into his life in the second section as the primary vitalizing and spiritualizing force in human experience; then Mephistopheles, to put in his sharp argument in the decisive struggle of forces; and thereafter the celestial victory. Here certainly is constructive achievement, after which it would be folly to accuse Liszt of lacking a formal sense.

But what gives the "Faust" Symphony true greatness is Liszt's noble appreciation and treatment of the subject, and, as seldom in his music, a searching, psychological character-analysis, close enough to Goetha for sympathy and identity, but not too close to hamper the composer's own imaginative and depicting powers. Liszt's Faust at the opening is the Faust of Goethe, gloomy and despondent over his books, perceiving the futility of his seclusive and dusty knowledge—applying it to nature, delving into the naked forces of creation and cosmos, startled at his own boldness, but reassured at his success. All this in vivid and unforgettable themes, increasingly significant in their development which yearns and strives upwards in ascending figures of persistent and dauntless ambition. Faust hesitates on the brink of divine secrets, feels his mortal helplessness, looks for enlightenment in human experience and turns with a sudden clear and pervading major to the rich stores of love. So he forgets his despair, and asserts his virile self-reliance and proud determination in flaring and sturdy trumpet rhythms.

Then comes Gretchen—not a Fredericka, but a wistful, innocent and entrancing Fräulein, in the poetic vein wherein Liszt so often falls into stereotyped sentimentality, but never here. The melody of the wood-wind is tenderly beautiful, with the delicate and rich color of the oboe most eloquent, and a chromatic figure of the solo-viola softly and finely interwoven, until it becomes far more than an accompaniment. The quiet of the opening may well be the hushed intimacy of Gretchen's chamber, which Goethe describes with such inimitable suggestion of its owner. It is from Gretchen's point of view that Faust is introduced, as he enters her life with a sweet acceptance, while their love and their themes are united in a wonderful and pure union, which precludes of its own accord all thought of evil. Even the devil must hold his peace. Finally, Gretchen alone again, firm, trustful and happy in her love.

Mephistopheles brings an entirely new point of view—the spirit of denial, turning Faust's themes upside down and inside out; reducing his cherished beliefs, hopes and aspirations ad absurdum, and mocking them with a hollow, echoing laughter, which is a triumph of musical description. This "spirit that denies" is neither the romantic marionette in red of Gounod nor the sinister and cynical fiend of Boito, but an engaging and acute gentleman, persuasively gaining one's sympathy with his irresistible and apparently harmless humor, and suddenly turning it with fiendish accuracy and ingenuity to his foul ends, debasing fond ideals with scoffing cynicisms, and destroying them with malicious parody. Liszt draws a complete picture with deft, staccato and pointed strokes, now gracefully light, now mordant and swift, now unearthly and uncanny, with his cackling of muted trumpets, and his shrieking of incisive flutes. There is just the right compromise in his Mephistopheles between an abstract principle and a sardonic human jester that knows no discouragement and is never abashed. He simply awaits his moment, and makes the most of it unfailingly. At the vision of Gretchen he vanishes, but is back the instant that his time comes for struggle that now is sharp and fiendish. Such a drama, moving to a glorious climax, carries illusion with it, and makes the audience submissive to the accumulated forces of orchestra, organ, chorus and solo voice. Alone, the spiritual triumph might sound impotent, but in the crowning place it is as imposing as Liszt intended, with high beauty in the orchestral inter-weaving of the music of Gretchen idealized. It is as far above Gounod as it is below Goethe.

J. N. B.

From the Transcript March 20,1917.

Fresh-Picked Laurels

Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra brought their visits to New York to an end for the season with the concert of Saturday afternoon last at which Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, Brahms's Double Concerto for Violin and Violoncello and Cherubini's overture to his opera, "The Abencerrages," divided the programme. Two or three of the reviewers of concerts for the New York newspapers seized the occasion to sum the work there of the conductor and the orchestra as the ten concerts distributed over five months had affirmed it. In The Times, Mr. Aldrich, for example, wrote:

> Dr. Muck has brought forth nothing in the shape of a "novelty," but his programmes for the New York concerts have given a well-balanced representation to composers of the classic and neo-classic schools on the one hand, and the "moderns" on the other, and also to composers of various nationalities. The French, Russians, Bohemians and Finns have not been neglected. They are represented in Berlioz, Franck, Debussy, Chabrier, Chausson, Tchaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, Smetana and Sibelius. . . . The playing of the orchestra has again deeply impressed the listeners as being of a quality that has quite upheld its reputation as above and beyond that of any other organization that has been heard here. Dr. Muck's conducting and his remarkable power of assimilating the characteristics of the most widely differing schools has won greater admiration than ever before. These ten performances have been the high-water mark of orchestral playing in New York.

In The Sun, Mr. Henderson said in similar summary:

> The orchestral numbers were played with that high finish which characterizes all the performances of the foremost American orchestra. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is a national institution. It is one of which the whole country should be proud. By many competent judges it has been pronounced the best concert orchestra in the world. Naturally local music lovers might be proud if it belonged to New York. Since, however, it does not they should rejoice that it comes here season after season to give them the privilege of hearing its unique playing. It will come again next season and will again be conducted—so far as is now known—by Dr. Karl Muck, to whose skill and industry much of its excellence is due.

From the Herald March 24,1917.

ERNEST BLOCH CONDUCTS AT SYMPHONY

Directs Playing of His Jewish Poems, Heard Here for the First Time and Fulfilling Expectations Roused by the Playing of His Quartet in B Major by Flonzaleys.

The 18th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Sinigaglia, overture to Goldini's comedy, "Le Baruffe Chiozzotte," Op. 32; Bloch, Trois Poemes Juifs, Danse, Rite; Cortege Funebre (first performance in Boston); Brahms, Concerto in B flat major, No. 2, for pianoforte and orchestra, Op. 83. Carl Friedberg, pianist, was the soloist.

Mr. Ernest Bloch appeared yesterday both as composer and conductor, for Dr. Muck had invited him to direct his Jewish Poems. He was born at Geneva, Switzerland, the son of a merchant. He soon showed musical talent and when he was eight years old began to play the piano. Jacques-Dalcroze and Tories Rey taught him solfeggio, the elementary principles of music, and the violin. At Brussels he continued his violin studies with Eugene Ysaye and worked at composition with Rasse. After studying at Frankfort-on-the-Main with Ivan Kiorr and at Munich with Ludwig Thuille, after a visit to Paris in 1903-4 he returned to Geneva to become book-keeper in his mother's shop. Spare hours were devoted to his opera "Macbeth." Mr. Bloch also gave lectures on aesthetic subjects at the Conservatory of Music. Romain Rolland, visiting Geneva, heard and praised his symphony led by the composer.

Miss Maud Allen engaged Mr. Bloch as conductor of the orchestra to accompany her in her tour through this country. He made his first appearance in America as conductor in New York at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre, Oct. 16, 1916, when the orchestra played orchestral pieces, among others his "Hiver-Printemps."

At an extra concert last January the Flonzaley quartet made known to Boston Mr. Bloch's Quartet in B major, an important and striking addition to the literature of modern chamber music. The expectations awakened by this work were not disappointed yesterday.

The Jewish poems are the first work of a cycle, dedicated to the memory of Mr. Bloch's father and composed in 1913. It is not his purpose or desire to attempt a "reconstitution" of Jewish music, but to write genuine music, his music. It is rather the emotions of the Jewish soul that interest him, that he tries to hear within himself and to transcribe in his music. The poems are first of all impressive, remarkable for their originality, for the power and beauty of their emotional expression. The orchestration is rich in color. There are effective combinations of instruments. The Danse is exotic, in turn sensuous, languorous, frenzied, passionate. Rite has a solemn ecclesiastical character, the sombre loftiness of an ancient ceremony. The Cortege Funebre, perhaps the most remarkable of the three, is an extraordinary and poignant expression of grief, its violence, its despair. Mr. Bloch is thoroughly versed in the art of sounds and rhythms. In this poem the reiteration of severe rhythms suggests the Reaper, stern, inexorable, deaf to the anguish of those left behind. Then there is the passionate outburst, the impotent wailing and lamentation; finally the mourners are resigned, a sorrowful peace comes to them with the consciousness of faith, the eternal and living memory of those who have gone before.

In 1909-10 Mr. Bloch conducted subscription orchestral concerts at Lausanne and Neufchatel. Yesterday his experience as a conductor was at once evident. He conducted simply. His wishes were expressed with authority. There was intensity, but nothing spectacular.

Mr. Friedberg, who played here with the orchestra for the first time, is also a conductor and composer. As a pianist he is intellectual, brilliant. His mechanical proficiency is indisputable. The first movement of Brahm's Concerto is long-winded, tedious. The second is wholly superfluous. Only the third and fourth commend themselves to a then restless audience. The pianist's task is thus the more difficult. Mr. Friedberg's performance evidently absorbed the attention.

Sinigaglia's overture to Goldoni's comedy "The Chioggian Brawls," is amusing descriptive music. It was brilliantly played. There was applause for Dr. Muck, for Mr. Bloch and his music, for Mr. Friedberg and for the orchestra. The concert will be repeated this evening.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Haydn, Symphony in C major (B. andtt. No. 90; Rieter-Bidermann, No. 3); Rameau's Ballet Suite from "Acanthe et Cephisse (arr. by Herman Kretschman); Handel, Concerto Grosso in D, No. 21 (op. 6, No. 10, arr. by Seiffert); Dvorak, concerto for violin 'cello and orchestra, Op. 104. Joseph Malkin will be the soloist.

From the Globe Feb.2.1917.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Mrs H. H. A. Beach Plays Her Own Concerto

Mr Loeffler's "Hora Mystica" Given the First Time Here

At the 16th Symphony concert yesterday afternoon Charles Martin Loeffler's "Hora Mystica" symphony in one movement for full orchestra and men's voices was given for the first time in Boston. The words of Mr Krehbiel, reviewing its production at the Norfolk, Conn, festival last June, and quoted in the program book, are illuminating.

They read: "The composer's conception of the plan of his work grew out of his interest in the Gregorian chant . . . of late years out of love for the ancient art, he has taught it to choristers in Medfield (Mr Loeffler's home). Two or three years ago (1909), he undertook a sort of artistic pilgrimage to a Benedictine monastery, built in the 11th century in a village of the Rhenish Palatine. He had walked through the country, his heart no doubt expanding to the beauty of the landscape; he had heard the piping of shepherds and the chiming of the village bells, and had looked upon the cathedral with its grotesque gargoyles, and in the mood of pious contemplation, had joined the worshippers in the evening service. How deeply he was impressed by the sights and sounds may easily be imagined; how his experiences were transmuted into a musical composition is testified by his 'Hora Mystica.'"

Mr Loeffler himself describes the mood as "one of religious meditation and adoration of nature. A lonely pilgrim winds his way through a land of ever changing enchantments, a land where clouds move like a procession of nuns over the hills or descend upon a lake, changing it into a mysterious gray sea—a land where shepherds still pipe to their flocks."

Then there are the tolling church bells for which Mr Loeffler finds graphic color in the curiously blunt tones of the harp and the piano, the grotesque gargoyles to charm away evil spirits, the piping shepherds, the chanting of the monks, the observance of the "compline," the office known as the "Hora Mystica."

Mr Loeffler has drawn upon the Gregorian music for his thematic ideas. The liturgical service of the early Roman church is one of strange names to modern ears—in capitulum, antiphon and compline. Ecclesiastical and archaic in character they give to the whole work in literal quotation and development a medieval flavor. The prevailing mood is austere, but the general thought is one of reverence before beauty of nature and in devotional worship.

There are masterful touches of color, as in the dominant tones of the larger bells, surrounded by the lesser ones of the village, and learning displayed in contraprental treatment of material and in invention. The chanting voices of the men in unison make their own effect, and were excellent again through the offices of Mr Townsend and the Choral Music Society. Mr Loeffler was called to platform and applauded cordially. Dr Muck conducted with all evidence of interest and admiration.

Mrs H. H. A. Beach played her C sharp minor concerto which she had done with Mr Gericke April 7, 1900. Its grateful moments in lyric vein and in pianistic embellishment make their ay clearly. Since her residence abroad, and appearances in German cities, Mrs Beach has grown in breadth and authority as a pianist, and played yesterday with fine command, at times with brilliancy. She was welcomed most warmly by her audience. Goldmark's overture, "In Springtime," which Dr Muck and the orchestra played with spirit, began the concert.

From the Post March 25,1917.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The concert in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon, April 1, in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be the second concert of the year of this kind. The programme presents a very considerable departure from the past, inasmuch as there will be employed a chorus of some 200 voices recruited in Harvard Universtly.

The Harvard chorus is composed of the Radcliffe Choral Society of women's voices and the entire membership of the Harvard Glee Club, with some additional voices. Dr. A. T. Davison of the department of music of Harvard has had the training of the chorus, and Dr. Muck, who has heard them sing, speaks most warmly of what Dr. Davison has accomplished.

There will be two choral numbers. The first will be a Motet by Bach, "I Wrestle and Pray," which will be sung a capella. While this Motet is found in the 39th volume of the collected works of Bach, there is a question whether it was written by Johann Sebastian or his uncle, Johann Christoph. The other number will be Brahm's "Song of Destiny," for chorus and orchestra. Many years ago in the ol Music Hall Mr. Gericke gave this work.

Both of these choral works appear in the first part of the programme. The first number will be Rheinberger's Theme and Variations for Violin an Organ, Op. 150. The organ part wi be played by J. P. Marshall and the violin part will be played by the entire violin section instead of by one instrument. Also in the first part of the programme will be found the prelude to "Tristan und Isolde."

The second part of the programme will comprise the prelude to "Parsifal," Hans Richter's arrangement of selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung," the funeral music from the last act of "Gotterdammerung" and the "Tannhauser" overture.

From the Monitor March 3,1917.

C. M. LOEFFLER'S SYMPHONY, "HORA MYSTICA," GIVEN

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Karl Muck, Conductor; Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Soloist.—Sixteenth program, presented in Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass., afternoon of March 2, 1917: Goldmark, overture, "In the Spring"; Beach, concerto for piano and orchestra in C sharp minor; Loeffler, "Hora Mystica" symphony for orchestra and men's voices (first performance in Boston).

Mr. Loeffler has written much abstruse music, but none more remote from ordinary symphonic design and method than the "Hora Mystica." And yet the work has a far more tangible melodic outline than his "Pagan Poem," which was played at the Symphony concerts a few years ago. Indeed, as far as themes are concerned, the piece has clear continuity and convincing logic. The question arises why the composer should make such extraordinary developments as he has made of his rather simple material. His reasons for abandoning the conventional plan of four movements may be found in his desire to be modern, but his reasons for giving up all idea of contrast of mood are not easily grasped. Surely there never could have been social conditions, even in a wild mountain country, so static and changeless as those here described.

The general aim of the piece seems to be the representation of monastic loneliness. But surely the composer must have taken a very particular view of his subject to translate it into such gray music as he has found for it. Here is a study of life too remote, solitary and detached to mean anything to the ordinary person who goes to concerts. It does not reveal history in a way to benefit people of today. It does not interpret the past in terms of encouragement or even of rebuke. If it is to be classed as program music, it strangely, perversely, one might say, lacks that dramatic quality which has always given program music excuse and explanation.

But whatever may be said of the composer's main purpose, his work is written in a way to gain clear and round sonorities, it is judiciously scored in the passage for unison male voices with orchestral accompaniment and altogether it shows high quality of workmanship. If it failed to yield greatly on the side of expression, that may have been in the manner of performance, though how music could be more carefully and considerately presented by conductor, players and singers than it was by Dr. Muck, the Symphony men and Mr. Townsend's chorus, is not easy to see. Perhaps the composer has written ahead of the orchestra and its assisting choir. He has pretty certainly written a long way ahead of Symphony matinee listeners, curious to hear what is new and keen to applaud what is significant as they are.

The day was one of excellent performance all around. The piano concerto was magnificently played both by the orchestra and by the composer of it, who was the soloist. The work is interesting because of its freedom from angular and four-square classic patterns. It might well have some other designation than concerto, since it is a piano piece set in an orchestral background, rather than a work in which themes are developed on a scheme of conversational exchange between solo instrument and orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts of March 9 and 10 will repeat the "Faust" symphony of Liszt, with a chorus of men assisting. The work will be presented in memory of Pauline Agassiz Shaw and will be the only number on the program.

Fromthe Advertiser March (,1917.

The Symphony this week will be in the nature of a memoriam to Mrs. Pauline Agassiz Shaw. The Faust Symphony of Listz will be the only number on the program. Experience has shown that this great work is sufficient in itself as a program for any concerts. The same admirable chorus prepared by Stephen S. Townsend will be utilized in the last movement and again Mr. Arthur Hackett, tenor, will sing the solos.

From the Advertiser
Feb. 3,1917.

MRS. BEACH STARS AT SYMPHONY

Artist Possesses Breadth and Power—Work Is Enthusiastically Received

GOLDMARK'S SPRING OVERTURE PERFORMED

Composition Has Fine and Triumphant Coda, Which Is Well Given

By LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAM

Goldmark—"In the Spring" Overture.
Beach—Concerto Piano and Orchestra. Pianist, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach
Loeffler—"Hora Mystica." Symphony in one movement.

Goldmark's Spring overture is a rather inconsequential work. It is not as varied as a New England weather report for April, or May, and its gentle warblings on wind instruments are conventional at best. This overture lags far behind the composer's Penthesilea or Sakuntala works in the same form. But it contains more melody than anything else in this severe program. It had a fine and triumphant Coda which was made the most of.

The gentle work, however, was but a prelude to a very masculine and powerful concerto. The remainder of the concert was quite Bostonian, for both Mrs. Beach and Mr. Loeffler belong to our city, if not by birth, at least by residence, and by achieving the chief part of their musical career here.

Mrs. Beach's piano concerto is what a concerto ought to be, an orchestral work with solo work interwoven. This is the more remarkable when we remember that the composer is a great pianist. Liszt, Rubinstein, Chopin and other pianist-composers generally give their favorite instrument the lion's share of the proceedings when they present a concerto, but Mrs. Beach has seen to it that the orchestra properly occupies the foreground.

In cadenza-work of the first movement, however, Mrs. Beach gave full evidence of her virtuosity, in an overwhelming display of technique and bravura. The first movement is however, not the strongest portion of the work. There is good figure treatment and some beauty of themes, but not the homogeneity of a Beethoven or Brahms first movement.

There is a Scherzo in this concerto an unusual proceeding which swells the work to four movements, for the Largo, although bracketed with the Finale is really a separate movement, but the Scherzo is quite short and very dainty, giving much fioritura against thematic work in the orchestra, which was performed by the composer-pianist with charming delicacy, with the rapidity of a "Mote Perpetuo."

The Largo was of pensive melancholy cast and gave prominence to a figure not unlike that used by Wagner to portray Fate, but it was used with originality and ingenuity.

The Finale seemed to us the best portion of the work. It had vigor and brilliancy from first to last, there was nothing redunding, no padding and the themes were well under control. The spirited playing of both soloist and orchestra added effect to what was intrinsically an excellent concerto finish.

In her piano work Mrs. Beach seems a riper artist than ever. She has breadth and power, without any spasmodic effort, and in daintiness and delicacy the Scherzo of this concerto proved her very well equipped. Small wonder, then, that she was recalled again and again with abundant enthusiasm. Both as composer and pianist the tribute was deserved.

Not so very long ago Mr. Loeffler gave us an excellent picture of unregenerate joy, in his "Pagan Poem." Now he is picturing ecstasies celestial, and we do not like them quite as well as when Daphnis came home accompanied by a full (very full) brass band. The Mystic Hour (so-called by the Benedictine monks) is the office of Compline, coming after Vespers, but there was no need of making it so mystical that some parts are incomprehensible.

Mr. Loeffler is the best orchestral colorist that we have in America and his skill in handling the large modern orchestra was evident all through this score. The introduction of bells at the first and at the end is very effective, even if Arthur Sullivan and Berlioz have been before with this touch. This touch is an improvement upon Berlioz ("Childe Harold Symphony") where harp and horn give the bell-tones, for here the actual bell is echoed by harps with fine effect.

We have stood upon the Schlossberg, in the Black Forest, on a Sunday, and heard the distant cathedral chimes sing Peace through the Spring air, and any one who has had a similar experience in Europe will easily come under the spell of this part of Mr. Loeffler's picture. The mingling of pastoral effects "mixed with the sweet bells of the sauntering herd," is also an added charm. But we occassionally longed for more of simplicity and less of marvellous skill. The composer takes his time in giving a long series of impressionistic ideas, many of them vague.

The climax is well-worked up to the appropriate "Salve Regina," and again bells mingle their tones with the hymn of adoration, a powerful culmination. Although there is but a single movement to the work ("the mystic hour" is only about 45 minutes long), there are changes of tempo which suggest different movements, and make the title of "Symphony" not out of place. The asceticism of parts of the work seem as if Mr. Loeffler desired to go back to the Des Pres epoch of music when tonal beauty was wholly obscured under intricate progressions. Sometimes the monotony is picturesque—sometimes it is irritating.

The climax, when the monks intone the office, is very beautiful, and the clangor of bells added much to the effect, the vocal parts reflecting credit upon Mr. Townsend's training, while the final chord, infinitely long-drawn out, made a most dignified ending to a work whose unusual flavor must bar it from the public. Yet the audience proved themselves somewhat appreciative of the power of the work and of its performance, of Dr. Muck's reading and of Mr. Loeffler's visions. There was considerable applause at the end, in which conductor, orchestra and composer shared.

Such a work is what we might expect from Debussy if he could sustain his piano-sketch fantasy in the larger orchestral forms, or from D'Indy when he gives full scope to his asceticism.

From the
Transcript
Feb. 28,1917.

BEYOND all memory of the music played at the Symphony Concert of last Saturday evening, the recollection of an extraneous incident lingers in the minds and on the tongues of those that heard the one and saw the other. The programme began with Cherubini's overture to his opera, "The Abencerrages," to which succeeded Brahms's Double Concerto for violin, violoncello and orchestra. That piece runs in three movements, and almost as the conductor was raising his stick to begin the finale—that is to say, well toward nine o'clock—three or four latecomers were lengthily ushered down an aisle and slowly took their seats. The eyes of the audience, hushed and intent for the beginning of the music, followed the little procession. Dr. Muck, watch in hand, gravely timed it; one woman laughed audibly and amusedly—and at length the concerto proceeded. In ten minutes came the intermission and the inevitable buzz of varied comment. Some, ever eager to find cause for offence in a conductor who happens to prefer to keep to himself and who has a just resentment of such interruptions to the progress of a concert, were loud in reproof of Dr. Muck and his watch; others were as resentful of the laggard intruders; some were amused; a few, being merely materially minded, blamed the usher-boy for the admission of the late-comers when the music was on the point of beginning. For all and sundry there had been an "incident" and "incidents" are not common at the Symphony Concerts.

Above question the public is wary of any restriction upon its right to enter or to leave a concert for which it has paid, at any time that happens to suit its necessity, convenience or whim, and such regulations as managers may impose, like that which forbids entrance into Symphony Hall while the music is proceeding, must be formulated and applied discreetly. Beyond equal question, any conductor who takes his work seriously is resentful of late-comers when they arrive processionally at the very moment in which he is about to beat the measure. Dr. Muck, being of nervous temper when he is absorbed in actual performance and long habituated to the continental custom of the shortest of pauses between the movements of a single piece, has often shown a natural irritation over these lengthy entrances and departures. No doubt, on Saturday, when he timed the laggards, he felt himself at the end of the endurance of a much-enduring man and conductor and relieved himself and administered his satirical rebuke accordingly. On the other hand, as every manager of a theatre, every player upon the stage and every giver of concerts from the Atlantic to the Pacific will testify, there is no persuading a part of the public into the smallest consideration for piece and actors; music, singer, conductor; fellow-spectators or fellow-hearers. It will come when it chooses, it will go when it chooses; and often it seems nothing loth when curious, amused or irritated eyes follow either process. It is "only pretty Fanny's way" and there is no altering it in the present stage of American civilization in the playhouse and the concert-hall. Thus, there is no solvent for such "incidents" as that of Saturday; but there is a salve compounded say of patient courtesy, slightly cynical amusement and appreciation of another point of view, mixed according to the needs of those to whom it is to be administered.

From the
Transcript
March 1,1917.

MR. LOEFFLER'S CROWN

HIS NEW SYMPHONY TO BE HEARD TOMORROW

The First Public Performance at the Symphony Concerts of Music in Which He Excels All His Previous Work—"Hora Mystica" for Orchestra and Men's Choir—The Formal Procedure, the Tonal Substance, the Imaginative Impulse

THE outstanding novelty of this week's Symphony Concert, one which by virtue of its intrinsic significance not only takes precedence above the other new pieces of the year, but which also assumes a special import in the annals of American music, is Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler's "Hora Mystica" for orchestra and men's chorus, unheard as yet save for the quasi-private performance of June 6 last under the composer's baton at Mr. Carl Stoeckel's "Music Shed" in Norfolk, Conn. Since this work, a symphony in one movement, claims concentrated and enlightened attention on the part of the listener by reason of its complex though essentially well-knit and logical structure, and its sustained mood of mystical elevation, it may not be amiss to outline the plan and substance of this music, as well as to hint the composer's delineative intentions.

In this work, Mr. Loeffler had no thought of a slavish adherence to the letter of the time-honored type of form. Instead he has embodied clearly and persuasively the essential principles and the underlying spirit which are fundamental in its nature. The principal theme of the symphony is the ecclesiastic chant from the Compline to the words "Deo gratias"; other fragments are quoted in the course of the work, subsidiary themes are original, and the choral conclusion employs the recitation and chants to the texts of the Compline "Tu autem in nobis es, Domine," "In manas tuas, Domine, commendo spiritum meum," and the antiphone "Salve Regina."

Structure and Substance

The plan of "Hora Mystica" is virtually that of introduction, "first movement" or sonata form, with close analogies, despite the freedom of treatment, to the usual divisions of "exposition" "development" and "recapitulation" leading to the choral close which contains the emotional kernel of the whole.

Over a kettledrum roll, and accompanied by tremolo in the strings, flute and horn intone in slow tempo the motive from the chant melody "Deo gratias" followed by responsive phrases in wood wind and strings. Soon trumpets followed by trombones give out a bell-like phrase which returns several times in the course of the piece, notably when the chorus begins. The orchestra swells to a slight climax in which bells complete the ecclesiastical suggestion. The chant theme is heard again in English horn and solo viola, developing with increased intensity it passes to the trumpets in notes of lengthened value (augmentation). The tempo changes from Lento to Andante Sostenuto. Here a new theme (still introductory) is heard for strings and wind instruments over horns and low strings. The chant theme persists even during a short adagio section where a new subsidiary theme appears in the oboe of which significant use is made later. So far all is introductory. Now a few measures agitato ed appassionata, in which the recent adagio theme is transformed into a rapid string figure (diminution) lead directly to the main body of the symphony, Allegro. The chant theme in rapid tempo sounds from horns and strings. It is "developed," appears in new instrumental guises and tonalities; it allies itself to fresh thematic material, including a reharmonization of the trumpet phrase near the beginning, which recurs with the chorus at the close. Then follows what constitutes the traditional "second theme" tranquillo, largely in the strings. After some development, this theme comes again to the strings, closing the "exposition" section.

With the "development section" the tempo reverts to allegro and the chant motive. While it is unnecessary to analyze this portion of the symphony in detail, it may be noted that the material is derived from the first chant theme, the phrase which accompanies the text "Salve Regina," the theme of the adagio from the introduction, the bell-like phrase which is first announced in the introduction also, the "second theme" proper, and some independent subsidiary material. These themes appear with fresh harmonic treatment and in contrapuntal opposition to one another.

While the element of the traditional "recapitulation," the third section of the sonata form, is less obviously observable, its function as far as securing structural balance is concerned is convincingly fulfilled by the reappearance of the initial chant theme, differently harmonized in allegro tempo. Its development, following the trend of modern recapitulation, is strictly devoid of any literal repetition, and with some material from the andante sostenuto in the introduction the composer passes to the climax of the work—the entrance of the chorus, preceded by a few measures of the bell-like phrase in fuller harmonization for wood wind, piano, celesta and harps.

With the entrance of the chorus follows a textual citation of the Complines, "Tu autem in nobis es, Domine," "In manus tuas, Domme, commendo spiritum meum," the latter with especially felicitous connotation, and the antiphone 'Salve Regina." At first the bell-like figure accompanies the chant, with interludes derived from the 'Deo gratias' theme; then the theme of Adagio from the introduction is combined contrapuntally with it with diversity of rhythmic effect. As the chant dies away, the bells sound, and after two expressive reminiscences of the "Deo gratias" theme, first by horns and then by trumpets, the symphony closes tranquilly upon a ninth chord left unresolved for a more sensitive suggestion of a mystic mood.

The Mystical Side

Thus "Hora Mystica" is disposed as regards structural outlines, and thematic material and development. Of far greater importance as far as the receptive interpretation of the listener is concerned is the emotional background which suggested the music to the composer. From material furnished for the Norfolk programme, the following is courteously placed at my disposition. "The mood is one of religious meditation and adoration of nature. A weary, contemplative wanderer winds his way through a land of ever-changing enchantments, where clouds pass like a procession of nuns over the mountains to descend upon a lake, changing it into a mysterious gray sea—a land where shepherds still pipe to their flocks. From far away comes a curious tolling of village church bells. At last the pilgrim stands before the cathedral of a Benedictine monastery, contemplating its beauty—even the grotesque beauty of the gargoyles placed on the house of worship to ward off evil spirits. In the church, with its rose-window aglow with the last evening light, the office of compline—known to Benedictine monks as Hora Mystica—is tendered to God, and peace descends into the soul of the pilgrim."

In Mr. Loeffler's symphony, as usually befalls in the most felicitous "programme music," the music itself now mystic, now ardent, by turns reflective, and passionately worshipful, interprets its title with admirable fulfilment. But the knowledge of the composer's descriptive intention illuminates poignantly and searchingly this music of revery, aspiration and prayer.

A Crowning Work

A preliminary article may fittingly end when a brief survey of the structure and delineative purpose of this symphony has been outlined. But it is not superfluous to add that "Hora Mystica" represents the crown of its composer's achievement. In it are united the ripeness of experience coupled with unblemished youth of imagination. In no work of Mr. Loeffler's has he so sustained profundity of thought with such vitality of expression and resourcefulness of harmonic subtlety. Mr. Loeffler is notable for the richness of his musical texture, but nowhere has he surpassed the spontaneous polyphony of "Hora Mystica," a polyphony not replete with the sterile ingenuity of devices on paper, but vital in its independence of part-writing. In orchestral style, Mr. Loeffler has long been distinctive for the opulence of his coloristic resource. In his latest work he has even out-distanced his former attainment in shimmering interplay of timbres, in individualistic realization of orchestral eloquence. In the creation of mystical atmosphere he has been singularly felicitous. For these reasons then, Mr. Loeffler's "Hora Mystica" embodying the best qualities of its composer's maturity should meet with a quickened response from the audiences of Friday and Saturday. E. B. H.

From the
Herald
March 3,1917.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES CONCERT

Players Perform, for the First Time in This City, Loeffler's "Hora Mystica," a Symphony for Full Instrumental Organization and Men's Voices, in One Movement.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 16th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Goldmark, Overture, "In Springtime"; Beach, Concerto in C sharp minor for the piano; Loeffler, "Hora Mystica," Symphony in one movement for full orchestra and men's voices.

Mr. Loeffler's symphony was performed for the first time in Boston. It was first played at a concert of the Litchfield County Choral Union at Norfolk, Ct., June 6, 1916, when Mr. Loeffler conducted the Philharmonic Orchestra of New York. He has given the argument of his composition. Put in a few words it is this: The mood is one of religious meditation and adoration of nature. A Pilgrim goes his way through an enchanting country. He hears shepherds piping to their flocks; he hears church-bells tolling curiously in a far off village. At last he comes to the cathedral of a Benedictine Monastery. He gazes on its beauty and its gargoyles. In the church the office of compline—the last service of the day, the Hora Mystica as it is known to Benedictine monks—is tendered unto God. Peace enters the soul of the pilgrim. The symphony is woven around the recitation of "Te autem in nobis es Domine," the chant, "In manus tuas, Domine," and the antiphon, "Salve Regina." The chief theme of the symphony is inspired by the response, "Deo gratias."

When Debussy's Nocturnes were performed here for the first time under Mr. Lang's direction, they were played twice in the same concert. It might have benefited the composer and the audience if the program yesterday had consisted of "Hora Mystica" played twice with an intermission between the performances.

Walter Savage Landor, speaking of "Imaginary Conversations," said with superb confidence in his future: "I shall dine late; but the dining room will be well lighted, the guests few and select." This proud speech is sometimes quoted by a reviewer, who knowing not a new book, an ultra-modern picture, a new musical composition is caviare to the general, looks forward to confirmation of his superior judgment by the avenger Time. He may be found intimating that his own seat is already secure, reserved for him as guest of honor at the right hand of the gracious and patient host.

The speech of Landor might be fairly applied to the composer of "Hora Mystica," but who of us all will be among the guests? Mr. Loeffler is a musician of so marked and subtle technic, of so pure and lofty purpose, of so fastidious taste; furthermore he is so intellectually musical, that the boldest reviewer may hesitate in recording even impressions of this uncommonly complex work, especially when he is not filled with the spirit in which it was written, when his acquaintance with the music must necessarily be superficial. He recognizes gladly and admiringly the supreme workmanship; he feels the spirituality of the composer; but he is in the dark concerning the exact train of thought as it is expressed in the music.

It was not to be expected of so rare a composer as Mr. Loeffler that in the section describing the pilgrim's journey through a landscape, now smiling and lovely, now mysterious, with the wayfarer reminded of humanity only by shepherds' pipes and distant bells, he should write program-music in a conventional and obvious manner. But this section seems to be first of all a study in overtones resulting at times in harmonic expression that unnecessarily throws off beauty without compensating effects. The landscape is for the most part a cerebral projection, not seen by painter or strolling lover of nature. In preceding compositions Mr. Loeffler has shown himself to be a master of exquisite coloring; in "Hora Mystica" the music, especially in the first section, is monochromatic. Nor do we understand the meaning of the anguish expressed by wailing or angry phrases, unless it be that Nature does not give rest to the soul of the pilgrim until he stands before the cathedral.

The Adagio section is warmer and more human. The use of the plain song for the male voices has the desired solemnity and mysticism. It might be said, however, that certain accompanying harmonies in the "Salve Regina," while they may suggest the sighing, mourning and weeping of supplicants in this vale of tears by their realism, disturb the prevailing serenity of the prayer to the Blessed Virgin. As performed yesterday, these harmonies at times obscured the chanting of the singers.

A remarkable work, this "Hora Mystica" suffered from its position after the long concerto of Mrs. Beach. We also think it a doubtful experiment to write an orchestral work of this importance and uncommon nature in one movement, when the ears of the most receptive hearers would be taxed if the music were in a more conventional manner.

Mrs. Beach played her concerto from manuscript at a Symphony concert 17 years ago. The concerto, which contains brilliant passages for the pianist, could easily endure condensation. Mrs. Beach yesterday was warmly applauded as composer and pianist. The orchestra gave a brilliant performance of Goldmark's familiar overture. Mr. Loeffler was called for after his symphony and he bowed his acknowledgment.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week will consist of Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, which will be played in memory of Mrs. Pauline Agassiz Shaw.

EVENING
om TRIBUNE
dress: Providence, R. I. te MAR 4 1917

One of the choicest concerts of this season was given at Moses Brown School on Saturday evening under the direction of Mrs. Anne Gilbreth Cross, introducing Miss Calista Rogers of New York, a graduate of the Institute of Musical Art and a pupil of George Henschel and Constantino Yon. The accompaniments and piano solos were played by Miss Gertrude Belcher of Boston with much distinction and artistic merit. On the program were a number of novelties, notably the songs of Winthrop L. Rogers and Albert Spalding, the violinist. Miss Rogers's voice is of a distinctive lyric quality, large and with perfect intonation, giving great promise for an artist still in her early 20s. The following program was presented: 1, "Piacer D'Amor," Martini; "Gia il Sole dal Gange," Scarlatti; "Intorno All'Idol Mio," Cesti; "Che Fiero Costume," Legrenzi; 2, piano, "Romance," Sibelius; 3, songs, "The Sea Queen," Borodin; "Child's Song," Moussorgsky; "O Thou Billowy Harvest Field," Rachmaninoff; 4, piano, "Two Scottish Tone Pictures," Barratt (a) "A Moorland Turn;" (b) "The Sea-Mew's Flight;" 5, songs, "To Morning," W. L. Rogers; "Medieval Eventide Song," Albert Spalding; "Voci di Primavera," Johann Strauss.

It is announced from Boston that conditions have arisen which will cause the reduction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts here next season to three concerts instead of the usual six, as heretofore. The subscription, which will take the name of the "Ellis concerts," will offer six musical programs, but with three of them supplied by individual artists of renown. Not since the earliest years of the organization will there be so few concerts here by the orchestra.

A pupils' recital will take place at the Hans Schneider Piano School, Wednesday, March 7, at 8:15.

[94]

From the Transcript March 3,1917,

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE RICH HARVEST OF A RARE AFTERNOON

Goldmark's "Spring" Overture in Uncommonly Stirring Performance—The Surprise and the Pleasures of Mrs. Beach and Her Concerto—The Unique Quality, Contents and Impression of Mr. Loeffler's "Hora Mystica"—His Masterpiece, If Not a Masterpiece of Ultra-Modern Music

BETWEEN the routine of the Symphony Concerts of last week and the repetition of the Symphony Concerts of next week, stand the deep pleasure and the high stimulation of the concerts of yesterday afternoon and this evening, with novel music significant and stirring in itself and doubly such by the eloquence of the performance. After weeks of study and days of rehearsal, Mr. Loeffler's new symphony, "Hora Mystica" was played for the first time in the ordinary circumstances of the concert-room, since the original hearing of the piece last June befell under the exceptional conditions of a semi-private festival in a Connecticut town. It proved again—and the more clearly for the luminous, enhancing and reciprocally imaginative performance—music of unique design, content, manner, mood and accomplishment, music that no living composer except Mr. Loeffler could vision, hear and write, music that again affirms his just place above other composers dwelling and working in America, and beside those of the first rank in Europe. The concert further disclosed, almost as though it were a new piece, Mrs. Beach's concerto for pianoforte and orchestra—music that has withstood seventeen years of neglect by almost all pianists but her, yet which holds stoutly beside many a concerto written, applauded and far more warrantably forgotten within that time. None of her music heard in Boston in recent years has deserved so well both by intrinsic quality and the pleasure that it yields alike to lay and expert ears. Moreover, not within long recollection has the composer, who undertook the piano part, played here with such ready resource and ample range, felicity of touch, ardor of tone and freedom of rhythm and progression. No wonder the audience, mindful friendly-wise of her long residence in Boston and not unimpressed by the sumptuous and stately figure in purples, again and again recalled her. Though Mr. Loeffler's symphony ended the concert, his hearers summoned him once and twice to the stage, while his companions of old in the orchestra surrounded him with outstretched hands, and Dr. Muck, slipping away according to his custom, left the composer to undivided honors. For the conductor himself, however, as he came first to his place was one of those rounds of applause that seem to intensify as the breach between his Government and his audience's widens. Yet in these days, in any rational view, the art of music and the abilities of Dr. Muck transcend in just place the pre-occupations of politics.

Even the familiar overture that led the programme—Goldmark's "In the Spring"—played for once in March weather that did not mock it—set the high pitch of the concert. Repetition may a little underscore the Wagnerian suggestion—a little of joyous "Die Meistersinger" and a little of the wood-notes wild of "Siegfried"—but it may not stale the leap of the first motive into being like the swift rush (as will sometimes and somewhere befall) of the springtime into lush and pulsing force; the full-bodied, warm-blooded, rhythmically animated and colorfully bright development; the whiskings of Goldmark into little decorative passages, like spring buds upon the stem of the music; the sense of out-of-doors when all the world of the Vienna woods is stirring anew and of impulsive human reaction to it even when a composer sits at his writing table; the moments of murky contrast, since spring has clouds as well as sunshine; the final bound into the first happy melody for the happier elation of the close. A tone-poem in short that by sheer human quality in the creative impulse behind and in the beauty of voice that it prompted may outlive Goldmark's more deeply meditated and opulently wrought overtures of Hindu heroines and Greek poetesses. Moreover, if repetition had staled the overture, the performance of yesterday would have revitalized it. It was rich in instrumental song; it glowed with Goldmark's luscious play of timbres and harmonies; it was as rhythmic as it was euphonious; it tingled with the bright mood and the light fancy of the music. Once more the orchestra was a virtuoso orchestra unsurpassed; once more Dr. Muck's pace and accent summoned the very voice of the composer.

Mrs. Beach, in her turn, may have been enkindled by the share of the conductor and the orchestra in her concerto, especially when they answered to the pianist-composer in the Grieg-like suggestion of some of the melodic contours and the harmonic color of the first movement; when they wrought the filmy background and songful progress of the Scherzo against the reiterated figures of the piano; when they lent romantic glamor, a little Grieg-like again, to the slow intermezzo or caught with her the rhythmical alertness of the stilled and musing contrast of the finale. The concerto in itself deserved these pains no less than the felicities of touch, the ardors of tone, the re-creating animation that, as already specified, Mrs. Beach gave lavishly and elastically to her own music. (It is years since she has played with orchestra—and such an orchestra—in Boston and few could have remembered the fine powers that seemed yesterday second nature to her). Throughout, the music is expertly, sensitively and fancifully written for pianoforte with orchestra, at the golden mean that treats a concerto neither as a virtuoso piece for the solo instrument with accompanying band or as a symphonic piece that happens to add a piano to the other instrumental voices. Much of the music, again, has clear romantic mood and imagination, but the voice of that temper and design, especially in the development of the long first movement, summons a purely musical and occasionally scholarly invention that such calculating contrapuntists as still survive might envy. Yet ever it is an intrinsically songful and transparent music.

Imagination again prompts, while skill fashions, the technical feat of the unchanging pianoforte part in the Scherzo—the recent Sibelian repetitions as it were outdone. Perhaps the invention of the slow song is not so fresh and happy as the rest; yet it woos the ear and quickens lyric impulse, especially when it returns in the finale; while the rhythmic élan and the gleaming pianistic ornament of that last movement are of Mrs. Beach in the vein again. In fine, a concerto that is no monumental masterpiece in the species nor yet music of esoteric distinctions but that gives pleasure to ear, mind, fancy and feeling by the traits enumerated; that may excel all else that Mrs. Beach has written, and that deserves to be played by other pianists, even though she that wrote it still lives and plays it herself. Unfortunately the silly egotism, envy or etiquette of many a virtuoso will continue to deprive audiences of the pleasure of it.

Thereafter the intermission, possibly that the audience might return with perceptions freshened and sensibilities quickened to the exactions of the contrast and the climax—as the whole concert went—of Mr. Loeffler's exacting and eloquent symphony. It bears title "The Mystic Hour," the name that monks give to the evening office following vespers, but of wider implication as to the whole substance and mood of the music. It runs in a single unbroken movement, say forty minutes long—an introduction, an allegro, an adagio, a return of the allegro and a choral close developed from and around tht hymn of the service, "Salve Regina," as a men's choir sings it while the orchestra garlands it with ecstatic and ethereal arabesques. The symphony is scored for full contemporary orchestra—large wind choir, two harps, celesta, and the usual rest, plus a singular chime of bells—B, D, E, F, A, B—designed to recall a succession of notes that the composer heard and remembered, deeply moved by the beauty of the sounds, from a Bendictine monastery, on a hill above a village of the Rhenish Palatinate. The music, furthermore, is written with Mr. Loeffler's habitual technical skill, felicity, and exactness at the fullest and finest—the qualities of workmanship that set him above other composers in the United States, and beside the Europeans of the first rank. Not in all his previous work has he achieved such sustained feats of intricate and imaginative polyphony, devised his harmonic color with such rare, subtle and vivid invention, made such artful and significant play with instrumental timbres, or held so closely, variously and persusively to his own characteristic idiom.

The gradual genesis of the chief motives of the symphony, from the germs of the introduction and from the suggestions of the Gregorian office whence the composer remotely derives them is thrilling alike to technical and imaginative perception. The main motive of the whole music has clear individuality to hold ear and mind and plain pregnancy of mystical mood to come. The theme of the slow movement—for it is long, self-contained and impressive enough to be called a theme—is of a rarefied and poignant beauty, as of spiritual vision and inner imagination. Heard for the first times, it kindles the mind and the heart. Subtly developed, transformed and transfigured, it loses none of its suggestive and intensifying power. Returning finally as the cantus firmus or the abiding melody of "Salve Regina," it uplifts thought and emotion by deepened and puissant beauty. Everywhere from end to end of the symphony, the evolution of the motives, the polyphonic procedure, the harmonic vesture and background, the instrumental dress are in themselves rarely subtle and intricate; yet the impression of the whole music on ear and imagination is of deep intrinsic beauty and of high but reticent spiritual ecstacy. Out of subtlety springs fine intensity of expression; out of intricacy, is born as rare a fineness of mood, sensation, vision and suggestion. The nearest analogue are the matter, manner and spirit of some of d'Indy's music. Yet even so, the symphony of "The Mystic Hour" is altogether and intrinsically Mr. Loeffler's own.

At the beginning, the chiming of the bells, while the harps answer them in high harmonies as of lesser bells heards afar, transports the hearer into a place of the imagination Yet it is still a human place—a visioned monastery or sanctuary on a hill-top. Then, as the motives of the symphony develop in this atmosphere of a common reality transfigured in dream, they seem to guide the listener up the ascent, to prompt the sensations that he receives and to bear this stirring of the pilgrim's and the hearer's spirit.

Sursum corda: lift up your hearts; and in the symphony, it is as though the theme—the beautiful, almost the great theme of the slow movement—spoke the words as the voice at last of the intensifying vision. Exaltation, aspiration, the passion of spiritual longing, wherein every impulse from within seems to find answer in some impulse from without until both are as high and deep ecstasy, flood the music; again, the Loeffierian harmonies are like the stir and quiver of such emotion, while in the play of the instrumental timbres are the changeful intensities of it. The spiritual passioning subsides; heard for an instant the bells recall the beginning of the vision which is also the goal. In the returning motives the pilgrim pursues his mounting way, glimpsing now, as the twilight deepens, only the shadowy phantoms of cloud and lake and all the images that were of fancy haloing actuality. In this transitional passage are the suspensive instants of a music that never loses its characteristic quality of quivering and poignant sensation written in as intense harmonies.

Then, of a gradual sudden—for the paradox of the words suits the course of the symphony—the pilgrim turns the shoulder of the hill. The sanctuary is beside him; out of court and door rise the chants of The Mystic Hour—"Thou art in us, O Lord"; "Into Thy hands we commend our spirits"; and above all the rest, as the pilgrim goes within the chapel, the antiphon, "Salve Regina," of prayer and praise to Her whose Son had set Her as Queen of Heaven, benignant, radiant, infinitely gentle.

Then do the aspiration and the exaltation become devotion and all the devout longing is as spiritual communion with the object and the end of the quest. Around as in yet another antiphon, the bells are ringing again, now as bells celestial, while the little notes of the high harmonies are the answering bells of earth. So, sealing its spiritual and musical unity and cumulating its spiritual and musical passion, the symphony ends, as it began, in the poetry of tones, bearing and translating vision. There is not a composer of our immediate time, save only Mr. Loeffler—and with d'Indy by no means forgotten—who could have written so his music of "The Mystic Hour."

It is easy to raise objection and to make reservation. Both were plentiful after the concert of yesterday; neither will be lacking when the symphony is heard in New York and Chicago, and when it is repeated, as it surely should be, in Boston in the course of the spring. Between the enfolding beauty and illusion of the beginning as of earth twilight-transfigured and the etherealized beauty of the end as of the heavens opened radiant to answering spiritual ecstasy; before the rapturous glow and the piercing longing of the Adagio work equal spell upon listening mind and heart, there are passages that still baffle, that as yet seem born of a musical intricacy for its own sake rather than of a release of emotional speech that may not be stilled. Repetition may illuminate and intensify them, whereas excision would only cut away and disjoint music as close woven and self-contained as the patterns of rood-screen or altar-cloth. The Loeffierian idiom, more reticent yet more significant, more individual and intuitive yet more quickening and penetrating than ever to those that answer to it, rarefied and radiant even beyond the composer's growing wont, still falls mute upon many an anxious ear. The quivering Loeffierian harmonies, the super-sensitive Loeffierian progressions—sensibilities of spirit in vision or ecstasy made sound by as sensitive an imagination with means idealized—still fail to vibrate upon not a few that hear. The Gregorian voice, ever below the music or ever in the air above and around it, leaves some puzzled and unstirred.

For others there is no answering to the mood which fills the symphony, of mystic exaltation, of the things of earth and man transfigured in the light of heaven and of them that sit upon celestial thrones benignant. For some Mr. Loeffler is too reticent; for others he speaks only of image and sensation that to them are prismatic vacancy. But for not a few that have now twice heard "Hora Mystica," he has enriched music with a strange, subtle and rarefied beauty new and of himself; and found disclosing and illusory voice for mysteries, longings and visionings of the spiritual faculty that dwells in man, as have few before him. For Liszt in the symphony of next week, for Wagner, "Das Ewig-Weibliche" incarnated this ideal that the soul pursues; for Franck, for d'Indy, for Loeffler, it wears less earthly and more heavenly guise. Not a few know the spiritual passion and the spiritual splendor that may suddenly flame white and high in great cathedrals from the celebration of the High Mass. This passion and this splendor, the music of "Hora Mystica" bears into the world of nature and then lifts high heavenward. Mr. Loeffler may or may not in this symphony have written one of the masterpieces of ultra-modern music, but Dr. Muck, his orchestra and Mr. Townsend's choir played and sang it as men who for the time believed it such.

H. T. P.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Another Repetition of Liszt's "Faust Symphony"—Mr. Ysaye Comes Anew—The Longy Club and the Apollo Club—Recitals by Mr. Gardner and Miss Gulick—Miscellaneous Music

BY general request Dr. Muck will devote the seventeenth pair of Symphony Concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next to one more repetition of Liszt's "Faust Symphony," in which the men's choir, assembled by Mr. Townsend for the performance of last December and Mr. Hackett, the tenor, in the solo part will again assist the orchestra. By common consent the symphony is Liszt's masterpiece; by equal agreement in no other music are conductor, orchestra and assisting chorus more eloquent. At their hands, in fact, the music both this season and last, has sounded as never before on this side the sea. Since the symphony fills seventy minutes and is exhausting to all concerned, no other piece stands on the programme.

Thursday evening, March 22, in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge, the seventh of the current series of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck.

Friday afternoon, March 23, in Symphony Hall, the eighteenth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck, with Mr. Friedberg, the virtuoso of skill and sensibility for assisting pianist.

Saturday evening, March 24, in Symphony Hall, the eighteenth of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck, with Mr. Friedberg for assisting pianist.

Friday afternoon, March 30, in Symphony Hall, the nineteenth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck, at which Mr. Malkin of the violoncellos will be heard in a solo piece.

[95]

From the Post March 4,1917.

SYMPHONY MAKES DEEP IMPRESSION

Loeffler's "Hora Mystica" Compels Attention

BY OLIN DOWNES

Goldmark's "Spring" overture; Mrs. H. H. A. Beach's piano concerto, played by the composer, and Charles Martin Loeffler's symphony, "Hora Mystica," made the programme of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

Goldmark's overture was given a surpassingly brilliant performance. It has the freshness of feeling, the joyous exuberance of spring. This spirit was fully revealed.

DISTINGUISHED PLAYING

Mrs. Beach played the piano part of her concerto with astonishing authority and virtuosity. Few composers are associated more closely with Boston and New England, and with the musical development of this community. There was perceptible a pleasing informality and intimacy in her appearance on the stage. The sensation of a pianist on trial before a solemn and inexorable jury was wholly absent. The greeting extended by the audience was the greeting of friends to a friend. Mrs. Beach's concerto is in fairly orthodox form, but written with a clearness that many a young American intent on out-Strausssing Strauss might take to heart. It is an excellent piece of workmanship. The themes, especially of the first movement, are grateful, and are competently handled. Without pretense or ostentation Mrs. Beach distinguished herself as a pianist in her performance, and was recalled many times.

From Ancient Chants

Mr. Loeffler's symphony was first heard June 6, 1916, at a concert of the Litchfield County Choral Union at Norfolk, Conn. The score is dedicated to Mr. and Mrs. Carl Stoeckel, the patrons of this festival. Mr. Loeffler has been long and deeply interested in the music of the Gregorian chant. He has more than once made pilgrimages to monasteries in Europe, where he has heard performances of these ancient chants and carried away from such experiences ineffaceable impressions, of which his latest work is in a way a record.

In his own words "The mood is one of religious meditation and adoration of nature. A lonely pilgrim winds his way through a land of ever-changing enchantment, a land where clouds move like a procession of nuns over the hills or descend upon a lake, changing it into a mysterious gray sea—a land where shepherds still pipe to their flocks. From far away comes a curious tolling of church bells. At last the wanderer stands before the cathedral of a Benedictine monastery, contemplating its beauty—even the grotesque beauty of the gargoyles, placed on the house of worship to ward off evil spirits. In the church, with its rose window still aglow with the last evening light, the office of compline—known to the Benedictine monks as Hora Mystica—is tendered to God, and peace descends into the soul of the pilgrim.

Compels Consideration

"The symphony is woven round the recitation of the capitulum, 'Tu autem in nobis es, Domine,' the chant, 'In manus tuas, Domine, commendo spiritum meum,' and the antiphon, 'Salve Regina.' The principal theme of the symphony is inspired by the response of the capitulum, 'Deo gratias.' The succession of notes on the bells, B-flat, D-flat, E-flat, F, A-flat, comes from an old Benedictine monastery, near which the composer also noted the curious tolling of smaller village church bells. This motive is rendered in the beginning of the work by the harps and recurs repeatedly." The symphony employs a male chorus as well as an unusual number of instruments.

The mood as well as the texture o the music itself compels the closes consideration. At the beginning it i as if a mood of agitation were flun across the beautiful and mystics background of the orchestra. Fro here on the composer, like the fancif wanderer, approaches through woo of rapt mediation and deep peace. T voices enter impressively with t fragments of Gregorian chant towa the last. The Benedictine monaste the composer had in mind is the m astry at Marialach, of which Hu mans wrote in his "En Route," which Mr. Loeffler last visited in 19

This work undoubtedly contains s of the noblest music Mr. Loeffler ever penned, and it also contains v ders of workmanship. The blendin sonorities, of harmonies which on appear to clash in a manner incap of any intelligible or beautiful result, blend most wonderfully. No doubt such effects are the result, on the one hand, of a profound knowledge of orchestral timbres and tone colors, and, on the other, of an inborn intuition that enabled the composer to translate on paper the precise sounds he has heard one could call the luminosity of the in strumentation—is another feature o this work. There is a noble clarity in the coloring and in the polyphonic writing, bold as it is, and at times extremely dissonant.

Mr. Loeffler has been mentioned in the past—we think erroneously—as a composer who succumbed to the influence of Claude Achille Debussy. The fact is, in the first place, that many of Mr. Loeffler's pages which seemed to have a relation to certain of the harmonic effects of Debussy preceded instead of followed the publication of the works in which these effects occurred. On the contrary, in the composition heard yesterday, if there is any outside influence, it is the influence of D'Indy, shown rather, however, in a similarity of spirit and in the character of the polyphonic writing. This writing impresses one as having, in its best estate, a subtlety and a fineness not hitherto approached, even by Mr. Loeffler.

Endless Melodies

A work like his "Mort de Tintagile," despite its beauty and its imaginative sweep ,is melodrama by the side of this symphony. There is also to be noted in this work a most interesting elasticity of rhythm and a new freedom which nevertheless does not dispense with a definite and consistent architecture in the melodic lines, lines at once singularly plastic and strong. The rhythmic strait-jacket has been thrown in the rubbish heap. The melodies are endless and enchained in a manner that shows the strongest, clearest thinking, as well as consummate technical mastery.

These latter characteristics hold true whether one agrees with the music or not. There are passages not readily "agreed" with at a first hearing, where one feels that the composer is having, as it were, a private conversation with himself, a sort of a musical masonry of which the secret could be discovered with longer and closer acquaintance. And there is also the impression, at this time, that the work is over long.

This symphony should soon be heard again. Neither one nor two hearings of such a work are sufficient for complete assimilation. As for its ultimate place in the repertoire—time only determines the true value of a work of art, but it requires no great length of time to realize in this symphony one of the most individual and ch racteristic utterances of a composer exceptionally entitled to the attention of all lovers of his art, who has here expressed, in a manner that is of engrossing interest, his loftiest thoughts. No other new work of equal interest and importance has been heard at the Symphony concerts this season. The performance must have been one of great difficulty. It reflected infinite credit on Dr. Muck and his men. The composer himself was forced to respond to the applause.

[illegible]latin

n ress: Providence, R. I.

MAR 3 19

H. M. Peck.

BOSTON SYMPHONY REDUCES CONCERTS HERE NEXT YEAR

Will Appear Only Three Times; Other Artists Complete Series.

It is announced that conditions, the nature of which is not specified, have caused the reduction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's appearances here next year to three concerts, cutting the usual number in half. The subscription, which will take the name of the "Ellis concerts," will offer six musical programmes, but with three of them supplied by individual artists of renown. Not since the earliest years of the organization will there be so few concerts here by the orchestra.

These circumstances add greater interest to the two remaining concerts of this season, the first of which comes next Tuesday night in Infantry Hall, and for which Dr. Muck has made one of his interesting programmes. The soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished soprano, who is down for two appearances on the programme, singing two groups of songs with orchestra.

The first group will be by Beethoven, "Wonne der Wehmut" and the great Ceration's hymn, "Die Ehre Gotes in der Natur," and two of the most effective songs from Beethoven's music to "Egmont," "Die Trommel Geuhret" and "Freudvoll und Leidvoll." Her second group will be three songs by Hugo Wolf. The first, "Der Freund," is one of the more unfamiliar songs of this unfortunate genius; "Verborgenheit" and "Er Ist's" are better known.

The symphony will be the First of the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, [illegible]t in E-minor. This has long been a favorite work with Dr. Muck, and justly so. Generally speaking, it is regarded as the best of the four symphonies by Sibelius which are known in this country. Like all of his music it is strong, rugged and individualistic.

The second orchestral number will be new to this city. This is a short sketch by the Russian composer, Borodin, entitled "On the Steppes of Middle Asia." It is programme music pure and simple, a tone-picture in the full sense of the term. It breathes the spirit of the Orient, and listening to it one needs little imagination to see the padding camels of the caravans going over the desert.

The final number will be Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan." This is the first of the series of remarkable works of this form which stamped Strauss as the greatest talent of his generation. Moreover, although it is the first, it remains one of his finest achievements. It has been heard here more than once and always with great success.

From the Transcript March 3,1917.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE RICH HARVEST OF A RARE AFTERNOON

Goldmark's "Spring" Overture in Uncommonly Stirring Performance—The Surprise and the Pleasures of Mrs. Beach and Her Concerto—The Unique Quality, Contents and Impression of Mr. Loeffler's "Hora Mystica"—His Masterpiece, If Not a Masterpiece of Ultra-Modern Music

BETWEEN the routine of the Symphony Concerts of last week and the repetition of the Symphony Concerts of next week, stand the deep pleasure and the high stimulation of the concerts of yesterday afternoon and this evening, with novel music significant and stirring in itself and doubly such by the eloquence of the performance. After weeks of study and days of rehearsal, Mr. Loeffler's new symphony, "Hora Mystica" was played for the first time in the ordinary circumstances of the concert-room, since the original hearing of the piece last June befell under the exceptional conditions of a semi-private festival in a Connecticut town. It proved again—and the more clearly for the luminous, enhancing and reciprocally imaginative performance—music of unique design, content, manner, mood and accomplishment, music that no living composer except Mr. Loeffler could vision, hear and write, music that again affirms his just place above other composers dwelling and working in America, and beside those of the first rank in Europe. The concert further disclosed, almost as though it were a new piece, Mrs. Beach's concerto for pianoforte and orchestra—music that has withstood seventeen years of neglect by almost all pianists but her, yet which holds stoutly beside many a concerto written, applauded and far more warrantably forgotten within that time. None of her music heard in Boston in Boston in recent years has deserved so well both by intrinsic quality and the pleasure that it yields alike to lay and expert ears. Moreover, not within long recollection has the composer, who undertook the piano part, played here with such ready resource and ample range, felicity of touch, ardor of tone and freedom of rhythm and progression. No wonder the audience, mindful friendly-wise of her long residence in Boston and not unimpressed by the sumptuous and stately figure in purples, again and again recalled her. Though Mr. Loeffler's symphony ended the concert, his hearers summoned him once and twice to the stage, while his companions of old in the orchestra surrounded him with outstretched hands, and Dr. Muck, slipping away according to his custom, left the composer to undivided honors. For the conductor himself, however, as he came first to his place was one of those rounds of applause that seem to intensify as the breach between his Government and his audience's widens. Yet in these days, in any rational view, the art of music and the abilities of Dr. Muck transcend in just place the pre-occupations of politics.

Even the familiar overture that led the programme—Goldmark's "In the Spring"—played for once in March weather that did not mock it—set the high pitch of the concert. Repetition may a little underscore the Wagnerian suggestion—a little of joyous "Die Meistersinger" and a little of the wood-notes wild of "Siegfried"—but it may not stale the leap of the first motive into being like the swift rush (as will sometimes and somewhere befall) of the springtime into lush and pulsing force; the full-bodied, warm-blooded, rhythmically animated and colorfully bright development; the whiskings of Goldmark into little decorative passages, like spring buds upon the stem of the music; the sense of out-of-doors when all the world of the Vienna woods is stirring anew and of impulsive human reaction to it even when a composer sits at his writing table; the moments of murky contrast, since spring has clouds as well as sunshine; the final bound into the first happy melody for the happier elation of the close. A tone-poem in short that by sheer human quality in the creative impulse behind and in the beauty of voice that it prompted may outlive Goldmark's more deeply meditated and opulently wrought overtures of Hindu heroines and Greek poetesses. Moreover, if repetition had staled the overture, the performance of yesterday would have revitalized it. It was rich in instrumental song; it glowed with Goldmark's luscious play of timbres and harmonies; it was as rhythmic as it was euphonious; it tingled with the bright mood and the light fancy of the music. Once more the orchestra was a virtuoso orchestra unsurpassed; once more Dr. Muck's pace and accent summoned the very voice of the composer.

Mrs. Beach, in her turn, may have been enkindled by the share of the conductor and the orchestra in her concerto, especially when they answered to the pianist-composer in the Grieg-like suggestion of some of the melodic contours and the harmonic color of the first movement; when they wrought the filmy background and songful progress of the Scherzo against the reiterated figures of the piano; when they lent romantic glamor, a little Grieg-like again, to the slow intermezzo or caught with her the rhythmical alertness of the stilled and musing contrast of the finale. The concerto in itself deserved these pains no less than the felicities of touch, the ardors of tone, the re-creating animation that, as already specified, Mrs. Beach gave lavishly and elastically to her own music. (It is years since she has played with orchestra—and such an orchestra—in Boston, and few could have remembered the fine powers that seemed yesterday second nature to her). Throughout, the music is expertly, sensitively and fancifully written for pianoforte with orchestra, at the golden mean that treats a concerto neither as a virtuoso piece for the solo instrument with accompanying band or as a symphonic piece that happens to add a piano to the other instrumental voices. Much of the music, again, has clear romantic mood and imagination, but the voice of that temper and design, especially in the development of the long first movement, summons a purely musical and occasionally scholarly invention that such calculating contrapuntists as still survive might envy. Yet ever it is an intrinsically songful and transparent music.

Imagination again prompts, while skill fashions, the technical feat of the unchanging pianoforte part in the Scherzo—the recent Sibelian repetitions as it were outdone. Perhaps the invention of the slow song is not so fresh and happy as the rest; yet it woos the ear and quickens lyric impulse, especially when it returns in the finale; while the rhythmic élan and the gleaming pianistic ornament of that last movement are of Mrs. Beach in the vein again. In fine, a concerto that is no monumental masterpiece in the species nor yet music of esoteric distinctions but that gives pleasure to ear, mind, fancy and feeling by the traits enumerated; that may excel all else that Mrs. Beach has written, and that deserves to be played by other pianists, even though she that wrote it still lives and plays it herself. Unfortunately the silly egotism, envy or etiquette of many a virtuoso will continue to deprive audiences of the pleasure of it.

Thereafter the intermission, possibly that the audience might return with perceptions freshened and sensibilities quickened to the exactions of the contrast and the climax—as the whole concert went—of Mr. Loeffler's exacting and eloquent symphony. It bears title "The Mystic Hour," the name that monks give to the evening office following vespers, but of wider implication as to the whole substance and mood of the music. It runs in a single unbroken movement, say forty minutes long—an introduction, an allegro, an adagio, a return of the allegro and a choral close developed from and around tht hymn of the service, "Salve Regina," as a men's choir sings it while the orchestra garlands it with ecstatic and ethereal arabesques. The symphony is scored for full contemporary orchestra—large wind choir, two harps, celesta, and the usual rest, plus a singular chime of bells—B, D, E, F, A, B—designed to recall a succession of notes that the composer heard and remembered, deeply moved by the beauty of the sounds, from a Benedictine monastery, on a hill above a village of the Rhenish Palatinate. The music, furthermore, is written with Mr. Loeffler's habitual technical skill, felicity, and exactness at the fullest and finest—the qualities of workmanship that set him above other composers in the United States, and beside the Europeans of the first rank. Not in all his previous work has he achieved such sustained feats of intricate and imaginative polyphony, devised his harmonic color with such rare, subtle and vivid invention, made such artful and significant play with instrumental timbres, or held so closely, variously and persusively to his own characteristic idiom.

The gradual genesis of the chief motives of the symphony, from the germs of the introduction and from the suggestions of the Gregorian office whence the composer remotely derives them is thrilling alike to technical and imaginative perception. The main motive of the whole music has clear individuality to hold ear and mind and plain pregnancy of mystical mood to come. The theme of the slow movement—for it is long, self-contained and impressive enough to be called a theme—is of a rarefied and poignant beauty, as of spiritual vision and inner imagination. Heard for the first times, it kindles the mind and the heart. Subtly developed, transformed and transfigured, it loses none of its suggestive and intensifying power. Returning finally as the cantus firmus or the abiding melody of "Salve Regina," it uplifts thought and emotion by deepened and puissant beauty. Everywhere from end to end of the symphony, the evolution of the motives, the polyphonic procedure, the harmonic vesture and background, the instrumental dress are in themselves rarely subtle and intricate; yet the impression of the whole music on ear and imagination is of deep intrinsic beauty and of high but reticent spiritual ecstacy. Out of subtlety springs fine intensity of expression; out of intricacy, is born as rare a fineness of mood, sensation, vision and suggestion. The nearest analogue are the matter, manner and spirit of some of d'Indy's music. Yet even so, the symphony of "The Mystic Hour" is altogether and intrinsically Mr. Loeffler's own.

At the beginning, the chiming of the bells, while the harps answer them in high harmonies as of lesser bells heards afar, transports the hearer into a place of the imagination Yet it is still a human place—a visioned monastery or sanctuary on a hill-top. Then, as the motives of the symphony develop in this atmosphere of a common reality transfigured in dream, they seem to guide the listener up the ascent, to prompt the sensations that he receives and to bear this stirring of the pilgrim's and the hearer's spirit.

Sursum corda: lift up your hearts; and in the symphony, it is as though the theme—the beautiful, almost the great theme of the slow movement—spoke the words as the voice at last of the intensifying vision. Exaltation, aspiration, the passion of spiritual longing, wherein every impulse from within seems to find answer in some impulse from without until both are as high and deep ecstasy, flood the music; again, the Loefflerian harmonies are like the stir and quiver of such emotion, while in the play of the instrumental timbres are the changeful intensities of it. The spiritual passioning subsides; heard for an instant the bells recall the beginning of the vision which is also the goal. In the returning motives the pilgrim pursues his mounting way, glimpsing now, as the twilight deepens, only the shadowy phantoms of cloud and lake and all the images that were of fancy haloing actuality. In this transitional passage are the suspensive instants of a music that never loses its characteristic quality of quivering and poignant sensation written in as intense harmonies.

Then, of a gradual sudden—for the paradox of the words suits the course of the symphony—the pilgrim turns the shoulder of the hill, the sanctuary is beside him, out of court and door rise the chants of The Mystic Hour—"Thou art in us, O Lord"; "Into Thy hands we commend our spirits"; and above all the rest, as the pilgrim goes within the chapel, the antiphon, "Salve Regina," of prayer and praise to Her whose Son had set Her as Queen of Heaven, benignant, radiant, infinitely gentle.

Then do the aspiration and the exaltation become devotion and all the devout longing is as spiritual communion with the object and the end of the quest. Around as in yet another antiphon, the bells are ringing again, now as bells celestial, while the little notes of the high harmonies are the answering bells of earth. So, sealing its spiritual and musical unity and cumulating its spiritual and musical passion, the symphony ends, as it began, in the poetry of tones, bearing and translating vision. There is not a composer of our immediate time, save only Mr. Loeffler—and with d'Indy by no means forgotten—who could have written so his music of "The Mystic Hour."

It is easy to raise objection and to make reservation. Both were plentiful after the concert of yesterday; neither will be lacking when the symphony is heard in New York and Chicago, and when it is repeated, as it surely should be, in Boston in the course of the spring. Between the enfolding beauty and illusion of the beginning as of earth twilight-transfigured and the etherealized beauty of the end as of the heavens opened radiant to answering spiritual ecstasy; before the rapturous glow and the piercing longing of the Adagio work equal spell upon listening mind and heart, there are passages that still baffle, that as yet seem born of a musical intricacy for its own sake rather than of a release of emotional speech that may not be stilled. Repetition may illuminate and intensify them, whereas excision would only cut away and disjoint music as close woven and self-contained as the patterns of rood-screen or altar-cloth. The Loefflerian idiom, more reticent yet more significant, more individual and intuitive yet more quickening and penetrating than ever to those that answer to it, rarefied and radiant even beyond the composer's growing wont, still falls mute upon many an anxious ear. The quivering Loefflerian harmonies, the super-sensitive Loefflerian progressions—sensibilities of spirit in vision or ecstasy made sound by as sensitive an imagination with means idealized—still fail to vibrate upon not a few that hear. The Gregorian voice, ever below the music or ever in the air above and around it, leaves some puzzled and unstirred.

For others there is no answering to the mood which fills the symphony, of mystic exaltation, of the things of earth and man transfigured in the light of heaven and of them that sit upon celestial thrones benignant. For some Mr. Loeffler is too reticent; for others he speaks only of image and sensation that to them are prismatic vacancy. But for not a few that have now twice heard "Hora Mystica," he has enriched music with a strange, subtle and rarefied beauty new and of himself; and found disclosing and illusory voice for mysteries, longings and visionings of the spiritual faculty that dwells in man, as have few before him. For Liszt in the symphony of next week, for Wagner, "Das Ewig-Weibliche" incarnated this ideal that the soul pursues; for Franck, for d'Indy, for Loeffler, it wears less earthly and more heavenly guise. Not a few know the spiritual passion and the spiritual splendor that may suddenly flame white and high in great cathedrals from the celebration of the High Mass. This passion and this splendor, the music of "Hora Mystica" bears into the world of nature and then lifts high heavenward. Mr. Loeffler may or may not in this symphony have written one of the masterpieces of ultra-modern music, but Dr. Muck, his orchestra and Mr. Townsend's choir played and sang it as men who for the time believed it such.

H. T. P.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Another Repetition of Liszt's "Faust Symphony"—Mr. Ysaye Comes Anew—The Longy Club and the Apollo Club—Recitals by Mr. Gardner and Miss Gulick—Miscellaneous Music

BY general request Dr. Muck will devote the seventeenth pair of Symphony Concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next to one more repetition of Liszt's "Faust Symphony," in which the men's choir, assembled by Mr. Townsend for the performance of last December and Mr. Hackett, the tenor, in the solo part will again assist the orchestra. By common consent the symphony is Liszt's masterpiece; by equal agreement in no other music are conductor, orchestra and assisting chorus more eloquent. At their hands, in fact, the music both this season and last, has sounded as never before on this side the sea. Since the symphony fills seventy minutes and is exhausting to all concerned, no other piece stands on the programme.

Thursday evening, March 22, in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge, the seventh of the current series of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck.

Friday afternoon, March 23, in Symphony Hall, the eighteenth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck, with Mr. Friedberg, the virtuoso of skill and sensibility for assisting pianist.

Saturday evening, March 24, in Symphony Hall, the eighteenth of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck, with Mr. Friedberg for assisting pianist.

Friday afternoon, March 30, in Symphony Hall, the nineteenth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck, at which Mr. Malkin of the violoncellos will be heard in a solo piece.

[95]

From the Post March 4,1917.

SYMPHONY MAKES DEEP IMPRESSION

Loeffler's "Hora Mystica" Compels Attention

BY OLIN DOWNES

Goldmark's "Spring" overture; Mrs. H. H. A. Beach's piano concerto, played by the composer, and Charles Martin Loeffler's symphony, "Hora Mystica," made the programme of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

Goldmark's overture was given a surpassingly brilliant performance. It has the freshness of feeling, the joyous exuberance of spring. This spirit was fully revealed.

DISTINGUISHED PLAYING

Mrs. Beach played the piano part of her concerto with astonishing authority and virtuosity. Few composers are associated more closely with Boston and New England, and with the musical development of this community. There was perceptible a pleasing informality and intimacy in her appearance on the stage. The sensation of a pianist on trial before a solemn and inexorable jury was wholly absent. The greeting extended by the audience was the greeting of friends to a friend. Mrs. Beach's concerto is in fairly orthodox form, but written with a clearness that many a young American intent on out-Strausssing Strauss might take to heart. It is an excellent piece of workmanship. The themes, especially of the first movement, are grateful, and are competently handled. Without pretense or ostentation Mrs. Beach distinguished herself as a pianist in her performance, and was recalled many times.

From Ancient Chants

Mr. Loeffler's symphony was first heard June 6, 1916, at a concert of the Litchfield County Choral Union at Norfolk, Conn. The score is dedicated to Mr. and Mrs. Carl Stoeckel, the patrons of this festival. Mr. Loeffler has been long and deeply interested in the music of the Gregorian chant. He has more than once made pilgrimages to monasteries in Europe, where he has heard performances of these ancient chants and carried away from such experiences ineffaceable impressions, of which his latest work is in a way a record.

In his own words "The mood is one of religious meditation and adoration of nature. A lonely pilgrim winds his way through a land of ever-changing enchantment, a land where clouds move like a procession of nuns over the hills or descend upon a lake, changing it into a mysterious gray sea—a land where shepherds still pipe to their flocks. From far away comes a curious tolling of church bells. At last the wanderer stands before the cathedral of a Benedictine monastery, contemplating its beauty—even the grotesque beauty of the gargoyles, placed on the house of worship to ward off evil spirits. In the church, with its rose window still aglow with the last evening light, the office of compline—known to the Benedictine monks as Hora Mystica—is tendered to God, and peace descends into the soul of the pilgrim.

Compels Consideration

"The symphony is woven round the recitation of the capitulum, 'Tu autem in nobis es, Domine,' the chant, 'In manus tuas, Domine, commendo spiritum meum,' and the antiphon, 'Salve Regina.' The principal theme of the symphony is inspired by the response of the capitulum, 'Deo gratias.' The succession of notes on the bells, B-flat, D-flat, E-flat, F, A-flat, comes from an old Benedictine monastery, near which the composer also noted the curious tolling of smaller village church bells. This motive is rendered in the beginning of the work by the harps and recurs repeatedly." The symphony employs a male chorus as well as an unusual number of instruments.

The mood as well as the texture o the music itself compels the closes consideration. At the beginning it i as if a mood of agitation were flun across the beautiful and mystica background of the orchestra. Fro here on the composer, like the fancifi wanderer, approaches through woo of rapt mediation and deep peace. T voices enter impressively with t fragments of Gregorian chant towa the last. The Benedictine monaste the composer had in mind is the mo astry at Marialach, of which Huys mans wrote in his "En Route," an which Mr. Loeffler last visited in 1909.

This work undoubtedly contains som of the noblest music Mr. Loeffler has ever penned, and it also contains won- ders of workmanship. The blending of sonorities, of harmonies which on paper appear to clash in a manner incapable of any intelligible or beautiful result, blend most wonderfully. No doubt such effects are the result, on the one hand, of a profound knowledge of orchestral timbres and tone colors, and, on the other, of an inborn intuition that enabled the composer to translate on paper the precise sounds he has heard one could call the luminosity of the instrumentation—is another feature of this work. There is a noble clarity in the coloring and in the polyphonic writing, bold as it is, and at times extremely dissonant.

Mr. Loeffler has been mentioned in the past—we think erroneously—as a composer who succumbed to the influence of Claude Achille Debussy. The fact is, in the first place, that many of Mr. Loeffler's pages which seemed to have a relation to certain of the harmonic effects of Debussy preceded instead of followed the publication of the works in which these effects occurred. On the contrary, in the composition heard yesterday, if there is any outside influence, it is the influence of D'Indy, shown rather, however, in a similarity of spirit and in the character of the polyphonic writing. This writing impresses one as having, in its best estate, a subtlety and a fineness not hitherto approached, even by Mr. Loeffler.

Endless Melodies

A work like his "Mort de Tintagile," despite its beauty and its imaginative sweep ,is melodrama by the side of this symphony. There is also to be noted in this work a most interesting elasticity of rhythm and a new freedom which nevertheless does not dispense with a definite and consistent architecture in the melodic lines, lines at once singularly plastic and strong. The rhythmic strait-jacket has been thrown in the rubbish heap. The melodies are endless and enchained in a manner that shows the strongest, clearest thinking, as well as consummate technical mastery.

These latter characteristics hold true whether one agrees with the music or not. There are passages not readily "agreed" with at a first hearing, where one feels that the composer is having, as it were, a private conversation with himself, a sort of a musical masonry of which the secret could be discovered with longer and closer acquaintance. And there is also the impression, at this time, that the work is over long.

This symphony should soon be heard again. Neither one nor two hearings of such a work are sufficient for complete assimilation. As for its ultimate place in the repertoire—time only determines the true value of a work of art, but it requires no great length of time to realize in this symphony one of the most individual and ch racteristic utterances of a composer exceptionally entitled to the attention of all lovers of his art, who has here expressed, in a manner that is of engrossing interest, his loftiest thoughts. No other new work of equal interest and importance has been heard at the Symphony concerts this season. The performance must have been one of great difficulty. It reflected infinite credit on Dr. Muck and his men. The composer himself was forced to respond to the applause.

...Bulletin

n ress: Providence, R. I.

MAR 3 19

H. M. Peck.

BOSTON SYMPHONY REDUCES CONCERTS HERE NEXT YEAR

Will Appear Only Three Times; Other Artists Complete Series.

It is announced that conditions, the nature of which is not specified, have caused the reduction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's appearances here next year to three concerts, cutting the usual number in half. The subscription, which will take the name of the "Ellis concerts," will offer six musical programmes, but with three of them supplied by individual artists of renown. Not since the earliest years of the organization will there be so few concerts here by the orchestra.

These circumstances add greater interest to the two remaining concerts of this season, the first of which comes next Tuesday night in Infantry Hall, and for which Dr. Muck has made one of his interesting programmes. The soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished soprano, who is down for two appearances on the programme, singing two groups of songs with orchestra.

The first group will be by Beethoven, "Wonne der Wehmut" and the great Ceration's hymn, "Die Ehre Gotes in der Natur," and two of the most effective songs from Beethoven's music to "Egmont," "Die Trommel Geuhret" and "Freudvoll und Leidvoll." Her second group will be three songs by Hugo Wolf. The first, "Der Freund," is one of the more unfamiliar songs of this unfortunate genius; "Verborgenheit" and "Er Ist's" are better known.

The symphony will be the Firs of the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, that in E-minor. This has long been a fav rite work with Dr. Muck, and justly so. G erally speaking, it is regarded as t best of the four symphonies by Sibelius which are known in this country. Like all of his music it is strong, rugged and individualistic.

The second orchestral number will be new to this city. This is a short sketch by the Russian composer, Borodin, entitled "On the Steppes of Middle Asia." It is programme music pure and simple a tone-picture in the full sense of the term. It breathes the spirit of the Orient, and listening to it one needs little imagination to see the padding camels of the caravans going over the desert.

The final number will be Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan." This is the first of the series of remarkable works of this form which stamped Strauss as the greatest talent of his generation. Moreover, although it is the first it remains one of his finest achievements. It has been heard here more and always with great suc-

From the Traveler March 3, 1917.

"Faust" Symphony to Be Repeated

Dr. Muck Promises Great Liszt Work for Next Week's Pair of Concerts with Male Chorus and Soloist.

By FRANK BERTWALL

Another opportunity of hearing Liszt's "Faust" Symphony with the male chorus from the Music Art Society, Arthur Hackett, tenor, is promised by Dr. Muck at next week's Symphony concerts. Other items of importance in the music calendar are the appearance of Eugene Ysaye, the Belgian violinist, at tomorrow afternoon's concert in Symphony Hall, the final concert of the Longy Club for the season on Wednesday evening in Jordan Hall, the concert by Mme. Galli-Curci, the famous soprano of the Chicago Opera Company, in Symphony Hall, Sunday afternoon, March 11, the final concert of the Flonzaley Quartet's season in Jordan Hall, Thursday evening, March 15 and Julia Culp's concert in Symphony Hall, Sunday afternoon, March 18.

For tomorrow afternoon's concert in Symphony Hall at 3:30 Eugene Ysaye, the eminent Belgian violinist, will play the following program:

Sunday Afternoon Concert.

Sonate in A major, Op. 13, for violin and piano.....G. Faure
MM. Ysaye and Dambois.
II.
Sonate in D minor for violin and piano.....Geminiani
MM. Ysaye and Dambois.
III.
a. Extase.....Ysaye
b. Scherzo—Valse.....Chabrier-Loeffler
M. Ysaye.
IV.
Piano Soli:
a. Prelude.....Rachmaninoff
b. Caprice—Valse.....M. Dambois
M. Dambois.
V.
a. Reve d'enfant.....Ysaye
b. Valse.....Chopin-Ysaye
c. Rondo.....Guiraud
M. Ysaye.

Symphony Treat

Just one number appears on Dr. Muck's program for next week's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is the "Faust" symphony of Liszt. The work is too long to permit of satisfactory linking up with another composition on these programs. Those who heard it at the Christmas concerts will appreciate the insistent demand for another hearing, which has caused Dr. Muck to repeat it. The orchestra will again be assisted by the male chorus of the Music Art Society, with Arthur Hackett as tenor soloist.

MRS. H. H. A. BEACH

Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra, Friday Afternoon, March 2, Saturday Evening, March 3.

While hundreds of people are enjoying charming Ann Murdock in Boston in "Seven Deadly Sins," this interesting star is enjoying a vacation at her charming log camp in the Adirondacks. Miss Murdock is a great outdoors enthusiast and is one of the most popular young women about the Lake Placid Club.

EVENING TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
MAR 4 1917

Fifth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

With the fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will be given in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, March 6, comes the news that next season, 1917-1918, the number of concerts which the orchestra will give in Providence will be reduced from six to three. In the subscription, which will take the name of "The Ellis Concerts" the number of concerts will remain six, the other three being given by distinguished artists. This will be the first time since the very earliest years of the orchestra that Providence has had so few concerts, but conditions have made the reduction in number necessary.

All the more interest, therefore, attaches to the last two remaining concerts of this year. For the one on next Tuesday evening Dr. Muck has made one of his usually interesting programs. The soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished soprano. Miss Gerhardt's art needs no praise at this time; suffice to say that it is very near perfection and she has never sung more beautifully than she has this year. She is down for two appearances on the program, singing two groups of songs with orchestra. The first group will be by Beethoven, "Wonne der Wehmut" and the great Creation's hymn, "Die Ehre Gottes in der Natur," and two of the most effective songs from Beethoven's music to "Egmont," "Die Trommel geruhret" and "Freudvoll und Leidvoll." Her second group will be three songs by Hugo Wolf, the first "Der Freund" is one of the more unfamiliar songs of this unfortunate genius; "Verborgenheit" and "Er ist's" are better known.

The purely orchestral part of the program is very attractive. The symphony will be the first of the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, that in E-minor. This has long been a favorite work with Dr. Muck and justly so. Generally speaking, it is regarded as the best of the four symphonies by Sibelius which are known in this country. Like all of his music it is strong, rugged and individualistic.

The second orchestral number will be new to Providence. This is a short sketch by the Russian composer, Borodin, entitled "On the Steppes of Middle Asia." It is program music pure and simple, a tone-picture in the full sense of the term. It breathes the spirit of the Orient and listening to it one needs little imagination to see the padding camels of the caravans going over the desert.

The final number will be Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan." This is the first of the series of remarkable works of this form which stamped Strauss as the greatest talent of his generation. Moreover, although it is the first, it remains one of his finest achievements. It has been heard here more than once and always with great success. The program in its proper order is as follows:

Symphony No. 1, in E-minor, Op. 39, Sibelius; songs with orchestra, "Wonne der Wehmut," "Die Trommel Geruhret," "Freudvoll und Leidvoll," "Die Ehre Gottes in der Natur," Beethoven; orchestral sketch, "On the Steppes of Middle Asia," Borodin; songs with orchestra, Der Freund, Verborgenheit, Er ist's, Wolf; "Don Juan" Tone poem, Strauss. Elena Gerhardt, soloist.

Journal
Address: Providence, R. I.
MAR 7 - 1917

SYMPHONY APPEARS IN FIFTH CONCERT

Compositions of Modernists Feature at Infantry Hall.

ELENA GERHARDT PLEASES

Singer Gives Songs with Orchestra Accompaniment.—Artist, Singing Beethoven and Wolf Songs, is Enthusiastically Applauded by Audience.—Dr. Muck Conducts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conducting, gave the fifth concert of its series in Infantry Hall last evening. It was a programme in which the modernists were much in evidence and for sustained interest the concert has not been surpassed this season. The orchestra was assisted by Elena Gerhardt, whose two groups of songs with orchestral accompaniment were enthusiastically received. After each appearance she was recalled again and again. The Sibelius symphony, the programme's chief number, is not unfamiliar to patrons of these concerts. It is indeed a gorgeous symphonic work and grows in beauty and interest with each successive hearing. A fanciful sketch by the Russian, Borodin, and the Strauss tone poem "Don Juan" completes the list of orchestral numbers. The full programme in its proper order follows:

Symphony No. 1, in E-minor, Op. 39....Sibelius
Andante ma non troppo; Allegro energico.
Andante, ma non troppo lento.
Allegro.
Finale (Quasi una fantasia): Andante; Allegro molto.
Four songs with orchestra.....Beethoven
Wonne der Wehmut, Op. 83, No. 1.
Die Trommel geruhret.
Freudvoll und leidvoll, from the music to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84.
Die Ehre Gottes in der Natur, Op. 48, No. 4.
Orchestra sketch: On the Steppes of Middle Asia.....Borodin
Three songs with orchestra.....Hugo Wolf
Der Freund.
Verborgenheit.
Er ist's.
"Don Juan," a tone-poem (after Nicolaus Lenau), Op. 20.....Strauss

In the Sibelius symphony is seen not only the hand of the master craftsman in technique, but an extraordinary fund of original musical ideas, which flow in brilliant succession and fall upon the ear with startling effect. The Finnish composer's style does not resemble that of any other writer. It is a strange and restless style and fascinates by its constantly changing effects, its unfamillar coloring and peculiar rhythms. Dr. Muck's reading of the work was all that could be desired, and in this and subsequent numbers his men gave that beautifully finished technical response which invariably distinguishes their playing.

Barodin's sketch, "On the Steppes of Middle Asia," is descriptive of the passage of a caravan over the desert and displays the Russian composer's skill in creating a realistic musical picture. There are many novel effects of orchestration, pizzacato of the strings giving a striking representation of the walking of horses. The vast stretches of the desert and the gradual disappearance of the caravan in the distance are suggested in an interesting and delightful manner.

The familiar Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan," was given a brilliant rendition. In this piece of "program" music there is wonderful orchestration, but the meaning of it all would be hard to follow, even with the assistance of a printed explanation. However, as a concert piece it is very effective and provides the necessary fireworks for a closing number.

Elena Gerhardt sang her songs in highly artistic fashion and was undoubtedly the most popular soloist that has appeared here with the orchestra this season.

It is a cause for rejoicing that her songs were sung with orchestral accompaniment, and Dr. Muck gave the singer perfect support. The Beethoven songs were sung with rare insight and beautiful vocal quality. Mme. Gerhardt's full, rich voice is ample in power and is controlled with fine skill and judgment. The martial Leid No. 1 was given with great spirit and the "Die Ehre Gottes in Der Natur" sung with the grandeur of style demanded by the thought expressed in the poem.

Again in the group by Wolf she sang with finished style and delightful vocal control.

Journal
Address: Providence, R. I.
MAR 4 1917

In the forthcoming announcement of next season's plans, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its patrons here will have a surprise, since the number of concerts by the orchestra will be reduced to three, and the other three concerts in the subscription series are to be given by distinguished artists. It is many years since the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave only three concerts here in a season, and while for several years the courses consisted of five concerts, there have been since that time several seasons of six concerts. Further definite anouncement of the arrangements for next season will enable patrons to form their opinions as to the change, and opinions once formed, there is small doubt that there will be full expression thereof.

EVENING TRIBUNE
Address: Providence, R. I.
MAR 6 -

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the last but one of this season, will be given in Infantry Hall this evening beginning at 8:15. The soloist will be that most admirable and artistic singer, Elena Gerhardt, and the program is as follows: Symphony No. 1 in E-Minor, Op. 39, Sibelius; songs with orchestra, (a) "Wonne der Wehmut," (b) "Die Trommel geruhret," (c) "Freudvoll und Leidvoll," (d) "Die Ehre Gottes in der Natur," Beethoven; orchestral sketch, "On the Steppes of Middle Asia," Borodin; songs with orchestra, (a) "Der Freund," (b) "Verborgenheit," (c) "Er ist's," Wolf; "Don Juan" (Tone Poem), Strauss. Soloist—Elena Gerhardt.

From the Journal March 3, 1917.

'HORA MYSTICA' PROVES PUZZLE AT SYMPHONY

Charles Loeffler's Work, Performed for First Time in Boston.

By F. Esposito

What is a symphony? If one reads the definitions of the books, he will find that it is a concerted work for orchestra, sometimes with chorus, almost always in several movements, tonally related and related in sentiment,—or, more simply, a consonance and harmony of sounds.

If, moved by curiosity to hear a new thing, one yesterday afternoon attended at Symphony hall while Charles Martin Loeffler's "Hora Mystica" symphony was performed for the first time in Boston, he would be compelled to revise either his definition or Mr. Loeffler's.

Mr. Loeffler calls it a symphony, though it has only one movement and not a single consonance in all its pages. The orchestra is made to sweep broad, rich groundwork of color slowly along, while one set of instruments after another embroiders vaguely the themes; but not in a pattern, for that word suggests regularity or recognizable repetition.

Like Older Music

Forgetting for a while that older music in which one expected to hear a melody with a beginning and an end, or a pause and a rhythm, the hearer may possibly be able to yield to plain tone-sensation, to fall with Mr. Loeffler into "religious meditation and adoration of nature." To such a hearer, more especially if he is accustomed to the more ancient Catholic music, the plain song and the Gregorian chants, the "Hora Mystica" may have interest and meaning, even on one hearing. It is safe to say, however, that very few such persons were in Symphony Hall yesterday. The work was not hailed with rapturous applause; the audience dispersed with a puzzled look for the most part.

Grave tones, rising in constant dissonance, open the symphony, and presently from the harps comes the suggestion of church bells, small and far away across a homely, quiet country. And now the notes are repeated by the bells themselves, falling curiously into a sequence that presently discloses the theme of the "Salve Regina." Through a movement called "allegro," a painted, slowly changing and dissolving mass of tone, this and the "Deo gratias" response appear.

In still more quiet and almost solemn dissonance, the wanderer comes at last to the Benedictine cathedral. Its rose-window is still aglow with the last evening light, and within the compline is sounding. This was sung, in rugged unisons of plain-song, by a chorus of men trained by Stephen S. Townsend. And so, even with its last stubborn chord, long drawn out and unresolved, the symphony falls to an end.

Performed Nine Times

The concert began with Goldmark's overture, "Im Fruehling," which might almost be called popular music by now; it has been performed nine times by the Symphony Orchestra since its first appearance in 1890. Dr. Muck's reading made the great work seem more Wagnerian than ever, the characteristic phrase-tags of the revolutionist of Bayreuth standing out clearly, and the delightful themes taking on unwonted brilliance at the conductor's swift tempo.

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach played her concerto in C-sharp minor. Its spirit, its clean-cut harmonies and delightfully open orchestration, are still refreshing, and Mrs. Beach herself never played more brilliantly, or with more command.

This movement sparkles so that it makes the earlier part of the work seem dull by contrast. Also, the regard for the piano as a solo instrument subdues the orchestra so that the beautiful cantilene melody which it sings against the piano accompaniment is hardly to be heard at all.

Mrs. Beach has avoided the frills of virtuosity in this work; she has supplied wonderfully artistic development of themes, and has sacrificed interest to repetition. The concerto still remains, however, one of the most delightful works of an American composer.

From HERALD
Address: Washington, D. C.
Date MAR 4 - 1917

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, March 13. This will bring to a close the most successful season the Boston Orchestra has ever had in Washington in the thirty-odd years it has been coming here. The soloist for this concert will be Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German soprano. Miss Gerhardt will sing four songs by Beethoven and three songs by Wolf.

From Bulletin
Address: Providence, R.
Date MAR 7 - 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLEASES IN FIFTH CONCERT OF YEAR

Elena Gerhardt's Two Groups of Songs, with Orchestra Accompaniment, Enthusiastically Received. — Modernists Much in Evidence in Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conducting, gave the fifth concert of its series in Infantry Hall last evening. It was a programme in which the modernists were much in evidence and for sustained interest the concert has not been surpassed this season. The orchestra was assisted by Elena Gerhardt, whose two groups of songs with orchestral accompaniment were enthusiastically received. After each appearance she was recalled again and again. The Sibelius symphony, the programme's chief number, is not unfamiliar to patrons of these concerts. It is indeed a gorgeous symphonic work and grows in beauty and interest with each successive hearing. A fanciful sketch by the Russian, Borodin, and the Strauss tone poem "Don Juan" completes the list of orchestral numbers. The full programme in its proper order follows:

Symphony No. 1, in E-minor, Op. 39....Sibelius
Andante ma non troppo; Allegro energico.
Andante, ma non troppo lento.
Allegro.
Finale (Quasi una fantasia): Andante; Allegro molto.
Four songs with orchestra.....Beethoven
Wonne der Wehmut, Op. 83, No. 1.
Die Trommel geruhret.
Freudvoll und leidvoll, from the music to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84.
Die Ehre Gottes in der Natur, Op. 48, No. 4.
Orchestra sketch: On the Steppes of Middle Asia.....Borodin
Three songs with orchestra.....Hugo Wolf
Der Freund.
Verborgenheit.
Er ist's.
"Don Juan," a tone-poem (after Nicolaus Lenau), Op. 20.....Strauss

In the Sibelius symphony is seen not only the hand of the master craftsman in technique, but an extraordinary fund of original musical ideas, which flow in brilliant succession and fall upon the ear with startling effect. The Finnish composer's style does not resemble that of any other writer. It is a strange and restless style and fascinates by its constantly changing effects, its unfamillar coloring and peculiar rhythms. Dr. Muck's reading of the work was all that could be desired, and in this and subsequent numbers his men gave that beautifully finished technical response which invariably distinguishes their playing.

Barodin's sketch, "On the Steppes of Middle Asia," is descriptive of the passage of a caravan over the desert and displays the Russian composer's skill in creating a realistic musical picture. There are many novel effects of orchestration, pizzacato of the strings giving a striking representation of the walking of horses. The vast stretches of the desert and the gradual disappearance of the caravan in the distance are suggested in an interesting and delightful manner.

The familiar Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan," was given a brilliant rendition. In this piece of "program" music there is wonderful orchestration, but the meaning of it all would be hard to follow, even with the assistance of a printed explanation. However, as a concert piece it is very effective and provides the necessary fireworks for a closing number.

Elena Gerhardt sang her songs in highly artistic fashion and was undoubtedly the most popular soloist that has appeared here with the orchestra this season.

It is a cause for rejoicing that her songs were sung with orchestral accompaniment, and Dr. Muck gave the singer perfect support. The Beethoven songs were sung with rare insight and beautiful vocal quality. Mme. Gerhardt's full, rich voice is ample in power and is controlled with fine skill and judgment. The martial Leid No. 1 was given with great spirit and the "Die Ehre Gottes in Der Natur" sung with the grandeur of style demanded by the thought expressed in the poem.

Again in the group by Wolf she sang with finished style and delightful vocal control.

TIMES
Address: Washington, D. C.
MAR 4 - 1917

CONCERTS FOR CAPITAL

Musical Treats Provided for Residents and Visitors.

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, March 13. This will bring to a close the most successful season the Boston Orchestra has ever had in Washington in the thirty-odd years it has been coming to this city.

The soloist for this concert will be Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German soprano. Miss Gerhardt will sing four notable songs by Beethoven and three songs by Wolf.

[96]

From the Traveler March 3, 1917.

"Faust" Symphony to Be Repeated

Dr. Muck Promises Great Liszt Work for Next Week's Pair of Concerts with Male Chorus and Soloist.

By FRANK BERTWALL

Another opportunity of hearing Liszt's "Faust" Symphony with the male chorus from the Music Art Society, Arthur Hackett, tenor, is promised by Dr. Muck at next week's Symphony concerts. Other items of importance in the music calendar are the appearance of Eugene Ysaye, the Belgian violinist, at tomorrow afternoon's concert in Symphony Hall, the final concert of the Longy Club for the season on Wednesday evening in Jordan Hall, the concert by Mme. Galli-Curci, the famous soprano of the Chicago Opera Company, in Symphony Hall, Sunday afternoon, March 11, the final concert of the Flonzaley Quartet's season in Jordan Hall, Thursday evening, March 15 and Julia Culp's concert in Symphony Hall, Sunday afternoon, March 18.

For tomorrow afternoon's concert in Symphony Hall at 3:30 Eugene Ysaye, the eminent Belgian violinist, will play the following program:

Sunday Afternoon Concert.

Sonata in A major, Op. 13, for violin and piano.....G. Faure
MM. Ysaye and Dambois.
II.
Sonata in D minor for violin and piano.....Geminiani
MM. Ysaye and Dambois.
III.
a. Extase.....Ysaye
b. Scherzo—Valse.....Chabrier-Loeffler
M. Ysaye.
IV.
Piano Soli:
a. Prelude.....Rachmaninoff
b. Caprice—Valse.....M. Dambois
M. Dambois.
V.
a. Reve d'enfant.....Ysaye
b. Valse.....Chopin-Ysaye
c. Rondo.....Guiraud
M. Ysaye.

Symphony Treat

Just one number appears on Dr. Muck's program for next week's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is the "Faust" symphony of Liszt. The work is too long to permit of satisfactory linking up with another composition on these programs. Those who heard it at the Christmas concerts will appreciate the insistent demand for another hearing, which has caused Dr. Muck to repeat it. The orchestra will again be assisted by the male chorus of the Music Art Society, with Arthur Hackett as tenor soloist.

MRS. H. H. A. BEACH

Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra, Friday Afternoon, March 2, Saturday Evening, March 3.

While hundreds of people are enjoying charming Ann Murdock in Boston in "Seven Deadly Sins," this interesting star is enjoying a vacation at her charming camp in the Adirondacks. Miss Murdock is a great outdoors enthusiast and is one of the most popular young women about the Lake Placid Club.

Journal
Providence, R. I.
MAR 7 - 1917

SYMPHONY APPEARS IN FIFTH CONCERT

Compositions of Modernists Feature at Infantry Hall.

ELENA GERHARDT PLEASES

Singer Gives Songs with Orchestra Accompaniment.—Artist, Singing Beethoven and Wolf Songs, is Enthusiastically Applauded by Audience.—Dr. Muck Conducts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conducting, gave the fifth concert of its series in Infantry Hall last evening. It was a programme in which the modernists were much in evidence and for sustained interest the concert has not been surpassed this season. The orchestra was assisted by Elena Gerhardt, whose two groups of songs with orchestral accompaniment were enthusiastically received. After each appearance she was recalled again and again. The Sibelius symphony, the programme's chief number, is not unfamiliar to patrons of these concerts. It is indeed a gorgeous symphonic work and grows in beauty and interest with each successive hearing. A fanciful sketch by the Russian, Borodin, and the Strauss tone poem "Don Juan," completes the list of orchestral numbers. The full programme in its proper order follows:

Symphony No. 1, in E-minor, Op. 39....Sibelius
Andante ma non troppo; Allegro energico.
Andante, ma non troppo lento.
Allegro.
Finale (Quasi una fantasia): Andante; Allegro molto.
Four songs with orchestra.....Beethoven
Wonne der Wehmut, Op. 83, No. 1.
Die Trommel geruhret.
Freudvoll und leidvoll, from the music to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84.
Die Ehre Gottes in der Natur, Op. 48, No. 4.
Orchestra sketch: On the Steppes of Middle Asia.....Borodin
Three songs with orchestra.....Hugo Wolf
Der Freund.
Verborgenheit.
Er ist's.
"Don Juan," a tone-poem (after Nicolaus Lenau), Op. 20.....Strauss

In the Sjbelius symphony is seen not only the hand of the master craftsman in technique, but an extraordinary fund of original musical ideas, which flow in brilliant succession and fall upon the ear with startling effect. The Finnish composer's style does not resemble that of any other writer. It is a strange and restless style and fascinates by its constantly changing effects, its unfamiliar coloring and peculiar rhythms. Dr. Muck's reading of the work was all that could be desired, and in this and subsequent numbers his men gave that beautifully finished technical response which invariably distinguishes their playing.

Barodin's sketch, "On the Steppes of Middle Asia," is descriptive of the passage of a caravan over the desert and displays the Russian composer's skill in creating a realistic musical picture. There are many novel effects of orchestration, pizzacato of the strings giving a striking representation of the walking of horses. The vast stretches of the desert and the gradual disappearance of the caravan in the distance are suggested in an interesting and delightful manner.

The familiar Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan," was given a brilliant rendition. In this piece of "program" music there is wonderful orchestration, but the meaning of it all would be hard to follow, even with the assistance of a printed explanation. However, as a concert piece it is very effective and provides the necessary fireworks for a closing number.

Elena Gerhardt sang her songs in highly artistic fashion and was undoubtedly the most popular soloist that has appeared here with the orchestra this season.

It is a cause for rejoicing that her songs were sung with orchestral accompaniment, and Dr. Muck gave the singer perfect support. The Beethoven songs were sung with rare insight and beautiful vocal quality. Mme. Gerhardt's full, rich voice is ample in power and is controlled with fine skill and judgment. The Spiritual Leid No. 1 was given with great spirit and the "Die Ehre Gottes in Der Natur" sung with the grandeur of style demanded by the thought expressed in the poem.

Again in the group by Wolf she sang with finished style and delightful vocal control.

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the last but one of this season, will be given in Infantry Hall this evening beginning at 8:15. The soloist will be that most admirable and artistic singer, Elena Gerhardt, and the program is as follows: Symphony No. 1 in E-Minor, Op. 39, Sibelius; songs with orchestra, (a) "Wonne der Wehmut," (b) "Die Trommel geruhret," (c) "Freudvoll und Leidvoll," (d) "Die Ehre Gottes in der Natur," Beethoven; orchestral sketch, "On the Steppes of Middle Asia," Borodin; songs with orchestra, (a) "Der Freund," (b) "Verborgenheit," (c) "Er Ist's," Wolf; "Don Juan" (Tone Poem), Strauss. Soloist—Elena Gerhardt.

EVENING TRIBUNE
Providence, R. I.
MAR 6 -

From the Journal March 3, 1917.

'HORA MYSTICA' PROVES PUZZLE AT SYMPHONY

Charles Loeffler's Work, Performed for First Time in Boston.

By F. Esposito

What is a symphony? If one reads the definitions of the books, he will find that it is a concerted work for orchestra, sometimes with chorus, almost always in several movements, tonally related and related in sentiment,—or, more simply, a consonance and harmony of sounds.

If, moved by curiosity to hear a new thing, one yesterday afternoon attended at Symphony hall while Charles Martin Loeffler's "Hora Mystica" symphony was performed for the first time in Boston, he would be compelled to revise either his definition or Mr. Loeffler's.

Mr. Loeffler calls it a symphony, though it has only one movement and not a single consonance in all its pages. The orchestra is made to sweep broad, rich groundwork of color slowly along, while one set of instruments after another embroiders vaguely the themes; but not in a pattern, for that word suggests regularity or recognizable repetition.

Like Older Music

Forgetting for a while that older music in which one expected to hear a melody with a beginning and an end, or a pause and a rhythm, the hearer may possibly be able to yield to plain tone-sensation, to fall with Mr. Loeffler into "religious meditation and adoration of nature." To such a hearer, more especially if he is accustomed to the more ancient Catholic music, the plain song and the Gregorian chants, the "Hora Mystica" may have interest and meaning, even on one hearing. It is safe to say, however, that very few such persons were in Symphony Hall yesterday. The work was not hailed with rapturous applause; the audience dispersed with a puzzled look for the most part.

Grave tones, rising in constant dissonance, open the symphony, and presently from the harps comes the suggestion of church bells, small and far away across a homely, quiet country. And now the notes are repeated by the bells themselves, falling curiously into a sequence that presently discloses the theme of the "Salve Regina." Through a movement called "allegro," a painted, slowly changing and dissolving mass of tone, this and the "Deo gratias" response appear.

In still more quiet and almost solemn dissonance, the wanderer comes at last to the Benedictine cathedral. Its rose-window is still aglow with the last evening light, and within the compline is sounding. This was sung, in rugged unisons of plain-song, by a chorus of men trained by Stephen S. Townsend. And so, even with its last stubborn chord, long drawn out and unresolved, the symphony falls to an end.

Performed Nine Times

The concert began with Goldmark's overture, "Im Fruehling," which might almost be called popular music by now. It has been performed nine times by the Symphony Orchestra since its first appearance in 1890. Dr. Muck's reading made the great work seem more Wagnerian than ever, the characteristic phrase-tags of the revolutionist of Bayreuth standing out clearly, and the delightful themes taking on unwonted brilliance at the conductor's swift tempo.

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach played her concerto in C-sharp minor. Its spirit, its clean-cut harmonies and delightfully open orchestration, are still refreshing, and Mrs. Beach herself never played more brilliantly, or with more command.

This movement sparkles so that it makes the earlier part of the work seem dull by contrast. Also, the regard for the piano as a solo instrument subdues the orchestra so that the beautiful cantilene melody which it sings against the piano accompaniment is hardly to be heard at all.

Mrs. Beach has avoided the frills of virtuosity in this work; she has supplied wonderfully artistic development of themes, and has sacrificed interest to repetition. The concerto still remains, however, one of the most delightful works of an American composer.

HERALD
Washington, D. C.
MAR

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, March 13. This will bring to a close the most successful season the Boston Orchestra has ever had in Washington in the thirty-odd years it has been coming here. The soloist for this concert will be Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German soprano. Miss Gerhardt will sing four songs by Beethoven and three songs by Wolf.

From Bulletin
Providence, R.
MAR 7 - 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLEASES IN FIFTH CONCERT OF YEAR

Elena Gerhardt's Two Groups of Songs, with Orchestra Accompaniment, Enthusiastically Received. — Modernists Much in Evidence in Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conducting, gave the fifth concert of its series in Infantry Hall last evening. It was a programme in which the modernists were much in evidence and for sustained interest the concert has not been surpassed this season. The orchestra was assisted by Elena Gerhardt, whose two groups of songs with orchestral accompaniment were enthusiastically received. After each appearance she was recalled again and again. The Sibelius symphony, the programme's chief number, is not unfamiliar to patrons of these concerts. It is indeed a gorgeous symphonic work and grows in beauty and interest with each successive hearing. A fanciful sketch by the Russian, Borodin, and the Strauss tone poem "Don Juan" completes the list of orchestral numbers. The full programme in its proper order follows:

Symphony No. 1, in E-minor, Op. 39....Sibelius
Andante ma non troppo; Allegro energico.
Andante, ma non troppo lento.
Allegro.
Finale (Quasi una fantasia): Andante; Allegro molto.
Four songs with orchestra.....Beethoven
Wonne der Wehmut, Op. 83, No. 1.
Die Trommel geruhret.
Freudvoll und leidvoll, from the music to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84.
Die Ehre Gottes in der Natur, Op. 48, No. 4.
Orchestra sketch: On the Steppes of Middle Asia.....Borodin
Three songs with orchestra.....Hugo Wolf
Der Freund.
Verborgenheit.
Er ist's.
"Don Juan," a tone-poem (after Nicolaus Lenau), Op. 20.....Strauss

In the Sjbelius symphony is seen not only the hand of the master craftsman in technique, but an extraordinary fund of original musical ideas, which flow in brilliant succession and fall upon the ear with startling effect. The Finnish composer's style does not resemble that of any other writer. It is a strange and restless style and fascinates by its constantly changing effects, its unfamiliar coloring and peculiar rhythms. Dr. Muck's reading of the work was all that could be desired, and in this and subsequent numbers his men gave that beautifully finished technical response which invariably distinguishes their playing.

Barodin's sketch, "On the Steppes of Middle Asia," is descriptive of the passage of a caravan over the desert and displays the Russian composer's skill in creating a realistic musical picture. There are many novel effects of orchestration, pizzacato of the strings giving a striking representation of the walking of horses. The vast stretches of the desert and the gradual disappearance of the caravan in the distance are suggested in an interesting and delightful manner.

The familiar Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan," was given a brilliant rendition. In this piece of "program" music there is wonderful orchestration, but the meaning of it all would be hard to follow, even with the assistance of a printed explanation. However, as a concert piece it is very effective and provides the necessary fireworks for a closing number.

Elena Gerhardt sang her songs in highly artistic fashion and was undoubtedly the most popular soloist that has appeared here with the orchestra this season.

It is a cause for rejoicing that her songs were sung with orchestral accompaniment, and Dr. Muck gave the singer perfect support. The Beethoven songs were sung with rare insight and beautiful vocal quality. Mme. Gerhardt's full, rich voice is ample in power and is controlled with fine skill and judgment. The Spiritual Leid No. 1 was given with great spirit and the "Die Ehre Gottes in Der Natur" sung with the grandeur of style demanded by the thought expressed in the poem.

Again in the group by Wolf she sang with finished style and delightful vocal

TIMES
Washington, D. C.
MAR

CONCERTS FOR CAPITAL

Musical Treats Provided for Residents and Visitors.

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, March 13. This will bring to a close the most successful season the Boston Orchestra has ever had in Washington in the thirty-odd years it has been coming to this city.

The soloist for this concert will be Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished German soprano. Miss Gerhardt will sing four notable songs by Beethoven and three songs by Wolf.

[96]

TRIBUNE
Providence, R. I.
MAR 7 - 1917

BRILLIANT WORK AT CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mme. Gerhardt Gave Great Delight.

The fifth concert of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Infantry Hall last night with Elena Gerhardt as the soloist and a programme was rendered that was of high order of merit, as is always expected of this orchestra and those who are selected to fill the role of soloists at its concerts. Dr. Muck, the conductor, had prepared a feast of good things musical that was presented in a most attractive and artistic manner and enjoyed to the full by the appreciative audience. There was the usual warm reception for the musicians and the soloist and the concert in its entirety was one of the best of the season.

The programme opened with the symphony in E-minor by Sibelius, the eminent Finnish composer which has been commonly pronounced the best of the four of his works which are familiar to music lovers of this country. Dr. Muck has long regarded it with special favor and it merits his regard. It is a strong, forceful composition and bears unmistakable marks of the individual of the composer, while characterized by passages of great beauty. It was rendered in a brilliant manner, the shading of the work of the orchestra from the soft and low measures to the bursts of great volume of sound being particularly noticeable and worthy of praise.

The second orchestral number, Borodin's "On the Steppes of Middle Asia," was given for the first time in this city. It is brief and of the nature simply of programme music, but is especially clear and forceful in its interpretive character. The spirit of the Orient whispers through all its melodies and delights the ear. It was received with hearty expressions of pleasure by the audience. The final number by the orchestra was Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," which has been rendered here several times but is always welcome. It is a remarkable work, ranking high among the achievements of the composer. It is filled with passages of marked strength with climaxes that tax the skill of the orchestra to its utmost, but never overtaxes, the musicians being equal to every demand made by the score.

Mme. Gerhardt possesses a strong but sweet soprano, developed naturally and fully, and she uses it with a display of technique that makes it easy for her to cover a wide range and to essay ambitious passages with certainty of correct execution. She sang two groups of songs, every number being enjoyable and creditably rendered. She was accompanied admirably by the orchestra. She won sincere and well-deserved applause and the audience would have been glad to have heard her again.

The program was rendered in the following order:

Symphony No. 1, in E-minor Op. 39....Sibelius
Andante ma non troppo; Allegro energico.
Andante, ma non troppo lento.
Finale (Quasi una fantasia); Andante; Allegro molto.
Four songs with orchestra.....Beethoven
Wonne der Wehmut, Op. 83, No. 1.
Die Trommel geruhret.
Freudvoll und Hedvoll, from the music to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84.
Die Ehre Gottes in der Natur, Op. 48, No. 4.
Orchestra sketch: On the Steppes of Middle Asia .....Borodin
Three songs with orchestra.....Hugo Wolf
Der Freund.
Verborgenheit.
Er ist's.
"Don Juan," a tone-poem (after Nicolaus Lenau), Op. 20.....Strauss

Journal
Providence, R. I.

For the fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, at 8:15 o'clock, an uncommon programme has been arranged by the conductor, Dr. Muck. The soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished soprano, who as announced last Sunday will sing two groups of songs with the orchestra. The first group will be by Beethoven, "Wonne der Wehmut," the great hymn, "Die Ehre Gottes in der Natur," and two songs from Beethoven's music to "Egmont," "Die Trommel Geruhret" and "Freudvoll und Leidvoll." Her second group will be three songs by Hugo Wolf the first, "Der Freund," is one of the more unfamiliar songs of this composer; "Verborgenheit" and "Er ist's" are better known.

The purely orchestral part of the programme is attractive, since the symphony will the first of the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, that in E-minor, which is generally regarded as the best of the four symphonies by Sibelius which are known in this country.

The second orchestral number, which will be new to Providence, is a short sketch by the Russian composer, Borodin, entitled "On the Steppes of Middle Asia," programme music pure and simple, which is said to breathe the spirit of the Orient so that listening to it one needs little imagination to see the camels of the caravans crossing the desert.

The final number will be Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," the first of the series of remarkable works of this form, which is one of his finest achievements. It has been heard here more than once with success. The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Sibelius, Symphony No. 1 in E-minor, Op. 39; Beethoven, songs with orchestra, "Wonne der Wehmut," "Die Trommel

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
News
Providence, R. I.
MAR 3 - 1917

Boston Symphony Orchestra

It is announced that conditions, the nature of which is not specified, have caused the reduction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's appearances here next year to three concerts, cutting the usual number in half. The subscription, which will take the name of the "Ellis concerts," will offer six musical programs, but with three of them supplied by individual artists of renown. Not since the earliest years of the organization will there be so few concerts here by the orchestra.

These circumstances add greater interest to the two remaining concerts of this season, the first of which comes next Tuesday night in Infantry Hall, and for which Dr. Muck has made one of his interesting programs. The soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished soprano, who is down for two appearances on the program, singing two groups of songs with orchestra.

The first group will be by Beethoven, "Wonne der Wehmut" and the great Ceration's hymn, "Die Ehre Gotes in der Natur," and two of the most effective songs from Beethoven's music to "Egmont," "Die Trommell Geruhret" and "Freudvoll und Leidvoll." Her second group will be three songs by Hugo Wolf. the first, "Der Freund," is one of the more unfamiliar songs of this unfortunate genius: "Verborgenheit" and "Er ist's" are better known.

The symphony will be the First of the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, that in E-minor. This has long been a favorite work of Dr. Muck, and justly so. Generally speaking, it is regarded as the best of the four symphonies by Sibelius which are known in this country. Like all of his music it is strong, rugged and individualistic.

The second orchestral number will be new to this city. This is a short sketch by the Russian composer, Borodin, entitled "One the Steppes of Middle Asia." It is program music pure and simple, a tone-picture in the full sense of the term. It breathes the spirit of the Orient, and listening to it one needs little imagination to see the padding camels of the caravans going over the desert.

The final number will be Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan." This is the first of the series of remarkable works of this form which stamped Strauss as the greatest talent of his generation. Moreover, although it is the first, it remains one of his finest achievements. It has been heard here more than once and always with great success.

om EAGLE
dress: Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 1 1 19
e

Boston Symphony Ends Season on Friday.

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Opera House of the Academy of Music next Friday evening, March 16, at 8:15 o'clock. The soloist will be Josef Malkin, 'cellist, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he will be heard here for the first time. Up to the outbreak of the war he was one of the great 'cello virtuosi of Europe. In Berlin he was long a most important figure in the world of music. Being a Russian it was necessary for him to leave Germany and the Boston Symphony Orchestra secured his scrvices. He will play the ever beautiful Concerto in D minor by the Frenchman, Edouard Lalo. The orchestral numbers will be the brilliant Overture of Goldmark, "In the Spring" and Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony.

On Thursday, the day before the concert, at 4 o'clock, rrofessor Hamilton C. Macdougall, head of the departmetn of music at Wellesley College, will give the explanatory lecture recital on the Symphony program. He is known both as an organist and as an instructor, has had an unusually thorough musical education under skilled instructors, is the author of authoritative treatises on musical subjects, text-books for classes and several anthems, and is a frequent contributor to musical journals. He will take up the program of the Boston Symphony Concert in detail, and will analyze and interpret the various movements of the selections.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
Journal
Providence, R. I.
MAR 3 1917

BOSTON SYMPHONY REDUCES CONCERTS HERE NEXT YEAR

Will Appear Only Three Times; Other Artists Complete Series.

It is announced that conditions, the nature of which is not specified, have caused the reduction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's appearances here next year to three concerts, cutting the usual number in half. The subscription, which will take the name of the "Ellis concerts," will offer six musical programmes, but with three of them supplied by individual artists of renown. Not since the earliest years of the organization will there be so few concerts here by the orchestra.

These circumstances add greater interest to the two remaining concerts of this season, the first of which comes next Tuesday night in Infantry Hall, and for which Dr. Muck has made one of his interesting programmes. The soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished soprano, who is down for two appearances on the programme, singing two groups of songs with orchestra.

The first group will be by Beethoven, "Wonne der Wehmut" and the great Ceration's hymn, "Die Ehre Gotes in der Natur," and two of the most effective songs from Beethoven's music to "Egmont," "Die Trommel Geruhret" and "Freudvoll und Leidvoll." Her second group will be three songs by Hugo Wolf. The first, "Der Freund," is one of the mere unfamiliar songs of this unfortunate genius; "Verborgenheit" and "Er ist's" are better known.

The symphony will be the First of the Finnish composer, Jan Sibelius, that in E-minor. This has long been a favorite work with Dr. Muck, and justly so. Generally speaking, it is regarded as the best of the four symphonies by Sibelius which are known in this country. Like all of his music it is strong, rugged and individualistic.

The second orchestral number will be new to this city. This is a short sketch by the Russian composer, Borodin, entitled "On the Steppes of Middle Asia." It is programme music pure and simple, a tone-picture in the full sense of the term. It breathes the spirit of the Orient, and listening to it one needs little imagination to see the padding camels of the caravans going over the desert.

The final number will be Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan." This is the first of the series of remarkable works of this form which stamped Strauss as the greatest talent of his generation. Moreover, although it is the first, it remains one of his finest achievements. It has been heard here more than once and always with great success.

om TIMES
ldress: New York City
ate

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Liszt's "Faust" Symphony the Only Number on the Program.

The last evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season in New York was unique, in that it was devoted to the performance of one composition—Liszt's "Faust" Symphony. Dr. Muck thought this enough for one evening. There was something novel in the performance also, though the composition itself is quite familiar to New York and had already been heard here this season. The version presented by Dr. Muck was a revised one which Liszt himself made and which Dr. Muck found in the library at Wahnfried, where it had remained unpublished—for Liszt's works were not very highly considered at Wahnfried. The score was given to him, and he, apparently, was alone had the opportunity to perform it.

Dr. Muck has played this revised version several times in Boston, where it has made a profound impression and been repeated "by request." It is not probable that the profundity of the impression had any very immediate connection with the changes that Liszt made from the score as printed and as always hitherto played. Probably few in even the Boston audiences could have told whether the original or the revised version was given. The deep impression was perhaps due in Boston, as it was in New York, to the performance by Dr. Muck and his men; and though enthusiasm did not pass beyond restraint at last evening's concert, there was a great deal of applause at the close; Dr. Muck was several times recalled, and made his men rise to share it. There may also have been in it something of the warmth of a farewell.

Applause was never better deserved. It was a wonderful performance in every detail of an orchestra's playing or in a conductor's reading. Dr. Muck was fired with enthusiasm for the music. He had elaborated and polished his conception of every phrase and every measure and the significance of every measure in the whole movement. He communicated to his men not only his own enthusiasm, but as well the completest sympathy and understanding. There was something thrilling, exciting, in the delivery of many a passage in the first movement; and in the second there were beautiful things done by many of the players in themes and phrases that are momentarily solos. There was a loving hand applied especially to this movement. In the last there was a highly characteristic expression of the spirit of irony, of parody. The final chorus was sung admirably by a body of Boston men, and the solo in it most artistically delivered by Arthur Hackett, tenor.

EVENING NEWS
s: Baltimore, Md.
MAR 6 1917

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its final concert of the season last night at the Lyric before an audience no whit smaller than on previous occasions, despite other attractions just now. The selection of the program, together with the choice of Elena Gerhardt as soloist, combined to give a peculiar distinction and dignity to the close of the series. For absolute artistic sincerity and nobility of style and conception Elena Gerhardt stands alone among singers, and of her it can invariably be said, that it is in the greatest music that she always finds her truest inspiration. Moreover, she is in her element, as last night, in a big hall and with orchestral accompaniment. The Beethoven songs are indeed severe vocal tests, but their difficulties she surmounted by a kind of big intuitive grasp of the composer's mood. Again in the second group of songs by Hugo Wolf there were shown such exquisite fineness of feeling and poetic appreciation of their inwardness as made her interpretation of these marvelous gems of music quite ideal.

It could hardly be expected that Mozart's so-called "Jupiter" symphony, with which the concert opened, should make any very deep impression on audiences of today, for, though (together with those in G minor and E flat) the earliest worthy to be ranked among the world's great symphonies, it has probably less emotional appeal than any other work on the same scale. Possibly, indeed, it is this certain Jove-like aloofness and indifference to the vagaries of human feeling that originally suggested the title of this symphony. Most interesting of the four movements is the last, with its singular combination of binary and fugal form, which is also, by the way, to be found in the same composer's "Zauberflote" overture. None, however, but the trained musician can in the least be expected to realize the extraordinary combination of fluent melodic invention and prodigous scholastic skill displayed in this movement—without exception the greatest specimen of orchestral counterpoint in existence.

In the tone-poem, "Don Juan," we have the mature Richard Strauss at the full height of his powers, for in his compositions of this period, vivid and graphic as are the pictures conjured up by the music, beauty is never sacrificed to realism, as unfortunately so often occurs in the composer's later works. Goldmark's overture, "Im Fruhling," the closing number, though a very pleasant and breezy work, seemed somewhat out of place and comparatively insignificant following on the fervid utterances of Strauss and Hugo Wolf.

rom SUN
ddress: New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS ITS SEASON

Liszt's "Faust," Revised Version, Sole Composition of the Evening.

The concluding evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series took place last evening in Carnegie Hall. The programme contained but one composition, Liszt's "Faust" symphony, revised version. The work is quite long enough to fill an entire concert and to send ordinary hearers away with sufficient Liszt to satisfy them for a considerable time. Of course the true Liszt enthusiast is insatiable.

The revised version does not differ in any important detail from the old one. It seems that the composer made some changes, chiefly in the orchestration, in the later years of his busy life and that these are to be found in a score resting in solemn state in the sacred precincts of the Wagner villa Wahnfried at Bayreuth.

Dr. Muck is very conscientious and he had the modifications copied so that in future performances of this work he might present it as it finally shaped itself in Liszt's mind. Without reference to the score even Liszt enthusiasts would not be likely to find out just what changes had been made.

For the performance a chorus of eighty singers, mostly from the Choral Music Society, was brought hither from Boston, where the work had already been given twice at the Boston Symphony series of the present season. The credit for the training of the chorus belongs to Stephen S. Townsend, conductor of the Choral Music Society. The tenor part was allotted to Arthur Hacket.

The performance was one of high excellence. It could not set at rest the differences of opinion between those who regard the work as tweedledee and those who hold that it is but tweedledum. The truth, as usual, lies midway between extremes. There is both good and bad matter in this symphony. It is the product of a remarkable mind, of which the tremendous force fell short of certain kinds of creative ability. But Liszt's style is always imposing and pomp and pageantry excite admiration the world over.

n EAGLE
ress: Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 1 7 1917

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Ovation to Conductor and Players at Academy.

The last of the series of five philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew the usual capacity audience, including many of the best-known names in Brooklyn society, to the Academy of Music, last night. And after the last note of the "Eroica" had sounded forth the audience rose and gave to Dr. Muck and his talented associates what was intended as a "farewell and come again" ovation. The program represented one of those happy blendings of the old and new, the grave and gay, which delight any concert audience. Of course, the neglected-old and the unheard-new are sure of friendly interest, but concert program makers, like theatrical managers, cannot always gauge with even fair accuracy what the great public is going to like. Last night eveyone was pleased.

Appropriate to a glad spring day was Goldmark's much-appreciated overture, "Im Fruehling." It is always a new experience to hear the Boston ensemble play even a most familiar number. Last night this melodic and charming work was played with great beauty of tone and a persuasive sympathy.

The soloist was Joseph Malkin, first 'cellist of the orchestra, a brother of the well-known pianist. He had selected Lalo's Concerto, a number which represents a happy co-operation and division of responsibility for both orchestra and solo instrument. The composition is typical of the composer of the "Symphonie Espagnole," and in some passages recalls his beautiful Violin Concerto, which Mischa Elman has made familiar here. A keen sense for musical color, the rhythmical diversity common in the modern French school and bold modulation are the striking characteristics of the composition. They were all happily emphasized by soloist and orchestra. Both from the harmonic and rhythmic standpoint the performance was most interesting. Mr. Malkin's clear and definitely shaded trills emphasized his masterful technique and in other passages, where fine tonal qualty was essential, his musical feeling was apparent. He was heartily applauded and had to return again and again to acknowledge the enthusiasm of audience and orchestra.

The last number was Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony and some malicious spirits in the audience wondered whether Mr. Muck, before selecting it, had heard that the Damrosch Orchestra would play it a few days before the Bostonians. Be this as it may, there has seldom been so completely satisfactory a performance of this supreme piece of orchestral music. It was dynamic and at the same time poetic and colorful. The climax was reached in the Marcia Funebre, where Dr. Muck and his musicians gave an admirable illustration of what absolute music means and how it must be played.

The "Scherzo and Finale" were played with a sprightliness of accent and a purity of tone that gave unalloyed delight. The famous French horn trio in the "Scherzo," which often reveals a defect in an otherwise well balanced orchestra, only served to demonstrate again that the Boston organization responds to all demands. The flute solo, too, was lovely in tone and effect. Through the Symphony, the auditor was conscious of the rhythmic sense and commanding will of the conductor elucidating here a delicate bit of shading and there a climactic effect of unusual power. It was an impressive close to a delightful season.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
EVENING
n STAATS-ZEITUNG ress: New York City
MAR 1 2

Das Programm der heutigen Matinee des Bostoner Symphonie Orchesters in der Carnegie Hall bringt ein klassisches Programm, nämlich: Cherubinis Ouvertüre „Die Abencerragen", Brahms' Doppelkonzert für Violine und Cello in A-Moll (Konzertmeister Herr Anton Witek und Solo-Cellist Herr Heinrich Warnke) und Mozarts „Jupiter"-Symphonie.

Unter Mitwirkung hervorragender Künstler wird die Komponistin Frl. Mana Zucca heute ein Rezital in Aeolian Hall geben, in welchem ausschließlich ihre eigenen Kompositionen zu Gehör gebracht werden. Die junge Dame, welche uns schon mit mancher schönen Gabe ihres kompositorischen Talents erfreute, hat bei dem bekannten Musikpädagogen und Komponisten Herrn Hermann Spielter studiert.

[97]

MORNING TELEGRAPH
New York City
MAR 16 1917

BOSTON SYMPHONY CLOSES ITS SEASON

Last Concert of Thursday Evening Series Pleases Large Audience at Carnegie Hall.

For its last concert of the Thursday evening series, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, played a "Faust" symphony in three character pictures (after Goethe by Franz), and owing to the length of the composition, there were no other offerings on the program at Carnegie Hall last night.

As explained in the descriptive notes, Dr. Muck in 1912 found the manuscript in Wagner's home in Bayreuth of Liszt's "Faust" symphony, with many penciled changes and additions. They have never been published, and the score was given to Dr. Muck with permission to perform the revised edition should he see fit. It was this version that was heard last night. Faust, Gretchen and Mefistopheles are the three characters which Liszt's music describes. Little need be said of Dr. Muck's interrpetation. Scholarly and masterful as he always is, he seemed to reach even greater heights last night, and so enthusiastic was his audience that he was recalled again and again at the end of the concert, and the orchestra was obliged to acknowledge the applause amid general cheering. Arthur Hacket sang the tenor role satisfactorily, while a chorus prepared by Stephen S. Townsend was pleasing.

At Carnegie Hall to-morrow afternoon the society will give its last Saturday concert, presenting a Brahms Cherubini-Mozart program, and will not be heard here again until next season.

m TIMES
dress: Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 17 191
e

LAST BOSTON CONCERT.

Goldmark's Overture and Malkin as Soloist the Features.

The final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last night was played to an unusually crowded house. The opening number, the "In the Spring" overture, by Carl Goldmark, was a most fitting introduction. Dr. Muck must be indeed a weather prophet. The composition is unlike any of Goldmark's better-known works. It does not savor of the Orient and has only the delightful murmurings of the awakening joys of springtime. In the historical notes by Philip Hale one reads with interest a short biography of this composer, of whom the public hears so little, and the large number of his works must have been a surprise to many who know him only as the author of "The Queen of Sheba," "Sakuntala" and "The Country Wedding." His nephew, Reuben Goldmark, of Manhattan, whose symphonic poem, "Samson and Delilah," was given by the Bostons three winters ago, contributed some interesting data on the life of Carl Goldmark for the program readers.

Joseph Malkin, the second 'cellist of the orchestra, was the soloist of the evening, and played without any marked degree of brilliancy a Concerto by Lallo, consisting of three movements, the intermezzo being the most interesting of the group. This he played with more understanding and breadth of tone. It is a pity that for the last concert of the season we could not have heard a 'cellist who would have appealed to us more. Malkin was all that was correct, but he lacked the innate qualities that go to make a great solo artist.

The program closed with Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, known as the "Eroica," Opus 55. Owing to the accentuatedly slow tempo in which Dr. Muck played it, The Scherzo was a delightful contrast, and the finale was played with much gusto, but not in a manner or style to which one is accustomed from the Boston Orchestra.

PUBLIC LEDGER
dress: Philadelphia, Pa.

The last concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, March 12, at 8:15. The program presents no novelty, although the Mozart symphony, which leads it, is one of those least played. It is the symphony in D major, which is No. 385 in Koechel's catalogue. It was composed in the summer of 1782 for the Salzburg merchant, Siegmund Haffner, and is consequently sometimes known as the "Haffner Symphony." The other orchestral numbers will be Brahms's set of variations on a chorale, by Josef Haydn, and the introduction and bacchanale from the first act of the Paris version of "Tannhauser."

The soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished soprano, who will sing as her first number the aria, "My Strength Is Spent," from Herman Goetz's opera, "The Taming of the Shrew," and as her second number three songs with orchestra by Hugo Wolf, "Der Freund," "Vorborgenheit" and "Er Ist's." The program, in its proper order, follows:

Symphony in D major, No. 35 (K. 385)..Mozart
Aria, "My Strength is Spent," from "The Taming of the Shrew".....Goetz
Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn..Brahms
Three Songs, with Orchestra.....Hugo Wolf
(a) Der Freund.
(b) Vergorgenheit.
(c) Es Isy's.
Introduction and Bacchanale from Act. 1, Paris Version of "Tannhauser".....Wagner

om EVENING POST
ldress: New York City
ate

MUSIC AND DRAMA

A Boston Symphony Triumph.

The Thursday night audience of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a disgrace to the city of New York. At the end of last night's concert it indulged in a regular riot of enthusiasm, standing up, applauding, shouting, making the orchestra get up, recalling the conductor over and over again, and behaving in general like the audience at the close of a Paderewski or Kreisler recital. It was the biggest demonstration ever made since the time when this orchestra began to visit New York.

This would have been all right, of course, if the work performed had been a symphony by Haydn, Mozart, or Brahms, or some other of the compositions of the ruthlessly Teutonic school, which have been so sternly proclaimed as the only proper food for Thursday audiences in New York. But it was not; it was the "Faust" symphony, of the vulgar, cheap, disgusting, satanic Liszt.

What aggravates the situation is that in Boston, too, the audiences of this orchestra have had their taste corrupted by Dr. Muck. Last season, when he produced the same "Faust" symphony, the Boston Journal said that "hundreds of enthusiasts couldn't get into the hall at all. There has been nothing like this intense interest over a symphony in Boston in recent years, except at one or two special performances of Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony." O tempora, O Boston. Liszt and Tchaikovsky—the very composers for the favoring of which our own Philharmonic Orchestra has been so sneeringly scoffed at of late. But the worst is yet to come. The Boston Transcript of last Saturday remarked that "the seventh performance of Liszt's 'Faust' symphony in two seasons of the symphony concerts took place yesterday afternoon [the eighth followed on Saturday night], making an unprecedented record in the way of repetitions by general request." Drat these degraded audiences!

Dr. Muck is not by any means the first conductor who has deliberately set himself the task of corrupting musical taste in Boston. Two of his predecessors, Henschel and Nikisch, also featured Liszt. As for New York, the disgraceful record carries us back as far as the days of Carl Bergmann (1855-76). Under him the "Faust" symphony had its first New York performance, on January 30, 1864. His successor, Dr. Leopold Damrosch, though he held the Philharmonic conductorship only one season, subsequently did missionary work for Liszt with his own orchestra. He was a friend and pupil of the great pianist-composer, who dedicated one of his symphonic poems to him.

After him came Theodore Thomas, with whose activity in his behalf Liszt was so much pleased that he wrote him a letter, dated May 27, 1871, in which he thanked him for his friendly efforts and remarked that his compositions need "the sympathetic and intelligent care of the conductor, on account of the many changes of tempo and tone color." The unfortunately too frequent reading-at-sight performances are not sufficient for them. Mediocre music-making is a sin against art; we demand something totally different, namely, the uplift and inspiration of the soul, and cry Sursum corda! (Lift up your hearts).

That Anton Seidl, who came next in the Philharmonic hierarchy, adored Liszt and did for him as zealous missionary work as for Wagner, is too well remembered to need dwelling on. Nor is it necessary to recall the fact that it was with Liszt's "Tasso" that the present conductor, Josef Stransky, made his triumphant entry into New York, and that he has given model performances also of Liszt's other symphonic poems, as well as the "Faust" and "Dante" symphonies. It was his admirable reading of these scores that won him the warm friendship among others, of Joseffy, the last and best editor of Liszt's works.

To drop both banter and historic reminiscence, last night's performance of Liszt's immortal work was one of the most enjoyable occasions of the season and the enthusiasm of the audience was as edifying as the magnificent performance under Dr. Muck's bâton. It can not be said that it was finer than any ever given here, for we have had superb interpretations under the great conductors just named. It might even be said that the "Marguerite" movement lacked some of the sensuous charm to which we are accustomed. But the glorious final movement was incomparable, thanks to the coöperation of a chorus such as New York has never heard in this work. It was worthy of the exalted standard of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that it brought down a choir of eighty men all the way to New York to sing less than five minutes in the final chorus. And how they did sing—with a [illegible] equal beauty equal to that of the [illegible] orchestra itself. When, after an hour of orchestra alone, the organ came in, followed by the choir and the exquisitely melodious and expressive tenor solo, the floodgates of emotional sublimity were opened and the music-lovers in the audience trembled with delight. Dr. Muck, with inspired gestures, rose fully to the occasion, the result being a climax such as has seldom awed and overwhelmed a New York audience. Wagner himself, king of climax builders, never excelled Liszt in this final outburst, and—did you notice once more—he remembered Liszt's "Faust" when he composed "Götterdämmerung" and "Parsifal."

A special line is due to Stephen S. Townsend, who trained that choir, and a column might be written in praise of the tenor, Arthur Hackett—a new "find" and a big one—a singer with a splendid voice and style, who sang his very difficult part with the spontaneity of Caruso at his best. Liszt would have wept for joy could he have heard him in this, the most sublimely beautiful product of his creative imagination.

Many in last night's audience doubtless felt like the Boston song writer, William Arms Fisher, who wrote to a friend last Saturday: "I take my hat off before such a masterwork and from now on the name of Liszt has a larger and deeper significance."

The revised version of the orchestration obtained by Dr. Muck in Bayreuth added beauty and expressiveness to the score. It is worth noting that some of the best of these changes had been made by Mr. Stransky without any knowledge of the Bayreuth revision.

om BULLETIN
ldress: Philadelphia, Pa.
ate

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Final Concert of Season With Elena Gerhardt as Soloist

GIVING the fifth and last concert of its thirty-second season in Philadelphia, the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared before an audience that filled the Academy of Music last evening, presenting, with the assistance of Elena Gerhardt, the German lieder singer, as soloist, a program which opened with the Symphony in D major (K. 385) of Mozart and closed with the Introduction and Bacchanale from Wagner's "Tannhauser," with Brahms' Variations on a Theme of Haydn, Op. 56a, as an intervening number.

The symphony, which Mozart is said to have written in less than a fortnight, has some of the spirit of spontaneity that is one of the chief charms of the ebullient composer, and the orchestra last evening, under Dr. Muck's placid leadership, realized, at least in the presto finale, all that is in it of buoyant beauty. The beginning also was marked by a fair amount of enthusiasm, but there was something of listlessness in the andante and even in the menuetto. This mood quickly vanished with the starting of the last movement, however, and the finale, as aforesaid, was dashingly brilliant and thoroughly exhilarating in the manner of its interpretation.

The Brahms variations, which are not unfamiliar to local audiences, were unfolded with a skill that gave emphasis to the variegated coloring with which Brahms has lavishly elaborated the original Haydn theme, which in itself is comparatively simple. Brahms introduces the theme in plain harmony and then proceeds freely to embellish it with his own ideas, and through eight parts, in contrasted major and minor, he does what he pleases with it. The result throughout is stimulating to the imagination and pleasing to the senses, and in all parts of the orchestra new bits of melody crop out with fascinating gleams of tonal beauty. The work scarcely could have been more beautifully played, the orchestra being quite at its brilliant best. The "Tannhauser" music came as an impressive climax to the program and to the orchestra's season, being given in a manner that fairly thrilled the audience and brought a genuine ovation of applause at the end.

Miss Gerhardt made her third appearance on the Academy of Music stage within the space of four days, as she was the soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. But this did not lessen in any degree the cordiality of the reception that she was given last evening. She was heard first in the scena, "My Strength is Spent," from Goetz's opera, "The Taming of the Shrew," which she sang with excellent command and emotional feeling though her voice, which is not of particularly beautiful quality, sounded rather hard in the more dramatic passages. It was in the succeeding group of lieder by Hugo Wolf that Miss Gerhardt was wholly in her element, and these she interpreted with the perfect control and artistic style and finish which characterize her work at its best. The songs were "Der Freund" ("The Friend"), "Verborgenheit" ("Retirement"), and "Er Ist's" ("'Tis Spring"), and of these the second, beginning "Tempt me not, O world, again," was most effective in its revelation of the best qualities of the singer's clear soprano and the refined artistry of her singing, though the spring song, in which the voice part is secondary to the elaborate and melodious orchestration, was received with an enthusiasm that recalled the singer several times to the stage.

om PUBLIC LEDGER
dress: Philadelphia,

DR. MUCK'S ADIEU MOZARTIANLY SAID

Boston Orchestra Heard in a Fine Farewell Program at the Academy

Sharp definition of his likes and dislikes is one of the peculiar virtues of Dr. Karl Muck, and, therefore, secondarily, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Last night's concert—the last this season by the scholarly band from the Hub—was singularly happy in most musical choices, and marked with all the mellow splendor of tone that has come to be synonymous with these musicians. But further than that, it fitted into the personality of the conductor, in many instances. So farewell was regretfully felt by his auditors. One parts with the clear, brown beauty of his oboes with a sigh.

Doctor Muck never illumines his talent so clearly as when he elects to play Beethoven or Mozart. The profound, tragic, spiritual recesses of the master of Bonn are as visible to him as the no-less-profound comic spiritual ones of the master of Salzburg. Some cosmic salt in the veins of each finds response in the conduetor. So it is pure delight to hear him read the "Haffner Symphony" as he did last night. This work demands absolute and unsullied sound from the strings. It also demands a cleanness of outline, a fresh and dainty mode of attack. All these qualities it had under the leader's stick. The dashing allegro melted into the grave and precise andante, and then into the charming minuet and the lastbubbling presto with indescribable elegance and detached gusto. The composition was revealed again as a thing all compact of rustic sunlight and "pools more secret than the soul."

It was so gay that it was touching, and so free in impulse that it never passed the bounds of stress. The dancing beat of its measures was admirably brought out by all the choirs. One thought again of Beethoven, of the seventh and eighth symphonies, of shepherd revelry.

There was a sort of salutatory spirit to much else on the program. And there was Elena Gerhardt, who had sung in the same building no later than the previous Saturday night. Like all good music and musicians, it is hard to get too much of Mme. Gerhardt. Last night she was in especially fine voice, even better than when she sang with the Philadelphia Orchestra. For one thing, her upper register had sloughed off the slightly muffled condition that failed to make her otherwise than a great and joyous singer on Friday. Her dramatic sense and her always authentic lyric gift shone as brightly as always. Ordinarily one wishes there were legislation to prevent lieder-singers of her caliber from singing excerpts from operas, generally poor ones. But the scena from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew" is quite a little gem of sentiment and melody. It was hardly so poignant as the three Wolf songs that followed. There the power and heart-touching inflection of Mme. Gerhardt's organ were made clear in all their warm appeal. Her diction is a marvel in itself.

The Brahms variations, given by Doctor Stokowski earlier in the season, and the Paris version of the "Tannhauser" bacchanale, given by Mr. Damrosch lately, were the other orchestral numbers of the night. It would be false to say that Doctor Muck is at his best in either, though he attacks the former with a gentle authority that is very taking and an attitude of dealing with a tour de force that is almost distressing. How to understand his attitude on Wagner is a little difficult. Here people have been going on all these years, thinking that this inspired and shameful score, "magnificent in sin," was about the last word in its particular volume. For Doctor Muck there is no wild blood, no mounting pulse, no thunder of fleshly trumpets in it at all. No, it is all an exercise in harmony, to be played as slowly as possible at first, and then with an enormous amount of nervous energy that has no savor of an orgy. Venus to him is an agitated and rather frosty person. Frankly the lady is a victim of melodic chilblains. Swinburne would never have recognized her. It must have been a lie—all that gossip about her fondness for the knight. B. D.

n CITIZEN
ress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Splendid Programme Interpreted at Academy of Music.

The last in a series of five philharmonic concerts was given at the Academy of Music last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with von Karl Muck as conductor. The soloist was Josef Mackin, 'cellist.

The performance was in every way in consonance with the outside traditions of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and for splendor of orchestration and nicety of technique has not been surpassed in Brooklyn this season.

The programme as interpreted was as follows:

Overture, "In the Spring" (Goldmark); concerto for violoncello and orchestra in D minor (Salo), (1) prelude allegro maestoro, (2) intermezzo, (3) introduction, rondo; Symphony No. 3, in E flat major, "Eroica," op. 55 (Beethoven), (1) allegro con brio (E flat major), (2) marcia funebre: adagio assai (C minor), (3) scherzo: allegro vivace (E flat major) trio (E flat major) (4) finale: allegro molto (E flat major).

RECORD
ress: Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 13 1917

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

End of Local Season With Elena Gerhardt as Soloist.

The fifth and last concert of the Boston Orchestra's thirty-second season in Philadelphia was attended by a "capacity" audience at the Academy of Music, last night. The Mozart D Major Symphony, Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and the Introduction and Bacchanale from Wagner's "Tannhaeuser," formed the orchestral portion of the program. As a soloist Dr. Muck presented the distinguished Lieder singer, Elena Gerhardt. She sang first a scene "Die Kraftversagt," from Goetz's "Der Widerspenstigen Zahmung," and later a group of songs by Hugo Wolf, comprising "Der Freund," "Verborgenheit" and "Er Isto."

The Mozart Symphony marked an enjoyable departure from some of the heavier works given by the Boston Orchestra this season, and it seems unnecessary to say the symphony was played with all the beauty of tone and delicacy and grace of execution at the command of the conductor. The Brahms Variations, too, were a pleasure to hear. The long Bacchanale, however, wonderfully as it is was done last night, seemed an anti-climax to a program already lengthy enough. Doubtless many persons enjoy this version of "Tannhaeuser," but there can be no question that the work is most appropriately heard on the operatic stage.

Miss Gerhardt was in superb voice and she thrilled the audience by the variety of expression at her disposal and the wonderful manner in which she interpreted her songs. The beautiful quality of her voice never ceases to appeal, no matter how frequently she is heard. The richness of her low tones and the brilliant yet soft timbre of her high notes makes every kind of song [illegible]

AMERICAN
ss: New York City

TRIUMPH FOR BOSTON ARTISTS

Audience Raised to Wild Pitch of Enthusiasm by Playing of Liszt Symphony.

By MAX SMITH.

Few genuine lovers of music who attended the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fifth and final Thursday evening concert of the season last night in Carnegie Hall are likely to forget the experience. Overwhelming is the only word that approximately describes the sensations which swept over sensitive listeners while absorbing the message of genius translated to them through the medium of the visiting body of players.

In that huge gathering there were other than genuine lovers of music, no doubt, men and women whom the concerts of the men from the Hub have social rather than artistic significance. Else the demonstration at the end of the programme, which was devoted entirely to Liszt's gigantic "Faust" symphony, would have been a riot of enthusiasm instead of an emphatic but deliberate and perfectly polite expression of concerted approval.

It was not only the composer's belated changes and excisions in the orchestration of his greatest work (changes that add conspicuously to brilliancy, the emotional intensity and the dramatic effectiveness of certain passages in the score) which made yesterday's performance by far the most notable, the most thrilling, the most inspiring interpretation of the "Faust" symphony the writer has ever heard here or abroad.

It was the reading of Dr. Muck—a reading that combined exquisite poetic expressiveness with great dramatic intensity and power—and the superb responsiveness of that wonderful instrument under his command which cast into shadow cherished memories of performances under Schuch in Dresden and under Loewe in Munich.

Never, surely, has the Boston Orchestra given a more splendid exhibition of its virtuoso powers than it did on this occasion; and never has Dr. Muck shown more conclusively how unjustly those critics estimate his powers who accuse him of being cold-blooded and metronomic.

This was not playing that aroused admiration solely because of its finish, its euphony, its marvellous clarity and transparency, its unanimity and rhythmical precision. It was playing that set the pulses throbbing—playing bold in outline, masculine, incisive.

Beautifully did the concertmaster, Anton Witek, render the solo passages in the "Gretchen" movement. But he was not the only "soloist" in the ensemble. It seemed as if every man in that masterful combination of musicians were pouring forth his life-blood for the glory of Liszt, and the same might be said of the valiant chorus of men from the Hub, admirably trained to their task by Stephen S. Townsend.

As for Arthur Hacket, who sang the solo tenor part flawlessly in the grandiose finale, "Alles Vergaengliche," Boston may well be proud of him. His is a voice of exceptionally mellow [illegible] timbre

[98]

MORNING TELEGRAPH
New York City
MAR 16 1917

BOSTON SYMPHONY CLOSES ITS SEASON

Last Concert of Thursday Evening Series Pleases Large Audience at Carnegie Hall.

For its last concert of the Thursday evening series, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Dr. Karl Muck, played a "Faust" symphony in three character pictures (after Goethe by Franz), and owing to the length of the composition, there were no other offerings on the program at Carnegie Hall last night.

As explained in the descriptive notes, Dr. Muck in 1912 found the manuscript in Wagner's home in Bayreuth of Liszt's "Faust" symphony, with many penciled changes and additions. They have never been published, and the score was given to Dr. Muck with permission to perform the revised edition should he see fit. It was this version that was heard last night. Faust, Gretchen and Mefistopheles are the three characters which Liszt's music describes. Little need be said of Dr. Muck's interrpetation. Scholarly and masterful as he always is, he seemed to reach even greater heights last night, and so enthusiastic was his audience that he was recalled again and again at the end of the concert, and the orchestra was obliged to acknowledge the applause amid general cheering. Arthur Hacket sang the tenor role satisfactorily, while a chorus prepared by Stephen S. Townsend was pleasing.

At Carnegie Hall to-morrow afternoon the society will give its last Saturday concert, presenting a Brahms Cherubini-Mozart program, and will not be heard here again until next season.

m TIMES
dress: Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 17 191
e

LAST BOSTON CONCERT.

Goldmark's Overture and Malkin as Soloist the Features.

The final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last night was played to an unusually crowded house. The opening number, the "In the Spring" overture, by Carl Goldmark, was a most fitting introduction. Dr. Muck must be indeed a weather prophet. The composition is unlike any of Goldmark's better-known works. It does not savor of the Orient, and has only the delightful murmurings of the awakening joys of springtime. In the historical notes by Philip Hale one reads with interest a short biography of this composer, of whom the public hears so little, and the large number of his works must have been a surprise to many who know him only as the author of "The Queen of Sheba," "Sakuntala" and "The Country Wedding." His nephew, Reuben Goldmark, of Manhattan, whose symphonic poem, "Samson and Delilah," was given by the Bostons three winters ago, contributed some interesting data on the life of Carl Goldmark for the program readers.

Joseph Malkin, the second 'cellist of the orchestra, was the soloist of the evening, and played without any marked degree of brilliancy a Concerto by Lalio, consisting of three movements, the intermezzo being the most interesting of the group. This he played with more understanding and breadth of tone. It is a pity that for the last concert of the season we could not have heard a 'cellist who would have appealed to us more. Malkin was all that was correct, but he lacked the innate qualities that go to make a great solo artist.

The program closed with Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, known as the "Eroica," Opus 55. Owing to the accentuatedly slow tempo in which Dr. Muck played it, The Scherzo was a delightful contrast, and the finale was played with much gusto, but not in a manner or style to which one is accustomed from the Boston Orchestra.

PUBLIC LEDGER
dress: Philadelphia, Pa.

The last concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, March 12, at 8:15. The program presents no novelty, although the Mozart symphony, which leads it, is one of those least played. It is the symphony in D major, which is No. 385 in Koechel's catalogue. It was composed in the summer of 1782 for the Salzburg merchant, Siegmund Haffner, and is consequently sometimes known as the "Haffner Symphony." The other orchestral numbers will be Brahms's set of variations on a chorale, by Josef Haydn, and the introduction and bacchanale from the first act of the Paris version of "Tannhauser."

The soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished soprano, who will sing as her first number the aria, "My Strength Is Spent," from Herman Goetz's opera, "The Taming of the Shrew," and as her second number three songs with orchestra by Hugo Wolf, "Der Freund," "Vorborgenheit" and "Er Ist's." The program, in its proper order, follows:

Symphony in D major, No. 35 (K. 385). Mozart
Aria, "My Strength is Spent," from "The Taming of the Shrew" ..... Goetz
Variations on a Theme by Josef Haydn. Brahms
Three Songs, with Orchestra ..... Hugo Wolf
(a) Der Freund.
(b) Vergorgenheit.
(c) Es Ist's.
Introduction and Bacchanale from Act 1, Paris Version of "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner

om EVENING POST
ldress: New York City
ate

MUSIC AND DRAMA

A Boston Symphony Triumph.

The Thursday night audience of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a disgrace to the city of New York. At the end of last night's concert it indulged in a regular riot of enthusiasm, standing up, applauding, shouting, making the orchestra get up, recalling the conductor over and over again, and behaving in general like the audience at the close of a Paderewski or Kreisler recital. It was the biggest demonstration ever made since the time when this orchestra began to visit New York.

This would have been all right, of course, if the work performed had been a symphony by Haydn, Mozart, or Brahms, or some other of the compositions of the ruthlessly Teutonic school, which have been so sternly proclaimed as the only proper food for Thursday audiences in New York. But it was not; it was the "Faust" symphony, of the vulgar, cheap, disgusting, satanic Liszt.

What aggravates the situation is that in Boston, too, the audiences of this orchestra have had their taste corrupted by Dr. Muck. Last season, when he produced the same "Faust" symphony, the Boston Journal said that "hundreds of enthusiasts couldn't get into the hall at all. There has been nothing like this intense interest over a symphony in Boston in recent years, except at one or two special performances of Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony." O tempora, O Boston. Liszt and Tchaikovsky—the very composers for the favoring of which our own Philharmonic Orchestra has been so sneeringly scoffed at of late. But the worst is yet to come. The Boston Transcript of last Saturday remarked that "the seventh performance of Liszt's 'Faust' symphony in two seasons of the symphony concerts took place yesterday afternoon [the eighth followed on Saturday night], making an unprecedented record in the way of repetitions by general request." Drat these degraded audiences!

Dr. Muck is not by any means the first conductor who has deliberately set himself the task of corrupting musical taste in Boston. Two of his predecessors, Henschel and Nikisch, also featured Liszt. As for New York, the disgraceful record carries us back as far as the days of Carl Bergmann (1855-76). Under him the "Faust" symphony had its first New York performance, on January 30, 1864. His successor, Dr. Leopold Damrosch, though he held the Philharmonic conductorship only one season, subsequently did missionar work for Liszt with his own orchestra. He was a friend and pupil of the great pianist-composer, who dedicated one of his symphonic poems to him.

After him came Theodore Thomas, with whose activity in his behalf Liszt was so much pleased that he wrote him a letter, dated May 27, 1871, in which he thanked him for his friendly efforts and remarked that his compositions need "the sympathetic and intelligent care of the conductor, on account of the many changes of tempo and tone color." The unfortunately too frequent reading-at-sight performances are not sufficient for them. Mediocre music-making is a sin against art; we demand something totally different, namely, the uplift and inspiration of the soul, and cry Sursum corda! (Lift up your hearts).

That Anton Seidl, who came next in the Philharmonic hierarchy, adored Liszt and did for him as zealous missionary work as for Wagner, is too well remembered to need dwelling on. Nor is it necessary to recall the fact that it was with Liszt's "Tasso" that the present conductor, Josef Stransky, made his triumphant entry into New York, and that he has given model performances also of Liszt's other symphonic poems, as well as the "Faust" and "Dante" symphonies. It was his admirable reading of these scores that won him the warm friendship, among others, of Joseffy, the last and best editor of Liszt's works.

To drop both banter and historic reminiscence, last night's performance of Liszt's immortal work was one of the most enjoyable occasions of the season, and the enthusiasm of the audience was as edifying as the magnificent performance under Dr. Muck's bâton. It cannot be said that it was finer than any ever given here, for we have had superb interpretations under the great conductors just named. It might even be said that the "Marguerite" movement lacked some of the sensuous charm to which we are accustomed. But the glorious final movement was incomparable, thanks to the coöperation of a chorus such as New York has never heard in this work. It was worthy of the exalted standard of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that it brought down a choir of eighty men all the way to New York to sing less than five minutes in the final chorus. And how they did sing—with a [illegible] a tonal beauty equal to that of the [illegible] orchestra itself. When, after an hour of orchestra alone, the organ came in, followed by the choir and the exquisitely melodious and expressive tenor solo, the floodgates of emotional sublimity were opened and the music-lovers in the audience trembled with delight. Dr. Muck, with inspired gestures, rose fully to the occasion, the result being a climax such as has seldom awed and overwhelmed a New York audience. Wagner himself, king of climax builders, never excelled Liszt in this final outburst, and—did you notice once more—he remembered Liszt's "Faust" when he composed "Götterdämmerung" and "Parsifal."

A special line is due to Stephen S. Townsend, who trained that choir, and a column might be written in praise of the tenor, Arthur Hackett—a new "find" and a big one—a singer with a splendid voice and style, who sang his very difficult part with the spontaneity of Caruso at his best. Liszt would have wept for joy could he have heard him in this, the most sublimely beautiful product of his creative imagination.

Many in last night's audience doubtless felt like the Boston song writer, William Arms Fisher, who wrote to a friend last Saturday: "I take my hat off before such a masterwork and from now on the name of Liszt has a larger and deeper significance."

The revised version of the orchestration obtained by Dr. Muck in Bayreuth added beauty and expressiveness to the score. It is worth noting that some of the best of these changes had been made by Mr. Stransky without any knowledge of the Bayreuth revision.

om BULLETIN
ldress: Philadelphia, Pa.
ate

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Final Concert of Season With Elena Gerhardt as Soloist

GIVING the fifth and last concert of its thirty-second season in Philadelphia, the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared before an audience that filled the Academy of Music last evening, presenting, with the assistance of Elena Gerhardt, the German lieder singer, as soloist, a program which opened with the Symphony in D major (K. 385) of Mozart and closed with the Introduction and Bacchanale from Wagner's "Tannhauser," with Brahms' Variations on a Theme of Haydn, Op. 56a, as an intervening number.

The symphony, which Mozart is said to have written in less than a fortnight, has some of the spirit of spontaneity that is one of the chief charms of the ebullient composer, and the orchestra last evening, under Dr. Muck's placid leadership, realized, at least in the presto finale, all that is in it of buoyant beauty. The beginning also was marked by a fair amount of enthusiasm, but there was something of listlessness in the andante and even in the menuetto. This mood quickly vanished with the starting of the last movement, however, and the finale, as aforesaid, was dashingly brilliant and thoroughly exhilarating in the manner of its interpretation.

The Brahms variations, which are not unfamiliar to local audiences, were unfolded with a skill that gave emphasis to the variegated coloring with which Brahms has lavishly elaborated the original Haydn theme, which in itself is comparatively simple. Brahms introduces the theme in plain harmony and then proceeds freely to embellish it with his own ideas, and through eight parts, in contrasted major and minor, he does what he pleases with it. The result throughout is stimulating to the imagination and pleasing to the senses, and in all parts of the orchestra new bits of melody crop out with fascinating gleams of tonal beauty. The work scarcely could have been more beautifully played, the orchestra being quite at its brilliant best. The "Tannhauser" music came as an impressive climax to the program and to the orchestra's season, being given in a manner that fairly thrilled the audience and brought a genuine ovation of applause at the end.

Miss Gerhardt made her third appearance on the Academy of Music stage within the space of four days, as she was the soloist with the Philadelphia Orchestra last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. But this did not lessen in any degree the cordiality of the reception that she was given last evening. She was heard first in the scena, "My Strength is Spent," from Goetz's opera, "The Taming of the Shrew," which she sang with excellent command and emotional feeling. Her voice, which is not of particularly beautiful quality, sounded rather well in the more dramatic passages. It was in the succeeding group of lieder by Hugo Wolf that Miss Gerhardt was especially in her element, and these she interpreted with the perfect control and artistic style and finish which characterized her work at its best. The songs were "Der Freund" ("The Friend"), "Verborgenheit" ("Retirement"), and "Er Ist's" ("'Tis Spring"), and of these the second, beginning "Tempt me not, O world, again," was most effective in its revelation of the best qualities of the singer's clear soprano and the refined artistry of her singing, though the spring song, in which the voice part is secondary to the elaborate and melodious orchestration, received with an enthusiasm that called the singer several times to the stage.

om PUBLIC LEDGER
dress: Philadelphia,

DR. MUCK'S ADIEU MOZARTIANLY SAID

Boston Orchestra Heard in a Fine Farewell Program at the Academy

Sharp definition of his likes and dislikes is one of the peculiar virtues of Dr. Karl Muck, and, therefore, secondarily, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Last night's concert—the last this season by the scholarly band from the Hub—was singularly happy in most musical choices, and marked with all the mellow splendor of tone that has come to be synonymous with these musicians. But further than that, it fitted into the personality of the conductor, in many instances. So farewell was regretfully felt by his auditors. One parts with the clear, brown beauty of his oboes with a sigh.

Doctor Muck never illumines his talent so clearly as when he elects to play Beethoven or Mozart. The profound, tragic, spiritual recesses of the master of Bonn are as visible to him as the no-less-profound comic spiritual ones of the master of Salzburg. Some cosmic salt in the veins of each finds response in the conduetor. So it is pure delight to hear him read the "Haffner Symphony" as he did last night. This work demands absolute and unsullied sound from the strings. It also demands a cleanness of outline, a fresh and dainty mode of attack. All these qualities it had under the leader's stick. The dashing allegro melted into the grave and precise andante, and then into the charming minuet and the last bubbling presto with indescribable elegance and detached gusto. The composition was revealed again as a thing all compact of rustic sunlight and "pools more secret than the soul."

It was so gay that it was touching, and so free in impulse that it never passed the bounds of stress. The dancing beat of its measures was admirably brought out by all the choirs. One thought again of Beethoven, of the seventh and eighth symphonies, of shepherd revelry.

There was a sort of salutatory spirit to much else on the program. And there was Elena Gerhardt, who had sung in the same building no later than the previous Saturday night. Like all good music and musicians, it is hard to get too much of Mme. Gerhardt. Last night she was in especially fine voice, even better than when she sang with the Philadelphia Orchestra. For one thing, her upper register had sloughed off the slightly muffled condition that failed to make her otherwise than a great and joyous singer on Friday. Her dramatic sense and her always authentic lyric gift shone as brightly as always. Ordinarily one wishes there were legislation to prevent lieder-singers of her caliber from singing excerpts from operas, generally poor ones. But the scena from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew" is quite a little gem of sentiment and melody. It was hardly so poignant as the three Wolf songs that followed. There the power and heart-touching inflection of Mme. Gerhardt's organ were made clear in all their warm appeal. Her diction is a marvel in itself.

The Brahms variations, given by Doctor Stokowski earlier in the season, and the Paris version of the "Tannhauser" bacchanale, given by Mr. Damrosch lately, were the other orchestral numbers of the night. It would be false to say that Doctor Muck is at his best in either, though he attacks the former with a gentle authority that is very taking and an attitude of dealing with a tour de force that is almost distressing. How to understand his attitude on Wagner is a little difficult. Here people have been going on all these years, thinking that this inspired and shameful score, "magnificent in sin," was about the last word in its particular volume. For Doctor Muck there is no wild blood, no mounting pulse, no thunder of fleshly trumpets in it at all. No, it is all an exercise in harmony, to be played as slowly as possible at first, and then with an enormous amount of nervous energy that has no savor of an orgy. Venus to him is an agitated and rather frosty person. Frankly the lady is a victim of melodic chilblains. Swinburne would never have recognized her. It must have been a lie—all that gossip about her fondness for the knight.

B. D.

n CITIZEN
ress: Brooklyn, N. Y.

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Splendid Programme Interpreted at Academy of Music.

The last in a series of five philharmonic concerts was given at the Academy of Music last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with von Karl Muck as conductor. The soloist was Josef Mackin, 'cellist.

The performance was in every way in consonance with the outside traditions of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and for splendor of orchestration and nicety of technique has not been surpassed in Brooklyn this season.

The programme as interpreted was as follows:

Overture, "In the Spring" (Goldmark); concerto for violoncello and orchestra in D minor (Salo), (1) prelude allegro maestoro, (2) intermezzo, (3) introduction, rondo; Symphony No. 3, in E flat major, "Eroica," op. 55 (Beethoven), (1) allegro con brio (E flat major), (2) marcia funebre: adagio assai (C minor), (3) scherzo: allegro vivace (E flat major) trio (E flat major) (4) finale: allegro molto (E flat major).

RECORD
dress: Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 13 1917

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

End of Local Season With Elena Gerhardt as Soloist.

The fifth and last concert of the Boston Orchestra's thirty-second season in Philadelphia was attended by a "capacity" audience at the Academy of Music, last night. The Mozart D Major Symphony, Brahms' Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and the Introduction and Bacchanale from Wagner's "Tannhaeuser," formed the orchestral portion of the program. As a soloist Dr. Muck presented the distinguished Lieder singer, Elena Gerhardt. She sang first a scene "Die Kraftversagt," from Goetz's "Der Widerspenstigen Zahmung," and later a group of songs by Hugo Wolf, comprising "Der Freund," "Verborgenheit" and "Er Isto."

The Mozart Symphony marked an enjoyable departure from some of the heavier works given by the Boston Orchestra this season, and it seems unnecessary to say the symphony was played with all the beauty of tone and delicacy and grace of execution at the command of the conductor. The Brahms Variations, too, were a pleasure to hear. The long Bacchanale, however, wonderfully as it is was done last night, seemed an anti-climax to a program already lengthy enough. Doubtless many persons enjoy this version of "Tannhaeuser," but there can be no question that the work is most appropriately heard on the operatic stage.

Miss Gerhardt was in superb voice and thrilled the audience by the variety of expression at her disposal and the wonderful manner in which she interpreted her songs. The beautiful quality of her voice never ceases to appeal, no matter how frequently she is heard. The richness of her low tones and the brilliant quality timbre of her high notes makes her a kind of song [illegible]

AMERICAN
ss: New York City

TRIUMPH FOR BOSTON ARTISTS

Audience Raised to Wild Pitch of Enthusiasm by Playing of Liszt Symphony.

By MAX SMITH.

Few genuine lovers of music who attended the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fifth and final Thursday evening concert of the season last night in Carnegie Hall are likely to forget the experience. Overwhelming is the only word that approximately describes the sensations which swept over sensitive listeners while absorbing the message of genius translated to them through the medium of the visiting body of players.

In that huge gathering there were other than genuine lovers of music, no doubt, men and women whom the concerts of the men from the Hub have social rather than artistic significance. Else the demonstration at the end of the programme, which was devoted entirely to Liszt's gigantic "Faust" symphony, would have been a riot of enthusiasm instead of an emphatic but deliberate and perfectly polite expression of concerted approval.

It was not only the composer's belated changes and excisions in the orchestration of his greatest work (changes that add conspicuously to brilliancy, the emotional intensity and the dramatic effectiveness of certain passages in the score) which made yesterday's performance by far the most notable, the most thrilling, the most inspiring interpretation of the "Faust" symphony the writer has ever heard here or abroad.

It was the reading of Dr. Muck—a reading that combined exquisite poetic expressiveness with great dramatic intensity and power—and the superb responsiveness of that wonderful instrument under his command which cast into shadow cherished memories of performances under Schuch in Dresden and under Loewe in Munich.

Never, surely, has the Boston Orchestra given a more splendid exhibition of its virtuoso powers than it did on this occasion; and never has Dr. Muck shown more conclusively how unjustly those critics estimate his powers who accuse him of being cold-blooded and metronomic.

This was not playing that aroused admiration solely because of its finish, its euphony, its marvellous clarity and transparency, its unanimity and rhythmical precision. It was playing that set the pulses throbbing—playing bold in outline, masculine, incisive.

Beautifully did the concertmaster, Anton Witek, render the solo passages in the "Gretchen" movement. But he was not the only "soloist" in the ensemble. It seemed as if every man in that masterful combination of musicians were pouring forth his life-blood for the glory of Liszt, and the same might be said of the valiant chorus of men from the Hub, admirably trained to their task by Stephen S. Townsend.

As for Arthur Hacket, who sang the solo tenor part flawlessly in the grandiose finale, "Alles Vergaengliche," Boston may well be proud of him. His is a voice of exceptionally mellow and [illegible] timbre,

[98]

EVENING SUN
s: New York City
MAR 16 19

From the first grim chain of dissonances to the ecstatic Chorus Mysticus which ended it, the rendition of the Liszt "Faust Symphony" by the Boston orchestra last night was a revelation of music magnificent. Beyond all the statutes and limitations of invidious comparison it was by far the greatest piece of playing which Carnegie Hall has heard this year.

Short as it seemed—it lasted scarcely all of the hour and twenty-five minutes which the programme allotted it—it was the only selection which Dr. Muck had made for this last concert of the Boston Symphony's Thursday evening series. It was enough, however, to arouse the usually staid audience to a pitch of enthusiasm which would not let up until a full ten minutes had gone by in energetic clapping, and until the last New Englander had fled the stage.

The "Faust Symphony," with its three character studies of Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles—the first so troubled and intensive, the second so tender, the third so demoniacally ironic—offers a scope and variety to test the virtuosity of any orchestra. If the second movement—the Gretchen—did not measure up to the other two in effectiveness it was undoubtedly because it was less fitted to the Bostons' aims and style. There can be no fault found w[illegible] it, however; it was played wit[illegible] the customary disciplin[illegible] which bring that orchestr[illegible] the top notch below absolu[illegible]ection. And as for the other t[illegible] novements, it is hard to imagine t[illegible] having been played with a s[illegible] evidence of power, control and [illegible]r genius since the day when Lis[illegible] himself conducted its first performanc[illegible] Weimar in 1857. Certainly it was the Boston Symphony at its noblest.

The chorus, whose introduction Liszt had to suffer for in bitterest and most sarcastic criticism, was sung last night by an aggregation especially imported from the orchestra's home city. The tenor was Arthur Hackett, whose solo work with the "Ewig Weibliche" beauties gave proof of a voice clear and sweet. The whole vocal display, for that matter, was worthy of the remarkable orchestral performance. It is hard not to overindulge in superlatives when superlatives are all that will serve for adequate description. It was an evening to remain in the musical memory for years to come.

Just where Liszt received his inspiration for this pictorial symphony will always be a matter of biographical curiosity. It is inscribed "after Goethe," of course, and dedicated to Berlioz; but is is doubtful whether he went either to the poet direct or to the composer of "The Damnation of Faust" for his idea of the three characters. Ary Scheffer's paintings of Faust and Grete are usually named, but it would be interesting for those who are acquainted with Heine's letters and notes on contemporary Berlin life to turn to his telling of the art exhibition which first showed these Ary Scheffer pictures to the public. Heine was disgusted with them; complained that they w[illegible]e having an unwarranted popularity, and that Gretchen's face had the con[illegible]plexion of toilet soap!

through her choice of selections, which failed to make that strong appeal of which she is capable.

In Miss Gerhardt's Beethoven and Mahler numbers last week conscientiously as they were interpreted, neither section gave the audience the opportunity of thoroughly enjoying her richly melodious voice, or her mental qualities that have made her the most finished of all the lieder singers. The Hugo Wolf numbers afforded such an opportunity, and the brilliant operatic aria showed her the artist of wide accomplishments.

Flowing Mozart Melody.

Mozart's Symphony in D major is beautifully harmonious from the first to the last note. It never rises to any great height of brilliance, but it is inspiring in its flow of simple melody, its adorable spontaneity and its classic architectural structure. It needs no thought as to its meaning, for it is all simply expressed in its flood of harmonious passages. It has its strongest appeal in its andante movement, in which is repeated over and over again one of the most attractive of symphonic themes.

The symphony was beautifully presented. Dr. Muck and the orchestra gave it a smooth and careful reading, and that is all that is necessary in a Mozart Symphony. With marvelous uniformity the four movements were played, and with that graduating rise and fall of tone, so striking in all the works of this character as conducted by Dr. Muck.

Concert's Brilliant Ending.

The conductor found his moments for brilliancy of tone in several of the Brahms Variations, and made them emphatic, but it was in the final dash of the striking Bacchanale music from "Tannhauser" that both the director and his men rose to the height of brilliant playing that sent the audience away in a most delightful frame of mind, and with a memory of nothing more attractive in the way of an orchestral offering heard here this season.

The announced dates of the Boston Symphony concerts for next season are November 5, December 3, January 7, and February and March 11.

n NORTH AMERICAN
ress: Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA ENDS SEASON HERE

Fifth Concert by Dr. Muck's Players Is Not Best of Year

SOME NUMBERS FINE

Soloist Gerhardt in Fine Voice in Wolf's 'Er Ist's' Particularly

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra brought its season here to a close last evening with the fifth concert in the Academy of Music.

For this final performance Dr. Karl Muck had chosen Mozart's symphony in D major and presented as his soloist Elena Gerhardt, who captured her audience with her first note in the scene from "The Taming of the Shrew," the exquisite song, "Die Kraft Versagt," only to raise it to even higher enthusiasm in her later number, three songs by Hugo Wolf.

Her voice was in perfect condition and she carried it triumphantly thru the final outburst of instruments in Wolf's "Er ist's," a no light test for even a strong contralto. She was at her best, however, in the song "Verborgenheit."

The symphony was given with the finish and precision expected of the Boston orchestra. The other numbers, Brahms' variations on a theme of Joseph Haydn, and the introduction and bacchanale from "Tannhauser," the slow and solemn opening of the familiar "Pilgrim Chorus," turned with its usual sharp contrast into the bacchanalian music of the "Venus Mountain," and the orchestra probably never did that peculiarly Wagnerian motive better.

The concert was not the best that Doctor Muck's organization has given here this year, but this last number on the program was on a par with anything given.

ESS
ress: Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 18 19

LAST CONCERT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Season Closes Brilliantly with Varied Program, Including Mozart Symphony.

PROGRAM.

Symphony in D Major.....Mozart
Aria, "My Strength Is Spent," from "The Taming of the Shrew".....Goetz
Variations on a Theme of Haydn..Brahms
Three Songs with Orchestra....Hugo Wolf
a. Der Freund.
b. Verborgenheit.
c. Er Ist's.
Introduction and Bacchanale from Act I, Paris Version of "Tannhauser"...Wagner
Conductor ..... Dr. Karl Muck
Soloist .....Elena Gerhardt

The season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was brought to a brilliant closing at the Academy of Music last evening. The concert was striking in its program, and was the best of the season. This has reference especially to its variety. All of the concerts were on that high plane of excellence characteristic of the Boston Orchestra, but at each previous concert this year there has been a jarring note, either in the way of a reintroduced soloist or composition following a very brief lapse, which should have been avoided in an all too brief season.

This last concert brought another very close reappearance in Elena Gerhardt as the soloist, who was the soloist with our own Philadelphia Orchestra at its two concerts at the end of last week. It was not as regrettable as it might appear, in that Miss Gerhardt is a singer of such fine accomplishments, and her appearance with the Philadelphia Orchestra was in no way satisfying

VENING JOURNAL
New York City
MAR 16 19

BOSTON BAND IN LISZT'S 'FAUST' SYMPHONY

Out of some strange inner counsel of Lisztian perfection, Dr. Karl Muck, director of the usually pleasant ministration of the Boston Orchestra, evolved the idea of presenting New York with the Hungarian's "Faust" symphony, revised but uncurtailed, entire, complete in all its unrelieved extension. The visitation was last evening, the place Carnegie Hall and the occasion, somewhat unfortunately, the final Thursday concert of the season.

One is informed that the symphony was previously offered in the orchestra's basic habitat and that the experience of audiences in what a wit has called "blue Boston" has shown that this ultra-manifestation of Liszt was "quite sufficient for one concert." The symphony last evening lasted for some only slightly interrupted seventy-five minutes. One imagines that New York may improve on Boston's verdict and add that the "Faust" symphony is considerably more than quite sufficient for almost any number of concerts.

Not that Dr. Muck and the Boston Orchestra did not do a great many interesting things. They did—interesting enough to make Liszt's "Faust" interesting for a time; but not for all the time. And not for seventy-five minutes on end. Even Wagner did not attempt that much without moving figures in the flesh and the rest of the stage diversion.

One of the interesting things Dr. Muck did was to make Liszt speak with about as much dignity as it seems possible for this prince of fustian to attain. Dr. Muck lent Liszt's bombast a certain sort of eloquence, gave his pomposities of gesture emphasis and even sweep of movement, and the whole loyally and sympathetically gathered about the nude and unashamed commonplaces the careful tatters of intelligible purpose.

Another of the interesting things Dr. Muck and his men did was to make quite plain—what has been set forth in and out of season in this place—that Richard Strauss and his followers not only are the lineal but also the literal-minded musical descendants of the orchestrated Abbe. Incidently, it was likewise plain that Hector Berlioz, the dedicatee in re the "Faust" symphony, was quite properly so. Berlioz is the father of them all not excepting even the greater Richard.

But in spite of the innumerably admirable things accomplished by Dr. Muck and the men of the Boston Orchestra—rarely have even the played with such truly superb virtuosity—one could not come to believe either in Liszt's Faust or in his Gretchen. His Faust is only George Moore's City clerk off on his Saturday night "devilment." And his Gretchen smells of bread and butter and has crumbs at the corners of her mouth. In truth, the whole Teutonic appropriation of the Faust legend—the Gallic may be left out of consideration for the moment—makes of it a piece of sentimentalism.

It may be necessary to say it with bowed head, since one is falling foul of Goethe, but it is still necessary to say it—Goethe himself, with his "Ewig-Weibliche zieht uns hinan" was enunciating a piece of sentimentalism. It was in the air in the mid-nineteenth century and he could no more help giving it expression than he could help breathing. But, other times, other sentimentalisms. We have our own, but they have nothing to do with Faust. For the Faust legend, one prefers the Anglo-Saxon of Christopher Marlowe, which is grim seventeenth century romance.

Liszt makes a deal of fuss of the "Ewig-Weibliche zieht uns hinan," which is quite natural to the sentimental Abbe. He makes a chorus of it, and a tenor solo and an organ and a harp. He was continuously incapable of getting onward and upward without an organ and a harp. They were his ladder of the celestial. But his last movement—the "Mephistophedes" movement—is far more interesting before he begins to climb. Before the ascent, we have Liszt more amazingly modern, more Richard Straussian than Richard, the Hero, or Richard through the Owlglass. Liszt in his Walpurgis Nacht orgy is orchestrally wholly entrancing. And the men from Boston performed an orgy of orchestral perfection in translating him.

The chorus that wound up this final movement with Liszt's vocal setting of the "Ewig-Weibliche" was that of the Chorale Music Society of Boston which last night proved itself to be a better chorus than New York has heard since the Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto, sang here. It was remarkably well trained by Stephen S. Townsend, its leader, and, also, probably by Dr. Muck. The tenor solo, which requires some good singing of sustained phrases, was done by Arthur Hackett. He sang with a voice of sufficient power, excellently handled and displayed intelligence throughout what he had to do.

RECORD
s: Philadelphia, Pa.
1 1 10

BOSTON SYMPHONY CLOSING CONCERT

Elena Gerhardt to Be the Soloist—Hans Kindler With Philadelphia Orchestra.

MATINEE MUSICAL CLUB

Schmidt Quartet to Play—Sonneck's Illustrated Talk—Nicholas Douty Recital.

—The last concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. The program presents no novelty, although the Mozart Symphony, which leads, is one of those least played. It is the symphony in D major which is No. 385 in Koechel's catalog, and composed in the summer of 1782 for the Salzburg merchant, Siegmund Haffner. It is sometimes known as the "Haffner Symphony." The other orchestral offerings will be Brahms' set of variations on a chorale by Josef Haydn and the introduction and Bacchanale from the first act of the Paris version of "Tannhaeuser." The soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, soprano, who will sing the aria, "My Strength is Spent," from Herman Goetz's opera, "The Taming of the Shrew," and three songs with orchestra by Hugo Wolf, "Der Freud," "Verborgenheit" and "Er ist's."

ELENA GERHARDT.

* * *

om HERALD OKLYN EDIT ddress: New York City
ate

Orchestral music is sometimes not appreciated to the fullest by auditors who are not skilled musicians, because they do not have a full understanding of the various numbers. To overcome this condition to an extent and to permit all the hearers to enjoy every minute of the Boston Symphony concerts the Brooklyn Institute has a lecture recital preceding each concert of the series, in which an authority on music interprets the numbers the orchestra will play.

Next Friday the last of the Boston Symphony concerts for the season will be heard, and on the afternoon preceding, at four o'clock, Professor Hamilton C. Macdougall, head of the department of music at Wellesley, will give the explanatory lecture recital. Professor Macdougall is known in the musical world for his work both as an organist and as an instructor. He has had an unusually thorough musical education under skilled instructors, is the author of various authoritative treatises on musical subjects, text books for classes and several anthems and is a frequent contributor to musical journals. Professor Macdougall will take up the programme of the Boston Symphony concert in detail and will analyze and interpret the various movements of the selections to be rendered, giving a complete understanding of the numbers that will add much to one's enjoyment of the concert.

On Friday evening the soloist will be Joseph Malkin, the admirable 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will be heard here for the first time. Mr. Malkin, up to the outbreak of the war, was one of the great 'cello virtuosi of Europe and had lived for several years in Berlin where he was a most important figure in the world of music. Being a Russian, it was necessary for him to leave Germany and the Boston Symphony Orchestra was fortunate enough to obtain his services. He will play the ever beautiful concerto in D minor by the Frenchman, Edouard Lalo. The orchestral numbers will be the brilliant overture of Goldmark, "In the

—Photo by Campbell Studios.

Spring," and Beethoven's "Heroica" symphony.

n PUBLIC LEDGER
ress: Philadelphia, P nd
artis MAR 13 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY, WITH GERHARDT

Dr. Karl Muck Gives the Last and the Best of the Series of Five

PROGRAM

Symphony in D (K. 385).....Mozart
Aria, "Die Kraft Versagt," from "Der Widerspenstigen Zähmung".....Goetz
Variations on a Haydn Theme.....Brahms
Three songs—(a) "Der Freund," (b) "Verborgenheit," (c) "Er ist's".....Wolf
Introduction and Bacchanale, from "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the final concert in its series of five to the filled Academy last evening, and the audience seemed to find it the most enjoyable of Doctor Muck's offerings this season. Never has the aristocracy of the tone of the first violins, its fineness and its finesse, appeared to happier advantage. The Mozart Symphony abounded in vivid contrasts of light and shade, of stress and sudden withdrawal, of lyric momentum and of delicately etched alto relievo. Mozart by the very clarity of form and substance demands faultless execution, and the reading last night in its refinement sacrificed nothing of the joyous spirit associated with the muse of the composer.

The Brahms variations, without an arid interval, unfolded new loveliness of cadence and sequence at every turn, particularly in the episode that gives the descending tripping scale as of an old-time dance to those hauntingly beautiful violins, and in the fullness of voice of the final variation. The last number was the Introduction and Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser," wherein the brasses, led by the majestic tuba, intoned effectually the pilgrims' stately processional, and the frenzied ecstasy of the revelers was masterfully presented in the racing strings that were as undulations of running waves of fire.

Elena Gerhardt was the soloist. She had left the same stage with our own orchestra only forty-eight hours before, and she maintained last evening her distinguished prestige as a lieder singer in songs as well fitted to her lyric gift as those of the earlier appearance. The dramatic declamation made the music of Goetz impressive, and each of the songs of Wolf was a masterpiece of subtle interpretation. The great "Verborgenheit" and the rapturous "Er ist's" seemed to possess every fiber of the singer's being, and her passionate intensity proved communicative. She gave another object lesson of the truth that the only sort of art that counts is the sort that sincerely transports and inflames the artist first of all.

E. L. W.

om POST
ldress: Washington, D. C.
ate

BOSTON ORCHESTRA DELIGHTS HEARERS

Elena Gerhardt Sings Beethoven Group With Feeling.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard for the last time this season at the National Theater yesterday afternoon, in a pretentious all-German program, with the exception of the Russian Borodin.

The program opened with the mighty "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart. Unequaled in dignity and loftiness of composition, full of breadth and igor, Dr. Muck read into the score all the characteristic attributes of Olympian heights where he himself—musically speaking—seems to dwell.

A little lacking in the tender melodiousness that usually is part and parcel of Mozart's writings, his last symphony does not moe the heart as some of its predecessors, but it is not entirely without human interest. The allegro is bold in character at times, the andante highly expressive, the minuet charming in its gayety, freshness and elasticity of movement.

The finale is the masterpiece of the symphony, with its collossal figures of counterpoint, combined with graceful and fanciful motives.

Goldmark's "Spring Overture" displayed much of the composer's mastery of orchestral technique, and the colorful and characteristic "On the Steppes of Middle Asia," Borodine, gave a touch of Oriental realism to a program rather weighty in its classic dignity.

Elena Gerhardt never sang better rich vocal endowments of tonal warmth, intense feeling, finished phrasing and dramatic accentuation were admirally displayed in the Beethoven group of songs and the Wolf series. Full of vibrant human sentiment, superb examples of vocal compositions, Mme. Gerhardt presenter them all with the preeminent distinction that hes gained for her one of the foremost places among the world's leading singers.

The orchestration, in particular, of Wolf's "Er Ist's"—a song of spring—is one of the most wonderful accompaniments ever heard, also radiated the jubilation of nature and sounded the songs of a thousand birds. It deserved the tremendous applause it received.

[99]

EVENING SUN
s: New York City
MAR 16 19

From the first grim chain of dissonances to the ecstatic Chorus Mysticus which ended it, the rendition of the Liszt "Faust Symphony" by the Boston orchestra last night was a revelation of music magnificent. Beyond all the statutes and limitations of invidious comparison it was by far the greatest piece of playing which Carnegie Hall has heard this year.

Short as it seemed—it lasted scarcely all of the hour and twenty-five minutes which the programme allotted it—it was the only selection which Dr. Muck had made for this last concert of the Boston Symphony's Thursday evening series. It was enough, however, to arouse the usually staid audience to a pitch of enthusiasm which would not let up until a full ten minutes had gone by in energetic clapping, and until the last New Englander had fled the stage.

The "Faust Symphony," with its three character studies of Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles—the first so troubled and intensive, the second so tender, the third so demoniacally ironic—offers a scope and variety to test the virtuosity of any orchestra. If the second movement—the Gretchen—did not measure up to the other two in effectiveness it was undoubtedly because it was less fitted to the Bostons' aims and style. There can be no fault found w[illegible] it, however; it was played wit[h] the customary disciplin[e] which bring that orchestra to the top notch below absolut[e] perfection. And as for the other t[wo] movements, it is hard to imagine t[hem] having been played with a s[ense] evidence of power, control and [the] genius since the day when Lis[zt] himself conducted its first performance at Weimar in 1857. Certainly it was the Boston Symphony at its noblest.

The chorus, whose introduction Liszt had to suffer for in bitterest and most sarcastic criticism, was sung last night by an aggregation especially imported from the orchestra's home city. The tenor was Arthur Hackett, whose solo work with the "Ewig Weibliche" beauties gave proof of a voice clear and sweet. The whole vocal display, for that matter, was worthy of the remarkable orchestral performance. It is hard not to overindulge in superlatives when superlatives are all that will serve for adequate description. It was an evening to remain in the musical memory for years to come.

Just where Liszt received his inspiration for this pictorial symphony will always be a matter of biographical curiosity. It is inscribed "after Goethe," of course, and dedicated to Berlioz; but is is doubtful whether he went either to the poet direct or to the composer of "The Damnation of Faust" for his idea of the three characters. Ary Scheffer's paintings of Faust and Grete are usually named, but it would be interesting for those who are acquainted with Heine's letters and notes on contemporary Berlin life to turn to his telling of the art exhibition which first showed these Ary Scheffer pictures to the public. Heine was disgusted with them; complained that they w[ere] having an unwarranted popularity, and that Gretchen's face had the com[plexion] of toilet soap!

n [illegible] ESS
ress: Philadelphia, Pa.

LAST CONCERT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Season Closes Brilliantly with Varied Program, Including Mozart Symphony.

PROGRAM.

Symphony in D Major.....Mozart
Aria, "My Strength Is Spent," from "The Taming of the Shrew".....Goetz
Variations on a Theme of Haydn..Brahms
Three Songs with Orchestra....Hugo Wolf
a. Der Freund.
b. Verborgenheit.
c. Er Ist's.
Introduction and Bacchanale from Act I, Paris Version of "Tannhauser"...Wagner
Conductor ..... Dr. Karl Muck
Soloist .....Elena Gerhardt

The season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was brought to a brilliant closing at the Academy of Music last evening. The concert was striking in its program, and was the best of the season. This has reference especially to its variety. All of the concerts were on that high plane of excellence characteristic of the Boston Orchestra, but at each previous concert this year there has been a jarring note, either in the way of a reintroduced soloist or composition following a very brief lapse, which should have been avoided in an all too brief season.

This last concert brought another very close reappearance in Elena Gerhardt as the soloist, who was the soloist with our own Philadelphia Orchestra at its two concerts at the end of last week. It was not as regrettable as it might appear, in that Miss Gerhardt is a singer of such fine accomplishments, and her appearance with the Philadelphia Orchestra was in no way satisfying through her choice of selections, which failed to make that strong appeal of which she is capable.

In Miss Gerhardt's Beethoven and Mahler numbers last week, conscientiously as they were interpreted, neither section gave the audience the opportunity of thoroughly enjoying her richly melodious voice, or her mental qualities that have made her the most finished of all the lieder singers. The Hugo Wolf numbers afforded such an opportunity, and the brilliant operatic aria showed her the artist of wide accomplishments.

Flowing Mozart Melody.

Mozart's Symphony in D major is beautifully harmonious from the first to the last note. It never rises to any great height of brilliance, but it is inspiring in its flow of simple melody, its adorable spontaneity and its classic architectural structure. It needs no thought as to its meaning, for it is all simply expressed in its flood of harmonious passages. It has its strongest appeal in its andante movement, in which is repeated over and over again one of the most attractive of symphonic themes.

The symphony was beautifully presented. Dr. Muck and the orchestra gave it a smooth and careful reading, and that is all that is necessary in a Mozart Symphony. With marvelous uniformity the four movements were played, and with that graduating rise and fall of tone, so striking in all the works of this character as conducted by Dr. Muck.

Concert's Brilliant Ending.

The conductor found his moments for brilliancy of tone in several of the Brahms Variations, and made them emphatic, but it was in the final dash of the striking Bacchanale music from "Tannhauser" that both the director and his men rose to the height of brilliant playing that sent the audience away in a most delightful frame of mind, and with a memory of nothing more attractive in the way of an orchestral offering heard here this season.

The announced dates of the Boston Symphony concerts for next season are November 5, December 3, January 7, and February and March 11.

m NORTH AMERICAN
ldress: Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA ENDS SEASON HERE

Fifth Concert by Dr. Muck's Players Is Not Best of Year

SOME NUMBERS FINE

Soloist Gerhardt in Fine Voice in Wolf's 'Er Ist's' Particularly

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra brought its season here to a close last evening with the fifth concert in the Academy of Music.

For this final performance Dr. Karl Muck had chosen Mozart's symphony in D major and presented as his soloist Elena Gerhardt, who captured her audience with her first note in the scene from "The Taming of the Shrew," the exquisite song, "Die Kraft Versagt," only to raise it to even higher enthusiasm in her later number, three songs by Hugo Wolf.

Her voice was in perfect condition and she carried it triumphantly thru the final outburst of instruments in Wolf's "Er ist's," a no light test for even a strong contralto. She was at her best, however, in the song "Verborgenheit."

The symphony was given with the finish and precision expected of the Boston orchestra. The other numbers, Brahms' variations on a theme of Joseph Haydn, and the introduction and bacchanale from "Tannhauser," the slow and solemn opening of the familiar "Pilgrim Chorus," turned with its usual sharp contrast into the bacchanalian music of the "Venus Mountain," and the orchestra probably never did that peculiarly Wagnerian motive better.

The concert was not the best that Doctor Muck's organization has given here this year, but this last number on the program was on a par with anything given.

VENING JOURNAL
New York City
MAR 16 1917

BOSTON BAND IN LISZT'S 'FAUST' SYMPHONY

Out of some strange inner counsel of Lisztian perfection, Dr. Karl Muck, director of the usually pleasant ministration of the Boston Orchestra, evolved the idea of presenting New York with the Hungarian's "Faust" symphony, revised but uncurtailed, entire, complete in all its unrelieved extension. The visitation was last evening, the place Carnegie Hall and the occasion, somewhat unfortunately, the final Thursday concert of the season.

One is informed that the symphony was previously offered in the orchestra's basic habitat and that the experience of audiences in what a wit has called "blue Boston" has shown that this ultra-manifestation of Liszt was "quite sufficient for one concert." The symphony last evening lasted for some only slightly interrupted seventy-five minutes. One imagines that New York may improve on Boston's verdict and add that the "Faust" symphony is considerably more than quite sufficient for almost any number of concerts.

Not that Dr. Muck and the Boston Orchestra did not do a great many interesting things. They did—interesting enough to make Liszt's "Faust" interesting for a time; but not for all the time. And not for seventy-five minutes on end. Even Wagner did not attempt that much without moving figures in the flesh and the rest of the stage diversion.

One of the interesting things Dr. Muck did was to make Liszt speak with about as much dignity as it seems possible for this prince of fustian to attain. Dr. Muck lent Liszt's bombast a certain sort of eloquence, gave his pomposities of gesture emphasis and even sweep of movement, and the whole loyally and sympathetically gathered about the nude and unashamed commonplaces the careful tatters of intelligible purpose.

Another of the interesting things Dr. Muck and his men did was to make quite plain—what has been set forth in and out of season in this place—that Richard Strauss and his followers not only are the lineal but also the literal-minded musical descendants of the orchestrated Abbe. Incidently, it was likewise plain that Hector Berlioz, the dedicatee in re the "Faust" symphony, was quite properly so. Berlioz is the father of them all not excepting even the greater Richard.

But in spite of the innumerably admirable things accomplished by Dr. Muck and the men of the Boston Orchestra—rarely have even they played with such truly superb virtuosity—one could not come to believe either in Liszt's Faust or in his Gretchen. His Faust is only George Moore's City clerk off on his Saturday night "devilment." And his Gretchen smells of bread and butter and has crumbs at the corners of her mouth. In truth, the whole Teutonic appropriation of the Faust legend—the Gallic may be left out of consideration for the moment—makes of it a piece of sentimentalism.

It may be necessary to say it with bowed head, since one is falling foul of Goethe, but it is still necessary to say it—Goethe himself, with his "Ewig-Weibliche zieht uns hinan" was enunciating a piece of sentimentalism. It was in the air in the mid-nineteenth century and he could no more help giving it expression than he could help breathing. But, other times, other sentimentalisms. We have our own, but they have nothing to do with Faust. For the Faust legend, one prefers the Anglo-Saxon of Christopher Marlowe, which is grim seventeenth century romance.

Liszt makes a deal of fuss of the "Ewig-Weibliche zieht uns hinan," which is quite natural to the sentimental Abbe. He makes a chorus of it, and a tenor solo and an organ and a harp. He was continuously incapable of getting onward and upward without an organ and a harp. They were his ladder of the celestial. But his last movement—the "Mephistopheles" movement—is far more interesting before he begins to climb. Before the ascent, we have Liszt more amazingly modern, more Richard Straussian than Richard the Hero, or Richard through the Owlglass. Liszt in his Walpurgis Nacht orgy is orchestrally wholly entrancing. And the men from Boston performed an orgy of orchestral perfection in translating him.

The chorus that wound up this final movement with Liszt's vocal setting of the "Ewig-Weibliche" was that of the Chorale Music Society of Boston, which last night proved itself to be a better chorus than New York has heard since the Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto, sang here. It was remarkably well trained by Stephen S. Townsend, its leader, and, also, probably, by Dr. Muck. The tenor solo, which requires some good singing of sustained phrases, was done by Arthur Hackett. He sang with a voice of sufficient power, excellently handled and displayed intelligence throughout what he had to do.

RECORD
s: Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 1 1 1917

BOSTON SYMPHONY CLOSING CONCERT

Elena Gerhardt to Be the Soloist—Hans Kindler With Philadelphia Orchestra.

MATINEE MUSICAL CLUB

Schmidt Quartet to Play—Sonneck's Illustrated Talk—Nicholas Douty Recital.

—The last concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. The program presents no novelty, although the Mozart Symphony, which leads, is one of those least played. It is the symphony in D major which is No. 385 in Koechel's catalog, and composed in the summer of 1782 for the Salzburg merchant, Siegmund Haffner. It is sometimes known as the "Haffner Symphony." The other orchestral offerings will be Brahms' set of variations on a chorale by Josef Haydn and the introduction and Bacchanale from the first act of the Paris version of "Tannhaeuser." The soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, soprano, who will sing the aria, "My Strength is Spent," from Herman Goetz's opera, "The Taming of the Shrew," and three songs with orchestra by Hugo Wolf, "Der Freud," "Verborgenheit" and "Er ist's."

ELENA GERHARDT.

* * *

rom HERALD OKLYN EDIT ddress: New York City
ate

Orchestral music is sometimes not appreciated to the fullest by auditors who are not skilled musicians, because they do not have a full understanding of the various numbers. To overcome this condition to an extent and to permit all the hearers to enjoy every minute of the Boston Symphony concerts the Brooklyn Institute has a lecture recital preceding each concert of the series, in which an authority on music interprets the numbers the orchestra will play.

Next Friday the last of the Boston Symphony concerts for the season will be heard, and on the afternoon preceding, at four o'clock, Professor Hamilton C. Macdougall, head of the department of music at Wellesley, will give the explanatory lecture recital. Professor Macdougall is known in the musical world for his work both as an organist and as an instructor. He has had an unusually thorough musical education under skilled instructors, is the author of various authoritative treatises on musical subjects, text books for classes and several anthems and is a frequent contributor to musical journals. Professor Macdougall will take up the programme of the Boston Symphony concert in detail and will analyze and interpret the various movements of the selections to be rendered, giving a complete understanding of the numbers that will add much to one's enjoyment of the concert.

On Friday evening the soloist will be Joseph Malkin, the admirable 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will be heard here for the first time. Mr. Malkin, up to the outbreak of the war, was one of the great 'cello virtuosi of Europe. He had lived for several years in Berlin before he was a most important figure in the world of music. Being a Russian, it became necessary for him to leave Germany. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was quick enough to obtain his services, and will play the ever beautiful concerto by the Frenchman, Edouard [illegible] The orchestral numbers will be the overture of Goldmark, "In the

—Photo by Campbell Studios.

Beethoven's "Heroica" sym-

n PUBLIC LEDGER
ress: Philadelphia, P
and
artis MAR 13 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY, WITH GERHARDT

Dr. Karl Muck Gives the Last and the Best of the Series of Five

PROGRAM

Symphony in D (K. 385).....Mozart
Aria, "Die Kraft Versagt," from "Der Widerspenstigen Zaehmung".....Goetz
Variations on a Haydn Theme.....Brahms
Three songs—(a) "Der Freund," (b) "Verborgenheit," (c) "Er ist's".....Wolf
Introduction and Bacchanale, from "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the final concert in its series of five to the filled Academy last evening, and the audience seemed to find it the most enjoyable of Doctor Muck's offerings this season. Never has the aristocracy of the tone of the first violins, its fineness and its finesse, appeared to happier advantage. The Mozart Symphony abounded in vivid contrasts of light and shade, of stress and sudden withdrawal, of lyric momentum and of delicately etched alto relievo. Mozart by the very clarity of form and substance demands faultless execution, and the reading last night in its refinement sacrificed nothing of the joyous spirit associated with the muse of the composer.

The Brahms variations, without an arid interval, unfolded new loveliness of cadence and sequence at every turn, particularly in the episode that gives the descending tripping scale as of an old-time dance to those hauntingly beautiful violins, and in the fullness of voice of the final variation. The last number was the Introduction and Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser," wherein the brasses, led by the majestic tuba, intoned effectually the pilgrims' stately processional, and the frenzied ecstasy of the revelers was masterfully presented in the racing strings that were as undulations of running waves of fire.

Elena Gerhardt was the soloist. She had left the same stage with our own orchestra only forty-eight hours before, and she maintained last evening her distinguished prestige as a lieder singer in songs as well fitted to her lyric gift as those of the earlier appearance. The dramatic declamation made the music of Goetz impressive, and each of the songs of Wolf was a masterpiece of subtle interpretation. The great "Verborgenheit" and the rapturous "Er ist's" seemed to possess every fiber of the singer's being, and her passionate intensity proved communicative. She gave another object lesson of the truth that the only sort of art that counts is the sort that sincerely transports and inflames the artist first of all.

E. L. W.

om POST
ldress: Washington, D. C.
ate

BOSTON ORCHESTRA DELIGHTS HEARERS

Elena Gerhardt Sings Beethoven Group With Feeling.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard for the last time this season at the National Theater yesterday afternoon, in a pretentious all-German program, with the exception of the Russian Borodin.

The program opened with the mighty "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart. Unequaled in dignity and loftiness of composition, full of breadth and igor, Dr. Muck read into the score all the characteristic attributes of Olympian heights where he himself—musically speaking—seems to dwell.

A little lacking in the tender melodiousness that usually is part and parcel of Mozart's writings, his last symphony does not moe the heart as some of its predecessors, but it is not entirely without human interest. The allegro is bold in character at times, the andante highly expressive, the minuet charming in its gayety, freshness and elasticity of movement.

The finale is the masterpiece of the symphony, with its collossal figures of counterpoint, combined with graceful and fanciful motives.

Goldmark's "Spring Overture" displayed much of the composer's mastery of orchestral technique, and the colorful and characteristic "On the Steppes of Middle Asia," Borodine, gave a touch of Oriental realism to a program rather weighty in its classic dignity.

Elena Gerhardt never sang better rich vocal endowments of tonal warmth, intense feeling, finished phrasing and dramatic accentuation were admirally displayed in the Beethoven group of songs and the Wolf series. Full of vibrant human sentiment, superb examples of vocal compositions, Mme. Gerhardt presenter them all with the preeminent distinction that hes gained for her one of the foremost places among the world's leading singers.

The orchestration, in particular, of Wolf's "Er Ist's"—a song of spring—is one of the most wonderful accompaniments ever heard, also radiated the jubilation of nature and sounded the songs of a thousand birds. It deserved the tremendous applause it received.

[99]

STAATS-ZEITUNG
ss: New York City

geben.

Liszt's „Faust-Symphonie".

Die gestrige Aufführung der Liszt-schen „Faust"-Symphonie durch das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester unter Leitung von Dr. Muck, eine Aufführung von ragender Größe, muß unbedingt als einer der Höhepunkte der diesjährigen Musiksaison bezeichnet werden.

Liszt hat aus zwei der höchsten Meisterwerke der Weltliteratur, Goethes „Faust" und Dantes „Göttliche Komödie", die Anregung zu zwei symphonischen Werken gefunden, welche nicht nur im äußerlichen und formellen Umfang, sondern auch vom künstlerischen Standpunkt aus den Höhepunkt seines Schaffens bedeuten. Gestern hörten wir den „Faust", der als einzige Programmnummer ohne Pause gegeben wurde und dessen Aufführung eine Stunde und 20 Minuten in Anspruch nahm.

Dr. Muck und sein Meisterorchester boten uns gestern einen unsagbaren Genuß, wenn die ehrliche Kritik auch konstatieren muß, daß des Werkes zweiter, der „lyrische", Teil, nicht die ragende Ausführung fand, die man diesem herrlichen Stück Musik verleihen kann. Ich fand den Dirigenten da nicht selten kalt und das rührende Melos schien der wünschenswerten Rundung und der süßen Fülle zu entbehren. Damit hat man aber auch sein kritisches Gewissen gänzlich beruhigt, denn der Wiedergabe des ersten Satzes und namentlich des Finales mit seinem an Wucht, Schönheit und bebender Innigkeit einfach unvergleichlichen Schluß kann man nicht genug Worte der Bewunderung und Dankbarkeit widmen.

Die Liszt'sche Charakterisierungskunst fand im ersten Akt die liebevollste Ausmalung. Faust, der große Grübler und Zweifler, der Welterforscher, erschien da in allen Phasen seines unbefriedigten Sehnens, seines heißen Verlangens, seines Ingrimms und Zornes, in seinem Verlangen nach Licht und Wahrheit und seiner Neigung zum Mystischen und Uebersinnlichen markig und feinsinnig geschildert. Ein gewaltiges Stürmen, ein titanisches Ringen, auf den die milde Verklärtheit des zweiten Satzes ungeachtet der mangelnden Wärme in der Wiedergabe doppelt zart und friedvoll wirkte. Das sanfte, gleichmäßige Weiterspinnen des Orchesters, der ruhige, ungetrübte Fluß des Werkes, die wie mit rosigen Schleiern zugedeckte Gedämpftheit des Ganzen, mußte mit Bewunderung für diese Orchestermeister erfüllen.

Unnachahmlich prägnant und charakteristisch erschien darauf die orchestrale Verkörperung des mephistophelischen Geistes, das Widerspiel von Faust, dem ein grinsendes Zerrbild von Hohn und zynischem Spott entgegengehalten wird. Wenn aber dann Gretchens sanftes Bild erscheint und nach einem Augenblick wie erzitternden Schweigens die Orgel mit den Streichern einen feierlichen, tiefen C-Dur-Akkord intonieren und der Chorus Mysticus, von Männerstimmen bestritten, ernst und wie aus dämmervoller Tiefe sich immer mehr zu verklärten, sanften Harmonien aufschwingt, wenn der Solotenor den melodischen Linien des Gretchenmotivs folgend, sich immer kraftvoller erhebt und das Ensemble zu großartigster Sonorität anschwillt, dann fühlt man, daß die Musik da wieder einmal ausgedrückt hat, was dem Wort versagt bleibt.

Die Pracht und künstlerische Zügelung dieses Aufschwunges durch Dr. Muck und seine Scharen kann man nicht genug anerkennen. Die Bostoner Sänger, welche von Herrn Stephen S. Townsend einfach bewunderungswürdig eingeübt worden waren, imponierten durch Kraft und Mark im Vokalen und hohe Intelligenz in der Beherrschung ihrer Aufgabe. Der Tenor, Herr Arthur Hackett, sang wunderschön, mit ausdrucksvollem, namentlich in der Höhe schön leuchtendem Tenor und großer Innigkeit, während seine deutsche Aussprache zu wünschen übrig ließ.

Das Publikum, welches der Darbietung mit respektvollstem Interesse gefolgt war, und nach den beiden ersten Sätzen ungemein warm applaudiert hatte, schien am Ende wie aus tiefer Andacht erst erwachen zu müssen. Dann aber machte sich die Begeisterung unwiderstehlich Luft. Es war ein großer Abend!

H.

EVENING GLOBE
dress: New York City

MAR 16

Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Liszt.

That Dr. Muck is not an ideal maker of programmes it has been the painful duty of The Globe to point out almost as often as the distinguished conductor has led a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in our town. It is, therefore, with a more particular relish that The Globe compliments Dr. Muck on the programme he selected for the last concert but one in the current Carnegie Hall series of his incomparable band. This programme consisted of a single work, Liszt's "Faust" symphony, but the length of that work, its character, and the character of the performance made the concert one of the most important and memorable of the present musical season.

Musicians still divide into hostile and warring camps over the place of Liszt as a composer. To a few he is a cult, and, as all of us New Yorkers know, one of our great orchestras is endowed in part to play his music. Others, paying tribute to the fame of Liszt the pianist, will have nought of the composer — trickster, charlatan, faker, sleight-of-hand expert, and all that sort of thing. Of course there are independents roving far from either camp accepting and rejecting at fancy's will.

After all there is something besides a stale joke in "I know nothing about music, but I know what I like," for is not that simple statement largely the root of the matter? There was once a Boston man who went through life proudly declaring he was born hating Weber. To most of us Weber was more or less a musician, but to the Boston man, and those like-minded, was Weber a musician at all? I doubt it. And perhaps no individual composer that ever lived summons into stronger light the personal idiosyncrasy of the listener than Liszt.

I am not a member of the Liszt cult. I can name works by him that to me are trash, others that are just a bore. Listening to the "Faust" symphony last evening, I could not but feel that for me at least this symphony puts Liszt unmistakably into the ranks of the great composers. I do not speak of the patent indebtedness of Wagner to the thematic treasury of this work, or of orchestration which in the day of Strauss, Debussy, Stravinsky still excites our wonder. I speak rather of the general impression, of the work as a whole.

In the piano concertos, in the "Dante" sonata, in the tone poem "Mazeppa," I recognize Liszt the magician; sometimes—it depends upon the performance—he holds me transfixed. In two or three of the songs I have felt something that transcends everything of that sort, the ineffable quality that sets apart the greatest music from matters of temporal and mundane alloy. At times last evening I had that same surpassing experience. Certainly the second movement is not only the most successful depiction of Goethe's Gretchen in tones, but more especially is one of the most beautiful movements in all symphonic music. The rest of the work seemed to me only less great.

Of course, a superlative performance had its part in the tremendous effect. To describe the achievement of Dr. Muck and his men would require the critical vocabulary of a Victor Hugo or a Swinburne, and even after the phials of their Olympian praise had been poured on the recollection, what idea of the thing would be conveyed to the reader who has not heard?

The version of the work used yesterday follows a score containing many pencilled changes and additions which Dr. Muck discovered in the library of Frau Cosima Wagner's home at Bayreuth in 1912. These alterations doubtless increase the effectiveness of the work, though they are not so important as to interest greatly any but students. Dr. Muck conducted the symphony in its revised version for the first time anywhere on Jan. 2, 1915, in Boston. The success was such that he has had several subsequent performances of it in Boston.

To bring it to New York after more than two years might be deemed under the circumstances a rather ungracious delay. However, there is the problem of the chorus and the tenor solo in the finale. For the performance last evening the chorus that sang in the work in Boston was brought over to New York. There was also the tenor of the most recent Boston performances, Arthur Hackett. The chorus and the soloist both their parts in the ensemble altogether worthily.

At the end of the symphony the audience, filling Carnegie Hall, gave the orchestra and the conductor an ovation.

PITTS SANBORN

EVENING GLOBE
New York City

MAR 19 1917

The Boston Symphony Orchestra also finished its present New York season in Carnegie Hall on Saturday, playing to a crowded house in the afternoon. It was a pleasure to hear Cherubini's overture "Les Abencérages," which must have been a complete novelty to most of those present. A wise conductor might allow the Weber overtures a total rest of a few years (they need it!) and specialize meanwhile in the less hounded overtures of Cherubini. Such a performance as the Boston orchestra can give of Mozart's great "Jupiter" symphony, the pièce de résistance of the concert, is always welcome, but the Brahms double concerto for violin and 'cello (Mr. Witek and Mr. Warnke of the orchestra played the solo parts) is a more dubious matter. The concerto has its army of defenders, but some of the stoutest adherents of Brahms have from the beginning been obliged to put it down as one of the master's less successful efforts, and one they have been willing a very long time without hearing to hear.

The Boston Symphony's New York concerts of the present season have been marked by superlatively fine orchestral playing and most admirable conducting, but the programmes have as usual been mainly of a kind to dispel much of the pleasure vouchsafed by the performance of the orchestra. Soloists until Saturday were withheld, but Dr. Muck's prejudice against the intrusion of soloists at a symphony concert is not difficult to understand. It would be out of the question for our local orchestras giving long series of concerts to try to do without soloists, but a visiting orchestra of the virtuosity of the Boston band can often dispense with them profitably from an artistic as well as a financial point of view! On the other hand, if soloists of the first order are to be denied us at these concerts, the programmes ought clearly to be more artistic and satisfying than those Dr. Muck is in the habit of offering.

SUN
ess: New York City

MAR 18

was very warmly applauded.

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT LAST MATINEE

Brahms Double Concerto Skilfully Rendered by Messrs. Witek and Warnke.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the last matinee of its season at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The programme comprised Cherubini's "Abencerrages," the Brahms concerto for violin and cello and Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony. The solo performers were Anton Witek, violin, and Heinrich Warnke, cello, both of the orchestra.

The Brahms double concerto was played at a New York Symphony Society concert on March 9, 1916, by Messrs. Kreisler and Casals. The composition is so beautiful in itself that it can be enjoyed without the good offices of such famous artists. Mr. Witek and Mr. Warnke, the concertmaster and first cellist of the Boston organization, are competent musicians capable of presenting this admirable creation in such a manner as to disclose its artistic value.

The orchestral numbers were well chosen to be associated with the concerto in a symmetrical programme. The C major symphony, the last one of Mozart, well retains its place among the fine old classic masterpieces. It and the overture were played with that high finish which characterizes all the performances of the foremost American orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is a national institution. It is one of which the whole country should be proud. By many competent judges it has been pronounced the best concert orchestra in the world.

Naturally local music lovers might be proud if it belonged to New York. Since, however, it does not they should rejoice that it comes here season after season to give them the privilege of hearing its unique playing. It will come again next season and will again be conducted—so far as is now known—by Dr. Karl Muck to whose skill and industry much of its excellence is due.

m EVENING STAR
dress: Washington, D. C.

e MAR

Boston Symphony Tuesday.

The closing concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon at 4:30. The soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished concert soprano, who will sing two groups of songs; the first by Beethoven, "Wonne der Wehmut," "Die Trommel Geruhret," "Freudvoll und Leidvoll" and "Die Ehre Gottes in der Natur." Her second group will be three songs by Hugo Wolf, "Der Freund," "Verborgenheit" and "Er Ist's."

The orchestral numbers will comprise the "Jupiter" Symphony of Mozart; a novelty to Washington in Borodin's fanciful and colorful sketch, "On the Steppes of Middle Asia," and Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring."

STAATS-ZEITUNG
ss: New York City

MAR 18 1917

Konzerte.

Die Bostoner spielten gestern nachmittag in der ganz besetzten Carnegie Hall ihr letztes diesjähriges Konzert unter dem üblichen durchschlagenden Erfolg. Dr. Muck kann mit stolzer Befriedigung auf die diesjährige Serie zurückblicken, welche nicht nur den alten Ruhm erhalten, sondern frisch grünenden, neuen dazu gewonnen hat. Das Programm war ein klassisches. Cherubinis schöne Ouverture zu seiner wenig erfolgreichen und nunmehr gänzlich vergessenen Oper „Die Abencerragen" erschien in plastischer Belebtheit gar virtuos, und die Mozartsche „Jupiter"-Symphonie rauschte glänzend, reizvoll und in gezügelter Klangpracht durch das Haus.

Die weitere Nummer war das selten gehörte Brahmssche Doppelkonzert für Violine und Cello mit Orchester, in dem Konzertmeister Anton Witek und der Solo-Cellist Herr Heinrich Warnke reife Meisterleistungen boten. Die Herren verstanden es, das mitunter etwas akademisch anmutende Werk der drohenden Trockenheit zu entziehen, ohne dem klassischen Geist entgegenzuarbeiten, und so entstand in gegenseitigem Wechselspiel eine wirklich erquickliche Darbietung, die, gerade wie die übrigen, den wärmsten Beifall des Publikums entfesselte. Dr. Muck erhielt seine Spezial

EVENING WORLD
ess: New York

MAR 16

Boston Players Win New Favor in Liszt Symphony

By Sylvester Rawling.

DR. KARL MUCK and the Boston Symphony Orchestra made a great occasion at Carnegie Hall last night. With the aid of a male chorus of eighty voices from the Chorale Music Society of Boston, prepared by Stephen S. Townsend and brought here for the event, they presented Liszt's "A Faust Symphony." The performance of the three character pictures, Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles (after Goethe) was memorable for a superb exposition of a remarkable work. Nothing that Dr. Muck and his splendid band have done is more to their credit, and the "Chorus Mysticus" got a proclamation worthy of the best traditions. If Arthur Hackett, the tenor soloist, fell anything short of what Dr. Philip Hale has said of him, at least he commanded respect and admiration for the quality of his voice and for the artistic use he made of it. Incidentally, Dr. Muck used the revisions made late in life by the composer, which he found in Wagner's home at Bayreuth and which are unpublished. At the end there was a demonstration such as one rarely may see by the dignified and learned music lovers who support Boston Symphony concerts.

om SUN
ldress: Baltimore, Md.

ate 3/14/17 MAR 1

BOSTON SYMPHONY; THE LAST THIS SEASON

THE last appearance of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be in the Lyric Theatre Wednesday evening. Again Dr. Muck has made a program full of delight for the lover of music. Again there will be a soloist of high distinction, in this case Elena Gerhardt, the concert soprano, who has long been a favorite in this city.

Dr. Muck begins his program with the immortal "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart. The more one hears this work the more one wonders at the genius of the composer, for while in form it is strictly classical, in content it is thoroughly modern. One has not to seek far for the reason, for it has been regarded almost since its first performance as one of the great masterpieces of the world.

The second orchestral number will be Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan." It was this work which stamped Strauss as a most uncommon genius. It is the first of the three great symphonic poems, the others being "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and "Tod und Verklaren," which in the opinion of many shows Strauss' genius at its highest development. The final number will be Goldmark's brilliant overture "In the Spring."

Miss Gerhardt will sing two groups of songs; the first will be four songs with orchestra by Beethoven. "Wonne der Wehmut," "Die Trommel Geruhret." "Freudvoll und Leidvoll" and "Die Ehre des Gottes in der Natur." The second and third of these are from the music written by Beethoven for Goethe's "Egmont." For her second number she will sing three songs with orchestra by Hugo Wolf."

EVENING NEWS
Baltimore, Md.

MAR 15 1917

SPRING IN MUSIC

So far as being signs of spring, the violets, the crocuses and the early birdlings are veritable sluggards when compared with portents of the musical world.

Weeks before any sane person thinks of letting the furnace fire die a natural death, the conductors, the virtuosi, the singers, commence ransacking their brains and their libraries for works appropriate to the joyous season of reviving life.

The program Dr. Muck is going to give us at the Lyric tonight, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play here for the last time this season, for instance, includes two lovely spring numbers—Goldmark's overture "In Fruhling" and Hugo Wolf's song "Er Ist's." As harbingers they antedate even the snowdrops upon the lawn of the Cardinal's residence, which are usually the very first indications we Baltimoreans have that "winter's storms have waned to the winsome moon."

The orchestral numbers tonight will include besides the overture Mozart's beautiful "Jupiter" symphony and Strauss' stirring tone poem "Don Juan." Elena Gerhardt, who sings lieder so sympathetically, will present, besides "Er Ist's," several other songs by Wolf and a group by Beethoven.

ENQUIRER
ess: Philadelphia, Pa.

MAR 16

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Its Concert With Elena Gerhardt at the Academy of Music Last Night

The proceedings at the Academy of Music last evening, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its last local concert for the present season, were not of a kind to suggest or require any extended comment. Mozart's symphony in D major, the one numbered 385 in Koechel's catalogue, was the central feature of the programme, and while it is characterized by the constructive elegance and melodic grace inseparable from this master's compositions this particular symphony cannot truthfully be described as a particularly interesting or as a musically important work. To be quite frank it sounded pretty thin and there were probably many in the audience who felt that its revival was hardly worth the while.

It was of course beautifully played, with the utmost refinement of style and lucidity of expression, and without any attempt on the part of Conductor Muck to get more out of it than it naturally contains. The other orchestral numbers were Brahms' set of variations on a theme by Haydn and the Paris version of the "Tannhauser" overture. Elena Gerhardt, whose selections comprised an aria, "My heart is spent," from Goetz' opera of the "Taming of the Shrew," and three songs by Hugo Wolf, was the assisting artist and her powers of dramatic and emotional expression were again impressively displayed.

om EVENING SUN
dress: New York City

MAR 17 1917

To-day's Musical Matters.

"Siegfried" is the afternoon opera at the Metropolitan, with "Il Trovatore" following it in the evening at popular prices.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its last New York concert of the season in Carnegie Hall at 3 o'clock, interpreting Cherubini's overture, "The Abencerrages," Brahms's double concerto for violin and 'cello and Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony.

Joseph Bonnet, the French organist, plays in Aeolian Hall at the same time, presenting works of Bach, Liszt, Saint Saens, Cesar Franck, Debussy and himself.

The New York Symphony has Carnegie Hall in the evening, with Mme. Homer singing the same arias which graced the Thursday afternoon concert of the society's orchestra.

The same hours find Mana Zucca playing, with assisting artists, in a recital of her own compositions at Aeolian Hall.

EVENING TELEGRAM
ess: New York City

MAR 16 19

For their last evening concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last night the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Karl Muck's direction, performed Liszt's noblest orchestral work, the "Faust" symphony," so beautifully that a notable demonstration was made by the most sedate musical audience that gathers in this city.

A chorus of men's voices from Boston, with Arthur Hackett as soloist, sang the memorable lines from "Faust" that conclude with "the ever womanly leads us upward and on."

The performance had special significance in view of the fact that Dr. Muck presented the revised version of the score, which he had found in Richard Wagner's library in Beyreuth. These revisions were made by the composer in 1883 and have never been published.

[100]

m TIMES
dress: New York City
MAR 18

The New York and Boston Symphony Orchestras Close Their New York Seasons.

Two series of orchestral concerts in New York were closed last week with every evidence of continued success—those of the New York Symphony Orchestra, and of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There has been a remarkable increase in New York of public interest in orchestral music, which has crowded with listeners all the numerous concerts given in the series of the New York Symphony Orchestra, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Philharmonic Society, the Young People's concerts. Nor should Mr. Sam Franko's three concerts of old music be forgotten. For several years the ten concerts of the Boston Orchestra have been fully subscribed, so that every seat in Carnegie Hall has been taken, and there is a long "waiting list" of would-be subscribers. The Philharmonic Society, which has not yet quite completed its series, has often had to put out the sign "all seats sold." The "Young People's" concerts have had very large audiences. And the New York Symphony Orchestra filled Aeolian Hall so often that its management in mid-season announced an extra series in Carnegie Hall.

The New York Symphony Orchestra has given thirty-six concerts in these two series—eight on Friday afternoons and sixteen on Sunday afternoons in Aeolian Hall; an extra series of ten in Carnegie Hall, to which two more were added. Now the announcement is made that the need of more room is so apparent that next season the Friday afternoon concerts will be transferred from Aeolian Hall to Carnegie Hall, which can seat more than twice as many listeners; also that the Saturday evening series given this season in Carnegie Hall will be increased from five to eight.

It has often been said that in New York the opera takes an undue share of the public interest, and an unfair toll of the public's money; that it overshadows and overwhelms other forms of musical performance, and hence is an injury to the art as a whole. The disproportionate attention that the lyric drama has received seems now in a fair way of being adjusted to an evener balance. It is not that the opera is receiving less attention. On the contrary, there has never been such a pressure on the part of the public to see and hear the opera as there has been this season; a pressure that is exerted in all parts of the house, from the orchestra stalls to the top gallery and the "standees." But it is quite evident that the taste for orchestral music has greatly developed. This is a taste that grows by what it feeds on. The very large patronage bestowed upon the great number of orchestral concerts now given in the course of the New York season shows that the provision of them is not too great.

The present is not a time that brings forth many new musical compositions. There is grimmer business on hand for many who would otherwise be producing and performing them. Mr. Damrosch, even in this exceptional time, has not been behindhand in playing new compositions, or compositions that had not before been heard in New York. Perhaps the most important of such on his season's list was a symphony by Henri Rabaud, a Frenchman whose name was new probably to many of those who heard his music for the first time, and whose symphony gave testimony that the art of symphonic writing has not yet been abolished by the freer methods of present-day composers. Deserving at least equal rank was George W. Chadwick's symphonic poem, "Aphrodite," a composition that does credit to American art. Riccardo Zandonai's "Symphonic Impressions" had a special interest as coming from the composer of a new opera then just brought out at the Metropolitan Opera House, "Francesca da Rimini," a composer accounted one of the rising young men of Italy. But the orchestral work disappointed in its offering of musical ideas, as the opera did, and like it showed more skill and dexterity than creative originality.

The other new things were mostly brief, and laid not much claim to importance; as the orchestral transcription of Ravel's pianoforte "Valses Nobles et Sentimentales," Sinigaglia's "Etude Caprice," and Elgar's "Sospiri." Neither Xavier Leroux's incidental music to "The Persians" of Euripides nor the suite from Stravinsky's "Le Oiseau de Feu" is heard to the best advantage in a concert performance. Mr. Sam Franko's arrangements for modern orchestra of movements from two of Bach's cantatas ("Am Abend desselbigen Tages" and "Ich steh mit einem Fuss im Grabe") were found deeply beautiful—music that had waited long in dusty scores to be exhumed and that had not aged in obscurity.

Attention has also been called, in the summary of the season printed in the program notes, to Mr. Damrosch's efforts to keep soloists "out of the rut of too often repeated works." These have resulted in the performance of a number of such works that have not often been heard; as Franck's "Symphonic Variations," Beethoven's triple concerto for violin, violoncello, and pianoforte; Ravel's Introduction and Allegro for harp, Roentgen's concerto for violoncello, Mozart's D minor concerto, and Liapunoff's concerto for pianoforte.

Dr. Muck has brought forward nothing in the shape of a "novelty," but his programs for the New York concerts have given a well balanced representation to composers of the classic and neo-classic schools on the one hand, and the "moderns" on the other, and also to composers of various nationalities. The French, Russians, Bohemians, and Finns have not been neglected. They are represented in Cherubini—if he is to be classed as a Frenchman—Berlioz, Franck, Debussy, Chabrier, Chausson, Tschaikowsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Smetana, and Sibelius. Dr. Muck had no difficulty in the matter of persuading soloists to avoid the ruts of frequent repetition, because the New York concerts were given without soloists, except the last one, when Messrs. Witek and Warnke, first violin and first 'cellist of the orchestra, united in a performance of Brahms's double concerto for their two

MALIGN, GROTESQUE, SAVAGE

People Who Don't Approve of the Philharmonic Given Their Deserts.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Mr. Mason's charges that the programs of the Philharmonic Society did not measure up to the highest standard and that they were too largely influenced by the terms of the Pulitzer bequest having been refuted, he now turns to make a savage attack on Mr. Stransky's ability as a conductor. Fortunately Mr. Stransky's ability is too well recognized in New York to make it necessary to answer an attack from this source. In support of his contention Mr. Mason quotes from what he calls an "able editorial that appeared in The Outlook Jan. 31." The internal evidence would suggest that this so "able editorial" might have been written by Mr. Mason himself.

The Outlook has been a worse offender in this matter than any one else. Not content with defaming the orchestra, its conductor, and its Board of Directors, it printed in its issue of Feb. 21 a grotesque article that maligned the intelligence of a Philharmonic audience that filled Carnegie Hall to overflowing on the afternoon of Feb. 9.

It seems that all "the thoughts and intents of the heart" are known to the critic of this audience. Never before has such omniscience been claimed, even by a musical critic.

This campaign has contained so much that is inaccurate and inconsistent, and is so manifestly inspired by some particular animus against the Philharmonic Society rather than by a real desire to raise the standard of music in New York, that no admirer of Mr. Stransky and his orchestra will be deceived by it, and all fair-minded people will treat the attack with the contempt that it deserves.

N. TRACY STONE.

South Orange, N. J., March 7, 1917.

THE EXAMPLE LACKING.

One Disappointed Listener at a Philharmonic Concert.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Your stand regarding the artistic worth of the Philharmonic conducting cannot be too strongly approved.

My own daughter has been studying the "Eroica" symphony on the piano. She remarked that "I would give anything to hear this part played by a symphony orchestra," a theme in the first movement. I took her to the "all-classical" concert for the purpose.

The opening Bach number was so correctly played that a girl of 15 could hardly find fault. But the "Eroica" was "put over," as they say in vaudeville, so inelastically and with such a metronomic baton, as you call it, that I was speechless afterward. My work had been so long to drill artistic conceptions and performance into her that I had no example to point to after all. And the very parts which she would have "given anything to hear" were entirely inaudible. The theme was entirely covered up by the violin group in the upper parts.

I feel absolutely sure that many times in the past I have heard Shannon conduct his Twenty-third Regiment Band with more musical understanding and artistic appreciation than was evident at the above concert. Such a remark may be called anything the other side likes, but facts are facts.

Generosity is, of course, good, but there is something due from an organization and from its conductor which professes to stand as exponent of the best and highest form of musical instrumental performance. I trust you will continue the good work.

R. A. DAVIDSON.

Bayonne, N. J., March 11, 1917.

The playing of the orchestra has again deeply impressed the listeners as being of a quality that has quite upheld its reputation as above and beyond that of any other organization that has been heard here. Dr. Muck's conducting and his remarkable power of assimilating the characteristics of the most widely differing schools has won even greater admiration than ever before. These ten performances have been the high-water mark of orchestral playing in New York.

Mr. Franko revived his series of orchestral concerts, devoted to forgotten and almost forgotten music of the past with success. They occupy a modest place in the season's activities, but they offer much that is significant to something besides an antiquarian's taste. The present time is taking more and more interest in the music of the pre-classical period and finding in the best of it something vital and eloquent, not dead, but capable of delighting listeners today. Mr. Franko's efforts deserve the support of the music lovers of New York.

RICHARD ALDRICH.

m STAATS-ZEITUNG
lress: New York City
MAR 11

Die beiden letzten Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters findet am kommenden Donnerstag abend resp. Samstag nachmittag in Carnegie Hall unter Leitung von Dr. Muck statt. Das Donnerstag-Abend-Programm bringt nur ein Werk, nämlich Liszt's „Faust"-Symphonie, welche über eine Stunde in Anspruch nimmt. Ein Männerchor von 80 Stimmen, darunter den Mitgliedern der Bostoner Choral Music Society unter Leitung von Herrn Stephen S. Townsend wirkt mit. Der Tenor Herr Arthur Hackett singt das Solo. Dr. Muck wird eine von Liszt in seinen letzten Lebensjahren vorgenommene Revision des Kolossalwerkes in Anwendung bringen, die er allein hierzulande besitzt. Das Original davon befindet sich in der Bibliothek in Wagner's „Wahnfried"-Villa in Bayreuth.

Das Programm der letzten Matinee bringt ein klassisches Programm, nämlich: Cherubini's Ouvertüre „Die Abencerragen", Brahms' Doppelkonzert für Violine und Cello in A-Moll (Konzertmeister Herr Anton Witek und Solocellist Herr Heinrich Warnke) und Mozart's „Jupiter"-Symphonie.

Sammelne Konzerte.

[101]

m TIMES
dress: New York City
MAR 1
e

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Cherubini, Brahms, and Mozart Played—Witek and Warnke Soloists.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra ended the doings of its fifth visit to New York, and its season in this city, with its concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The program was devoted to music that might all be considered in the "classical" style. It began with Cherubini's overture to "Les Abencérages"; not one of the Gallicized Italian's best ones, it seemed yesterday as if it had been pretty well dried out by the hundred years that have passed over it, and that it had lost its savor. Its dignified style remains, and not much else. It is not long since Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture was played here, and seemed considerably more interesting to the modern taste.

Mozart's C major symphony was the other orchestral number, and this has not been staled by the passage of 129 years. It came yesterday as from an inexhaustible fountain of youth. It was delightfully played by Dr. Muck and his men. There is always a problem confronting the modern conductor playing such a symphony with a modern orchestra, in which the strings are much more numerous than they were in the orchestra Mozart knew and wrote for. There is thus necessarily a thicker and heavier string tone that has not the balance with the wood winds that he had in mind. Nor is the balance restored by increasing the number of these wood winds, but a different quality is produced. Not even so skillful and so discerning a treatment as Dr. Muck gave the orchestra yesterday can afford the real effect, which will not be heard again till some conductor cuts down his strings to a number somewhat nearer Mozart's.

For the first time this season a concerto was played, Brahms's double concerto for violin and violoncello, Op. 102, by Messrs. Witek and Warnke, first violin and first violoncello, respectively, of the orchestra. They are both admirable artists, and they gave a musicianly and intelligent performance of this work, of which the first two movements, at least, are of Brahms's finest and strongest music. Mr. Warnke's tone was not in all places quite equal to holding its own in the ensemble. But one of the enjoyable features of the performance was the singleness of purpose with which the two artists aproached the work and the unity of style with which they played it. They were deservedly applauded.

m STAR
dress: Baltimore, Md.

COMPLETE TEUTONIC PROGRAM

Was Given Last Evening By the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric.

The fifth and last local concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, at the Lyric, last night was a brilliant success, musically. This applies to the playing of the orchestra, the singing of the special soloist, Miss Elena Gerhardt, and the program presented. The entire work was exceedingly fervent, and made the concert one of the most individual this organization has given in Baltimore.

It is interesting to note, also, with war between Germany and the United States of America threatening daily and with the German ambassador sent back to Germany by the United States and the United States ambassador recalled sometime ago, that the German conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented at this concert a German soloist, singing in the German language, and that the program was made up of compositions by natives of Germany and its ally, Austria-Hungary. [illegible]

ENQUIRER
: Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The last concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening at 8.15. The programme presents no novelty, although the Mozart Symphony, which leads it, is one of those least played. It is the symphony in D-major, which is No. 385 in Koechel's catalogue. It was composed in the summer of 1782 for the Saulzburg merchant, Siegmund Haffner, and is consequently sometimes known as the "Haffner Symphony." The other orchestral numbers will be Brahms' set of variations on a chorale by Josef Haydn, and the introduction and Bacchanale from the first act of the Paris version of "Tannhauser."

The soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished soprano, who will sing as her first number the aria, "My Strength Is Spent," from Herman Goetz's opera "The Taming of the Shrew," and as her second number three songs, with orchestra by Hugo Wolf, "Der Freund," "Verborgenheit" and "Er ist's." The program in its proper order is as follows:

Symphony in D Major, No. 35 (K. 385)..Mozart
Aria, "My Strength Is Spent," from "The Taming of the Shrew".....Goetz
Variations on a theme by Josef Haydn.....Brahms
Three songs with orchestra.....Hugo Wolf
(a) Der Freund
(b) Verborgenheit
(c) Er ist's
Introduction and Bacchanale from Act I, Paris Version of "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Soloist—Elena Gerhardt.

From WORLD
Address: New York City
Date MAR 2

Boston Symphony.

The last concerts of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, March 15, and Saturday afternoon, March 17. For Thursday evening the programme consists of only one work, Liszt's Faust Symphony. Experience in Boston has shown that this Symphony, the playing of which consumes over an hour, is quite sufficient for one concert. For the performance of this Symphony a male chorus of eighty voices will be brought specially from Boston. The basis of this chorus, which has already sung the Faust Symphony twice in Boston, is made up of members of the Choral Music Society of Boston, and the chorus was prepared by Stephen S. Townsend, conductor of the society. The tenor solos will be sung by Arthur Hackett. Dr. Muck will use the revised version of the Symphony, which he alone in this country possesses. The revisions were made by Liszt in the last years of his life and the original score containing them is in the library of Wahnfried in Bayreuth.

The programme for the last matinee is, generally speaking, classical. It comprises Cherubini's Overture, "The Abencerrages," Brahm's Double Concerto for Violin and Violoncello in A inor and the "Jupiter" Symphony of Mozart. The Concerto will be played by Messrs. Anton Witek and Heinrich Warnke, concert master and solo 'cellist respectively of the orchestra.

AMERICAN
ess: New York City
APR 18 1917

Boston and New York Symphony Farewells

Carnegie Hall was the scene of two farewell concerts yesterday. In the afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fifth and last matinee until next November. The evening concert was the final musical contribution of the New York Symphony Society's season. Mr. Damrosch, with his eighty musicians, and from Zimbalist, as solo performer, are to give a transcontinental series of concerts, extending to the Pacific Coast.

Dr. Muck's afternoon programme of the visiting Bostonians consisted of three numbers: The overture to Cherubini's opera, "Les Abencerages," Brahms's Concerto in A minor for violin, 'cello and orchestra, and the "Jupiter" symphony by Mozart. Mr. Witek played the solo violin part, and Mr. Warnke the solo 'cello. Both are leading members of the orchestra.

TRIBUNE
ess: New York City
MAR 16 19

Music of Yesterday

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Concert That Pleases Large Audience

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has made us its debtors many times, but never more utterly than last night. Its concert at Carnegie Hall contained but one number—Liszt's "A Faust Symphony"—but of this one number the great band gave a performance which every member of the huge audience will not soon forget.

The "Faust Symphony" is not often given, yet it is one of the very few orchestral works of the Hungarian composer which seem destined for immortality. In its conception as in its execution it is a creation of a stupendous imagination, and one which is a veritable mine of melody. Its length and the necessity for a chorus in the final movement, make its presentation infrequent, though the Philharmonic gave it once before this season.

Dr. Muck found in the symphony a work peculiarly sympathetic to his spirit, and he gave it a performance such as might well occur but once in a lifetime. In its variety of color, its sense of nuance, its exquisite dynamic adjustment, its polish, its force, its suavity, it was beyond all praise. The final chorus was superbly given by a body of Boston singers trained by Stephen S. Townsend, and the solo admirably sung by Arthur Hackett, a young tenor, possessed of a clear, pleasing voice and a fluent style. No wonder at the end of the symphony Major Higginson walked down the aisle and publicly congratulated Dr. Muck!

om EVENING TELEGRAM
ddress: New York City
MAR 17

For their final concert of the season in Carnegie Hall this afternoon, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Dr. Karl Muck, present a classic programme, including Cherubini's graceful overture to his forgotten opera, "Les Abencarges;" Brahm's concerto in A minor for violin and violincello, played by Messrs. Witek and Wamke of the orchestra's forces, and Mozart's delightful Jupiter Symphony.

m PRESS
ress: Philadelphia, Pa.
e MAR

The last concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow (Monday) evening, March twelve at eight fifteen. The program presents no novelty, although the Mozart Symphony which leads it is one of those least played. It is the Symphony in D Major which is No. 385 in Koechel's catalogue. It was composed in the Summer of 1782 for the Salzburg merchant, Siegmund Haffner and is consequently sometimes known as the "Haffner Symphony." The other orchestral numbers will be Brahm's set of Variations on a Chorale, by Josef Haydn and the Introduction and Bacchanale from the First Act of the Paris version of "Tannhauser."

The soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished soprano, who will sing as her first number the aria, "My Strength Is Spent," from Herman Goetz's opera, "The Taming of the Shrew," and as her second number three songs with orchestra by Hugo Wolf, "Der Freund," "Verborgenheit" and "Er Ist's." The program in its proper order is as follows:

Symphony in D-Major, No. 35 (K. 385), Mozart
Aria, "My Strength Is Spent," from "The Taming of the Shrew".....Goetz
Variations on a Theme by Joseph Haydn, Brahms
Three Songs with Orchestra.....Hugo Wolf
(a) Der Freund.
(b) Verborgenheit.
(c) Er Ist's.
Introduction and Bacchanale from Act I. Paris Version of "Tannhauser".....Wagner

* * *

EVENING TELEGRAM
ess: Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 13 1917

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Orchestra Appears with Elena Gerhardt as Soloist.

There was nothing very thrilling in the program presented last night at the Academy of Music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. So far as the strictly instrumental numbers were concerned, it was made up of sonorolent selections in which Dr. Muck at times insists on proving himself the only surviving past grand master. It was not altogether without a certain antiquarian interest for those who like such things, but it was the third such program that the classical doctor has forced upon us this season and served largely to chill the memory of the last two very different concerts.

Mozart came first with the D major symphony, and then Brahms with the variations on a Haydn theme—which even Brahms lovers would be perfectly willing to forget and forgive—and the program ended with the familiar "Tannhauser Introduction and Bacchanale" (Paris version, of course). The orchestra did it all faultlessly and flawlessly and without calling upon the emotions for any unduly deep stirring.

Elena Gerhardt, who was also heard with the Philadelphia Orchestra last week, was the soloist. Her first selection, a scene from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew," did not serve to arouse much enthusiasm for either singer or composer, but her second, a brace of three of Hugo Wolf's exquisite songs, did much to relieve the impression of lethargy created by the program. The songs are beautiful works and Mme. Gerhardt interpreted them with all of the art which has gained her supreme place among lieder singers.

om EVENING NEWS
ddress: Baltimore, Md.
te MAR 10 1

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The last appearance of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, March 14, at 8:15. Again Dr. Muck has made a program full of delight for the lover of music. Again there will be a soloist of high distinction, in this case Elena Gernardt, the concert soprano, who has long been a favorite in this city.

Dr. Muck begins his program with the immortal Jupiter symphony of Mozart. The more one hears this work the more one wonders at the genius of the composer, for while, in form, it is strictly classical, in content it is thoroughly modern.

rom CITIZEN
ddress: Brooklyn, N. Y.
ate

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Opera House of the Academy of Music next Friday evening, March 16, at 8:15. The soloist will be Joseph Malkin, cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will be heard here for the first time. Mr. Malkin, up to the outbreak of the war, was one of the great 'cello virtuosi of Europe, and had lived for a number of years in Berlin, where he was a most important figure in the world of music. Being a Russian it was necesary for him to leave Germany and the Boston Symphony Orchestra was fortunate enough to secure his services. He will play the ever-beautiful Concerto in D minor by the Frenchman, Edouard Lalo. The orchestral number will be the brilliant Overture of Goldmark, "In the Spring" and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

STANDARD UNION
ess: Brooklyn, N. Y.

MAR 1

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS SEASON WITH THE "EROICA"

With Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night closed its Brooklyn season with the fifth concert at the Academy of Music. Dr. Muck conducted a performance rich in dramatic color, precise and gripping in its rhythms and of marvelous clarity in its instrumental traceries.

Preceding the symphony Goldmark's seasonable "Im Fruhling" overture was given with joyous zest, and Joseph Malkin stepped from the ranks of the 'cellists to play the solo part in Lado's 'cello concerto.

The concerto is a mournful affair, the solo wailings in the first two movements going their monotonous way to the accompaniment of crashing chords repeated over-insistently, and ending in the second movement with an echo of "Till Eulenspeigel" witchery. The third movement was more interesting, but the themes never seemed to reach full development. Mr. Malkin brought to the solo work a rich warm tone and a conscientious method that resulted in artistic untiy with the orchestra.

The usual subscription audience was augmented by a number of standees, and there was more than usual enthusiasm in the applause for the "Eroica."

From the American
March 18,1917.

Bloch's Poems at Symphony Concert

THE eighteenth Symphony program, which will be played next Friday afternoon, March 23, and Saturday evening, March 24, will present an important novelty by the Swiss composer, Ernest Bloch. This novelty is three Jewish poems for full orchestra. Bloch, who is a Swiss Jew, has devoted much of his time to the traditional music of his race. He is one of the younger men of great talent and has been in this country for the past season. It will be remembered that at its extra concert last Winter the Flonzley Quartet played a quartette of his which excited much interest. The titles of these poems are "Danse," "Rite" and "Cortege Funebre." Dr. Muck has invited Mr. Bloch to conduct his own works and Mr. Bloch has accepted the invitation.

The soloist at this concert will be Carl Friedberg, the eminent pianist, who has already been heard here with Kreisler and in recital. He will play Brahms's Second Concerto for pianoforte in B-flat, Opus 83. The program in its entirety is Sinigaglia's Overture to Goldoni's "Le Baruffe Chiozotte," Ernest Bloch's three Jewish poems for orchestra and the Brahms's Concerto.

The program of the second concert in aid of the Pension Fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will be given in Symphony Hall, Sunday afternoon, April 1, at 3:30, is a wide departure from the conventional. The orchestra will have the assistance of a chorus of upwards of 200 from Harvard University. This chorus is made up of the Radcliffe Choral Society and the entire Harvard University Glee Club. The two choral numbers will be the unaccompanied Motet, "I wrestle and pray; by Bach, and Brahms' "Song of Destiny" written for chorus and full orchestra.

* * *

From the
Globe
March 18,1917.

Bloch's Jewish Poems This Week's Symphony Novelty

The Symphony program next Friday afternoon will present an important novelty by the Swiss composer, Ernest Bloch. This is three Jewish poems for full orchestra. Bloch, who is a Swiss Jew, has devoted much of his time to the traditional music of his race. He is one of the younger men of great talent, and has been in this country for the past season.

It will be remembered that at its extra concert last Winter the Flonzaley Quartet played a quartet of his which excited much interest. The titles of these poems are "Danse," "Rite" and "Cortege Funebre." Dr Muck has invited Mr Bloch to conduct his own works and Mr Bloch has accepted.

The soloist at this concert will be Carl Friedberg, the eminent pianist, who has already been heard here with Kreisler and in recital. He will play Brahm's second Concerto for pianoforte in B-flat, op. 83. The program will include Sinigaglia's Overture to Goldoni's "Le Baruffe Chiozotte."

DRY GOOD

EVENING JOURNAL
ss: New York City

MAR

ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

The last concerts of both the Boston Symphony and the New York Symphony orchestras took place on Saturday in Carnegie Hall, the former in the afternoon and the latter in the evening. Dr. Muck's final principal offering was the Mozart C major symphony, known as the "Jupiter" symphony, while Dr. Damroch made Schumann's "Spring" symphony his pabulum of chief sustenance.

Dr. Muck and his men presented the Mozart symphony with that combined force and grace it so seldom receives. There are many orchestral conductors whose patronizing attitude toward Mozart leads one to believe that they regard as a kind of sublimated dance music everything he wrote, including the greatest three of his symphonies. They even try to dance along with it on their little platforms. Dr. Muck's attitude toward Mozart is, of course, one of intelligence. Also, it is one of enthusiasm. And the "Jupiter" symphony was presented in its mature and masculine beauty.

The opening feature of this program was one of the nowadays rarely heard overtures of Cherubini, that to "Les Abencerrages," whilst the middle section of it was devoted to the double concerto of Brahms for violin and violoncello, the solo portions played by Messrs. Witek and Warnke of the orchestra. The overture was hardly worth a renewed acquaintance. There have been more satisfying accounts of the Brahms concerto than that of Messrs. Witek and Warnke.

From the
Transcript
March 17,1917.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

New Music and a New Pianist for the Symphony Concerts—Mr. Casals, Variously Partnered—An Evening of Mr. Loeffler's Pieces—Mme. Culp in Songs—Minor Recitals

MORE novel music diversifies Dr. Muck's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, viz.: Three Jewish Poems—"Dance," "Rite," "Funeral Procession—written by Ernest Bloch, to be played for the first time in the United States and to be conducted by the composer himself. By birth and residence he is a Swiss of Jewish blood, who journeyed hither last autumn on various errands. By profession he is composer and conductor, with an opera, "Macbeth," and various symphonic and chamber pieces to his credit. One of these, a quartet for strings, was played here by "The Flonzaleys" last January, and proved an acrid, vivid, poignant and intense music in ultra-modern yet personal idiom, and almost always moving to hear. Mr. Bloch feels his Jewish blood and heritage, and in these "Poems" for orchestra he has sought to write music less derived from Jewish sources than puissant with Jewish trait, emotion, mood. On Dr. Muck's programme Sinigaglia's gay and chattering Italian overture to a comedy of Goldoni, "Le Baruffe Chiozzote," will precede Mr. Bloch's pieces. Following them comes Brahms's long and exacting concerto in B-flat for piano and orchestra, in which Mr. Friedberg, a pianist of merit, who enjoys Mr. Kreisler's protection, will play the solo part.

Mr. Friedberg will be the "assisting artist" also at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge in Sanders Theatre on Thursday when and where he will play the pianoforte part in Schumann's concerto. Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony and the overture and Venusberg music from Wagner's opera, "Tannhäuser" fill the rest of the programme.

FROM THE HERALD 3/11/17.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

There will be no Symphony concerts this week. The orchestra will be away on its fifth and last trip of the season to the South. The usual concerts will be given in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn, with Miss Gerhardt, soloist, in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, and Joseph Malkin, soloist, in Brooklyn. On Thursday night in New York Liszt's "Faust" Symphony will be given with no other number on the program. The male chorus with Arthur Hackett as solo tenor will leave Boston Thursday noon on the limited, and will return at midnight. At the Saturday afternoon concert in New York Messrs. Witek and Warnke will play Brahms's Double Concerto.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The second concert in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall, Sunday afternoon, April 1. This concert will be out of the ordinary. For the first time the public will have a chance to observe Dr. Muck as a conductor of choral work. So far since he has been in Boston his choral work has been limited to incidental choruses in symphonies such as the "Faust" symphony, performed the past week.

There will be a large chorus recruited in Harvard University and Radcliffe College. The basis of the chorus is the Radcliffe Choral Society and Harvard University Glee Club, which have been trained by Mr. Davison. With the orchestra this chorus will give Brahms's "Schicksal Lied," which has not been heard in Boston for many years. The chorus will also sing alla cappella, a motet by Bach. This will make the first part of the program. The second part of the program will be devoted to excerpts from Wagner's opera.

HERALD
New York City

MAR 18 1917

Boston Orchestra Plays Superbly at Last Concert

Two local series of orchestral concerts were brought to a close yesterday. In the afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra played its final programme in Carnegie Hall, and at the same place at night the Symphony Society's Orchestra appeared for the last time this season, repeating last Thursday's programme, with slight alterations.

Few concerts of the men from Boston, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, have been more enjoyable than that of yesterday. The "Jupiter" symphony of Mozart, one of the monumental symphonic works, was played superbly. The andante cantabile and the fugue finale were beautiful as Dr. Muck and his men presented them. The lovely tone of the string section, the unanimity of action of the players and the strong yet delicately refined reading of the conductor were responsible for much applause.

Two soloists from the ranks of the orchestra—Anton Witek, violinist, and Heinrich Warnke, 'cellist—were heard in Brahms' double concerto, opus 102. This number, too, was presented admirably. Both soloists are excellent musicians and Mr. Witek in particular is a soloist of real distinction. The spirit with which the concerto was presented was that of a great orchestral work with solos, rather than of a solo work with orchestral accompaniment, which is refreshing after a season filled with temperamental dominating violinists, 'cellists and pianists, who often overshadow the orchestras with which they play.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

BOOTS AND SHOES

EVENING SUN,

Baltimore, Md.

MAR 15 1917

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, gave the last of this season's concerts at the Lyric last evening, the soloist being Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished lieder singer.

The symphony was the "Jupiter," of Mozart, an exqnisite example of pure music of the older type which, while it no longer thrills, was given a very definite interest by the delicacy and beauty of the orchestra's performance. The "Jupiter" symphony is replete with graceful melodies and sparkling episodes and it has, besides, a fine dignity, but the interest that it excites is historic rather than actual, for it so definitely belongs to other days.

The orchestra also played the splendid "Don Juan" tone-poem of Richard Strauss, a composition conceived in broad periods and one of the most significant examples of the rather early activities of its composer. It is very rich in instrumentation and melodic invention, it projects a stirring picture of ove and life and the futility of sensuous instances and is a colorful and intricate composition that roused the audience to unusual enthusiasm. The concert closed with the rarely played Goldmark "Springtime" overture, a spirited and suggestive work that has many beauties.

Elena Gerhardt was in beautiful voice, singing in the grand manner, with that far-reaching authority, that always marks her work. She gave first four Beethoven songs and afterward three of the Hugo Wolf lieder, all with orchestral accompaniment, bringing to them unusual and unexpected interpretative significance. She sang both the "Wonne der Wehmut" and the moving "Die Ehre Gottes in der Natur" with a calm beauty that was especially effective, giving a heartfelt and very significant rendition of the "Die Trommel geruehret" of the older composer, and she also made a particularly deep impression by the delightful way in which she sang the Hugo Wolf songs. "Der Freund" seemed less important than the others, but the "Verborgenheit" and "Er Ist's," so familiar to all students of lieder, seemed particularly impressive as they rang out in this great artist's clear tones over their lovely orchestral background. J. O. L.

84

3 B. 3

[162]

TRAVELER - MARCH 17, 1917.

Ernest Bloch to Lead Symphony Orchestra

Swiss Composer Will Direct Dr. Muck's Players at Next Week's Concerts in Three of His Own Compositions.

By FRANK BERTWALL.

The rather unusual sight of another than Dr. Muck directing the Symphony Orchestra will be afforded at next week's pair of concerts when Ernest Bloch, the Swiss composer, by Dr. Muck's invitation, will direct the players in three of his own compositions. Another feature of the concerts will be the appearance of Carl Friedberg, pianist, as soloist.

Interest in the coming concert by the Symphony Orchestra for its pension fund is heightened by the announcement that a chorus of some 200 voices from the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe, trained by Dr. Davidson, will assist. There will also be a special number for organ and violins with Wagner selections, without which no pension fund concert would be complete, filling out the program.

Sunday Afternoon's Concert.

The program for tomorrow afternoon's concert in Symphony Hall by Julia Culp, with Coenraad V. Bos as assisting artist and accompanist, will be as follows:

I.
Der Lindenbaum ..... Schubert
Lachen und Weinen ..... Schubert
Gretchen am Spinnrade ..... Schubert
MME. CULP.
Litanei ..... Schubert

II.
Sonate, C major ..... Mozart
COENRAAD V. BOS.

III.
Japanese Death Song ..... Earl Cranston Sharp
Indian Love Song ..... T. Lieurance
Deep River (Negro melody)
Arr. by William A. Fisher
I'm wearing awa', Jean ..... Arthur Foote
MME. CULP.

IV.
Old German Folk Songs
Das Muhlrad
Hans und Liesel
Der Tyroler und sein Kind
Phyllis und die Mutter
MME. CULP.

V.
Elegie ..... Rachmaninoff
To Elise ..... Beethoven
Pierrette ..... Chaminade
COENRAAD V. BOS.

VI.
Nachtigall ..... Brahms
Schalbe, sag' mir an ..... Brahms
Wiegenlied ..... Brahms
Vergebliches Standchen ..... Brahms

Symphony Program.

Those who heard the composition of Ernest Bloch, the Swiss composer, played this season by the Flonzaley Quartet, will welcome the opportunity afforded at next week's symphony concerts of seeing Mr. Bloch direct the orchestra in three of his poems, "Danse," "Rite" and "Cortege Funebre." The opening number will be Sinigaglia's overture to Goldoni's "Le Baruffe Chiozzote." Then come the Bloch selections. Brahms's second concerto for piano, with Carl Friedberg as soloist, completes the program.

Pension Fund Concert.

Departing quite a bit from the beaten path, Dr. Muck offers as a program for the Pension Fund concert, Sunday afternoon, April 1, in Symphony Hall, the unaccompanied Motet, "I Wrestle and Pray," by Bach, and Brahms's "Song of Destiny" for full orchestra and chorus, the chorus in this case being 200 voices from the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe, Rheinberger's "Theme and Variations" for organ and violins, and the following Wagner numbers:

Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," the prelude to "Parsifal," Hans Richter's arrangement of selections from "Siegfried" and "Goetterdaemmerung," the funeral music from "Goetterdaemmerung" and the "Tannhaeuser" overture.

m TRIBUNE

dress: New York City

te

Bostonians' Season Ends

Symphony Orchestra Makes Last Appearance Here

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its New York season with its concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Whatever this great orchestra gives is thrice worthy of hearing because of the way the programme is given. Dr. Muck is an admirable leader, but his choice of compositions is often far from happy. He has given both more and less interesting programmes than the one of yesterday. It opened with the overture to Cherubini's opera, "Les Abenceroges." The overture is seldom given and possesses grace and melodic beauty. The Brahms A minor concerto for violin and 'cello is, on the whole, rather heavy fare, despite the quiet beauty of its second movement. The solo parts were sustained yesterday by Anton Witek and Heinrich Warnke, two excellent musicians, who played earnestly. The Mozart "Jupiter" symphony, which closed the afternoon, is of course, always welcome, and its music peculiarly sympathetic to Dr. Muck.

It was not exactly an inspired afternoon, yet it gave real pleasure and renewed wonder at the superb organization which Major Higginson's public spirit has given to his native city. The Bostonians are always welcome, and at each performance they renew the regret that New York is priviliged to hear them only ten times a season. New York could easily stand a tripling of their appearances.

From the Journal
March 10,1917.

Dr. Muck's Reading of Liszt's "Faust" Stirs Even Sophisticated.

By F. Esposito

Liszt's glorious "Faust" symphony, though heard as lately as last December, was chosen by Dr. Muck for yesterday's rehearsal and tonight's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The conductor left the symphony standing bravely alone in the program. This was well; another work would have seemed colorless beside it, or else would have carried the exaltation of the afternoon to an exhausting point.

The version given was the "revised" score, which Dr. Muck found in the library at Wahnfried Wagner's home in Bayreuth. He was told that Liszt made the revision about 1883. Arthur Hackett sang the difficult "Ewig Weibliche" declamation. He was assisted by a large male chorus trained by Stephen Townsend.

As Mr. Hale and Mr. Apthorp, the writers of the Symphony program notes, have both pointed out, the "Faust" is less a symphony than a group of symphonic poems, or tone pictures. There is no descriptive program; none is needed beyond the names of the three movements, "Faust," "Gretchen" and "Mephistopheles."

"Faust" deals in reflective themes, "Gretchen" in smooth, curving melodies, and "Mephistopheles" in mockery of all the preceding material. Beyond that, every hearer must make his own visions. The Faust of the legend is difficult to envisage in the music; he is a more youthful philosopher, just as Gretchen is less simple-minded. The childishness of jewels and flowers finds no place in the intense music of Liszt. And in the third movement one may fancy anything, from sheer glee in the dominions of Mephisto over humanity, wrecked and ridiculous, to a despairing cry at the uselessness of life.

Dr. Muck's reading of the symphony raises it to the highest dramatic pitch. He swept the orchestra along to the great shout of the triumphant Faust motif in the brass, and fairly thrilled his sophisticated audience with the full-throated cry of the strings in unisons that follow.

The "Gretchen" movement, full of amorous suggestion, and shading always the thought of the principal motive into new meanings, was never so full of color before. But it was in the tremendous third movement, with its devilish chucklings, its distorted mockery of the Faust theme, its scoldings, explosions, and finally, the noble "mystic chorus," that emotion was most roused.

Certainly it would have been a pity to add another number to the program.

From the
Post
March 18,1917.

The programme of the second concert in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, April 1, at 3:30, is a wide departure from the conventional. The orchestra will have the assistance of a chorus of upward of 200 from Harvard University. This chorus is made up of the Radcliffe Choral Society and the entire Harvard University Glee Club. It has been under the training of Dr. A. T. Davison since October. Dr. Muck heard it 10 days ago and was highly pleased with the results. The two choral numbers will be the unaccompanied Motet: "I Wrestle and Pray," by Bach, and Brahms' "Song of Destiny," written for chorus and full orchestra. The first number on the programme will be a theme and variations, by Rheinberger, for violin and organ. Mr. Marshall will be the organist and the violin part will be played by the entire section of violins, 30 in number.

The remainder of the programme will include Wagner's prelude to "Tristan and Isolde," the prelude to "Parsifal," Hans Richter's arrangement of selections from "Siegfried," and "Gotterdammerung," the funeral music from "Gotterdammerung" and the "Tannhauser" overture.

FROM THE TRANSCRIPT 3/28/17

NEWS OF MUSIC

A MAUDLIN YARN CAUGHT AND NAILED

The Mendacious and Malicious Rumor of the Disbanding of the Symphony Orchestra Because of Impending War—Programmes in Prospect—"Lakme" Revived at the Metropolitan — Festivals and "Farewells"—Items and Opinions

IN the eyes and upon the tongues of the obstreperous partisans of Mr. Stransky, the conductor, and of his Philharmonic Society in New York, and no less in the sight and the speech of the rich men, the rich women and the newspapers that in Philadelphia troop after Mr. Stokowski and his orchestra, it is an error in the organization of the universe, even as at present perturbed, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra should exist and at the pitch to which Dr. Muck has raised it. It is an even greater error of the cosmic forces and of mere men, their instruments, that it should pay monthly visits to New York and Philadelphia and so afford a recurring basis of comparison with the resident bands and conductors; while it is depravity and nothing else that the public of those cities—the finest public of concerts in both—should flock to hear and so learn to be exacting. By a very simple process, as the witty Mr. Henderson suggested in The New York Sun last Sunday, this jealous resentment could be removed—the dispersal of the Boston Orchestra or even the abandonment by it of frequent visits to the cities in question. Since, however, it continues to exist and Dr. Muck to lead it, there is no remedy—as Mr. Henderson concluded—and in talk and print about it much will be said to grate upon Mr. Stransky and his followers and to roil Mr. Stokowski and his benefactors.

However, where there is a will there is a way—especially in Philadelphia, in which town Mr. Stokowski and his orchestra possess what the politicians call a "newspaper organ." Last autumn that journal fathered a yarn according to which the unionized employees of the halls or theatres in which the Boston Orchestra played outside its own city would no longer endure the presence of an orchestra beyond the pale. It or they must go. Thus there would have been no more concerts by Dr. Muck and his men in Philadelphia—if only this invention had been true. It was not, but now that same precious organ mounts to larger things. Quivering in all its stops it was ready to discover a day or two ago that the Boston Orchestra was about to go out of existence; that Mr. Higginson was preparing to wash his hands of his dearest possession; that band and conductor were to be sacrificed to the exigencies of the war. Timely denial from Mr. Higginson himself, and in terms so emphatic that they may not be printed here, choked the organ before it could publicly lift its voice. But the maudlin or malicious invention over which it was so eager has now reached Boston and alarmed inquirers repeat it. So doing they reiterate a nonsensical, if not a malignant, falsehood.

Here in Boston

Mr. Philip Clapp's new symphony will be played for the first time anywhere at the Symphony Concerts of next week on Friday afternoon, April 6, and Saturday evening, April 7, with the composer conducting; while orchestrated songs for Mme. Culp, an organ piece by Mr. Chadwick and a fragment from Franck fill the rest of the programme. In detail it stands:

Symphony in G major.....Clapp
Songs with Orchestra:
"Sei mir Gegrüsst."—"Ständchen"...Schubert
"Morgen".....Strauss
Symphonic Piece from "The Redemption"..Franck
Songs with Orchestra:
"Verborgenheit".....Wolf
"Ich atmet einen Lindenduft."—"Rheinlegendchen".....Mahler
Theme, Variations and Fugue for Organ and Orchestra.....Chadwick

Mr. Townsend and the Choral Music Society are preparing three novel pieces for its concert of April 25 in Jordan Hall—three motets that set hymns of the Roman Church for soprano voice and mixed chorus by Roger-Ducasse, the Parisian composer; a fragment for baritone and men's chorus from Mr. Converse's unpublished and unperformed opera, "Beauty and the Beast"; and a threnody for an eight-part chorus written by Mr. Bantock to commemorate the dead in the sinking of the Titanic, five years ago.

Another series of "Pop Concerts" will begin in Symphony Hall on May 7 or 8, immediately after the end of the Symphony Concerts on the preceding Sautrday. No departure is intended from the routine of these entertainments for many a year past, unless it be in the coming to a part of them of a new conductor who can stimulate the orchestra as did Mr. Pasternack last autumn. He, indeed, opened new possibilities of animation which the public, even after eight months, has not forgotten.

"Lakme" Reanimated

For final revival of the season, the Metropolitan mounted last Saturday Delibes's "Lakmé," a opera seldom heard nowadays even in the Paris whence it came, known and liked in Boston in the first years of its own lyric theatre, and relished apparently in New York where it has been represented only three or four times in the last two decades. "The drama is not a very significant one," writes Mr. Aldrich, recalling the piece in The Times. "It has reminded various commentators of 'L'Africaine' on the one hand and 'Aida' on the other. The scene is Oriental and the composer makes use of Oriental musical traits. The heroine, Lakmé, like Aida, loves an enemy of her country who is unwittingly delivered by her into the hands of her people. Nilakantha betrays his enemy like Nelusko, and like Selica, Lakmé bears herself contributed to the programme does. But these characteristics are of negligible import in view of the originality and eloquence, and what one might call the essential naivete of true art, revealed in these pages. This is unmistakably the music of a new man, with something wholly his own to say, who composes not because he makes up his mind to do so, but because he must.

Orientalism From Inside

How did Mr. Bloch discover this freshness of idiom, this deep and fundamentally racial manner of speech? He does not believe that a composer who wishes to express the spirit of his race has necessarily to make use of folk-songs for such a purpose. He has gone deeper than this. It is true that his music has oriental characteristics of rhythm and melodic outline, but there is the heartening conviction on the part of the hearer that this orientalism comes from inside out, rather than from outside in. The composer has not found these rich and fascinating idioms because of a deliberate search for that which would be externally indicative of his quest, but because such forms of expression were forced into existence by the driving power of his own emotions and ideas, and by the birth-right inherited from his forefathers.

This music has the warmth, the melancholy, the sensuality, the prophetic fervor of Hebraic literature. It is at moments harsh and austere, of a passionate intensity, or it has oriental grace and languor.

Supple and Varied

Technically speaking, there are oriental rhythms conspicuous for their suppleness and variety; harmony that is intentionally simple, and often rugged and harsh; unusual and very effective schemes of orchestral color, and a manner of melodic ornamentation which, as it glides rapidly through chromatic intervals, gives the impression of intervals smaller than those of the accepted scales of Western Europe—an ornamentation which is as a diaphonous veil thrown about the main thematic fragments. This latter is observed particularly in the first movement. Other passages furnish a direct contrast in the breadth and simplicity and long line of the themes.

Of the three movements, "Danse," "Rite" and "Cortege Funebre," the first is perhaps the most tentative in its form and instrumentation. But it is enormously rich in material and suggestion. Thus the first theme, stiff and archaic in its steps, giving an extraordinary impression of the antique, yet having a wealth of the characteristically chromatic embellishments. Other short, wailing motives, which glide through half-tones that might as easily as not become quarter-tones, set over monotonous rhythms, and interrupted by outcries and dialogues of wind-instruments, make the material of the movement. The second movement opens with a grand simplicity and tenderness, and then, following impressive trumpet calls, a passage of fiery and majestic utterance that might well be the adjurations of the prophet in the temple. These last two movements—the Ritual and the Funeral Procession, are movements which, in spite of occasional thickness and lack of balance of instrumentation would remain monuments to the talent of the composer, if he left nothing else to the world. The emotional force of this music is startling. It was the more startling yesterday, as it was so unexpected, and so novel in its forms of expression.

Players Applaud Composer

Mr. Bloch was called back to the stage repeatedly. The orchestra, as well as the audience, impressed by his music and by the simple dignity of the man on the platform, joined in the applause.

Mr. Friedberg, in playing the Brahms concerto, displayed not only phenomenal virtuosity in dealing with a work which is one of the most ungrateful in existence for the pianist, but a never-failing beauty and sonority of his tone and a true nobility of conception. Dr. Muck and Mr. Friedberg collaborated in a wonderfully clear exposition of the contents of a complicated symphonic work, and for once this work stood revealed at its full stature. They understood the rugged, heroic spirit of the opening, the demoniac scherzo, the haunting poetry of the slow movement, and the humor and vigor of the finale. Orchestra and pianist out-vied each other. Not in 17 years at these concerts had this concerto been so superbly presented. More performances of this kind would bring about a more general appreciation of the rather formidable Brahms of the B flat piano concerto than now generally obtains. The audience was quick to appreciate the wholly exceptional qualities of the performance. As a matter of record, the concert opened with a performance of Sinigaglia's noisy overture to Le Baruffe Chiozzote, performed with exemplary precision and brilliancy.

wounded lover, Captain Gerald, away to an Oriental paradise, thinking to keep him always with her. Like Vasco da Gama Gerald deserts his sweetheart, not at the summons of another, but at the call of his country; and, again like Selika, Lakmé poisons herself with a deadly Oriental flower.

"Delibes treated this story musically with a lighter touch, naturally, than either Meyerbeer or Verdi treated his. There may not be in the opera all the sparkling flow of vivacious and piquant melody remembered in other works of Delibes; and the music may seem to some to have aged somewhat in its thirty-four years; but there is much grace and charm in it, a real melodic invention, and, indeed, an originality that marks it as the composer's own. The best known portion of it is the 'Bell Song,' cultivated by every coloratura singer as a concert piece. There are other effective numbers.

"Delibes applied 'local color' copiously in the music of 'Lakmé.' Oriental intervals, rhythmical and harmonic formulas are abundant in it. Now, constant Oriental coloring in music is gained only at the expense of what seems monotony to the Occidental ear. That ear is likely soon to reach the saturation point and is cloyed. It is from this that many will find the opera to suffer. Yet there was obviously a continued interest in the performance and the beauty and charm of the music hardly lost their spell from beginning to end.

"Mme. Barrientos is a delightful figure as the Indian maiden: graceful, lithe, alluring in appearance and action. The music, too, suits her very well; and much of it she sang with the delicacy and brilliancy that it needs and with a quality of voice that was excellent except where it was forced for volume. Her delivery of florid passages is now well known, and as before, certain high tones and certain passages were elaborately prepared for and carefully rather than spontaneously executed. Mr. Martinelli was accetable as the English officer, acceptable but not distinguished in his singing of the music. It might be said that the part is not one that admits of much distinction in action. Mr. Rothier sang well as Nilakantha, and made him something a little more than the operatic father. There is a luxurious and realistic scenic representation of the temple garden and the Indian forest, and the public square of the town is picturesquely shown. Mr. Polacco conducted a smooth and sonorous performance."

—.

Bridling Tongues

There is too much war talk among professional musicians. Those of us who sit in the audience and listen to the performances of singers and instrumentalists from various parts of the earth are duly and repeatedly warned that we must forget all matters of nationality. We should think of all these excellent personages only as purveyors of æsthetic delights. Most of us are trying to do so. But the musicians themselves have not been and are not now all taking the attitude which they ask us to take. Some of them have talked freely and bitterly in the not distant past and others are still talking. The best thing they can do at this present moment is to sing and play. Some of them have shown excellent judgment in attending strictly to their professional duties and refraining from unwise talk. Others should take thought of the possibilities of their position in case they should find themselves stranded here in war-time unable to return home and equally unable to secure engagements in a country in which they have hitherto flourished. [The New York Sun.

From the
Post
March 24.1917.

COMPOSER CONDUCTS SYMPHONY

Bloch's 'Jewish Poems' Create Profound Impression

BY OLIN DOWNES

"Three Jewish Poems," by Ernst Bloch, who directed the performances of his own works, and a memorable performance of Brahms' B flat piano concerto by Carl Friedberg, were distinguishing features of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

DISTINCTIVELY HEBRAIC

The music of Bloch took everyone by surprise on account of its emotional depth and its novelty of color and accent. A number of new works of greater or lesser importance have been heard at the Symphony concerts this winter. None have made such a distinctive impression. No others have revealed, as we believe these "Jewish Poems" reveal, a new and important figure in the modern musical art.

Mr. Bloch, turning his back on precedent and the set formulas of European schools of composition, has essayed to write music which shall be fundamentally and distinctively Hebraic. He has succeeded in this in an astonishing degree. We feel that this music, not the most mature achievement of the composer, is in some respects tentative and experimental. As much is admitted by Mr. Bloch in the notes which he him-

From the
Globe
March 24,1917.

ERNEST BLOCH'S NOTABLE NEW MUSIC

"Three Jewish Poems" Are Led by Composer

Music of Forceful Individuality—Carl Friedberg Soloist

The Symphony concerts which bring anew an arresting, puissant individuality into the field of music are notable and few. Yesterday afternoon both Ernest Bloch, as conductor, and his "Three Jewish Poems" appeared for the first time in Boston. This city had not heard Mr. [illegible] Maud Allan, the dancer, in her tour of the present season. It had heard his remarkable quartet played a number of weeks ago by the gentlemen of the Flonzaley quartet, music of distinctive spirit, born apparently of the deepest personal conviction, intrepid, resolute, even at times supremely daring in expression, yet never hinting at the poseur.

As an individualist, Bloch, now but 37 in July, reminds of Sibelius, not in thought or idiomatic speech, but in that zeal of soul which must find voice and in its own vein. The Finn has been taken by his annotators to write nationalistic music, in which one is to hear the oppression and the deathless courage of Finland. Living in a north land of austere physical characteristics, he has written what is probably his own emotional and spiritual consciousness.

Bloch makes the history and character of the Jewish people, their type of mind and soul, his inspiration. He finds an instinctive kinship between the spirit of portions of the Old Testament, as of the Psalms and the Song of Solomon, and his own feeling. Yet the composer states that he has not endeavored to use Jewish melodies or themes as elemental material. He professes to have written in his own vein, with the consciousness of a race as the general sources upon which he draws.

The three poems, Danse, Rite and Cortege funebre, do not rely for the arresting individuality displayed in them upon any form of extremism which parades manner above content. Even the first is serious. There the suggestion of ritual or ceremony which is carried much farther in the second, but throughout these two, although a thematic fabric is to be found, there is a rich color sense, at times gorgeous in its sensuous prodigality

But this sensuous quality is never that of languor, or of the suggestion associated with the Orient. There is indeed a biblical, a patriarchal, even a savage splendor, which is a distinctively new note in modern orchestral literature. The climaxes are those of a multitude of virile, impassioned voices, in lamentation as in joy. Such a one brings to a majestic and elegiac conclusion. The cortege, written in memory of the composer's father, a movement in which the gray mood of the middle portion is somewhat overdeveloped, and notwithstanding its varying rhythmic figuration seems insufficiently winged to span the broad pace the composer took it.

The rich texture of the score of the two preceding movements in part reflects an opulent imagination and ready skill in orchestral color and a harmonic palette which secures depth of perspective at times by imposing one tonality upon another.

As a conductor Mr Bloch makes his effects with point and authority. He was received with marked enthusiasm by audience and orchestra. Mr Bloch's symphony, which he says has been refused in Europe because he "was unknown," should be worth a hearing. His "Macbeth," an opera, was produced in Paris in 1910.

Carl Friedberg played with virtuosity and with rhapsodic, poetic fancy in Brahms' concert in B flat major No. 2, a work in which the piano is largely an incidental instrument in a symphonic structure of dramatic character. In four long movements, the concert might have been called a symphony with a part for piano. Sinigaglia's chattering overture, "The Chioggian Brawls," was brilliantly played by Dr Muck, who made the orchestra in the concert a feature.

[illegible]m SUN

dress: New York City

By W. J. HENDERSON.

THE season of orchestral concerts has come to its end and with it the inrush of a horde of recital givers. There are as many concerts scheduled for the coming week as there were for weeks earlier in the season when the Philharmonic Society, the Symphony Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra all gave concerts within three days.

The retrospective eye, scanning the past season of orchestral activities, must be struck by certain features which stand out clearly in the historical spectacle. Chief among them is the insistence on the virtuoso character of the conductor. This becomes wearisome to the sincere music lover who naturally prefers to concentrate his thought on the creations of composers.

It is not possible, nor is it essential, to recall just when and just how the adoration of the interpretative conductor began. So far as New York is concerned it may perhaps safely be dated from the happy days of Theodore Thomas and the Central Park Garden concerts. The Thomas Orchestra was a title which invited every music lover to regard the organization as the creation and the creature of the directive genius of the one man who waved the baton.

It is not difficult to conjure up in the mind the vigor of the efforts which were made to convince people that Dr. Leopold Damrosch was the superior of his predecessor. Then came Anton Seidl, and upon the head of every human being who dared to question anything he did was launched the awful curse of the Evening Post, which now takes the same attitude toward detractors of Josef Stransky.

What things were not done and said in the name of Safonoff, he who worked his magic without the wand! And poor Mahler was the next victim of hysteric admiration, which in the old familiar manner hurled immeasurable abuse upon any one venturing to suggest that some things done by him were not perfect.

Arturo Toscanini, who was primarily an opera conductor, directed some orchestral concerts, notably a performance of Beethoven's ninth symphony. Thereupon people attached to the Metropolitan Opera House became violently affected and one could have believed readily that none of them had ever heard the symphony before. They behaved precisely like the [illegible] enced attendant at a piano rec[illegible] is possessed by the ludicrous [illegible] that the pianist is playing "pie[illegible] hard" for any other pianist to perform.

In the course of Mr. Toscanini's engagement at the opera it transpired that those in authority regarded it as wholly impossible that he could do anything wrong, and when the hardened commentators of the daily press pointed out the shortcomings in certain of his productions they were assailed in terms of vituperation and their motives defined as strictly dishonest.

It was regarded as inconceivable that there could be any man alive who really knew that Mr. Toscanini had not discovered the true inwardness of the score of "Die Meistersinger." He who disagreed with Toscanini was simply a falsifier. There is another word, but it is not polite. And he falsified not from sheer malice, but because some one—no one ever told who—paid him to do it.

Mr. Toscanini is no longer at the Metropolitan and the recorders of the newspapers may say anything they please about the conductors—provided always that they do not praise Mr. Polacco too warmly—and no one will pay the slightest attention to them. Verily these things are more or less a part of the great comedy of life.

It is unfortunate for art in general and the Philharmonic Society in particular that Mr. Stransky has been set up as a deity against whom no man must blaspheme. With the renewal of energy and determination to make the concerts of New York's oldest orchestra brilliantly successful in respect of popular interest every music lover and writer on musical topics should be heartily in sympathy. Because of the inspiriting results which have been attained in the increase of attendance every one should rejoice. The house is now often sold out. Growth of love for orchestral concerts is a blessing.

A large part of the campaign has naturally been bent toward convincing the general public that in Mr. Stransky the society has secured a virtuoso conductor of the first rank. Mr. Stransky has received a generous allowance of praise. He conducts certain types of music with enthusiasm and understanding.

But he does not succeed equally well with others. It is the policy of certain persons in the Philharmonic Society to accuse any one who says this of dishonesty. To their ingenuous or disingenuous minds—the action is open to either construction—no man can possibly doubt the correctness of anything done by the prophet. The position taken by these people might be called ridiculous were it not that it is accompanied by malicious, illegal and punishable action.

Mr. Damrosch, who makes too many speeches despite the fact that they are generally clever, goes quietly along his way with the New York Symphony Society and generally receives praise and censure with equal calmness. The people who support the organization, at any rate, keep quiet no matter what is said. Once in a while Mr. Damrosch, who is afflicted with literary aspirations, writes a letter to an editor complaining of some criticism. Any conductor or supporter of a conductor has that privilege. But we do not recall any campaign of privately circulated slanders of the critics carried on by members of the Symphony Society. According to the persons previously referred to all the commentators who find any fault with Mr. Stransky are in the pay of the Damrosches.

Well, this is a very old story. And it is a story of folly and futility. In all the years of the present writer's experience he has never known any musical commentator to be frightened by slanderous chatter. No newspaper man pays any attention to it. He knows that whenever he writes praise he is acclaimed as a very Solomon of wisdom, unerring, discriminating and unshakable in his honesty.

But when he is compelled to declare that some singer or player or conductor has done something which he knows to be inartistic or inadequate he will be charged by the friends and adherents of the artist with sinister motives. Editors have precisely the same experience. Their politics are of the loftiest type so long as they are those of the politician who is favored by them. They are otherwise utterly dishonest and untrustworthy.

No one is fooled by the methods which have been described herein. When critics assert that Mr. Stransky has no feeling for certain classic composers, and that he conducts their works as if he were walking in his sleep, only those whose business it is to uphold this conductor in all matters take umbrage and utter plaints of outraged spirits.

Without any question, comment on the interpretations of this conductor will be made next season without the slightest consideration of the industrious campaign of abuse carried on in the season now ending. Any musical editor who could be swayed by such influence would deserve to be discharged on the ground of unfitness for his business.

Meanwhile it may be added that much of the bitterness could be removed from the campaign by a very simple process. If the newspapers will stop praising the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Muck much will be forgiven. But so long as Dr. Muck persists in being the best concert conductor in the country and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in being the best concert orchestra in the world it is unlikely that the newspapers—barring all

[illegible]ning Post

[163]

From the
March 26, 1917.
Transcript

... the Symphony Orchestra is Most a Virtuoso Orchestra—The Singer in New Revelation of a Voice at Zenith and of Widening and Ripening Skill in Song—The Limitations That She Might Readily Widen—The Violoncellist in Novel Pieces—Among Them Mr. Loeffler's "Spanish Poem"—Mrs. Casals in New and Old Quality

WHEN the Symphony Orchestra plays a piece like Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice" and makes it prismatic with tonal color, or like the overture to Smetana's opera, "The Bartered Bride," till it snaps, but never breaks, with pace and rhythm, it is a formula of reviewing to call the band a "virtuoso orchestra." Yet as a matter of fact, it is more truly so when it is playing such pieces as Bloch's "Jewish Poems" or Brahms's second concerto for pianoforte in the fashion in which it played them on Saturday. More than once, for example, in the "Poems" of "Dance" or "Rite," Mr. Bloch sends a significant phrase or succession of phrases slithering across the whole orchestra from choir through choir and from instrumental group through instrumental group within those choirs. Such sleight-of-hand—for the phrase of conjuring suits better the process than any other—the orchestra accomplishes as in a single swift flash of tone, yet in the flash are distinguishable all the contrasts of color or the composer would so give to the measures that he launches from his shrilling violins to his deep-voiced brasses, while the screen-like web of the music is never parted. Again, in the third of the "Poems" called "Funeral Procession," Mr. Bloch, zealous to express a barbaric frenzy of grief, piles shrieking dissonance upon shrieking dissonance until the music almost cracks with wild furies of lament. It would have cracked, perhaps, were it not for the skill with which conductor and orchestra sustained it when to the casual ear it seemed no more than piercing din reiterated. Indeed, the practice of modern and ultra-modern composers has developed in the orchestras frequently playing their music a new virtuosity of dissonance that may in time stand beside the elder qualities of euphony, sustained phrases, rhythmic verve and the like.

Thirty years of divided opinion have spattered Brahms's concerto with many epithets, but none in praise or scorn has labelled it a "displayful" music. Yet in all the show-pieces of Dr. Muck and his men does their virtuosity in the finer senses of the word rise higher than in the shadowy color that clarinets, horns and the whole wood-wind and string choirs with them shed over the windings of the twilit melody through the slow movement? Here is no color of timbre and color of harmony, staring the players in the face as in the "Spanish Caprice" aforesaid or in Chabrier's "España." Rather they must be distilled out of the music by penetrating intelligence and responsive sensibility. So, again, with the streaming progressions of the Allegro Appassionato or the rhythmical return of the motives of the Finale. Take them as so much music-making in Brahms's calculating fashion and an orchestra may do no more than make its way through them, Stransky-wise. But infuse into them the incisiveness of tone and the ardor of movement that Dr. Muck and the orchestra imparted at both concerts and straightway they become thrilling to hear. Lack of definite contours that ear and mind may readily follow has been long-standing reproach to the first movement of the concerto, but this obscurity of outline, as it now appears, is less a shortcoming of Brahms as he wrote the music than of many an orchestra, conductor and pianist as they have played it. Neither on Friday nor on Saturday had any fairly acute and practised listener reason to lose the place. Now so to illuminate a music that readily clouds itself is a virtuosity in those that play it far transcending a super-fleetness through the racing measures of Smetana's overture. In all these things, especially on Saturday, Mr. Friedberg was worthy co-partner with Dr. Muck and his men; but it is one of the "vices" of the concerto-form (as our scornful and superior youngsters are eager to point out) that the "soloist" must seem to receive and to take the applause that the audience is lavishing upon the whole effect of a remarkably fused and vitalizing performance. Yet there have been "soloists" at the Symphony Concerts that less deserved this seeming singling-out than did Mr. Friedberg.

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York City

Date

Karl Muck Conducts Liszt's Faust Symphony

The audience at the Boston Symphony's fifth concert at Carnegie Hall last evening was treated to "A Faust Symphony in Three Character Pictures (after Goethe)." This diverse but colorful gallery of etchings is in three parts:

I. Faust. Lento assai. Allegro impetuoso. Allegro. Agitato ed appassionata.

II. Gretchen. Andante soave.

III. Mephistopheles. Allegro vivace ironico.

Final chorus. "Alles vergangliche." Andante mistico.

Liszt's orchestral skill and weirdly wild thematic invention are very evident in this symphony.

A large male chorus accompanied Arthur Hackett, tenor, in the "Alles vergangliche."

Mr. Hackett has a pleasing legato voice and articulates well, but the pronunciation of his German could be improved.

The audience was large and enthusiastic in their approval.

FROM THE GLOBE 3/11/17.

Symphony Orchestra Away

There will be no Symphony concerts this week, for the orchestra will be away on its fifth and last trip of the season to the South. The usual concerts will be given, with Elena Gerhardt soloist in Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore and Joseph Malkin soloist in Brooklyn. Thursday night, in New York, Liszt's "Faust" Symphony will be given, with no other number on the program. The male chorus, with Arthur Hackett as solo tenor, will leave Boston Thursday noon and will return at midnight. At the Saturday afternoon concert in New York Messrs Witek and Warnke will play the Brahms Double Concerto, which they played here a fortnight ago.

Pension Fund Concert

The second concert in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, April 1. For the first time the public will have a chance to observe Dr Muck as a conductor of choral work. So far since he has been in Boston his choral work has been limited to incidental choruses in symphonies such as the "Faust" symphony performed the past week.

At this pension fund concert there will be a large chorus recruited in Harvard University and Radcliffe College. The basis of the chorus is the Radcliffe Choral Society and Harvard University Glee Club, which have been trained by Dr Davison. With the orchestra this chorus will give Brahms's "Schicksal Lied," which has not been heard in Boston for many years. The chorus will also sing a capella a Motet by Bach. The second part of the program will be devoted entirely to excerpts from the music dramas of Wagner.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City

MAR 10

What Stirred Boston

DR. MUCK and his orchestra will come to New York next Thursday to perform Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, with which Dr. Muck has repeatedly ... a sensation in the Hub. A male chorus of eighty voices will be brought specially from Boston. The basis of this chorus, which has already sung the "Faust" Symphony twice in Boston, is made up of members of the Chorale Music Society of Boston, and the chorus was prepared by Stephen S. Townsend, conductor of that society. The tenor solos will be sung by Arthur Hackett. Dr. Muck will use the revised version of the symphony which he alone in this country possesses. The revisions were made by Liszt in the last years of his life, and the original score containing them is in the library of Wahnfried in Bayreuth.

LIFE

From

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

Musical Comment.

LALO is almost a composer of one work as far as our concert-halls are concerned. With the single exception of the "Sinfonie Espagnole" the works of this Frenchman are but little known, though in his long life he produced much, and successfully. Dr. Muck, however, to accommodate the needs of Mr. Malkan played the D Minor Concerto for 'cello and orchestra and found in it a vehicle that gave full technical opportunity to the 'cellist and probably for that reason much pleasure to the audience. To the more critical, however, it is not difficult to discover why the work languishes. It is a concerto only in name; in reality it is a solo for the 'cello with the entire orchestra as nothing more than an accompanying body. Mr. Malkan had full opportunity to display his powers, an opportunity that disclosed him as a 'cellist of no mean parts but without the heaven-sent gift that should distinguish the soloist. In taking his soloist from the ranks of the orchestra Dr. Muck saves money and time, but scarcely gives his subscribers what they think they have paid for. But then perhaps he wanted to give the Lalo work a hearing and could find no other 'cellist so fond of its suave and at times mawkish nature as to be persuaded to play it. Such things we cannot speak of with certainty; they lie in the deepest recesses of the minds of the gods, and we have not the necessary clairvoyant powers.

DISMISSING the Lalo with just this word and passing over the Goldmark overture, "Spring," we come to the great joy of the concert, if not of Dr. Muck's series in Brooklyn—the playing of the "Eroica." The comparative merits of the local orchestras have been discussed at considerable length recently in a certain New York newspaper and this discussion has revolved around their playing of the classics.

Our kindest advice is that all might go to the shrine of Boston and hear how Dr. Muck and his band play the Third Symphony of Beethoven. Friday evening the work took on new significance under Dr. Muck's magic. The beauties of the work—and how many they are musical enthusiasts have been vainly endeavoring to tell for the past hundred years—were revealed in all their glory. Every movement was a joy and yet the whole was welded together in a unity that should, but unfortunately does not, mark its every performance. In majesty and in splendor the noble thoughts of the greatest of symphonists were proclaimed.

TO pick out the high-water marks of the readings would be difficult, but for the inevitable contrast with other performances we have heard recently. The robust humor of the Scherzo needs what only Dr. Muck has been able to give it, a variety of dynamics reaching from the gentlest of pianissimos to the loudest proclamation of a fortissimo. In the graduating of the orchestral tone, in the rhythmic precision of the band's playing Dr. Muck found the full expression of the composition's meaning. Beethoven was, if ever, treading the heights of immortality.

m EVENING SUN
ress: Baltimore, Md.
3/10/17. MAR 1

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, will give the last of its current season's concerts at the Lyric next Wednesday evening, when the soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished lieder singer.

The orchestra will play Mozart's symphony in C major, popularly known as the "Jupiter Symphony," of which it is said that it is a composition strictly classical in form, but entirely modern in content.

The second orchestral number will be Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan." The final number will be Goldmark's brilliant overture "In the Spring."

Miss Gerhardt will sing two groups of songs; the first will be four songs with orchestra by Beethoven, "Wonne der Wehmut," "Die Trommel geruhret," "Freudvoll und Leidvoll" and "Die Ehre des Gottes in der Natur." The second and third of these are from the music written by Beethoven for Goethe's "Egmont." For her second number she will sing three songs, with orchestra, by Hugo Wolf.

From the
Herald
March 18, 1917.

18TH SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The 18th Symphony program of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will present an important novelty by the Swiss composer, Ernest Bloch; three Jewish poems for full orchestra. Bloch, who is a Swiss Jew, has devoted much of his time to the traditional music of his race. He is one of the younger men of great talent, and has been in this country for the past season. At its extra concert last winter the Flonzaley quartet played a quartet of his which excited much interest. The titles of the poems are "Danse," "Rite" and "Cortege Funebre." Dr. Muck has invited Mr. Bloch to conduct his own works, and Mr. Bloch has accepted the invitation. The soloist at this concert will be Carl Friedberg, who has already been heard here. He will play Brahms's second concerto for pianoforte in B flat, opus. 83. The program in its entirety is Sinigaglia's overture to Goldoni's "Le Baruffe Chiozotte." Bloch's three Jewish poems for orchestra, and the concerto, No. 2.

7TH CAMBRIDGE CONCERT

The seventh Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given next Thursday evening. Carl Friedberg, pianist, will be the soloist. The program comprises the "Jupiter" Symphony of Mozart; the concerto for piano by Schumann and the introduction and Bacchanale from the first act of the Paris version of "Tannhaeuser."

n AMERICAN
lress: Baltimore, Md.
MAR 11 1917

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The last appearance of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, March 14, at 8.15.

Again Dr. Muck has made a program full of delight for the lover of music. Again there will be a soloist of high distinction, in this case Elena Gerhardt, the concert soprano, who has long been a favorite in this city.

Dr. Muck begins his program with the immortal Jupiter symphony of Mozart.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau
News
rom Providence, R. I.
Address:
Date MAR 31

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra brings its thirty-fourth season of concerts in Providence to an end Tuesday evening, April 10th, with its sixth concert of the year in Infantry Hall. The concerts of the past season have been in the opinion of all unusually brilliant. Dr. Muck has been very happy in his choice of programs and the Orchestra has displayed all those qualities of virtuosity which make it famous. In his review of the current season of orchestral concerts in New York, in the New York Sun last Sunday, March 25th, W. J. Henderson remarked that Dr. Muck is the greatest concert conductor in the country and that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the greatest concert orchestra in the world. Never has the Orchestra been on such a solid foundation as it is today.

The program which Dr. Muck has arranged for this concert contains three works. These are the immortal "Jupiter" Symphony of Mozart, Rubinstein's great Concerto for Piano and Orchestra in D-Minor and the Introduction and Bacchanale from the first act of the Paris version of "Tannhauser."

The soloist will be that very remarkable English pianist, Ethel Leginska, who has already had great success in this city.

The sale of seats opens at Seddon's News Stand, Butler Exchange, next Saturday morning, April 7th.

[104]

HERALD
ess: New York City
MAR 16

Hear Boston Orchestra and Choir.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its last concert of the Thursday series in Carnegie Hall last night. It seemed too bad to have a final concert devoted entirely to one symphony, even though it was Liszt's great Faust symphony. New York has had a surfeit of Liszt, and to have one hour and twenty-five minutes of his symphonic music without an intermission was a little too much for some persons. But the performance was so fine that even anti-Lisztians were compelled to pay homage to Dr. Muck's reading.

Arthur Hackett, tenor, and a chorus of eighty men's voices trained by Stephen S. Townsend came with the orchestra from Boston to show that other forms of musical art besides orchestral flourish there. The chous sang with beautiful tone, finely controlled, and with delightful clearness of enunciation. Mr. Hackett has a rich vibrant voice, which rang out triumphantly and added much to the dramatic effectiveness of the chorus.

EVENING SUN.
Baltimore, Md.
MAR 15 191

Among those noticed in the audience at the last of the season's Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at the Lyric yesterday evening were Judge and Mrs. Allan McLane, Doctor and Mrs. Charles O'Donovan, Professor and Mrs. Henry Wood, Mr. and Mrs. Harold Randolph, Doctor and Mrs. J. H. Mason Knox, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Edward H. McKeon, Mr. and Mrs. Peter P. Blanchard, Mr. and Mrs. Wyatt W. Randall, Mrs. Francis T. Redwood, Mrs. Edgar Allan Poe, Mrs. James Teackle Dennis, Colonel and Mrs. John Hinkley, Mrs. W. Bladen Lowndes, Miss Beverly James, Miss Josephine C. Morris, Miss Emily B. Randall, Miss Katharine B. Randall, Mrs. Clinton P. Paine, Mrs. Edward Athelstan Marshall, Miss Nancy W. B. Brewster, Miss Mary G. Morton, Mr. George May, Mr. Alfred Jenkins Shriver, Mr. M. Ernest Jenkins, M. Robertson Griswold, Mr. Henry W. Williams, Mr. R. Gordon Williams, Mr. J. B. Noel Wyatt, Mr. William F. Lucas, Jr., Mr. Edward A. Robinson and Mr. Richard H. Bayard.

These concerts are among the most popular of the season's musical events, and are always largely attended by the members of society.

From the
Post
March 31, 1917

DR. MUCK AS PLAYER AND CONDUCTOR

Directs Handel's Concerto While Seated at Piano

BY OLIN DOWNES

Some wondered at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall at the presence of a piano on the stage. The programme indicated only the appearance of Joseph Malkin, 'cellist of the orchestra, as soloist.

The audience was still wondering when Dr. Muck seated himself at the instrument, and in the capacity of the "capellmeister" of the 18th and early 19th century directed the performance.

DOING AS HANDEL DID

When his intention was percieved a wave of applause, swept through the hall. But Dr. Muck was only doing what conductors of other days did both in the concert hall and the opera house and in doing this he was in entire accord with the spirit of Handel's time. It might be said, however, that if Dr. Muck were intent on fulfilling all chronological requirements, we should have had a harpsichord, or at least a modified harpsichord, such as the one Gustave Mahler played on when he conducted an orchestral concert in Boston several season's ago.

However, in conducting from the "thorough-bass" of Handel and in reducing the orchestra to the proportions of Handel's time for the concerto grosso he did much to make a pleasant and relatively informal diversion of a highly artistic character in a smphony concert. After the performance the leader and the little orchestra bowed their acknowledgement of the applause.

Given First Hearings

The other music on the programme was the Haydn Symphony in C major, (Reiter-Biedermann, No. 3); a ballet suite of music arranged by Hermann Kretzschmar from Rameau's "Acanthe et Cephise" and "Platee." These pieces were played for the first time at these concerts and Dvorak's violincello concerto in B minor, op. 104, played by Mr. Malkin.

Mr. Malkin played with a tone of much sonority—it is no doubt impossible to play the 'cello with an orchestra without that snarl and whine that true enthusiasts and cognoscenti call a "real 'cello tone." Mr. Malkin played, then, with admirable art, a work which is deadly dull. His pure intonation, his exceptional virtuosity and expressive singing of melodic passages, commended him highly to the audience.

Haydn's Symphony is one of the works that run so evenly though pleasingly in a regular routine that the hearer knows what is coming, whatever the movement. One may except that naive passage after the "grand pause" of the last movement. Haydn had thus his little joke, and entertained the audience, which was his purpose when he wrote symphonies.

A concert of what one might call confirmed classicism, of which the high light, musically speaking, was the dances orchestrated by Mr. Kretzschmar. And the oldest music heard was the Dvorak concerto, which, in point of mere time, is some century and a half more recent than the music of Handel and Rameau.

FROM THE MONITOR MARCH 31, 1917

At the pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given tomorrow afternoon in Symphony Hall, with Karl Muck conducting, a chorus from Radcliffe College and Harvard University will assist. John P. Marshall, organist, will take part with the violin section of the orchestra in an arrangement of a sonata of Rheinberger for organ and violin solo. The program is as follows:

Rheinberger, theme and variations for violin and organ, op. 150; Bach, motet, "I Wrestle and Pray"; Wagner, prelude to "Tristan and Isolde"; Brahms, "Song of Destiny"; Wagner, prelude to "Parsifal"; selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung," funeral music from "Gotterdammerung," overture to "Tannhauser."

From the
March 26, 1917.
Transcript

When the Symphony Orchestra is Most a Virtuoso Orchestra—The Singer in New Revelation of a Voice at Zenith and of Widening and Ripening Skill in Song—The Limitations That She Might Readily Widen—The Violoncellist in Novel Pieces—Among Them Mr. Loeffler's "Spanish Poem"—Mrs. Casals in New and Old Quality

WHEN the Symphony Orchestra plays a piece like Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice" and makes it prismatic with tonal color, or like the overture to Smetana's opera, "The Bartered Bride," till it snaps, but never breaks, with pace and rhythm, it is a formula of reviewing to call the band a "virtuoso orchestra." Yet as a matter of fact, it is more truly so when it is playing such pieces as Bloch's "Jewish Poems" or Brahms's second concerto for pianoforte in the fashion in which it played them on Saturday. More than once, for example, in the "Poems" of "Dance" or "Rite," Mr. Bloch sends a significant phrase or succession of phrases slithering across the whole orchestra from choir through choir and from instrumental group through instrumental group within those choirs. Such sleight-of-hand—for the phrase of conjuring suits better the process than any other—the orchestra accomplishes as in a single swift flash of tone, yet in the flash are distinguishable all the contrasts of color the composer would so give to the measures that he launches from his shrilling violins to his deep-voiced brasses, while the screen-like web of the music is never parted. Again, in the third of the "Poems" called "Funeral Procession," Mr. Bloch, zealous to express a barbaric frenzy of grief, piles shrieking dissonance upon shrieking dissonance until the music almost cracks with wild furies of lament. It would have cracked, perhaps, were it not for the skill with which conductor and orchestra sustained it when to the casual ear it seemed no more than piercing din reiterated. Indeed, the practice of modern and ultra-modern composers has developed in the orchestras frequently playing their music a new virtuosity of dissonance that may in time stand beside the elder qualities of euphony, sustained phrases, rhythmic verve and the like.

Thirty years of divided opinion have spattered Brahms's concerto with many epithets, but none in praise or scorn has labelled it a "displayful" music. Yet in all the show-pieces of Dr. Muck and his men does their virtuosity in the finer senses of the word rise higher than in the shadowy color that clarinets, horns and the whole wood-wind and string choirs with them shed over the windings of the twilit melody through the slow movement? Here is no color of timbre and color of harmony, staring the players in the face as in the "Spanish Caprice" aforesaid or in Chabrier's "España." Rather they must be distilled out of the music by penetrating intelligence and responsive sensibility. So, again, with the streaming progressions of the Allegro Appassionato or the rhythmical return of the motives of the Finale. Take them as so much music-making in Brahms's calculating fashion and an orchestra may do no more than make its way through them, Stransky-wise. But infuse into them the incisiveness of tone and the ardor of movement that Dr. Muck and the orchestra imparted at both concerts and straightway they become thrilling to hear. Lack of definite contours that ear and mind may readily follow has been long-standing reproach to the first movement of the concerto, but this obscurity of outline, as it now appears, is less a shortcoming of Brahms as he wrote the music than of many an orchestra, conductor and pianist as they have played it. Neither on Friday nor on Saturday had any fairly acute and practised listener reason to lose the place. Now so to illuminate a music that readily clouds itself is a virtuosity in those that play it far transcending a super-fleetness through the racing measures of Smetana's overture. In all these things, especially on Saturday, Mr. Friedberg was worthy co-partner with Dr. Muck and his men; but it is one of the "vices" of the concerto-form (as our scornful and superior youngsters are eager to point out) that the "soloist" must seem to receive and to take the applause that the audience is lavishing upon the whole effect of a remarkably fused and vitalizing performance. Yet there have been "soloists" at the Symphony Concerts that less deserved this seeming singling-out than did Mr. Friedberg.

From EVENING MAIL
Address: New York City

Date

Karl Muck Conducts Liszt's Faust Symphony

The audience at the Boston Symphony's fifth concert at Carnegie Hall last evening was treated to "A Faust Symphony in Three Character Pictures (after Goethe)." This diverse but colorful gallery of etchings is in three parts:

I. Faust. Lento assai. Allegro impetuoso. Allegro. Agitato ed appassionata.

II. Gretchen. Andante soave.

III. Mephistopheles. Allegro vivace ironico.

Final chorus. "Alles vergangliche." Andante mistico.

Liszt's orchestral skill and weirdly wild thematic invention are very evident in this symphony.

A large male chorus accompanied Arthur Hackett, tenor, in the "Alles vergangliche."

Mr. Hackett has a pleasing legato voice and articulates well, but the pronunciation of his German could be improved.

The audience was large and enthusiastic in their approval.

FROM THE GLOBE 3/11/17.

Symphony Orchestra Away

There will be no Symphony concerts this week, for the orchestra will be away on its fifth and last trip of the season to the South. The usual concerts will be given, with Elena Gerhardt soloist in Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore and Joseph Malkin soloist in Brooklyn. Thursday night, in New York, Liszt's "Faust" Symphony will be given, with no other number on the program. The male chorus, with Arthur Hackett as solo tenor, will leave Boston Thursday noon and will return at midnight. At the Saturday afternoon concert in New York Messrs Witek and Warnke will play the Brahms Double Concerto, which they played here a fortnight ago.

Pension Fund Concert

The second concert in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, April 1. For the first time the public will have a chance to observe Dr Muck as a conductor of choral work. So far since he has been in Boston his choral work has been limited to incidental choruses in symphonies such as the "Faust" symphony performed the past week.

At this pension fund concert there will be a large chorus recruited in Harvard University and Radcliffe College. The basis of the chorus is the Radcliffe Choral Society and Harvard University Glee Club, which have been trained by Dr Davison. With the orchestra this chorus will give Brahms's "Schicksal Lied," which has not been heard in Boston for many years. The chorus will also sing a capella a Motet by Bach. The second part of the program will be devoted entirely to excerpts from the music dramas of Wagner.

From EVENING POST
Address: New York City

What Stirred Boston

DR. MUCK and his orchestra will come to New York next Thursday to perform Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, with which Dr. Muck has repeatedly ...

a sensation in the Hub. A male chorus of eighty voices will be brought specially from Boston. The basis of this chorus, which has already sung the "Faust" Symphony twice in Boston, is made up of members of the Chorale Music Society of Boston, and the chorus was prepared by Stephen S. Townsend, conductor of that society. The tenor solos will be sung by Arthur Hackett. Dr. Muck will use the revised version of the symphony which he alone in this country possesses. The revisions were made by Liszt in the last years of his life, and the original score containing them is in the library of Wahnfried in Bayreuth.

From LIFE
Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date

Musical Comment.

LALO is almost a composer of one work as far as our concert-halls are concerned. With the single exception of the "Sinfonie Espagnole" the works of this Frenchman are but little known, though in his long life he produced much, and successfully. Dr. Muck, however, to accommodate the needs of Mr. Malkan played the D Minor Concerto for 'cello and orchestra and found in it a vehicle that gave full technical opportunity to the 'cellist and probably for that reason much pleasure to the audience. To the more critical, however, it is not difficult to discover why the work languishes. It is a concerto only in name; in reality it is a solo for the 'cello with the entire orchestra as nothing more than an accompanying body. Mr. Malkan had full opportunity to display his powers, an opportunity that disclosed him as a 'cellist of no mean parts but without the heaven-sent gift that should distinguish the soloist. In taking his soloist from the ranks of the orchestra Dr. Muck saves money and time, but scarcely gives his subscribers what they think they have paid for. But then perhaps he wanted to give the Lalo work a hearing and could find no other 'cellist so fond of its suave and at times mawkish nature as to be persuaded to play it. Such things we cannot speak of with certainty; they lie in the deepest recesses of the minds of the gods, and we have not the necessary clairvoyant powers.

DISMISSING the Lalo with just this word and passing over the Goldmark overture, "Spring," we come to the great joy of the concert, if not of Dr. Muck's series in Brooklyn—the playing of the "Eroïca." The comparative merits of the local orchestras have been discussed at considerable length recently in a certain New York newspaper and this discussion has revolved around their playing of the classics.

Our kindest advice is that all might go to the shrine of Boston and hear how Dr. Muck and his band play the Third Symphony of Beethoven. Friday evening the work took on new significance under Dr. Muck's magic. The beauties of the work—and how many they are musical enthusiasts have been vainly endeavoring to tell for the past hundred years—were revealed in all their glory. Every movement was a joy and yet the whole was welded together in a unity that should, but unfortunately does not, mark its every performance. In majesty and in splendor the noble thoughts of the greatest of symphonists were proclaimed.

TO pick out the high-water marks of the readings would be difficult, but for the inevitable contrast with other performances we have heard recently. The robust humor of the Scherzo needs what only Dr. Muck has been able to give it, a variety of dynamics reaching from the gentlest of pianissimos to the loudest proclamation of a fortissimo. In the graduating of the orchestral tone, in the rhythmic precision of the band's playing Dr. Muck found the full expression of the composition's meaning. Beethoven was, if ever, treading the heights of immortality.

m EVENING SUN
lress: Baltimore, Md.
3/10/17. MAR 1

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Karl Muck, will give the last of its current season's concerts at the Lyric next Wednesday evening, when the soloist will be Elena Gerhardt, the distinguished lieder singer.

The orchestra will play Mozart's symphony in C major, popularly known as the "Jupiter Symphony," of which it is said that it is a composition strictly classical in form, but entirely modern in content.

The second orchestral number will be Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan." The final number will be Goldmark's brilliant overture "In the Spring."

Miss Gerhardt will sing two groups of songs; the first will be four songs with orchestra by Beethoven, "Wonne der Wehmut," "Die Trommel geruhret," "Freudvoll und Leidvoll" and "Die Ehre des Gottes in der Natur." The second and third of these are from the music written by Beethoven for Goethe's "Egmont." For her second number she will sing three songs, with orchestra, by Hugo Wolf.

From the
Herald
March 18.1917.

18TH SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The 18th Symphony program of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will present an important novelty by the Swiss composer, Ernest Bloch; three Jewish poems for full orchestra. Bloch, who is a Swiss Jew, has devoted much of his time to the traditional music of his race. He is one of the younger men of great talent, and has been in this country for the past season. At its extra concert last winter the Flonzaley quartet played a quartet of his which excited much interest. The titles of the poems are "Danse," "Rite" and "Cortege Funebre." Dr. Muck has invited Mr. Bloch to conduct his own works, and Mr. Bloch has accepted the invitation. The soloist at this concert will be Carl Friedberg, who has already been heard here. He will play Brahms's second concerto for pianoforte in B flat, opus. 83. The program in its entirety is Sinigaglia's overture to Goldoni's "Le Baruffe Chiozotte." Bloch's three Jewish poems for orchestra, and the concerto, No. 2.

7TH CAMBRIDGE CONCERT

The seventh Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given next Thursday evening. Carl Friedberg, pianist, will be the soloist. The program comprises the "Jupiter" Symphony of Mozart; the concerto for piano by Schumann and the introduction and Bacchanale from the first act of the Paris version of "Tannhaeuser."

n AMERICAN
lress: Baltimore, Md.

MAR 11 1917

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The last appearance of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, March 14, at 8.15.

Again Dr. Muck has made a program full of delight for the lover of music. Again there will be a soloist of high distinction, in this case Elena Gerhardt, the concert soprano, who has long been a favorite in this city.

Dr. Muck begins his program with the immortal Jupiter symphony of Mozart.

Newspaper Cutting Bureau ...
News

rom Providence, R. I.
ddress:
Date 3/1

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra brings its thirty-fourth season of concerts in Providence to an end Tuesday evening, April 10th, with its sixth concert of the year in Infantry Hall. The concerts of the past season have been in the opinion of all unusually brilliant. Dr. Muck has been very happy in his choice of programs and the Orchestra has displayed all those qualities of virtuosity which make it famous. In his review of the current season of orchestral concerts in New York, in the New York Sun last Sunday, March 25th, W. J. Henderson remarked that Dr. Muck is the greatest concert conductor in the country and that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the greatest concert orchestra in the world. Never has the Orchestra been on such a solid foundation as it is today.

The program which Dr. Muck has arranged for this concert contains three works. These are the immortal "Jupiter" Symphony of Mozart, Rubinstein's great Concerto for Piano and Orchestra in D-Minor and the Introduction and Bacchanale from the first act of the Paris version of "Tannhauser."

The soloist will be that very remarkable English pianist, Ethel Leginska, who has already had great success in this city.

The sale of seats opens at Seddon's News Stand, Butler Exchange, next Saturday morning, April 7th.

[104]

HERALD
ess: New York City
MAR 16 1

Hear Boston Orchestra and Choir.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its last concert of the Thursday series in Carnegie Hall last night. It seemed too bad to have a final concert devoted entirely to one symphony, even though it was Liszt's great Faust symphony. New York has had a surfeit of Liszt, and to have one hour and twenty-five minutes of his symphonic music without an intermission was a little too much for some persons. But the performance was so fine that even anti-Lisztians were compelled to pay homage to Dr. Muck's reading.

Arthur Hackett, tenor, and a chorus of eighty men's voices trained by Stephen S. Townsend came with the orchestra from Boston to show that other forms of musical art besides orchestral flourish there. The chous sang with beautiful tone, finely controlled, and with delightful clearness of enunciation. Mr. Hackett has a rich vibrant voice, which rang out triumphantly and added much to the dramatic effectiveness of the chorus.

EVENING SUN.
Baltimore, Md.
MAR 15 191

Among those noticed in the audience at the last of the season's Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at the Lyric yesterday evening were Judge and Mrs. Allan McLane, Doctor and Mrs. Charles O'Donovan, Professor and Mrs. Henry Wood, Mr. and Mrs. Harold Randolph, Doctor and Mrs. J. H. Mason Knox, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Edward H. McKeon, Mr. and Mrs. Peter P. Blanchard, Mr. and Mrs. Wyatt W. Randall, Mrs. Francis T. Redwood, Mrs. Edgar Allan Poe, Mrs. James Teackle Dennis, Colonel and Mrs. John Hinkley, Mrs. W. Bladen Lowndes, Miss Beverly James, Miss Josephine C. Morris, Miss Emily B. Randall, Miss Katharine B. Randall, Mrs. Clinton P. Paine, Mrs. Edward Athelstan Marshall, Miss Nancy W. B. Brewster, Miss Mary G. Morton, Mr. George May, Mr. Alfred Jenkins Shriver, Mr. M. Ernest Jenkins, M. Robertson Griswold, Mr. Henry W. Williams, Mr. R. Gordon Williams, Mr. J. B. Noel Wyatt, Mr. William F. Lucas, Jr., Mr. Edward A. Robinson and Mr. Richard H. Bayard.

These concerts are among the most popular of the season's musical events, and are always largely attended by the members of society.

From the
Post
MARCH 31, 1917

DR. MUCK AS PLAYER AND CONDUCTOR

Directs Handel's Concerto While Seated at Piano

BY OLIN DOWNES

Some wondered at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall at the presence of a piano on the stage. The programme indicated only the appearance of Joseph Malkin, 'cellist of the orchestra, as soloist.

The audience was still wondering when Dr. Muck seated himself at the instrument, and in the capacity of the "capellmeister" of the 18th and early 19th century directed the performance.

DOING AS HANDEL DID

When his intention was percieved a wave of applause, swept through the hall. But Dr. Muck was only doing what conductors of other days did both in the concert hall and the opera house and in doing this he was in entire accord with the spirit of Handel's time. It might be said, however, that if Dr. Muck were intent on fulfilling all chronological requirements, we should have had a harpsichord, or at least a modified harpsichord, such as the one Gustave Mahler played on when he conducted an orchestral concert in Boston several season's ago.

However, in conducting from the "thorough-bass" of Handel and in reducing the orchestra to the proportions of Handel's time for the concerto grosso he did much to make a pleasant and relatively informal diversion of a highly artistic character in a smphony concert. After the performance the leader and the little orchestra bowed their acknowledgement of the applause.

Given First Hearings

The other music on the programme was the Haydn Symphony in C major, (Reiter-Biedermann, No. 3); a ballet suite of music arranged by Hermann Kretzschmar from Rameau's "Acanthe et Cephise" and "Platee." These pieces were played for the first time at these concerts and Dvorak's violincello concerto in B minor, op. 104, played by Mr. Malkin.

Mr. Malkin played with a tone of much sonority—it is no doubt impossible to play the 'cello with an orchestra without that snarl and whine that true enthusiasts and cognoscenti call a "real 'cello tone." Mr. Malkin played, then, with admirable art, a work which is deadly dull. His pure intonation, his exceptional virtuosity and expressive singing of melodic passages, commended him highly to the audience.

Haydn's Symphony is one of the works that run so evenly though pleasingly in a regular routine that the hearer knows what is coming, whatever the movement. One may except that naive passage after the "grand pause" of the last movement. Haydn had thus his little joke, and entertained the audience, which was his purpose when he wrote symphonies.

A concert of what one might call confirmed classicism, of which the high light, musically speaking, was the dances orchestrated by Mr. Kretzschmar. And the oldest music heard was the Dvorak concerto, which, in point of mere time, is some century and a half more recent than the music of Handel and Rameau.

FROM THE MONITOR MARCH 31, 1917

At the pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given tomorrow afternoon in Symphony Hall, with Karl Muck conducting, a chorus from Radcliffe College and Harvard University will assist. John P. Marshall, organist, will take part with the violin section of the orchestra in an arrangement of a sonata of Rheinberger for organ and violin solo. The program is as follows:

Rheinberger, theme and variations for violin and organ, op. 150; Bach, motet, "I Wrestle and Pray"; Wagner, prelude to "Tristan and Isolde"; Brahms, "Song of Destiny"; Wagner, prelude to "Parsifal," selections from "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung," funeral music from "Götterdämmerung," overture to "Tannhäuser."

From the TRANSCRIPT MARCH 31, 1917

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

EIGHTEENTH-CENTURY MUSIC AND A SURPRISE

Dr. Muck as Pianist-Conductor in the Ancient Fashion—The Similarities and the Contrasts of Seldom-Heard Haydn, Rameau and Haendel—Dvorak's Concerto for Violoncello as Postlude with Mr. Malkin

NOBODY, unless very young and courageous, dares venture comparison and contrast between the audiences of Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings at the Symphony Concerts. Yet the listeners by day have one advantage over the listeners by night. Surprises are not common in the course of the concerts wherein all things are usually pre-considered and foreordained; but when a surprise does come, as it did yesterday afternoon, only the public of Friday receives the full pleasure of it. Though no pianist was announced for the concert, a pianoforte stood on the stage, easy to account for as substitute of harpsichord in the eighteenth-century music of Rameau or Händel that the programme proposed. The Parisian, however, made no use of it; but when the Londoner's Concerto Grosso for strings was at hand, it was trundled into the space between the two choirs of violins usually occupied by the conductor's stand. Then, for new sensation to an audience in lively speculation, Dr. Muck seated himself at the piano, back toward the listeners, to play the harpsichord part—the running bass of continuo—and lead the band in the fashion of composers from Händel's time and earlier through Mozart's and Haydn's.

From the beginning of the concert, the house, as often of late, had quickly seized every opportunity to applaud the conductor. Now it clapped him so long and heartily that he had to rise from his new place and acknowledge as warm an expression of pleasure and good will as he has ever received in Symphony Hall. Forthwith he and the string choirs set to Händel's Concerto, with Dr. Muck beating the measure with his right hand whenever the key board did not require both. There is a written piano part for the piece, though often the eighteenth-century composers left it blank or merely jotted an indication here and there that they might improvise at will upon their harpsichords. To keep to their custom, Dr. Muck in turn occasionally devised ornament or filling of his own; while the whole scene recalled contemporary prints of such "concerts" in the seventeenth and the eighteenth centuries or a similar incident when Mahler was the conductor of the Philharmonic Society in New York and so led from a modernized harpsichord in a suite by Bach.

Justly Dr. Muck believes that eighteenth-century pieces lose intrinsic quality and distinctive savor, when played in too close contact with the matter and the manners of later music. Accordingly, he isolated in the first part of his programme, a symphony of Haydn in C major, written in 1788; a suite of dances compiled from two of the pièces d'occasion of Rameau's final years (1745-51); and a Concerto Grosso in D minor by Händel, first heard in London in 1739. All three have lain long overlooked in the library of the orchestra, after a single performance in its early days. The symphony and the Concerto Grosso proved characteristic of the composer of each, as twentieth-century ears hear and place his music. But it was a pity in a way that the six dances of Rameau came mainly from a certain "heroic pastoral" called "Acanthe et Céphisse" after the mythological and pseudo-classical fashion of his time and commissioned for an entertainment at court, with one added out of a "Ballet Bouffon," entitled "Platée" that the composer wrote in the days when Italian opera buffa had caught the Parisian ear, split the town into factional quarrel over merits and demerits, and prompted French composers to imitation in their own manner.

A happier choice might, perhaps, have assembled a few dances from the earlier operas, written when Rameau had his way to make and was using to utmost a command of long-breathed phrase, vigorous rhythm, modulation, color, and a force and candor of style novel to a time which cherished musical conventions though in the theatre they were already diluted into affectations. Audibly, yet not too characteristically, this more sonorous, striding, innovating Rameau spoke out of the minuet, in the voice of the ancient and respected hurdy-gurdy, from the minuet in "Platée." Few illustrious composers of the eighteenth century are less known to American ears than Rameau. The more, then, does he deserve in his rare return to our concert-rooms, his most characteristic voice. As for a reproduction of one of his operas, who dare suggest such a thing, even to the scholarly and experimenting Mr. Gatti. Paris itself neglected "Hippolyte et Aricie," when the Opéra, some years ago, resurrected it.

Not too mindful of the far-flung antiquarian knowledge that attends such revivals of seldom-heard eighteenth-century pieces, the audience heard them with the quick, keen, easy pleasure that it invariably takes in the transparent qualities of this ancient music, as Dr. Muck and the orchestra artfully and astutely play it. Wisely content with the agreeable sensations of the moment, the hearer leaves to the theorists and the technicians the difficult problem of tonal quality and balance when the full string choir of a modern orchestra plays music designed for a little band of such instruments, with supplementary wind voices among which Rameau, in his Paris of 1751, was innovatingly setting clarinets and horns, "kindly lent" by a fermier-general rich and curious enough to afford them. Beyond question the weight of string tone that violins, violas, violoncellos and double basses—a full forty, fifty or sixty in an orchestra of 1917—give to a symphony by Mozart or Haydn, is alien to the music as the composer conceived it and must usually be matched, if balance and euphony are to remain intact, by proportionate "doubling" in the wind choir.

Even so, however acute the ear of the conductor and the fingers and the lips of the players, the sheer volume of tone does perceptibly thicken the arabesques and blunt the finer modulations. With any other orchestra it tends, again perceptibly, to stay pace and dull rhythm; but under Dr. Muck, our band, as it proved once more yesterday in Haydn's symphony, has gained a rare fleetness, lightness, lucidity and luminosity with such music. Its tone answers to every inflection, yet flows unbroken, unroughened, unless the composer otherwise wills; its euphony is flawless; no gradation, no modulation baffles its finesse; its color is the shimmer of elegant watercolor. So it was that the audience had full delight of the lightly running and transparently distributed melodies of the first allegro with the full orchestra jutting in playful heaviness once and again within them; in the answering and mellifluous variations of the adante, with different choirs and single instruments proving their happy mettle; in the fancy that dapples occasionally the suavity of the minuet; in the racing returns and the flickering arabesques of the rondo-finale. Seldom heard Haydn, it is true, but altogether characteristic Haydn.

As it happened the Rameau of the dances from "Acanthe et Céphisse" was of clear kin to the later Haydn, though the Paris of his day had not yet begun to share the Ritter von Gluck with distant Vienna. Rameau in the dances, as Haydn in the symphony, was writing the music of their time—music to please their aristocratic patrons of Versailles or Esterhàz, their elegant audiences of "Concerts Spirituels," or courtly fetes; smiling music, transparent music, no more than crossed with melancholy or touched with sentiment; music that expressed itself in a little secluded world of design and ornament, devices and delicacies all its own, in which the composer disclosed himself chiefly as the well-kept means to an appointed end. Of course the vigorous and independent Rameau, like the still sturdier and quarrelsome Ritter von Gluck, could and did express himself in a very different way that in his earlier pieces laid foundation for the expressive declamation, the coördinated eloquence, the musico-dramatic quality that became and remain the virtues of true French opera, ancient style or modern style. But the Rameau of "Acanthe et Céphisse" was old and compliant, doing his job for a kindly court with pretty grace of melody, lightly springing rhythms and smoothly polished ornament, working, Haydn-like, in the fashions of the time and for the pleasure of his "august master." More of the real Rameau, who in spite of all these connections and compliances, could express himself and the faith that was in him in his music of the theatre, spoke out of the interpolated minuet from "Platée." There the tonal stream flowed more richly and warmly, in larger phrases, gathering themselves into long-spun, propulsive melody, in sturdier rhythm, in deeper color and more individual modulation; while throughout in the imitation of the ancient hurdy-gurdy was echo of the music of the folk in music that so was not wholly courtier-like.

Yet only in the Concerto Grosso of the three ancient pieces of the day did the listener feel the presence of a man as well as a composer behind and within the music. Of course Händel wrote in the fashion and for the public of his Georgian place and time. His music is pattern-making in tones, exercise in the interweaving, evolution and culmination of his melodic ideas, in the interplay of his assembled instruments in combination and contrast, unity and division, through the harmonies and the timbres of his day—and also of his own large imagining. But Händel was too rich an individuality, too full a personality, to stop at the mere confection of pleasurable and proper music, Haydn wise. Willy-nilly, the vigor and the splendor of him in spontaneous self-expression were bound to enter even into Concerti Grossi written primarily for the edification of the British nobility and gentry and for their guineas at the door of the theatre or in subscription to the published pieces. So throughout the particular piece of yesterday the music moves with a clear magnificence of declamation, in full-bodied line and broadly expanding phrase, in sumptuous harmonic and instrumental color, as color went anno domini 1739 for a limited group of instruments, with a large eloquence not merely of mood but of counterpoint, with a finely independent vigor of soul as well as speech. A man, living his own life of thought and fancy, work and play, in his own way, speaks out of the music, strides through it. Händel worked well for his noble patrons, but better, as in this very Concerto Grosso, for himself. He served them justly, but they did not subdue him into compliant Rameau (of "Acanthe et Céphisse") and timorous, mouse-like Haydn.

Dvoràk's concerto for violoncello and orchestra, revived anew that Mr. Malkin of the first desk might have his annual inning in a solo piece, filled the second part of the concert and in more interesting performance than it usually receives. The leader in the deed, as with the piano concerto of Brahms a week ago was Dr. Muck, anew finding the procedure most in accord with the music, and so vitalizing, characterizing, enhancing it. Again, and with like happy result, he treated a concerto—and much more a virtuoso concerto than is Brahms's—as a symphonic piece in which the "solo violoncello" is only a conspicuous and semi-pervasive instrument. So played, with acute choice of pace, keen alertness to rhythm, quick feeling for Dvoràk's simple melody, lively or wistful, and adroit sharpening of his modulation and shading of his color, the concerto took new character and fresh life as a piece of intrinsic and even engaging quality as well as of service to violoncello and violoncellist. The wistfulness, the sense of that which is distant, cherished and regretted, that haunts all the music that Dvoràk wrote during his exile in the United States fills the slow movement. No more in the bright-rhythmed finale or in the long and musing first movement is it ever far absent, while in the harmonic and instrumental color run the mingled softness and brightness of Dvoràk in his mature and fertile years and the intuition with telling modulation that served him better than scholarship. He accepts the inevitable bravura for the violoncello resignedly as one who would do a becoming and useful job with it; but he is interested, seemingly, only when the instrument becomes clear, true, heightening voice of his wistful song. Mr. Malkin fulfilled Dr. Muck's and, doubtless, his own understanding of the concerto, when he kept his tone a fine, bright strand in the web of the music. He fulfilled Dvoràk's purpose also when he made it the penetrating voice of the Czech's longing and the Czech's memories.

H. T. P.

From the ADVERTISER MARCH 31, 1917

SYMPHONY CONCERT IS CONSERVATIVE

Dr. Muck Reads Haydn in Masculine Fashion—Exquisitely Played

JOSEPH MALKIN IS THE SOLOIST

Conductor Surprises Audience by Taking Place at Piano—Strings Play Well

By LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAM.

Haydn.—Symphony in C major.
Rameau.—Ballet Suite.
Handel.—Concerto Grosso, in D major.
Dvorak.—Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra.

Soloist, Mr. Joseph Malkin.

Everything was safe, sane and conservative, in this concert of yesterday afternoon. The pendulum swung decidedly to the other end of the arc, and Liszt and Loeffler gave place to Handel, Haydn and ameau. It is just as well that the younger auditors at the concerts should hear something conservatively classical once in a while, if the course is to be really educational, but it is not exactly necessary to put all the eggs in one basket.

Dr. Muck reads Haydn in good masculine fashion and the old master is always brief enough not to wear out his welcome. Only the stereotyped Minuets and the rather attenuated slow movements verge on the "ennuyante," but the first and last movements are always genial and pleasant to hear.

The Symphony was exquisitely played, the variations of the Andante passing several of the instruments in solo review, the cellos playing in this with especial beauty, and the applause at the end of the work being enthusiastic.

But Haydn was musical confectionery, and Rameau in his Ballet Suite was more. Why this addition of Suite to the sweet? A modern work would have made a better contrast after Haydn. Rameau, by the way, was the party who stated, somewhere about 1722, that Music had made about every possible combination and was then moribund and could not bring forth anything new thereafter. Yet the works of Bach, Handel, Beethoven, Brahms, Wagner, and about every other Master came afterward. Nevertheless, Rameau himself made some rather charming new combinations and refuted his own theory. The rustic "Musette" which begins the Suite was daintily pastoral and gave the wood-wind good opportunities, which they made use of. Then, as if Haydn's Minuet had not been enough, we had two more Minuets, but their elegance was well-contrasted with the hearty jollity of the Rigaudon. The light and skipping Gavotte made another good contrast and an excellent Finale, making quite a complete concert, eight movements, in the olden style.

Then came a great surprise. The piano was moved to the front, head on to the orchestra, and Dr. Muck took his seat at it, just as Handel once used to do at the clavicembalo, or harpsichord, leading his men sometimes by playing the "continuo," sometimes leading with both hands, but generally beating time with his right hand and playing with his left, and playing gloriously well, too! It was in the old style, but with clavicembalo magnified into a concert grand and the few old viols grown into a full string orchestra, but it sounded magnificently and aroused tremendous enthusiasm. The old concerto has never been heard in this way in Boston before and it became a revelation.

Counterpoint has the advantage that, if it does not attract quite as readily, at a first hearing as homophony (harmonic construction), it does not so easily grow threadbare. A well-constructed contrapuntal work never grows old, and we are disposed to place many of Handel's compositions in this [illegible]. Besides, Handel was a radical in his time. He brought the horn into the orchestra, he was the first to employ the clarinette, he was the pioneer with contra-bassoons, he wrote bassoon passages as modern as Barlioz, in short he was the Richard Strauss, or possibly the Wagner of the middle of the 18th century. His Concerto Grosso contained no difficulties for our string orchestra and it was good music to listen to.

The strings played as if inspired by having their conductor thus become part of the working force of the orchestra, and every voice in the contrapuntal web could be followed easily; the balance was perfect, the ensemble wonderful.

The Meiningen Orchestra once used to play piano concerts with Bulow at the solo instrument and no conductor on the stand. That was regarded almost as a musical miracle; but after yesterday afternoon's surprise we feel sure that our Boston Symphony Orchestra could rival it.

At the end the conductor-pianist received an ovation and the orchestra was obliged to rise for the second time, the first having been after the Haydn Symphony.

And now, at last, there came some modern music as dessert to the banquet. Not your radical modern with mystifications in 16 different rhythms and no particular tonality, but a moderate modern who had not lost the art of melody nor his belief in symmetry.

The placing of the soloist at the end of the concert is a new idea. In the last concert Mr. Friedberg's excellent performance gave the benediction, and yesterday Mr. Malkin's splendid violoncello playing made an equally effective ending. Yet it is scarcely just to the soloist to put him in where his finale comes at the point where ladies are pinning on their hats and men are contemplating an immediate rush for their trolley car.

This concerto was written just before the composer left America. It suggests some of the American themes which Dvorak used (He composed them himself) in his "New World Symphony." He evidently found them here for they have neither negroes nor sea coasts in Bohemia. There was much reiteration of figures in the first movement ("the demon of development hath thee in thrall") and the movement began in the old-fashioned mode of causing the orchestra to announce the themes of the exposition before the violoncello is allowed to enter, giving a good chance for the solo-

From the HERALD MARCH 31, 1917.

HANDEL, HAYDN ARE FEATURED BY SYMPHONY

Former's Concerto Grosso in D Minor Is Given with Dr. Muck at the Piano—Haydn's Symphony in C Major Marked by Grace and Brilliance of Performance.

MR. MALKIN PLAYS DVORAK VIOLONCELLO CONCERTO

By PHILIP HALE.

The 19th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Haydn, Symphony in C major (Rieter-Biedermann, No. 3); Rameau-Kretschmur, Ballet Suite: Musette, Rigaudon, Menuet, Rigaudon from "Acanthe et Cephise," Minuet from "Platee," Gavotte from "Acanthe et Cephise"; Handel, Concerto Grosso in D minor, Op. 6, No. 10; Dvorak, Concerto for violoncello (Joseph Malkin, violoncellist).

Handel apparently took a peculiar pride in his Concerti Grossi. He published them himself, and by subscription. They would probably be more popular today if all conductors realized the fact that music in Handel's time was performed with varied and free inflections; that his players undoubtedly employed many means of expression. As German organists of 40 years ago insisted that Bach's preludes, fugues, toccatas, should be played with full organ and rigidity of tempo, although those who heard Bach play admired his skill in registration, many conductors find in all the allegros of Handel's concertos only a thunderous speech and allow little change in tempo. In the performance of this old music, old, but fresh, the two essential qualities demanded by Handel's music, suppleness of pace and fluidity of expression, named by Volbach, are usually disregarded. Unless there be elasticity in performance, hearers are not to be blamed if they find the music formal, monotonous, dull.

The 12 concertos were composed within three weeks. Kretschmar has described them as impressionistic pictures, probably without strict reference to the modern use of the word "impressionistic." They are not of equal worth. Romain Rolland finds the seventh and three last mediocre. In the 10th he discovers French influences and declares that the last allegro might be an air for a music box. However this may be, the music as performed yesterday was aristocratic and noble, justifying Mr. Runciman's remark: "Mr. George Frideric Handel is by far the most superb personage one meets in the history of music."

Dr. Muck used Seiffert's arrangement. The notes in the program book had reference to the original edition played at a previous concert. Dr. Muck played the thorough-bass part on the piano as Handel had played the cembalo with two banks of keys before him. An old picture thus represents Handel, with the violoncellist of the "Concertino" at his right, two violinists and two flute players in front of him, the other players behind him, while singers are on his left. Dr. Muck, who was heartily applauded as he took his seat, often played at will, as did his great predecessor. In Seiffert's arrangement the "Concertino" has less individual work, but in this instance arrangement is not necessarily perversion. The allegros were given in a spirited manner, like the rushing of many waters in the forte passages, and with relieving passages, while the stately Air, an air that only Handel could have written, was sung majestically.

Haydn's Symphony, written for a Parisian orchestra and first played at a concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1899, is not too familiar. It is a delightful and, in some ways, a surprising work; witness the boldness of the modulations for 1788; the delicacy of the workmanship, the originality of the treatment, as in the use of the wind instruments at the end of the Andante. Grace, brilliance, astonishing virtuosity marked the performance. The exquisite playing of Messrs. Maquarre and Longy was not the only noteworthy feature.

Rameau's ballet music as arranged by Kretschmar was performed here for the first time. Motti's disarrangement of the charming Minuet from "Platee" has been heard. Rameau wrote the minuet for strings alone, employed no double basses, and gave this indication: "after the manner of the vielle," that is to say, after the manner of the hurdy-gurdy. It is needless to add this hurdy-gurdy was not the street organ to which the name is now given. It was a species of violin and the player turned a wheel to play the melody on one string and a drone-bass on the others. Motti changed the pretty little minuet into a pompous, swollen thing with drums and trumpets and all that. Kretschmar contented himself with adding flutes, oboes and clarinets, an impertinence, because Rameau had these instruments at his disposal and used them freely in "Platee"; indeed, he was one of the first, if not the first in France, to use clarinets and horns in F. It would have been a pleasure to hear this minuet as Rameau wrote it; and all the ballet music would have gained if it had been possible to perform it with a small orchestra and in a small hall. Tinkered as it was by Kretschmar and played by the orchestra in Symphony Hall, it nevertheless gave great pleasure. It would not have been easy to copy Rameau's string parts for the minuet from "Platee" in time, and the hall was necessarily the customary one. It is a good thing to be reminded that there was beautiful music in the 18th century; that the French composer, as well as Handel and Haydn, was not dependent on a huge orchestra; that fine or lofty ideas could be fully expressed by strings and a few wind instruments. This ballet music of Rameau well suited the gallantry of the age.

Mr. Malkin, an accomplished virtuoso, gave a skilful performance of Dvorak's formidable concerto.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Clapp, Symphony in E flat major, first time, conducted by the composer; songs, Schubert, Sei mir gegruesst and Staendchen; Strauss, Morgen (Mme. Culp); Franck, Symphonic Piece from "The Redemption"; songs, Wolf, Verborgenheit; Mahler, Ich atmet' einen Lindenduft and Rheinlegendchen (Mme. Culp); Chadwick, Theme, Variations and Fugue for organ and orchestra (John P. Marshall, organist).

m Free Pre
ress: WINNIPEG MANIT.

APR 7 - 191

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MAY DISBAND.

A report to the effect that the Boston Symphony orchestra will disband in the event of a declaration of war with Germany was circulated in New York early this week. The rumor had it that the Boston musical public would not allow Dr. Karl Muck, a German, to conduct should war be declared, and that since the patrons of the orchestra would insist upon his retention so long as the orchestra gives concerts it had been decided to disband the organization during the period of hostilities.

From the Herald April 8. 1917.

TWENTY-FIRST SYMPHONY

Debussy and Schubert are the composers represented on the 21st program of the Boston Symphony orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The Debussy pieces will be his three "Images" for orchestra. The "Rondes de Printemps" was last played here in 1910 under Mr. Fiedler while the "Iberia," those exquisite Spanish sketches of the French composer, have been heard several times. "Gigues," which although it is catalogued as No. 1, was the last of the three to be written, has never been played here. The symphony will be Schubert's ninth in C-major, "the symphony of heavenly length." This has not been heard for a couple of years.

FROM THE TRAVELER 3/31/17

New Symphony for Concerts Next Week

Dr. Muck to Give First Presentation of Latest Work by Philip Greeley Clapp—Julia Culp to Be Soloist.

By FRANK BERTWALL.

Two exceptional offerings are scheduled for the music lover next week with the final Pension Fund concert of the season tomorrow afternoon in Symphony Hall at 3:30 and the weekly pair of Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next. At the former will be heard for the first time with the Symphony Orchestra a chorus of 200 voices from the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society. At the latter comes the first hearing of a new symphony by Philip Greeley Clapp, professor of music at Dartmouth College.

The New Symphony.

The first hearing of a new work at the hands of the Boston Symphony orchestra always excites interest, all the more so when it is the work of an American and as pretentious as a symphony. Mr Clapp's symphony will be the first number on the program at next week's concerts. Julia Culp will be the soloist. Other numbers on the program include Cesar Franck, symphonic piece from the poem symphony, "The Redemption," and Chadwick, theme, variations and fugue for organ and orchestra.

Mme. Culp will sing as her first number two songs by Schubert, "Sei mir gegrusst" and "Staenachen," both of them orchestrated for her by Arnold Schoenberg, and Richard Strauss' "Morgen." For her second number she will sing "Verborgenheit," by Hugo Wolf and two songs by Gustav Mahler, neither of which has been heard at these concerts, "Ich atmet einem lindenduft" and "Rheinlegendchen."

Pension Fund Concert.

Tomorrow afternoon at 3:30 in Symphony Hall brings the season's second and final pension fund concert. A crowded house is assured, for Dr. Muck offers an exceptional program, with the participation of a chorus of 200 voices from the ranks of the Radcliffe Choral Society and Harvard Glee Club a feature.

The choral numbers will be a Motet "I Wsestle and Pray," by Bach, and Brahm's "Song of Destiny." The program will open with the Rheinberger theme and variations for violin and organ, opus 150. The organ part of this will be played by John P. Marshall while instead of a violin soloist, Dr. Muck will employ the entire section of 30 violins. The rest of the program will be Wagner. Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde, prelude to "Parsifal," selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung," funeral music from "Gotterdammerung" and overture to "Tannhauser."

FROM the HERALD APRIL 1, 1917.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

That admirable singer, Mme. Julia Culp, will appear with the Symphony orchestra as soloist at the 20th pair of concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The program begins with a new symphony by Philip Greeley Clapp, professor of music in Dartmouth College, who is regarded as one of the most important of the younger American composers. His symphony was finished a short time ago. Mr. Clapp has worked on it for the past year. He will conduct it.

The entire program is as follows:

Symphony in G major.....Clapp
Songs with orchestra:
"Sei mir gegrusst".....Schubert
"Staendchen".....Schubert
Orchestrated by Schoenberg.
"Morgen".....Strauss
Symphonic Piece from the Poem-Symphony
"The Redemption".....Cesar Franck
Songs with orchestra:
"Verborgenheit".....Hugo Wolf
"Ich atmet einen Lindenduft".....Mahler
"Rheinlegendchen".....Mahler
Theme, Variations and Fugue for Organ and orchestra (John P. Marshall, organist).....Chadwick

The second concert of the season in aid of the pension fund of the Symphony orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall this afternoon at 3:30. For the first time in nearly a dozen years a chorus will be used. Under the direction of A. T. Davison and Mrs. H. H. Gallison choral music in Harvard University has made great strides. Mrs. Gallison has organized and directed with much success the Radcliffe Choral Society of over 100 voices, and under Dr. Davison's leadership the Harvard University Glee Club has been enlarged and has accomplished much. These two choruses he has been drilling during the past winter and Dr. Muck was so pleased with their singing that he invited them to assist in this pension fund concert. Altogether there will be about 200 voices.

The choral numbers will be a motet "I Wrestle and Pray," by Bach, and Brahms's "Song of Destiny." This latter work was first done in Boston in 1874 at a Theodore Thomas concert, later by the Cecilia; still later at Symphony concerts under Mr. Nikisch.

The program will open with Rheinberger's theme and variations for violin and organ, op. 150. The organ part of this will be played by John P. Marshall while instead of a solo violin Dr. Muck will employ the entire section of 30 violins. The program is as follows:

Theme and Variations for Violin and Organ, Opus 150.....Rheinberg
Motet, "I Wrestle and Pray".....Bach
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde".....Wagner
Song of Destiny.....Brahms
Prelude to "Parsifal".....Wagner
Selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdaemmerung".....Wagner
Funeral Music from "Gotterdaemmerung."
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner

FROM THE APRIL 2 1917 Post

VOICES AID SYMPHONY AT CONCERT

Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses With Orchestra

BY OLIN DOWNES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, gave the second concert of the season in aid of its pension fund, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

The orchestra was assisted by the Radcliffe Choral Society, Mrs. H. H. Gallison director, and the Harvard University Glee Club, some 200 voices, under the direction of Dr. A. T. Davison.

BIG HALL CROWDED

The programme consisted of Rheinberger's Theme and Variations for violin and organ, op. 150, played by Mr. Marshall, organist of the Symphony Orchestra, and the entire violin section; Bach's Motet, "I wrestle and pray," for chorus, orchestra and organ, conducted by Dr. Davison; Brahms' "Song of Destiny," for full chorus and orchestra, and excerpts from Wagnerian music-drama—the prelude to "Parsifal," selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdamerung," arranged by Hans Richter; the funeral music from "Gotterdamerung," the overture to "Tannhauser." The hall was filled to its capacity, including the standing room in the aisles. The audience was evidently deeply impressed by the performances.

The piece by Rheinberger is conventional but agreeable music. The performance of the Bach motet brought before the musical public of Boston the admirable work which Dr. Davison and his collaborators have been carrying on in the development of choral singing at Harvard and Radcliffe of late years.

Voices Are Musical

The vocal material at Dr. Davison's disposal is unusually good. The voices in the aggregate are delightfully fresh and musical. The conductor himself knows well how to make the most of this material. The quality of tone is always musical and never dry or forced. The singers know the difference between "piano" and "pianissimo" and observe it.

The performances were musicianly in the careful observation of attack, phrasing, time values, etc., but they were, happily, far from that routine character which some professionals exalt as a virtue. In the health and spontaneity of the singing, in the quality of tone, which had not been planed and whittled to certain cut and dried vocal standards, and in the obvious earnestness and pleasure the performers took in the task there was a new and refreshing element. This was not, thank heaven, the singing of professional singers, but something incomparably more charming, normal and musical.

Color and Sonority

But there is plenty of resource of color and sonority in this body of singers. This was shown in the effects Dr. Muck secured from chorus as well as orchestra. The "Song of Destiny" is a piece of music that is too seldom heard. There is the noble orchestral introduction, the serenity of mood at first, and then the brilliant and dramatic setting of the second verse, in which mortals laboring and suffering here below bewail the contrast of their lot with that of the angels, serene in heaven.

Then there is the harking back in the orchestra to the mood of the opening

The chorus was alert in obeying the wishes of Dr. Muck.

Wagnerian Excerpts

With the performance of the Wagnerian excerpts the latitues of Symphony concerts are long familiar. But this does not diminish the effect of the music. Discounting the "Parsifal" prelude, which some of us find entirely too metaphysical and sophisticated to be quite true, the rest of the music on the programme was in greater part Wagner in his most tremendous moments. Familiarity with every note of the "Tristan" prelude can never dull its appeal, at least for this generation. The same thing is true of the magnificent tone-painting from the "Nibelungen Ring" and the epic pathos and grandeur of the funeral music. Here, indeed, is something of the large utterance of the early gods.

What need be said of the orchestra's performance or the mastery of Dr. Muck in this music? The performance of the funeral march from "The Dusk of the Gods," in particular, will not be quickly forgotten by those who heard and witnessed it. The audience was loath to leave the hall.

FROM THE ADVERTISER APRIL 2/17.

PENSION FUND CONCERT SUCCESS

HARVARD-RADCLIFFE CHORUSES HEARD

200 Student Singers Assist at Notable Entertainment by Symphony Orchestra

By LOUIS C. ELSON

Pension Fund concert program:—
Rheinberger, Theme and Variations. violir and organ, by all the violins.
Bach. Motet. "I Wrestle and Pray."
Wagner. "Tristan and Isolde," Prelude.
Brahms. "Song of Destiny."
Wagner. Prelude to "Parsifal."
Selections from Trilogy, Richter's Arrangement.
Siegfried Funeral Music.
Tannhauser Overture.

It is not permitted to criticise a beneficent concert, where all the participants donate their services for a good cause; but were this ban entirely lifted we would still only be able to praise the phenomenal concert given in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. In addition to the regular orchestral forces the Radcliffe Choral Society, which Mrs. H. H. Gallison directs, and the Harvard University Glee Club, which is conducted by Dr. A. T. Davison, came over from Cambridge, a combined chorus of over 200 voices, and the Bach and Brahms numbers lent vocal dignity to the remarkable program. The Bach notet was finely conducted by Dr. Davison.

What a versatile musician Dr. Muck is! He is one of the greatest of vocal conductors in both the oratorio, or cantata, and operatic fields; he is the equal of any Wagnerian conductor that we have heard (and we have heard all the famous ones); he has absolutely revealed the orchestral works of Brahms and Liszt to Boston; and only the day before he conducted a contrapuntal Handelian work from the piano, playing the "Continuo" (the supporting clavicembalo part) upon the piano.

In this concert he shone in all his glory. His reading of the "Song of Destiny" was lofty and properly serene, in its great opening stanzas, and the Allegro, in which the unhappy lot of Man is pictured, was given in dark and effective contrast. The culmination of it all however, was in the noble orchestral postlude, which, after the chorus has ended in seeming hopelessness, brings back the broad movement of the beginning and ends with peace and tranquility. Such music has far more to say to mankind at present than the composer's "Song of Triumph."

The chorus was very effective in this, as in the Bach work, and Mrs. Gallison and Dr. Davison are to be congratulated upon what their societies have achieved. But it took a Dr. Muck to bring out all their powers in connection with full orchestral accompaniment, which in the case of Brahms was more than an accompaniment.

We need not speak of the Wagnerian works. It is always a great musical delight to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra carry out Dr. Muck's readings in these numbers. But there is nothing new to say about these except that they always cause the post-Wagnerian strivers to seem very petty and poverty-stricken in real musical ideas. Yet the Richter arrangement had something of novelty to us. We recall the old days when Gericke played this, and it still seems the most successful Wagnerian transcription that we know of.

The opening number was Rheinberger's violin and organ variations swollen to Brobdignagian proportions, by allowing all the violins to play the solo part in unison. We recall Mr. Nikisch once giving Handel's Largo ("Ombra mai Fu") in this manner, but here at least there was more justification, for the contrapuntal parts balanced nicely and the strings made a fine display of good ensemble, even in some very florid passages.

Mr. John P. Marshall was most efficient at the organ.

A word of especial praise must be spoken about the clear enunciation of the chorus, both male and female.

There was a tremendous audience present and the enthusiasm was constant from beginning to end.

From the Globe April 8,1917.

Works by Debussy and Schubert at the Symphonie

Debussy and Schubert are the composers represented on the program the Boston Symphony Orchestra ne Friday afternoon and Saturday evenin The Debussy pieces will be two and possibly three of his "Images" for orchestra. Dr Muck will play, in any event, the "Rondes de Printemps" and the "Iberia." The "Rondes de Printemps" was last played here in 1910 under Mr Fiedler, while the "Iberia," those exquisite Spanish sketches of the French composer, have appeared on the program several times.

FROM THE MONITOR APRIL 2, 1917

COLLEGE SINGERS ASSIST ORCHESTRA

Pension Fund Concert, Boston Symphony Orchestra—Programe given in Symphony Hall, with Karl Muck conducting, and with a chorus from Radcliffe College and Harvard University, and John P. Marshall, organist, assisting; afternoon of April 1. The program: Rheinberger, theme and variations for violin and organ, op. 150 (arranged for violins in unison and organ); Bach, motet, "I Wrestle and Pray"; Wagner, prelude to "Tristan and Isolde"; Brahms, "Song of Destiny"; Wagner, prelude to "Parsifal," selections from "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung," funeral music from "Götterdämmerung," overture to "Tannhäuser."

For many years it has been the hope of certain musicians that a chorus could be assembled in Boston worthy of taking an important part in the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra. Speaking broadly, the thing has been done to satisfaction only when the chorus was an auxiliary tone force. To a good outcome a full choir of men and women has been used in performances of Beethoven's ninth symphony; also a choir of men in the finale of Liszt's "Faust" symphony, and a choir of women in the little symphonic episode, "Sirens," of Debussy. Such experiments as have been made with the chorus taking the leading place, and with the orchestra fulfilling a mere accompanying function, have not been particularly successful.

The Symphony Orchestra, a delicately articulated plaything, put together in the expensive toyshops of Europe, goes best when left to itself. As sure as it is tied for any length of time to a rough jack-knife contrivance that somebody has whittled out in odd moments of leisure, it breaks down. Nevertheless, with certain accommodations tactfully made, the imported and domestic mechanisms will coordinate. On Sunday afternoon, for instance, the product of Vienna and Paris conservatory tradition which Dr. Muck directs and the product of New England singing school tradition which Dr. Davison of Harvard University has in hand, worked splendidly together for a few minutes. The Symphony Orchestra found in the group of college singers a chorus with which, long enough at least for a performance of the Brahms "Song of Destiny," it could work on equal interpretative terms.

The unifying element in the case was Dr. Muck's masterful style of conducting. There was a music lesson in that which every conductor of a choral society for 300 miles around could well have availed himself of. Choral conductors as a rule think that they have achieved all that is necessary if they make their men and women sing. So thinking, they get along very well until they emerge from strictly choral rehearsal. Just as soon as they try to fit choral singing to orchestral playing, they find that to make people sing is less than half the problem. Having no firm knowledge of the technique of orchestral directing, they get but a haphazard compound of instrumental and vocal sound. They have to trust to the composer's writing for a good outcome. They have but partial control of the situation themselves. Dr Muck, however, as master of style in conducting, could make the interpretation of the "Song of Destiny" an orchestral and vocal unit. He could maintain a desirable balance between players and singers, and he could even give, here and there, the illusion of balance of voices in a chorus which had inherently a poor equalization of soprano, contralto, tenor and bass tone.

The Harvard men and Radcliffe women, performing the motet of the Bach school, "I Wrestle and Pray," with Dr. Davison conducting, showed the quality of their academic enthusiasm. No ordinary group of singers would have the patience to study a piece which contains, like this one, little reward but vocal drill. The motet is a contrapuntal curiosity, hardly anything else; and is not to be thought of, on the score of inspiration, with the B minor mass and the Passion cantatas.

The choral experiment seemed on the whole to win the favor of the large audience. If there were any hearers who were in doubt about the value of the vocal numbers, they could do nothing but give their heartiest approval to the Wagner orchestral selections, which were presented with all possible authority and brilliance.

FROM Journal APRIL 7, 1917.

A new symphony, finished barely three months ago in this city by Philip Greeley Clapp, a graduate of Harvard '09; a group of some of the most moving of the German lieder, sung by Julia Culp; the very first of Cesar Franck's expositions of his theory of tonality, and Mr. Chadwick's beautiful velvety tour de force for organ and orchestra made yesterday's program, the 20th Symphony rehearsal of the season, rich. The occasion was memorable in other ways.

Dr. Muck did not appear until the symphony was finished, the composer himself conducting the work.

And when the tall, grave, slender figure of the regular conductor appeared, there was an outburst of applause that went on and on; never vociferous, never the crazy enthusiasm of having just heard a wonderful performance; it was just the sympathy of a great throng of friends for the friend in a strange land, a friend placed in a sad position because war had just been declared against his country.

There was plenty of enthusiasm, for Mr. Clapp and for Mme. Culp, whose rich voice was never heard to better advantage.

The interpolation of two groups of songs into a symphony program seemed a little strange to the habitues of the concerts—and incidentally, very refreshing indeed. It changed the air, so to speak.

Mr. Clapp's symphony, though wholly in the modern manner, was a joy to the layman as well as to the professional musician. No need here to strain the attention through the thickened dissonances of "tonality," and to probe for some scrap of melody, some meaning, some rhythm. Color there was, brilliance and richness in every bar; there is not a thin page in the score. But Mr. Clapp has not disdained to speak in unisons, nor to pile the notes of well-known chords up for the pleasure of sweetness.

His ornamentations often flashed in eerie violet intervals, but they always flashed. He insists, in the program notes written by himself, that there is no detailed program, though there is an underlying dramatic plan. It is true; the whole symphony is drama of the emotions purely; to chain it to the story of events of characters would be a pity.

It is in three movements, each with strongly marked and noble themes, clearly stated; Mr. Clapp is in this a very forthright person, as he is vehement in exclamation or climax. The exuberance of the first movement, however, is the exuberance of a highly cultivated person; there is nothing pastoral about it. Often it rises to exaltation, always with a pointing forward, by way of introduction of a series of chords, or a variation of the early themes, to a consequence in second or third movement.

In the second movement (andante agitato) the principal theme is stated boldly by the trombones, with an odd effect produced by carrying the attacking note on in the brass, and then dropping those instruments out, so that the strings sing the remainder of the melody quietly, with a thrill more poignant than if the whole strain had been shouted.

There comes into this movement, too, a feeling of spaciousness, of noble architecture, which is not at first understood. Then the hearer becomes aware of the great tones of the organ underneath a fretting orchestra, making all great and solemn.

The finale is graceful in its scherzo-like opening, though never light, and in the end rises to a triumphant re-statement, in new mdods, of all the themes of the symphony. If concerts are to be for pleasure as well as for culture and enlightenment, Mr. Clapp has contributed a work which will be taken from the library of the orchestra frequently for many years to come.

Mme. Culp sang two of the familiar Schubert songs, the Strauss "Morgen," two of Mahler's and Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," best understood of the mad composer's lieder, and most like those of other men. The orchestra played the accompaniments con amore, and the great audience was furiously enthusiastic.

The Cesar Franck "morceau symphonique" from his "Redemption," and Mr. Chadwick's theme, variations and fugue, have both been played before in the symphony concerts. Each has interest, as exposition of color, or of tone-contrast. Perhaps one longer work would have been as welcome.

[106]

FROM the TRANSCRIPT APRIL 7, 1917.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

NOTABLE INCIDENT AND LIVELY PLEASURE

Spontaneously the Audience Singles Out Dr. Muck for New Token of Present Regard—Mme. Culp in the Fulness and the Fineness of Her Powers Upon Songs That Invite Them — Minor Orchestral Pieces, and the High Merits and Rooted Shortcomings of Mr. Clapp's New Symphony

THE outstanding incident of the twentieth Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon was the willed warmth with which the audience long and exceptionally applauded Dr. Muck when he came first to his place as conductor. The liveliest pleasure of the day was the six songs appointed for Mme. Culp, her singing of them, and, curiously, the orchestral accompaniment—or more truly part—that various hands, sometimes the composer's own, had substituted for the original voice of the piano. Since Mr. Clapp's new symphony stood first on the programme and he himself led the band in it, Dr. Muck did not appear until the beginning of the second half of the concert. No sooner had he rounded the turn under the trombones and the second violins than the whole audience broke into applause, usually reserved for him at the first and the final concert of the season. It continued while he stepped with habitual briskness to his stand, persisted long after he had opened his music book and turned to the orchestra, finally merging into other plaudits for the entering Mme. Culp. By all the tests of practised ears the applause for the conductor was general, hearty, sincere; by every sign it was clear, spontaneous and genuine token of personal regard from the public of the concerts toward Dr. Muck at a time in which its government is entering upon a war with his government. It sprang, seemingly, from seven seasons of weekly association with a man of the world whose personality penetrates his audiences and with a conductor who in those years has raised the standards, the interest, the pleasure and the prestige of the concerts to higher pitch than ever before. As yet, by many a sign of the theatre and the concert hall, the Bostonian public, like that of New York and Chicago, differentiates the preoccupations of warfare from the pleasures of the arts and the personal qualities of an artist from the policies of the state into which he happened to be born. In spite of the pessimists, there is sound reason to believe that this mood will continue through what official proclamations sonorously call "the duration of the war." It would be a pity if in this respect the American public did not follow the long-standing example of Continental Europe on either side of the conflict and not fall to the unintelligent level in these matters of the English. Sufficient, however, for the day is the good thereof. In the ordinary course of the Symphony Concerts no conductor within long recollection has received such significant applause as did Dr. Muck yesterday.

Through the spring rains that would mock her, Mme. Culp brought to the stage the white spring garments and the flowered spring hat that with her own springiness of presence and spirit belied the years that an over-scrupulous programme-book attributed to her. Six songs of Schubert, of Strauss, of Wolf, of Mahler served her voice, artistry, imagination—one over-familiar everywhere, Wolf's "Verborgenheit"; two or three of long standing in the singer's own recitals; but all sung, according to the prescriptions of the Symphony Concerts, to orchestral accompaniment. Five of the pieces were songs of contemplative and poetized vision, of inner mood and picture that out of penetrating mind and assimilating spirit the singer's voice, skill and subtler faculties of revelation must impart to quickened perceptions and stimulated sensibilities in her audience—Wolf's lyric already cited; Strauss's dreamy ecstasy of "Morgen"; Mahler's sentimental musings upon linden flowers and love; Schubert's rhapsody of lovers' meetings and greetings, "Sei mir Gegrüsst"; and his silvery, moonlit serenade. The sixth, Mahler's folk-song of German river and German legend, was of franker speech, bolder contours and livelier rhythms. It aside, the music of these songs ran for the most part within the middle range of Mme. Culp's voice wherein it is richest of velvety body and warmest and deepest of tonal color. Yesterday, moreover, it was a voice that seemed to pulse with its own beauty, to glow with its own lustres; that was flawless and willing instrument to the singer and her song. Upon all her days in Boston, now beginning to be many, Mme. Culp has not sung with finer mastery of technical means, like the control of breath and the focussing of tone; of artful procedure like the shaping of phrase or the long undulation of melody; or of imaginative and enhancing coloring of voice, placing of accent, concentration of image, graduation and cumulation of impression. At one with the illusion of her tones as so much sensuous beauty of lustrous sound, was the illusion of the poetized mood and the amorous vision that they bore; while through both ran the fine, deep ardor of creation repeated in the singer out of poet and composer.

Happily, too, as does not always befall with orchestrated songs, even when the composer has himself made the change of medium, the orchestral voices were no less at one with his lyric tones and mood and the transmitting tones and mood of the singer. The voice of the violin that spins with her voice the melody, misty and groping, iridescent and suffusing of Strauss's "Morgen" touched this loveliness at the composer's and Mr. Witek's hands. Reznicek's accompaniment to Schubert's "Sei mir Gegrüsst" seems in the few instrumental voices employed, to glow in soft radiance around the song. Schönberg utilizes more numerous voices for Schubert's Serenade, but his harmonies and his timbres are silvery as the song, as lovely of euphony and cadence. So does imagination beget imagination. Less concealedly artful is Mahler's own instrumentation of the song of the linden flower, yet poignant, as sprung suddenly from inner impulse are some of his modulations, while in not a little of his coloring is the perfumed suggestion of verse and voice. Again in the song of the Rhine, wind choir and string choir under his skill may move in light and candid folk-song voice. As sensitively as these accompaniments were written, Dr. Muck suffused them with euphonies and colors and led them into single and supple flow with the voice of the singer.

Between Mme. Culp's two groups of songs stood that symphonic fragment from Franck's tonal and devotional congeries, "The Redemption," which requires twelve pages of "historical and descriptive" programme-notes, continues through hardly as many minutes and, even when played with such transparencies of tone and eloquence of progress as Dr. Muck and the orchestra brought to it, hardly leaves impression behind commensurate with the extollings that Mr. d'Indy and other Franckian devotees lavish upon it. The music, indeed, makes a very Franckian piece of the composer's middle years—a single luminous melody, germinating, ascending out of harmonic and instrumental darkness into harmonic and instrumental light; a single wavering melody, gaining strength, encouraged, so to say, by other subordinate melodies until it rises into high and devout affirmation. So in Franck's scheme of the piece did the religion of Jesus of Nazareth illumine a pagan darkness and assert itself above all other religions. The concept, as the philosophers might say, doubtless touched deeply his piestic spirit and believing faith. From his imagination it invoked an ascendant melody, ecstatic from the beginning, speedily radiant and always of gently propulsive force—of intrinsic beauty, of spiritual suggestion. But the background against which it moves; the progress that it would gather; the triumphant affirmation to which it would rise are less of a Franck lacking inner impulse than of a Franck lacking imparting means according to the measure of his invention. The Franck of the chamber music and the symphony of rich maturity did not write this fragment and so, outside the first period of the ascendant melody and in spite of the clear glow of the beauty therein, the symphonic piece comes off rather tamely, even when there are Dr. Muck's affectionate pains to aid. Quite to believe in it, a measure of Franck's faith is necessary to the worldling hearer. Per contra, he may have such or none at all in the final number of the day, the theme, variations and fugue for organ and orchestra that Mr. Chadwick wrote to demonstrate the fusions and contrasts possible to the two media in their modern estate. As some say, in the inevitably esoteric discussion of these matters, his piece proves the feasibility of such a union. As others assert his music does not make it less a misalliance. All the organists, however, may agree upon the skill with which Mr. Marshall played it. But why—to confess to a seat in outer darkness—why organ pieces anyhow, at a Symphony Concert?

Thus, Mr. Clapp's new symphony—in E-flat major, No. 3—was the conspicuous orchestral piece of the day. The composer conducted it with precision and effect. He knew his own will with the music; he imposed it upon an able and willing orchestra; he set his symphony in true and animate image before his hearers. They, in turn applauded composer and piece, not too ardently, but with more warmth of understanding and appreciation than they did his second symphony, played "at these concerts" in the spring of 1914. And with reason, since the new piece is less exhausting and more rewarding music. Beyond question, Mr. Clapp can manipulate his medium from the ordering of minute detail to the marshalling of large climax. Through and through he knows the capabilities and can imagine and exact the possibilities of his instruments, individually, in separate choirs, in large and fused tonal mass. He has not only erudition and courage with instrumental timbres, but also imagination with them.

As the pedagogues like to say, he thinks and writes in terms of the modern orchestra and not in transcription, for it from that which has been really and inwardly created or contrived in another medium. As with his play of timbres, so with his play of harmony and the complement thereof which is dissonance. Mr. Clapp is vastly and minutely erudite in these things from the commonplaces, as they now seem of Wagner, Franck, Mahler and even Debussy to the tentatives and the idiosyncrasies of Skriabin and Schönberg. He is fertile and astute, sure-fingered and elastic-fingered in the manipulation of them. In the new symphony, he runs the whole gamut from the stout or luscious progressions of the Wagnerian and the Mahleresque Germans, through the subtleties of the Parisians, to the bleak and phantasmal intervals of the newest innovators. Whatever the manner, his manipulative skill never fails him; while with harmony and dissonance, as with timbres, he can, on occasion, take his own inventive and imaginative way.

On the other hand, Mr. Clapp cannot resist the temptation of composers, young and old, ancient as well as modern to stock his orchestra "full up —in this instance five clarinets, eight horns, five trumpets, many drums and so onward; to keep as much of it going as steadily as possible; to overstress tonal mass in climax and tonal spaciousness for slithering progressions from one end of the band of the other, to overplay power especially in the flamboyant and projecting brass; and to write his music in over-thick strands. Yet it is not often an opaque music; he can thin it and open it for not a few of his more expert and fanciful strokes; he can even make esoteric harmonies flicker spark-like across the surface. It is his fault, his besetting fault to do too much, rather than too little, to give the technically acute too many points of interest, too few of comparative repose.

Similarly, Mr. Clapp may follow his own will and still keep his readiness and sureness of hand in the coördination, propulsion and manipulation of symphonic design in which he seems equally capable of ancient orthodoxies and modern freedoms. The new symphony lacks neither cohesive progress. It is a self-sustaining and self-contained whole without resort to the commonplaces of articulation, repetition, reminiscence. Mr. Clapp's generative musical ideas—usually full-bodied and far-flung themes with a suggestion of Mahler in them or else in subordination or contrast, mere tonal germ with a hint of Franck—reveal an inventiveness and even an individuality of the mind. He develops, transforms, enriches and variously arrays them with no small command of process and resource, with fertile imagination, with clear implication of mood so that the two contents, musical and poetic, technical and emotional, expand as one. There is no mistaking the high energy of both as they break and burst their vigorous way through the first movement of the new symphony. As clear is the stress of haunting questionings, insidious despair, ghostly images upon the music and the mood of the second movement, clouding and dispelling recurring periods of confidence and exaltation. The third does summon and sustain in just tonal and poetical mingling an atmosphere of luminous calm. What, then, is the shortcoming of a symphony that, thus briefly recorded sounds so fair? On the one hand, while it engages the mind, it never stimulates it out of intent observation. On the other, while mental perception recognizes, distinguishes, accepts the succeeding moods and emotional implications, the heart never stirs deeply and warmly to them. At the end, the listener rises from the symphony as one whom the composer would compel by power rather than persuade by beauty. H. T. P.

The Orbed Oracle of the Oboe

From an Original Drawing by Gluyas Williams

Georges Longy

Of the Symphony Orchestra and of Chamber Music

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Debussy and Schubert Share Dr. Muck's Programme—"Elijah" for Easter—The Fullers in Folk-Song — Pianists' and Singers' Recitals

DEBUSSY and Schubert—contemporary French and classic German music—divide Dr. Muck's programme for the Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next week. From the Parisian, conductor and orchestra will play for the first times here the full set of "Images for Orchestra" in the sequence in which the composer designed them. The first, "Gigues," has never been heard in Boston and seldom elsewhere; the second is the imaginative and poetized tone-picturing of Spanish night and Spanish festival, "Ibéria," music in which Debussy renews not a few of his finest powers; the third is the gay and ricochetting "Rondes de Printemps." The Spanish piece, since first it made its way over sea has remained in the active repertory of the concerts; while once or twice in Mr. Fiedler's time, the "Rondes" have been played at them. They, however, like the "Gigues" are new from Dr. Muck's hand. Out of Schubert comes the familiar lyrical symphony in C major, the Schubertian symphony par excellence to which the conductor now gives biennial repetition.

Saturday evening, April 21, in Symphony Hall, the twenty-second of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck with Mme. Kurt for the assisting singer.

Friday afternoon, April 20, in Symphony Hall, the twenty-first of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck with Mme. Kurt of the Metropolitan Opera House for assisting singer.

Friday afternoon, May 4, in Symphony Hall, the twenty-fourth and final afternoon concert of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck and unassisted.

Saturday evening, May 5, in Symphony Hall the twenty-fourth and final evening concert of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck and unassisted.

Thursday evening, April 26, in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge, the eighth and last of the current series of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck, with Miss Claire Forbes as assisting pianist.

Friday afternoon, April 27, in Symphony Hall, the twenty-third of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck, at which Mr. Noack of the string choir will play the solo part in a concerto for violin.

Saturday evening, April 28, in Symphony Hall, the twenty-third of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Muck, with Mr. Noack as aforesaid.

Weekly Pair of Symphony Concerts with Selections by Debussy and Schubert the Principal Offering—Handel and Haydn Tomorrow.

By FRANK BERTWALL

The coming week finds the usual lull in musical circles as a result of the many activities incident to Easter week. The principal events for the music lover scheduled for the week include the annual Easter offering of the Handel and Haydn Society tomorrow evening in Symphony Hall, and the regular pair of weekly concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next. Otherwise the week might well be a holiday so far as concerts or recitals call for attention.

The lull is one of those preliminary signs that the season is drawing to a close, which close, apart from the symphony concerts, may be hastened by the actual participation of the Unied States in the world war.

Tomorrow's Concert.

With Symphony Hall set apart for the annual Easter offering of the Handel and Haydn Society tomorrow night, the regular Sunday afternoon concert had to be omitted. The Handel and Haydn Society offering will be "Elijah," Emil Mollenhauer conducting. The Boston Festival Orchestra, John W. Crowley, principal, will assist. The soloists will be Mrs. Grace Bonner Williams and Miss Edith B. Whitcomb, sopranos; Miss Alma Beck, alto; Lambert Murphy, tenor, and Henry Scott, bass. H. G. Tucker will be at the organ.

Symphony Concert.

Debussy and Schubert selections will monopolize the program at next week's Symphony concerts, the former being represented by two and possibly three of his "Images" for orchestra, the "Rondes de printemps" and the "Iberia" having been decided upon by Dr. Muck, with the "Gigue" the possible third choice. Schubert's offering will be the 9th symphony in C major, "The Sym-

[107]

FROM the ADVERTISER APRIL 7, 1917.

NEW AMERICAN SYMPHONY HEARD

New Work by Prof. Clapp Shows Intelligence and Emotional Power

MME. CULP WINS SUCCESS IN LIEDER

Concert Ends With Chadwick Composition—Organ Is Well Played

By LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAM

Symphony in E-flat.....Schubert
Philip G. Clapp.
Three Lieder..... Strauss
Mme. Culp.
Symphonic Piece from "The Redemption".....Franck, Wolf
Three Songs..... Mahler
Theme, Variations and Fugue.....Chadwick Organ and Orchestra.

The concert began and ended with American compositions. Prof. Clapp has no reason to complain of neglect in New England. He has now been heard with two symphonies in these concerts. His learning and orchestral skill are shown in both of them, but the present work is preferable to its predecesoor, in intelligibility, in brevity and in emotional power. The symphony is of three movements only. Sometimes when a native composer evolves a symphony of three movements the public makes the fourth movement itself—towards the exits. This was by no means the case yesterday, for the work was interesting and of good contrasts. The Scherzo is omitted from the regular succession. It is heavily scored, in the modern manner (unnecessarily at times), and contains some juggleries of rhythms and of tonalities.

We are not convinced of the poetry of Mr. Clapp, although paying hearty tribute to his intelligence, and he seems an excellent conductor also. He led his own work with conspicuous success.

The first movement was rather blatant, for a symphony, and its very sharp contrasts and heavy crashes reminded of Mahler, who used to compose program-music symphonies without giving the program, and define them as absolute music. We pitied the poor little themes all running about with their ends cut off, for none of them come to a legitimate conclusion. The movement ended with a sudden crash in which the kettle-drummer "did his possible" and which proved Mr. Clapp at least a great sforzandissimist. The movement was full of experiments with different kinds of noises.

The second movement was much more to our liking. There was still some declamatory, unmelodic work, but it was powerful and dramatic, and there were also some beautiful passages on the strings. It had a somewhat sombre ending.

There was also some beautiful work in the beginning of the finale. It made us feel that if Mr. Clapp were less ambitious he would accomplish more. One does not need a regiment of performers to express every musical thought, and, after all, it ought not to be considered a crime to follow the dominant chord with the tonic, once in a while. Nevertheless, this symphony is a marked advance on Mr. Clapp's preceding one, and he certainly belongs among America's prominent composers. The public thought so, too, for the composer-conductor was enthusiastically applauded and recalled.

We scarcely care for Lieder in these symphonic concerts; they seem to demand a different atmosphere. They are better in a small hall and with piano accompaniment. Yet, if they are to be given, we could desire no better interpreter of them than Mme. Julia Culp. It is only fair to add that the public do not share the above view, for they were apparently delighted with all of the vocalist's work, and the perfection of her singing certainly deserved the great enthusiasm it created. Yet Schubert's "Sei mir Gegruesst" and his "Staendchen" were excessively sweet, as if to correct the asceticism of parts of the preceding symphony. Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit" is one of the gems of that unfortunate composer, and it was sung with exquisite expression.

Strauss and Mahler fall a trifle behind Hugo Wolf in not weaving their accompaniments so thoroughly into the fabric of the song. Cesar Franck is more in his own field when he is writing a symphonic poem around a sacred topic than when he is giving a dramatic picture like "Chasseur Maudit." There is a serenity in his work which is born of earnestness and devotion. His great learning never stands in the way of beautiful expression or melodic charm. In short he has mastered the rules and not let the rules master him.

We believe that his "Morceau Symphonique" should be translated as "Orchestral Piece" rather than "Symphonic" for the French word properly means that. The work was exquisitely played and was much applauded.

The concert ended with Chadwick's Theme and Variations and Fugue, for organ and orchestra. The organ was well played by Mr. John P. Marshall. It is always a pleasure to hear this fine-toned instrument combined with orchestra. We might even suggest an organ concerto for some future concert.

There was a strong contrast between the American who began the concert and the American who ended it. We consider Mr. Chadwick a model for the native composer. He is as thoroughly versed in the mysteries of counterpoint as any of them, as witness the canons he has written in Leipsic, and the fugues in his "Judith"; he can swing the great modern orchestra as well as any of them, as is proved by his "Aphrodite"; he has all the modern dramatic fervor and graphicality, as is shown in his "Tam o' Shanter." Yet he has never lost spontaneity or the gift of melody, or geinality, or humor.

The theme composed for variation here is good, attractive, and suited to its transformations. The organ is well united with the orchestral parts, something that is not often accomplished. The fugue is masterly and the ending after it is majestic and powerful. The work is not prolix either. Many otherwise excellent composers, when they get to the variation form are very loath to let go of their lemon until they have squeezed out the last possible drop. No clergyman, with his "tenthly, my dear brethren," holds on so interminably to his text as the variation writer to his theme. Mr. Chadwick was wisely moderate in this. The composition is a most worthy one and has something to say all the way through. It was greatly applauded in spite of its unfavorable place on the program.

FROM the POST APRIL 7, 1917.

WARMEST GREETINGS TO DR. MUCK

Dr. Clapp's Symphony Heard for First Time

BY OLIN DOWNES

When Dr. Karl Muck stepped on the platform to conduct at the 20th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall he was extended a greeting by the audience of exceptional warmth and heartiness. The applause continued until the conductor turned round for a second time to bow his acknowledgments.

It was a greeting, in a season when feelings between two nations are at their height, which reflected infinite credit on the attitude of an American audience toward a great musician, who has long since been accorded the appreciation that he so amply deserves; and this is an attitude which will surely be maintained through the remaining four concerts of the season which Dr. Muck will conduct.

NEW SYMPHONY HEARD

It may be added here that there is not the slightest reason for unrest as to the continuing of the Boston Symphony concerts. They will continue according to schedule this spring, and the arrangements are now far forward for the concerts of next season.

The concert opened with the first performance anywhere of the Second Symphony in E flat major of Dr. Philip Clapp, head of the music department of Dartmouth College, who personally conducted the performance. As regards style we find this work a marked advance over Dr. Clapp's first symphony, heard in this same place three years ago. The composition is more organic, melodic and intelligible than its forerunner. The composer might retort that he had not in this later work undertook so formidable an enterprise as he had in the earlier composition; that because the second symphony was less pretentious in spirit and treatment than the first it was easier to comprehend at an initial hearing. The point is not, however, the immediate comprehension of the listener, for good music will make its way in due time, whatever the limitations of an audience. The point is, rather, whether the composer thoroughly comprehends what he is trying to do himself, and in this respect Dr. Clapp appears to have developed considerably since the composition of his first symphony.

Second Movement Dramatic

In the second symphony the themes have simplicity, a melodic contour and usually a diatonic character. There is effective use of reminiscent passages in the last two movements. A joyous phrase of the third theme of the first movement becomes a motive that is heard constantly in the concluding section of the symphony. A sudden interruption of the course of the opening movement, a passage that is melancholy in mood and dark in coloring, becomes an initial and significant episode of the slow movement. Thematic fragments, or variants of them, are accompanied by their characteristic instrumentation. The first movement, as a whole, is joyous; the second movement, for us the most original of the three, darker and more dramatic in its mood; the third movement brings a tranquil conclusion, after passages which suggest as regards firm, etc., the rolling of a scherzo and a finale into one movement.

The most interesting passage for us in the entire symphony is the fanastical and macabre coloring of a passage of the slow movement which appears very suddenly and significantly in the symphony. The composer had probably some definite incident or emotion of his own in mind when he wrote this. That is his concern. Our's is that the music has here definite physiognomy, which it must be admitted, is still far from the customary thing with Dr. Clapp. He is still, in our opinion, overmuch influenced by modern German scores, with the attendant bombast and lack of taste.

He also appears to be still endeavoring to do the unusual or shocking thing. To frighten the bourgois, which is the dream of the young composer. But what is unusual in this score is all too likely to be extraneous, inapropos of the principal things. Suppose Dr. Clapp had suddenly elected to twirl on his heel like a whirligig or cut a highland fling on the rostrum. That would have been funny, but not particularly pertinent to the matter in hand. Similar with some of the orchestral effects. One was more prone to say, "How very smart" than to say "How original."

Advance Over Former One

We speak of these things in the face of the very evident and admirable advance of this symphony over the former one because they are still, beyond reasonable dispute, unfortunate and unnecessary defects of Dr. Clapp's composition, and because they should be dispensed with quickly in a genuine search for what constitutes his own native, direct musical speech. These may not be particularly simple.

The composer may have a native predilection for the musical equivalents of long words and involved sentences, but he will change his idiom very considerably and throw off the pervading outside influences which now seem to affect his inspiration before he will do the thing which the public will prize, and be undeniably and essentially himself. Having said which, according to the best of our knowledge and belief, it is a pleasure to add that the symphony was well received, and the composer twice called back to the platform.

Mme. Culp sang with her accustomed and remarkable art songs by Schubert, the annoyingly sentimental song of Wolf, "Vergorbenheit," and two songs of Mahler, heard for the first time at these concerts, "Ich atmet' einen Lindenluft" and "Rheinlegendchen," the latter of which is very charming in its suggestion of a German folk dance. She was recalled with due cordiality.

Organ in Solo Part

The symphonic compositions were Franck's Symphonic Piece from the Poem-Symphony and "The Redemption" and George W. Chadwick's "Theme, Variations and Fugue" for organ and orchestra. The former work is delightful for its naivete rather than its distinctions of the Franck who had yet to come when "The Redemption" was composed. The latter piece is a series of excellently written variations, well scored, entertaining and melodious in character. The organ part was played by Mr. Marshall with skill and taste, although he might perhaps have been less modest in his registration and not scrupled to take the fullest advantage of the opportunities which the composition extended to him as a virtuoso in his care for just tonal balance and ensemble effect. An organist more enamoured of virtuosity for its own sake might have done this. As it was, the performance was admirable for its clarity and musicianship and its fulfilment of the wishes of the composer.

FROM the MONITOR APRIL 7, 1917.

ORCHESTRA PLAYS CLAPP SYMPHONY, LED BY COMPOSER

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Karl Muck, Conductor; Mme. Julia Culp and John P. Marshall, Soloists—Twentieth program, presented in Symphony Hall, afternoon of April 6: Clapp, symphony in E flat (conducted by the composer. Songs with orchestra: Schubert, "Sei mir gegrüsst" and "Ständchen"; Strauss, "Morgen." Franck, symphonic piece from "The Redemption." Songs with orchestra: Wolf, "Verborgenheit"; Mahler, "Ich atmet einen Lindenduft" and "Rheinlegendchen." Chadwick, theme, variations and fugue for organ and orchestra.

Works of United States composers are much heard in the Boston Symphony concerts at this time of the year. The reason why they are given room on the calendar, especially in April, is perhaps because that is when their performance can be confined to well-disposed listeners, and when their crudities cannot react seriously on the reputation of the orchestra. The last six weeks of the season are the one period when the conductor is free from the responsibility of choosing for his programs pieces which will please the people of New York, Philadelphia and the other cities included in the annual series of southern tours; wherefore, a new symphony of the Boston school of composition, tried now and found unsuitable for repertory use, can be permanently got rid of with one Friday afternoon and one Saturday evening presentation.

The subscribers to the concerts take these end-season experiments pleasantly. The players in the orchestra, too, enter into them enthusiastically. And as for those men and women who come under the classification of prominent local musicians, they may be said to regard the occasions when home-wrought symphonies, tone poems and overtures are played as the only ones that show public taste at normal and that show the community as its artistic self.

At the twentieth orchestral matinee given this year in Symphony Hall under Karl Muck's administration, a three-movement work by Philip Greeley Clapp, director of music in Dartmouth College, was produced, but not with Dr. Muck conducting it. It has often happened that a composer of the Boston school has been allowed, as in this case, to take the baton and interpret his work as he liked. Which more than once has seemed to mean that the conductor regarded the new piece as not worth his time; but which, again, has seemed to mean that he wished to extend the courtesies of the orchestra without stint, and to let composers plant around their works a budding hedge of tradition all their own.

The three-movement piece was written, two-thirds of it, as a note in the program book indicates, in the college summer vacation of 1916, and the remaining third in the Christmas vacation of 1916-17. Had the symphony been kept from production a while longer, or until after Easter, it might have been provided with another movement and so have got rounded out to a complete classic cycle. Many hearers on Friday afternoon must have regretted that Mr. Clapp stopped short of a four-movement scheme. For had he constructed his work according to the strict historic method, he would have been obliged to add what is much needed, a well-developed episode of comedy. Not that the music is wanting in humor. On the contrary, the first movement has not a little gayety, especially toward the close. But the second and third movements are excessively sober. Furthermore, had the composer employed the usual four-division structure, he would have been compelled, in order to keep within reasonable bounds of time, to reduce the number of his thematic developments, to shorten down his trumpet and trombone drawlings and to curb in general his tendency to make his score discursive. In fine, had he been wholly instead of partially classical in his plan, he would have covered a wider range of expression and at the same time would have sent his meaning straighter home.

The symphony shows its most markworthy thematic traits in the summer vacation pages, which were written, according again to the program book, in Hanover, N. H. Plainly enough, there is rural New England music here—strains heard at the town bandstand on Saturday nights and in the village meeting-house on Sunday mornings. There are almost identifiable fragments of popular cornet melody and phrases of gospel song refrain. Of the old ballad tunes of New Hampshire, however, few, if any, traces are to be found. The composer could never have been one of a farmhouse doorstep group on a night in haying time, when somebody started singing the dozen stanzas of "Young Charlotte Lived by the Mountain Side." No, indeed; for has not the needle and disk opera machine, with its importunate "La donn' è mobile," put the doorstep bard out of favor and made him an inexpressive listener?

The composer of the new symphony was warmly applauded for his music and for his interpretation of it. Dr. Muck, going to the conductor's desk in succession to him, was greeted with loud hand-clapping. The voice of Mme. Culp, the principal soloist, never had so rich a sound when accompanied by piano, as it had on this occasion when supported by orchestra. Such beautiful blend of vocal and instrumental tone as she and the conductor achieved very nearly made up for any incongruity or inappositeness that might be found in the accompaniments in their enlarged form. To the praise of lovely tone is to be added that of exquisite shading and phrasing. Mme. Culp may probably be said to have done the best soprano singing, for sheer brilliancy of technique and elegance of style, of the Symphony year. The Franck symphonic piece from "The Redemption" had a rather laborious reading from Dr. Muck. The Chadwick theme and variations for organ and orchestra, with Mr. Marshall playing the organ, wo[illegible]

Schubert's symphony in C major will be the principal number on the program of the Symphony concerts of April 13 and 14. Other works to be presented are the "Rondes de printemps" and the "Iberia" of Debussy.

FROM the Globe APRIL 7, 1917.

TWENTIETH CONCERT

Philip Greeley Clapp's New Symphony

Julia Culp Sings Beautifully Lieder by Schubert and Mahler

The 20th Friday afternoon symphony concert brought forward a new symphony in E flat major by Philip Greeley Clapp, music by Cesar Franck and Mr Chadwick, and two groups of lieder with orchestra sung by Mme Julia Culp. The symphony was played for the first time anywhere, and is yet in manuscript. Mr Clapp conducted. It was profitable and pleasurable, to listen to the pieces by Franck and Mr Chadwick. Mme Culp, in music happily chosen for her, sang as one inspired.

Mr Clapp has written his symphony this time in three movements, to play three-quarters of an hour or less, instead of in four movements, as in that of three years ago, to last over an hour. He offers no fixed program, but outlines three moods as a basis—"confident enthusiasm" in the first; "active struggle and contemplative idealism" in the second; with "gentleness and calm" in the last. There is undeniably opportunity in this reversed dynamic order of approaching the close with contemplation rather than with triumph and unfurled banners, as is more usual.

It was said that Mr Clapp had reconsidered his cryptic style of the longer work of three years ago. There was then reasonable anticipation of this one after the period intervening. In comparison it would seem more sane, perhaps less given to prolix, turgid or exaggerated expression and showing passages of more significant ideas and greater continuity of mood. But with all admiration for Mr Clapp's scholarship, for his fine mind, for the splendid success he has made as analyst, lecturer and pedagogue, and with a keen desire to find something in this symphony, it is difficult to say that these qualities are more than mildly comparative rather than absolute.

Incessant Modulation

In a word, if Mr Clapp would write a simple melody, harmonize it, distribute it among his instruments to sound as speech of his own heart and feeling, it might carry conviction beyond this second score of infinitely contrived and elaborated detail. Characteristic qualities have not been shaken off. There is still a distaste, apparently an aversion, to a mood established and sustained for any appreciable time. The incessant modulation at best is wearisome, at its worst as sea travel in time of storm. There is the constant unrest, uncertainty, not the agitation developed with cumulative intensity to a dramatic climax, but a vague, rudderless meandering about as though the composer himself could but hint at the final haven.

There are germinal ideas, notwithstanding some themes of boisterous vacuity or curiously tortured invention, which with a rational outflowering could be led into expression of character and strength, but promising bits are frittered away, whittled into smaller fragments or more generally left scattered, while some other abortive idea leaps up for attention.

The instruments as individuals and as choirs are used with what may be the same versatility, but if true, that of wildly rhapsodic flights. They are puppets and Mr Clapp is fond of pulling the strings. The brass, best of all, dance to his call, and are asked over often for an incisive punctuation of ideas neither of weight nor of beauty to warrant it. The first trumpet still must be an acrobat in full training. After all this flourish and virtuosity one asks the reason. The hearer is left struggling to sift out this or that morsel, long since buried.

Second Movement

In the second movement Mr Clapp is to be thanked for the brief passage, somewhat choral like, in which continuity and content with pretense seem to rule. Again, when the English horn ascends the leap of the major ninth one hopes for another tangible scene, but the solo violin interrupts and what has preceded seems not introductory, but fragmentary and irrelevant. The closing tonic chord of the final movement is authoritative. Mr Clapp was recalled more than once and was cordially applauded.

Mme Culp, in superb voice, sang two songs each by Mahler and Schubert, one each by Strauss and Wolf, to well orchestrated accompaniment beautifully played by Dr Muck. John P. Marshall was soloist in Mr Chadwick's theme and variations with the fine fugue for organ and orchestra. The symphonic piece from Cesar Franck's Poem-Symphony "The Redemption," music not most characteristic of the composer, was welcome in the hands of Dr Muck, who was given an affectionate welcome when he came on.

[108]

FROM the TRANSCRIPT APRIL 2, 1917.

WEEK-END CONCERTS

OWN A LONG AND DIVERSIFIED LINE

Eighteenth-Century Music and Twentieth-Century Virtuosity—Thirty Violins as One—Wagner from Dr. Muck, More Than Usually Eloquent—Two Choral Feats—Progress and Personality in Eddy Brown, Violinist—Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with Orchestra and Chorus for Next November

MUCH eighteenth-century music was intrinsically a virtuoso music. Violinists, like Tartini or Viotti, wrote it for violinists; Mozart leads a long line of composers who played expertly upon the harpsichord for which they made pieces; while makers of music in general (so to say) like Händel or Haydn, possessed a practical aptitude wth the instruments they employed that few of their successors enjoy today, though they set down thrice as intricate parts. All these ancients, moreover, were wont to leave much more in their music to the individual prompting, discretion and taste of the players than do even the less exacting moderns. Instead of strewing the space between the staves of the music-paper with indications for the performer, they often left some of these staves blank that he might fill them with his own fertile and sympathetic improvisation. In these matters eighteenth-century audiences were likeminded with eighteenth-century composers, expecting from the players a display of the virtuosity for which the score either left room or provided explicit opportunity. Accordingly it was easy to anticipate that in a concert largely filled by this ancient music, like that of the Symphony Orchestra on Saturday evening, the virtuosi of the band would improve every occasion it gave them. To do so was a part of the obligation and the atmosphere of the moment.

Dr. Muck set the pace, as it were, when he played the harpsichord part in Händel's Concerto Grosso, while from his place at the substituted pianoforte he also led the string band with his familiar aptitudes as a conductor but with unfamiliar though not unknown aptitudes as a pianist. Close beside him, a little apart from their several choirs, sat Mr. Witek of the first violins, Mr. Habenicht of the second violins and Mr. Warnke of the violoncellos, forming the solo group, as distinguished from the answering ensemble, which was a part of the scheme of such pieces. Mr. Witek's and Mr. Warnke's understanding, taste and skill with this music of large line, ample flow, fine inflection and frequent technical exaction is an old story to the public of the Symphony Concerts; Mr. Habenicht's, as he proved on Friday and Saturday, is not less than theirs; while it was the more pleasure to note it, since the leader of the second violins usually has little opportunity to show his individual quality apart from his fellows. In the symphony by Haydn and in the dances by Rameau, the wood-wind choir, in turn, received its opportunity. Mr. Maquarre outshone himself in the body, the suavity, the security, and the radiance with which he played the solo passages for flute in the first and the second movements of the symphony; Mr. Sand and Mr. Mimart lent the richness and the smoothness of their tone to the parts for clarinet with which Rameau deepened and colored two or three of his dances; while the strings snapped out the whimsical pizzicati of the rigadoons to piquant perfection; and the whole orchestra filled the gavotte with the queer, reverberant tonal quality with which, as well as by rhythm the composer gave it savor. So, through the three eighteenth-century pieces was virtuoso music kept in character and illusion by virtuoso accomplishment in a twentieth-century band.

Wagner and Dr. Muck

This virtuosity had place, again, in the first number of the concert for the Pension Fund of the orchestra that it undertook in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, with Dr. Muck again conducting and with band and leader above even their usual eloquence on many such occasions. The piece was a set of variations for organ and orchestra by the diligent and fluent Rheinberger—chamber music in itself or even churchly diversion. But for the one violin for which the composer wrote Dr. Muck substituted the thirty violins that weekly sit to left and right of him. Yet as one man they played this violin part in a flawless unanimity of like-shaped phrase, simultaneous inflection, equally distributed color and mutual dynamic gradation. More, they played as one mind in the designing and the upbuilding of the music and as one temperament and imagination in response to the songful quality and the occasional high intensity of the progress. Whether they swelled and sharpened the voice of the organ, whether it or they were unfolding or adorning the variation the ear heard them as a single superb violinist; and the thirty accomplished this feat less by such technical means as unified bowing than by a finer and inner community of understanding, feeling, intent. It is the custom to marvel and applaud when four men in a string quartet attain such singleness of intensified voice through all the convolutions of such music and when they carry it also to such elasticity within that unity. Here were thirty working their miracle with Mr. Marshall at the organ a worthy partner for them.

The other orchestral numbers were familiar excerpts from the Wagnerian repertory, still too scanty for the liking and the necessities of an operaless city that Dr. Muck permits himself, the orchestra and a hungry public—the preludes to "Tristan" and "Parsifal," the overture to "Tannhäuser" the jointure fragments of "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung" in which that hero scales the fire-girt rock and fares forth for new conquests on the Rhine; and the orchestral glorification of him slain, recalled, lamented. Familiar pieces all even in a city that, somewhat absurdly, hears its Wagner in a concert hall and not in an opera house and that has almost forgotten the entrance of the gods into Valhalla, the forest-music in "Siegfried," the mournful introduction to the third act of "Tristan," the like introduction that brings Tannhäuser back from pilgrimage, simply because in the one or in the other, it so seldom hears them. Familiar, indeed, yet yesterday sounding as it seemed with a voice that even Dr. Muck and the orchestra in its present estate have seldom brought to them. Richter himself, who could hardly feel the swaying of the Wagnerian wood or see down the long Wagnerian vistas therein, because he was so occupied with the individual trees, might have marvelled at the beauty and the elasticity of detail especially in the wood-wind parts, in the prelude tt "Tristan," at the distribution, at once subtle and poignant, of tonal emphases over the repetitions of the prelud to "Parsifal," at the suggestion or the proclamation of every inwrought motive as the music bore young Siegfried through mist and fire to Brünnhilde's rock, rang and sped through his ardent farewelling in the dawn, swept him forward, Rhine-borne, to new adventure. In all three was the detail that for an instant arrests the ear as it gleams out of the whole tonal web or leads period into period and yet almost within that instant vanishes into larger course and onflow ot the orchestral weaving. It proceeds equally from the particular players who accomplish and from the conductor who coördinates and fuses.

These multiplied and momentary strokes are, however, but Dr. Muck's means to a larger and deeper end, fulfilled yesterday beyond usual degree in all his Wagnerian numbers. It has been the just custom to exalt the emotional force of Mr. Toscanini's version of the prelude to "Tristan" above that of any other conductor of our time. Yet, if recollection of more than one hearing bears true witness, it has never excelled the fate-haunted voice that Dr. Muck and the orchestra gave yesterday to the first measures; the ardor of a passion that is at once an ecstasy and a torture, that mourns while it yearns, with which they carried the love-music through the long ascent; or the wan decline alike of the passion and the pain with which they led the music into the whispers and the extinction of the end. Time and again, the prelude to "Parsifal" will yield the impression of an over-meditated, over-manipulated music in which imagination and emotion are withered by the quest for superlatively exact and impinging means of expression. Even Dr. Muck and his responsive men could not quite hide this dryness as the prelude proceded in anguished or ecstatic paragraphs. Yet within each paragraph, the voice of sinful suffering, of beatified compassion, of stately and solemn holy rite, was not less poignant than had been the voice of other passion in the prelude to "Tristan." Similarly the music of young Siegfried glowed with the tale it bears in high, heroic note—the lambent fires, the horn that parts them and cleaves the mists; the instant of revelation of the attained Valkyr; the stride and splendor of the music that sends Siegfried faring forth anew,

Zu neuen thäten
Theure Helde

and the rest; the smooth surge of the Rhine and the song of the river-daughters. The living Siegfried in epitome before what the old ballads called "death and bane" had come upon him. Then afterward for contrast, postlude and apotheosis the clangors, unlike any that as yet man has drawn from orchestra, that at once mourn, recount, exalt him into the heaven of heroes, with the power of the orchestra at one with the power of these clangors. Perhaps after such tonal might and magnificence of mourning and of memory, the overture to "Tannhäuser" was bound to sound a little routine. As yet with all the orotund sonorities of the brass in the music of the pilgrims it is not quite of Dr. Muck's most eloquent Wagner.

The Harvard Chorus

"Wagner for the Pension Fund," according to the familiar formula of many a year was, however, only the major part of the concert. To it came also, and generously proffering its services, the choir that Dr. Davison of the Division of Music at Harvard has assembled from the college and from Radcliffe, nursed against no small odds, held, practised and fused until its singing yesterday was no less revelation of unexpected choral forces and possibilities hereabouts than was that of Mr. Townsend's chorus at two pairs of Symphony Concerts. For some years past Dr. Muck has been ambitious to join choral music to symphonic music in his concerts and to set new standards in this town for the one as he has for the other. With such coworkers as Dr. Davison and Mr. Townsend, and the men-singers and the women-singers that he and they can gather and stimulate, he is well on the way to his end. The method is the careful choosing of the choir by these lieutenants, long training under them in the appointed music and final rehearsals under Dr. Muck himself.

The pieces of yesterday set the Cambridge youth no easy task—the motet "Ich lasse dich nicht," attributed to Sebastian Bach, though probably written by his uncle Christopher; and Brahms's "Song of Destiny," stupidly neglected by many choral conductors because it is incongruous to their pet miscellanies and too short for their programmes of "larger works." The motet weaves and interweaves from the spool, so to say, of a choral-like cantus fermus, long strands of contrapuntal song set to a religious text, rising, falling, blending, parting, in incessant curve and motion until, in the present instance, a chorale concentrates and cumulates them. As the Bach of the motet wrote his music, the curve of the lines is beautiful upon he ear, the contrapuntal body runs rich and deep, the phrases for the voices and the harmonic background upon which they move stir the hearer; while with all the tonal intricacy of the piece, it speaks with that direct, simple whole-hearted feeling which makes the music of the elder Bachs the voice of a devout and personal religious faith and impulse as far from pious routine as an appurtenance to position and respectability as it is from the antics and the orgies of Reverend Dr. Sunday and his clerical species.

For contrast, stood Brahms's setting in tones of the German verses that vision Elysian fields of placid and remote beatitude, where the turmoil of earth never penetrates and where in spiritual repose dwell beings not as the futile and impotent atoms which are men. To it, stirred by poetry that quickened a characteristic and fertile vein in his imagination, Brahms has written music of a cool, distant, serene and luminous illusion as lovely of flowing line, soft harmonies, pale color and still atmosphere as are like decorations of the like-tempered Puvis de Chavannes—music that embodies the high, far heaven in which Clough set his goddess of the eternal wisdom. Then in as swift and whirling epitome as the music of Elysium has been long-breathed and tranquil, the tonal tumult of the vanities and vicissitudes of men; and finally conclusion out of the deep compassion of music when a deeply-moved spirit may write it.

No light tasks these to set a chorus relatively at beginnings, even with an orchestra to sustain and prompt it, a Davison to practice it and, in Bach, to lead it and a Muck to bear it through the contrasting eloquences of Brahms. Yet in all but one respect, it rose, so stimulated, to the necessities of both composers and the exactions of both leaders. It was possible to wish somewhat more freedom and élan of song as the choir spun Bach's ardent contrapuntal web and a measure more of freedom as they wrought Brahms's still and silvery tone-picture. Men and women both, they took thought and sang; but so doing they missed the elastic and infectious spontaneity that will be theirs when this taking of thought before song becomes as second nature to them. Yet thanks to it, they attained an unerring intonation, an unflagging precision, a roundness of phrase, a warmth and a fineness of shading, an intelligent sense of the music in hand as a whole tonal and expressive fabric, and a ready responsiveness to every indication, especially in rhythm and modulation, of the conductors, that set them, as it sets Mr. Townsend's chorus, high above the routine of the species. The instrument, yesterday, of these qualities was, moreover, voices young, fresh, unclouded, grateful, that Dr. Muck in particular wrought into elastic fusion with the orchestra. Above all else, however, it was the intelligence of the chorus that, again as with Mr. Townsend's, makes it serviceable and desirable for Symphony Concerts and for the music likely to be sung thereat. Background tells even in a chorus and minds have part as well as voices in choral singing. They have their large and dominant part also in the making of all music. Else would Dr. Muck not be what he is as conductor; so master of his music, his orchestra, his audience and himself; so acclaimed as he was yesterday from stage and auditorium; and so able and disposed to lift choral music from the slough in which it has long lain moribund in this town and raise it to the level on which he sustains symphonic.

Contrary to current rumor that has made way into blundering print, there will be no concerts of choral music in the regular series of Symphony Concerts next season. Such choral singing as is heard in them under Dr. Muck will be merely incidental to symphonic pieces, as in Liszt's "Faust Symphony" or in Busoni's "Turandot" last winter. In them, the relatively small chorus and the orchestra filled the stage. The employment of a more numerous chorus, such for instance as that used yesterday in the concert for the Pension Fund, requires an additional platform to make room for which five or more rows of seats must be removed from the parquet. Obviously to do this on two or three occasions in a series of concerts with these very seats taken by subscription is impossible. Hence such concerts of choral music of large dimensions as are contemplated under Dr. Muck will fall outside the regular Symphony Concerts. Moreover, only one, and not three, is at present projected—a performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony next November with a chorus four hundred strong assembled from various choirs, the Symphony Orchestra and a quartet of solo singers for which Miss Hempel and Mr. Hackett have already been engaged. Upon the fortunes that attend the preparation and the reception of this concert will depend any others of similar nature.

The chorus from Harvard and Radcliffe that was heard with such lively pleasure by the audience at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon announces a concert of its own on Thursday evening, April 12, in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge. It will then repeat the motet from Bach that it sang eloquently on Sunday and undertake various other pieces—among them Debussy's three madrigals to mediæval verse as yet unheard hereabouts.

FROM the HERALD APRIL 7, 1917.

GIVE SECOND CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND

Symphony Orchestra, Assisted by Radcliffe Choral Society and the Harvard Glee Club, Plays to Crowded Hall, with Many Persons Standing—Dr. Muck Conducts.

COMBINED CHORUS OF 200 VOICES IS HEARD

By PHILIP HALE.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, gave a second concert in aid of the pension fund yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. There was a great audience. Many stood. The orchestra was assisted by the Radcliffe Choral Society, Mrs. H. H. Gallison director, and the Harvard University Glee Club—a combined chorus of 200 voices.

The program was as follows: Rheinberger, theme and variations for violin and organ, Op. 150 (John P. Marshall, organist, and the entire violin section); J. C. Bach, Motet, "I Wrestle and Pray," conducted by Dr. A. T. Davidson; Wagner, prelude to "Tristan and Isolde"; Brahms's, "Song of Destiny," Op. 54, conducted by Dr. Muck; Wagner, prelude to "Parsifal." Selections from "Siegfried" and "Goetterdaemmerung" (arranged by Richter); Funeral Music from "Goetterdaemmerung"; overture to "Tannhaeuser."

Rheinberger's theme has a simple beauty, and the variations are not forcer or too pedantic; they are true variations in which the theme does not remind one of blindman's buff. Mr. Marshall registrated tastefully and with a fine sense of proportion. The violins were eloquent.

The chorus, which generously assisted, was conspicuous in the motet and in Brahms's cantata for vocal freshness. The voices were young, without the tang and bitterness that come from long experience. The singers had been admirably drilled. Seldom have we heard a chorus that was so fully in sympathy with the orchestra. There was one great homogeneous body, responsive to the silghtest wish of the conductors. The attack was remarkably precise; there was full volume; and, above all, there was a command of nuances that many small choruses might well envy.

The motet has more than historic interest, whether it were written by Sebastian Bach or by his uncle, Johann Christoph. As for Brahms's "Song of Destiny," it is among his most poetic and imaginative works. Hoelderlin's pessimistic, poem, contrasting the serene life of the immortals with that of the complaining millions of men appealed to Brahms, for there was in the man a peculiar melancholy. The late John F. Runciman insisted that Brahms, like Tschaikowsky, was terribly afraid of death, but in a less manly fashion, if the statement be not paradoxical. There was a defiant note in Tschaikowsky's fear; while Brahms often came dangerously near whining at the thought of the inevitable; nor did he show the resignation that characterizes so many of the Greek poets in their everlasting farewell to earth and sky. Yet in this instance Brahms was not content to end his cantata in Hoelderlin's gloomy vein. For once he had hope, perhaps faith; and so he added an orchestral postlude that is one of the most beautiful and impressive pages in all his literature.

With this postlude the concert might have ended; but there was pleasure in store for the lovers of Wagner, whose music was played under the direction of Dr. Muck, famous as a conductor of Wagner's music dramas in the opera houses of Germany and at Bayreuth. At the same time the impression left by that page of Brahms remained through the solemn prelude to "Parsifal" and the brilliant music from the "Ring" with the magnificent dirge from "The Dusk of the Gods."

Yesterday the Herald published the opinions of the critics in Boston when there was a Boston Symphony chorus under Mr. Nikisch. We well remember the performances. They were lame and impotent. The strictures were deserved. Even Mr. Apthorp, who usually took a cheerful view of musical conditions in Boston, did not see the necessity of choral concerts in the Symphony course.

The times have changed. Dr. Muck has been most fortunate in the choruses provided for him this season. The male chorus that sang in Liszt's "Faust," excited the admiration even of New York critics, who dislike Liszt and all his works. With the Boston chorus at Dr. Muck's disposal, and with the chorus that assisted yesterday, there is every reason why great choral works should be performed occasionally in the concerts of the Symphony orchestra. It is already rumored that there will be at least three choral performances next season. There is talk of Beethoven's 9th symphony, Bach's Passion music according to Matthew, and possibly a symphony by Mahler. May the rumor turn out to be a fact!

FROM the GLOBE APRIL 7, 1917.

REMARKABLE CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND

Wagner Music Recreated by Dr Muck

Appearance of Combined Choral Bodies of Harvard and Radcliffe

Another concert for the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon, brought excerpts from the Wagerian music dramas, played as only Dr Muck and this orchestra can pla them, and for a novelty at these concerts, the appearance of the united choral bod[illegible] and which Dr A. T. Davison is conductor and the Radcliffe Choral Society, directed by Mrs H. H. Gallison, made a combined chorus of some 200 voices. Dr Davison conducted Bach's motet, "I Wrestle and Pray."

The body of tone of the singers from Cambridge is fresh and agreeable; that of the men in particular is pleasing in quality, expressive and well balanced in the two parts. Full maturity of voice and resultant power in dramatic effects is not to be expected in these young voices, but their singing indicates musicianship; it is in tune; there is precision in attacking and dismissing a phrase; there is a sensitive regard for fineness in shading which would serve as a model for older choral singers than they; indeed, as Brahms' "Song of Fate" showed, with Dr Muck conducting, there was interpretation of text in a manner to denote technical skill and imagination, and with these the large share of credit due Dr Davison for his preparation.

The concert began with Rheinberger's "Theme and Variations" for violin and organ, op 150, played by John P. Marshall and the entire section of violins, phrasing with a unanimity, observing a purity of intonation and obtaining a burning intensity of tone in the soaring climaxes that was remarkable to see and hear. Between the two choral numbers came the prelude to "Tristan and Isolda," played with a sublimation of feeling on even a broader scale than Dr Muck is remembered to have taken it before.

But the great moments of the concert come in the performance of the prelude to "Parsifal," one of the most rapt and ecstatic embodiments of religious or noble thought in orchestral tone which even under Dr Muck's administration it has been the fortune of these audiences to hear. In this great document, wherein Wagner coped with the soul in flight better than in many of the dreary passages of the opera which follows it, in the selections also from the music of the superbly joyous, exultant young "Siegfried" and from "Goetterdaemerung" in Hans Richter's arrangement, and probably above all in the Funeral Music from the latter, did Dr Muck reach mountain tops lofty even for him.

There was the note of pontifical solemnity, of majestic splendor beyond the plane of the things of earth, and withal a note as of ominous prophecy in this music in the late afternoon of a day which may stand as a threshold. Such conducting is supreme recreation. Few who heard ever can forget it. The overture to "Tannhauser" came last. An audience which had left no room to sit or stand stayed to applaud.

FROM the Journal APRIL 2, 1917

HUNDREDS TURNED AWAY AT SYMPHONY BENEFIT

Hundreds were unable to get into Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon to hear the concert in aid of the pension fund. There was not a seat to be had when the doors were opened, and many stood along the side of the hall. The Symphony Orchestra was assisted by the Radcliffe Choral Society, directed by Mrs. H. H. Gallison, and the Harvard Glee Club, directed by A. T. Davidson.

At the conclusion of Brahms' "Song of Destiny," applause continued several minutes.

From Bulletin

Address: Providence R I.

Date

Ethel Leginska

English Pianist Will be Soloist At Boston Symphony Concert At Infantry Hall Next Tuesday Evening.

Ethel Leginska, the English pianist, will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its sixth and last concert in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening. Madame Leginska will play Rubinstein's concerto for piano and orchestra in D-minor. Other numbers on the programme will be the "Jupiter" symphony by Mozart and the Introduction and Bacchanale from the first act of the Paris version of "Tannhauser."

[109]

JOURNAL

Providence, R. I.

APR 8 - 1917

THE final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday evening will naturally be the most important musical event, not only of the week but probably of the post-Lenten season, proving especially significant as putting an end to the custom of a series of six concerts which has prevailed here for several years. So far there has been little outspoken expression in regard to the proposed change, although individuals here and there have deplored the prospect. But in these uncertain times next fall seems far away and concerts of less moment than other events. What seems most vital concerning the Boston Symphony Orchestra at present, is its final appearance here under existing conditions.

Brown Alumni are taking great interest in the concert to be given a week later by the Brown musical clubs in Churchill house, when following the custom of Harvard graduates who have made the Harvard concerts here important social events, they will manifest their interest in supporting the local clubs so that it is likely that both from a musical and social standpoint the approaching concert will be one of the most important in the annals of such events at Brown.

Ethel Leginska

English Pianist with Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday.

Easter music in the churches to-day will be elaborate and in the production of masterpieces for choir and organ, many extra singers and instrumentalists will be employed.

* * *

The season of Symphony concerts will come to an end next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall with the sixth and last appearance this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As frequently announced, the present season is the last in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give six concerts here, as next season the number will be reduced to three, the series will become the Ellis Course and while there will still be six concerts, there of them will be given by distinguished artists. One of these will bring here a quartet of singers from the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York; Martinelli, tenor; Mabel Garrison, soprano; Sophie Braslau, contralto, and Arthur Middleton, baritone. Another concert will be a joint appearance of Louise Homer, the American contralto, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, while the third of the artists' concerts will be a recital by Fritz Kreisler.

As announced last week, the soloist on Tuesday evening will be the pianist, Ethel Leginska; the symphony will be the "Jupiter," more than a century and a quarter old, which sounds as fresh to-day as when it was written, since in spirit it is modern enough to have ben written within the last 25 years.

Madame Leginska will play Rubinstein's Concerto in D-Minor, one of the greater works for piano and orchestra, written by one of the greatest pianists the world has ever known who ranks high as a composer. It has all those qualities of brilliancy and substance that one demands in a masterpiece.

The third and final number on the programme will be the Introduction and Bacchanale from the first act of the Paris version of "Tannhauser," written to conform to the fact that when the Grand Opera of Paris accepted "Tannhauser" for production in 1860, it made its acceptance conditional on the introduction of a ballet, in order to conform with the traditions of the house. Wagner cut out the Coda to the Overture and enlarged the Venusberg Scene, introducing a Bacchanale and connecting the two to be played without pause. The work is interesting, showing Wagner at the height of his powers.

The programme in its proper order is as follows: Mozart, symphony in C-major, "Jupiter;" Rubinstein, concerto in D-minor, for piano and orchestra; Wagner, Introduction and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," Act 1, Paris version.

From the HERALD APRIL 7, 1917

20TH SYMPHONY CONCERT HELD, CULP SINGS

Dr. Muck Conducts Varied Program—Clapp Composition in E Flat Major Is Led by Its Originator—Is an Improvement on His First Played Here Three Years Ago.

ORGAN IS CONTRASTED WITH MODERN ORCHESTRA

By PHILIP HALE.

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The soloists were Mme. Julia Culp, mezzo-soprano, and John P. Marshall, organist. The program was as follows: Clapp, Symphony in E flat major (first performance); songs with orchestra; Schubert, Sei mir gegruesst, and Staendchen; R. Strauss, Morgen; Cesar Franck Symphonic piece from "The Redemption"; songs with orchestra: Wolf, Verborgenheit; Mahler. Ich atmet' einen Lindenduft and Rheinlegendchen; Chadwick, Theme, Variations and Fugue for organ and orchestra.

Mr. Clapp conducted his symphony, which was composed in 1916-17; the first two movements in Hanover, N. H., where Mr. Clapp lives as director of music at Dartmouth College; the finale in Boston. This symphony is an improvement on his first symphony performed here three years ago; it is less pedagogic; the ideas are clearer defined and have more musical importance. The second symphony also has the merit of being shorter than the first; less complex, less involved.

There are some fine moments in the first movement; the concluding section of the second movement, the music that suggests a dirge, is impressive. The finale is the least important, the least interesting of the three movements.

We have said that there are fine moments in the first movement. These ideas unfortunately suffer too often from cumbrous orchestration and a lack of effective contrasts in the development. Mr. Clapp employs a huge orchestra: three oboes, four clarinets, English horn, bass clarinet, eight horns (including a quartet of small tubas), five trumpets, everything in proportion; a swollen orchestra that does not aid him in musical expression. He uses the brass extravagantly, and at times curiously; as his emphasis by trumpet on the attack of a melodius phrase for strings. His employment of bells seems incongruous, without significance, even the disturbance of an otherwise pleasing musical thought. The whole work is injured by a lack of carity in the orchestration. We should like to hear the symphony scored skillfully for a much smaller orchestra. There have been poets who have begun by portentous epics. Thackeray poked fun at a contemporary, introducing him as one of the characters at Mrs. Perkins's ball. Mr. Clapp is a serious musician, a man of acknowledged talent, and he is to be taken seriously. Let us hope that he will give up for a time the writing of "colossal" works and learn to express himself simply, gracefully and beautifully.

The symphonic movement from Franck's "Redemption" is not an example of Franck at his greatest; the phrase for trombones, while it is energetic, is dangerously near the commonplace, but the long melodic phrase at the beginning is serenely beautiful, eminently Franckian, and it is used afterwards in a masterly manner. Note also the clearness throughout, the luminous thought and expression. Franck taking no less a subject than "the joy of the world which is changed and made radiant by the words of Christ" found an ordinary orchestra sufficient. Although he was an organist, he did not think it necessary to introduce that instrument, nor did he summon to the rescue an extra pair of kettle drums, cymbals, triangle, snare drum, bass drum, tom-tom, bells and two harps.

Mme. Culp, accompanied by the orchestra led by Dr. Muck, who was loudly applauded when he appeared, gave much pleasure by her voice and art. Schubert's "Sei mir gegruesst," however, seemed too long by reason of the unvaried treatment of the strophes, but this might be said of other songs by Schubert. Schoenberg's instrumentation for the "Serenade" is discreet and effective. Note again what can be done with a few instruments. Mahler's songs are melodically interesting, especially "Ich atmet' einen Lindenduft," and ingeniously orchestrated; witness the absence of violoncellos and double basses, the few wind instruments used unerringly. Mme. Culp sang with her accustomed fervor. She did not indulge as in the past in certain mannerisms, such as a vexing slowness in tempo to show her command of breath with injury to the melodic line. Her performance of "Rheinlegendchen" was vocally not so secure as that of the preceding songs, but she sang with delightful appreciation of the folk spirit.

Mr. Chadwick wrote his variations and fugue to show the possibilities of combining and contrasting a modern organ with the orchestra. It was said long ago [illegible] use of organ with orchestra was unwise; that the one would not brook a union with the other. This was said when organs were distinctively organs; with dominating diapason tone. The modern organ, devised to obtain orchestral effects, generally weak in true diapason quality, is another machine. Mr. Chadwick's piece, which was played at a Symphony concert eight years ago, when Wallace Goodrich was the organist, is well constructed to show his purpose.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Debussy, Gigues (first time here); Iberia, Rondes de Printemps; Schubert, Symphony in C major.

From the Traveler April 7, 1918.

NEW AMERICAN SYMPHONY MAKES GOOD IMPRESSION

A new symphony by an American composer in which the orchestra was led the composer was the feature of yesterday afternoon's Symphony concert. The symphony was that of Philip Greely Clapp of Dartmouth College. The program was: Clapp, symphony in E-flat major (first performance); songs with orchestra; Schubert, sei mir gegrusset, and Staendchen; R. Strauss, Morgan; Cesar Franck Symphonic piece from "The Redemption"; songs with orchestra; Wolf, Verborgenheit; Mahler. Ich atmet' einen Lindenduft and Rheinlegendchen; Chadwick, Theme, Variations and Fugue for organ and orchestra.

The symphony made a favorable impression as did also Mr. Clapp as conductor. Mr. Clapp is rather more fortunate in his use of the strings and woodwind than with the brasses. His work gives the impression of one who had a lot of things to say with time to complete but a few of them. There are too many abrupt changes for the full enjoyment of the work.

Mr. Clapp was several times recalled at the close of the number.

The apearance of Julia Culp, mezzo soprano, as soloist, was another feature of the concert. Her singing, ever a treat, is never more so than when she appears with the orchestra. Exceptionally fine work was done by the orchestra in the accompaniments. She was recalled and recalled.

Mr. Chadwick's number provided a fitting close for an interesting and varied concert. The reception accorded Dr. Muck was noticeably cordial.

From the Transcript April 9,1 17.

AT the Symphony Concert of Saturday Dr. Muck was applauded at his first entrance no less enthusiastically than on Friday, confirming the broad-mindedness of both audiences, who can separate their political opinions from their personal esteem and admiration. So, passing the critical test, may the season's Symphony Concerts be presumed to end in all good faith and good will. In respect to the music, there was a noticeable challenge which can hardly go unanswered in respect to the final piece for organ and orchestra by Mr. Chadwick. In every measure of the music Mr. Chadwick seems to say: "This question of the blending of the modern organ and orchestra has dawdled along beyond patience. Let us have it out, here and now." Whereupon he makes many variations upon an acceptable and lively theme, putting each medium through its separate and combined paces in every possible way, so that the work comprises a full argument and exposition. The whole proposition is laid forth in bald, unquestionable and workmanlike manner. The various woodwind stops are compared and contrasted with their originals, the organ makes a foundation or swells it, the full instrument speaks canonically with the full orchestra, and the pedal is exercised freely to its very lowest, making the very stones of the auditorium rumble "in sympathy." After it all, there seems nothing left to say, except the verdict, which must be a "no," for the piece eloquently makes its own detailed denial. The organ undoubtedly fills its wide and lasting place in the world, notably in those localities where the orchestra which it imitates is scarce—but so direct a comparison is as unfair to it as it is detrimental to its reputation. For those celestial stops become unlovely indeed in uncompromising juxtaposition to actual flutes, clarinets and the rest, and the larger harmonies which the "mixture" of stops produces may be assimilated equably at best only through long custom, but with its intricate overtones, confuses and clouds the orchestral mass of tone completely. It is an instrument of mechanical emotionalism, with a false dignity won and preserved by ancient association with the Church. Whether moving-picture shows will by lay associations eventually deprive it of this dignity is beside the point. Suffice it that traditional association permits its use in oratorios, that it is seldom used effectively even so, except to give body and impressiveness to a chorus, where a small and simple orchestra has limited voice for such a purpose. Perhaps it has never been used with a modern orchestra for lay purposes except in such an instance as the introduction to the very pagan "Zarathusta," where the pedal supplies a fulness and impressiveness of tone notably lacking in the lowest depths of orchestral range. Further argument or illustration is useless, for Mr. Chadwick's piece is at once definitive argument and illustration.

From the Globe April 28,1917.

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT BUT ONE

Miss Christie as Soloist Take Mme Kurt's Place

Mr Converse Conducts New Tone Poem at First Time Here

Mme Melanie Kurt, dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who was to have made her first appearance in Boston in concert, did not sing yesterday at the last symphony program on Friday but one of the season. Owing to illness, her place was hastily taken by Miss Winifred Christie, the young pianist who has played here twice in recital, once in one of the Sunday afternoon concerts, and has appeared as soloist in out-of-town concerts with the orchestra.

Frederick S. Converse conducted his new tone poem, "Ave atque Vale," now performed for the first time in Boston. He disclaims any attempt to write program music or the inspiration of any particular poem. His intention rather was "a subjective expression of the feelings of one who bids farewell at the call of duty to all that is infinitely loved and cherished." Mr Converse was warmly applauded and twice recalled.

The texture of the work is woven out of a long-breathed, songful phraseology, in general of a contemplative, reflective character, sombre, yet not repining nor elegiac; on the contrary, there is quiet purposefulness, strength, rising at moments to nobility. Growing from this reminiscent mood expressive of tenderness and devotion, appears a more agitated, terse rhythmic figuration, set off by accent, which rises to climaxes, two of them of marked emotional intensity. It may be that these are to suggest the shock of battle. The piece ends with the characteristics of the dirge.

Plastic Melodic Vein

In the development of the first theme, which influences strongly the entire composition, Mr Converse has shown a rich and plastic melodic vein. Contrapuntal invention and harmonic resource add to it. To adhere to one prevailing mood, not of wide emotional compass, one which cannot admit dramatic writing, but must rather remain subjective, yet not to overdo monotony in the development of a few salient ideas, as in rhythmic figuration, or in the relief of periods of stress and of repose, is a test in composition. Particularly in the long sustained lines approaching the climaxes Mr Converse has found a sympathetic orchestral expression of sentiments which, aside from their timeliness, have nobility and beauty. Mr Converse conveyed easily his wishes to the orchestra.

Miss Christie shows a musical nature just, discriminating, as yet judicial more than emotional, but in all keenly sensitive to what is beautiful and worthy of reverence. There was not a note of this fourth concerto of Beethoven, from the opening theme, announced by the piano alone with a majesty which is worshipful, wherein the pianist did not reveal the sincerity of her study and the purity of her ideals.

Her Mechanism Admirable

Her mechanism is admirable, her feeling that born of a fine mind and sense. It will be interesting to watch the growth of this unusual young artist, as she learns to command more broadly, to mold rhythm in such a work and such a hall rather than be swept along too much before it, to make her points with more authority, yet with no less spontaneity. Miss Christie was applauded with enthusiasm.

Dr Muck gave a beautiful reading of Brahms' second symphony, in these near-ending concerts; one to remember for its clearness, its definitely profiled moods—the lyric character of much of the first and second movements, the gracious caprice of the scherzo, the tumultous joy of the finale, which was not mere noise. A brilliant performance of Berlioz' overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" was added.

From the Post April 22,1917.

There continue to arise inquiries as to the future of the German conductor and the German players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, hence of the future of the concerts of the orchestra itself. An answer can be made briefly and reassuringly. As neither Dr. Muck, who is strongly in sympathy, as he has a perfect right to be, with his country in the present struggle, nor the players under him, have been convicted of utterances or actions unbecoming them in the present situation, they will remain where they are today, and be unmolested in their legitimate activities. Incidentally, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has almost completed the arrangements for next season's concerts in Boston and in the various cities which it visits each season.

THE POPS

The 32d season of Pop Concerts will open in Symphony Hall Monday evening, May 7, and continue for 10 weeks thereafter, the closing concert being given on Saturday evening, July 14. The characteristics which have made the Pop Concerts a unique institution of Boston and have held them in such high favor for so many years will be maintained. The concerts will run from 8 o'clock until about 11. A number of special nights have been arranged for, which will be announced in due course. The orchestra employed will number a minimum of 75 musicians.

From the Post April 1,1917.

This afternoon in Symphony Hall: Pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor. See special notice.

Tomorrow afternoon in Jordan Hall: Joint recital by Harold Bauer, pianist, and Jacques Thibaud, violinist. Sonatas for violin and piano by Mozart in B flat, Beethoven in G minor, op. 20, Cesar Franck in A major.

Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall: Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor. The first performance anywhere of Philip Clapp's symphony in G major, the composer conducting. This is Mr. Clapp's second symphony. The first, when performed some seasons ago by the Boston Symphony, aroused argument and invective. The second will be hearkened to with the more curiosity. The soloist at this concert will be Mme. Julia Culp. She will sing Schubert's "Sei mir gegrusst" and "Standchen," with accompaniments orchestrated by Arnold Schonberg; Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," Mahler's "Ich atmet einen Lindenluft" and "Rheinlegendchen." The other orchestral pieces will be the symphonic piece from Franck's poem-symphony, "The Redemption" and George W. Chadwick's "Theme, Variations and Fugue" for organ and orchestra.

Saturday afternoon in Symphony Hall: Last recital this season in Boston by Ignace Paderewski. The Brahms-Handel Variations, Beethoven's sonata in B flat, op. 27, Schumann's "Carnival," Ballade in F minor, Three Etudes, Nocturne in G major, Mazurka and Scherzo in B flat minor, Chopin.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The second concert of the season in aid of the pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall this (Sunday) afternoon at half past 3. For the first time in nearly 12 years a chorus will be used. Choral music in Harvard University has made great strides of late under the direction of Dr. A. T. Davison and Mrs. H. H. Gallison. Mrs. Gallison has succesfully organized and directed the Radcliffe Choral Society of over 100 voices, and under Dr. Davison's leadership the Harvard University Glee Club has been enlarged and has accomplished much. Dr. Davison has been drilling these two choruses during the past winter and Dr. Muck was so greatly pleased with their singing that he invited them to assist in this pension fund concert. Altogether there will be about 200 voices.

The choral numbers will be a Motet, "I Wrestle and Pray," by Bach, and Brahms' "Song of Destiny." The latter work was first done in Boston in 1890 by the Cecilia Society and three years later it was heard at the Symphony concerts under Mr. Nikisch.

The programme will open with the Rheinberger theme and variations for violin and organ, Opus 150. The organ part of this will be played by Mr. John P. Marshall, while instead of a solo violin Dr. Muck will employ the entire section of 30 violins. The rest of the programme will be Wagner. In its entirety it is as follows:

Theme and Variations for Violin and Organ, Opus 150 ..... Rheinberger
Motet, "I wrestle and pray" ..... Bach
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wagner
Song of Destiny ..... Brahms
Prelude to "Parsifal," Selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung," Funeral Music from "Gotterdammerung," Overture to "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner

From the Transcript April 4,1917.

THE NEW SYMPHONY

A Note from Mr. P. G. Clapp About His Music to Be Played for the First Times at the Symphony Concerts of This Week

AT the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the orchestra will play for the first times anywhere a new symphony by Philip Greeley Clapp, professor of music in Dartmouth College, conductor as well as composer, writer for the reviews as well as teacher of students. The new piece, to be played from manuscript with the composer conducting, is Mr. Clapp's third symphony in succession to his first, which he regards as too experimental for performance and his second heard at the Symphony Concerts a few years ago. It bears no other title than the routine "Symphony in E-flat Major, No. 3," and it is without programme in the usual sense of that word as applied to music. Concerning the course and the character of the symphony, however, Mr. Clapp has courteously handed to The Transcript the following note:

The new symphony in E-flat has but three movements, of which the last is the shortest. The first is exuberant in character, except for two short episodes soon after the beginning, one of which forecasts the agitation of the second movement and the other the eventual peaceful conclusion. In contrast with the confident enthusiasm of the first movement, the second movement is in part agitated and full of strife, in part contemplative in a very serious manner. The finale begins playfully, and ends calmly and happily. A large modern orchestra is called for in the score, but except in the second movement there is little complexity.

The foregoing arrangement of movements and succession of moods may arouse suspicion of a "programme." To enter life buoyantly in a spirit of adventure must be a common experience among young men; to find experience somewhat grimmer than dreams is surely not unheard of, and to cleave to idealism in such circumstances is widely recommended; while to emerge from experience into a happiness less boisterous but more understanding than the easy confidence of youth and consequently more lasting and helpful, is what most thoughtful men try to accomplish. These three states of feeling are not out of keeping with the successive movements of the new symphony; the hearer who probes for more descriptive detail will not find it, unless he introduces it himself.

Technically the symphony is not radical. The succession of a brilliant, a stormy, and a quiet movement is not new; Schumann's C major Fantasy for pianoforte offers a stormy, a brilliant and a quiet movement in succession. In this symphony there are no "generative" themes—though the coda of the finale reminisces a bit concerning the other movements—but passages in different movements designed to recall each other sometimes use the same keys and instruments without actually quoting themes. The harmonies are in the main rather diatonic and the contrapuntal texture simple. The formal treatment is free but not involved: the first movement has three themes, the others two each. A large orchestra is used for the sake of sonority, but the score is not intricate. The entire symphony is less than forty minutes in length.

[116]

JOURNAL

Providence, R. I.

APR 8 - 1917

THE final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday evening will naturally be the most important musical event, not only of the week but probably of the post-Lenten season, proving especially significant as putting an end to the custom of a series of six concerts which has prevailed here for several years. So far there has been little outspoken expression in regard to the proposed change, although individuals here and there have deplored the prospect. But in these uncertain times next fall seems far away and concerts of less moment than other events. What seems most vital concerning the Boston Symphony Orchestra at present, is its final appearance here under existing conditions.

Brown Alumni are taking great interest in the concert to be given a week later by the Brown musical clubs in Churchill house, when following the custom of Harvard graduates who have made the Harvard concerts here important social events, they will manifest their interest in supporting the local clubs so that it is likely that both from a musical and social standpoint the approaching concert will be one of the most important in the annals of such events at Brown.

Ethel Leginska

English Pianist with Boston Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday.

Easter music in the churches to-day will be elaborate and in the production of masterpieces for choir and organ, many extra singers and instrumentalists will be employed.

* * *

The season of Symphony concerts will come to an end next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall with the sixth and last appearance this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As frequently announced, the present season is the last in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give six concerts here, as next season the number will be reduced to three, the series will become the Ellis Course and while there will still be six concerts, there of them will be given by distinguished artists. One of these will bring here a quartet of singers from the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York; Martinelli, tenor; Mabel Garrison, soprano; Sophie Braslau, contralto, and Arthur Middleton, baritone. Another concert will be a joint appearance of Louise Homer, the American contralto, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, while the third of the artists" concerts will be a recital by Fritz Kreisler.

As announced last week, the soloist on Tuesday evening will be the pianist, Ethel Leginska; the symphony will be the "Jupiter," more than a century and a quarter old, which sounds as fresh to-day as when it was written, since in spirit it is modern enough to have ben written within the last 25 years.

Madame Leginska will play Rubinstein's Concerto in D-Minor, one of the greater works for piano and orchestra, written by one of the greatest pianists the world has ever known who ranks high as a composer. It has all those qualities of brilliancy and substance that one demands in a masterpiece.

The third and final number on the programme will be the Introduction and Bacchanale from the first act of the Paris version of "Tannhauser," written to conform to the fact that when the Grand Opera of Paris accepted "Tannhauser" for production in 1860, it made its acceptance conditional on the introduction of a ballet, in order to conform with the traditions of the house. Wagner cut out the Coda to the Overture and enlarged the Venusberg Scene, introducing a Bacchanale and connecting the two to be played without pause. The work is interesting, showing Wagner at the height of his powers.

The programme in its proper order is as follows: Mozart, symphony in C-major, "Jupiter;" Rubinstein, concerto in D-minor, for piano and orchestra; Wagner, Introduction and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," Act 1, Paris version.

From the HERALD APRIL 7, 1917

20TH SYMPHONY CONCERT HELD, CULP SINGS

Dr. Muck Conducts Varied Program—Clapp Composition in E Flat Major Is Led by Its Originator—Is an Improvement on His First Played Here Three Years Ago.

ORGAN IS CONTRASTED WITH MODERN ORCHESTRA

By PHILIP HALE.

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The soloists were Mme. Julia Culp, mezzo-soprano, and John P. Marshall, organist. The program was as follows: Clapp, Symphony in E flat major (first performance); songs with orchestra; Schubert, Sei mir gegruesst, and Staendchen; R. Strauss, Morgen; Cesar Franck Symphonic piece from "The Redemption"; songs with orchestra: Wolf, Verborgenheit; Mahler, Ich atmet' einen Lindenduft and Rheinlegendchen; Chadwick, Theme, Variations and Fugue for organ and orchestra.

Mr. Clapp conducted his symphony, which was composed in 1916-17; the first two movements in Hanover, N. H., where Mr. Clapp lives as director of music at Dartmouth College; the finale in Boston. This symphony is an improvement on his first symphony performed here three years ago; it is less pedagogic; the ideas are clearer defined and have more musical importance. The second symphony also has the merit of being shorter than the first; less complex, less involved.

There are some fine moments in the first movement; the concluding section of the second movement, the music that suggests a dirge, is impressive. The finale is the least important, the least interesting of the three movements.

We have said that there are fine moments in the first movement. These ideas unfortunately suffer too often from cumbrous orchestration and a lack of effective contrasts in the development. Mr. Clapp employs a huge orchestra: three oboes, four clarinets, English horn, bass clarinet, eight horns (including a quartet of small tubas), five trumpets, everything in proportion; a swollen orchestra that does not aid him in musical expression. He uses the brass extravagantly, and at times curiously; as his emphasis by trumpet on the attack of a melodius phrase for strings. His employment of bells seems incongruous, without significance, even the disturbance of an otherwise pleasing musical thought. The whole work is injured by a lack of carity in the orchestration. We should like to hear the symphony scored skillfully for a much smaller orchestra. There have been poets who have begun by portentous epics. Thackeray poked fun at a contemporary, introducing him as one of the characters at Mrs. Perkins's ball. Mr. Clapp is a serious musician, a man of acknowledged talent, and he is to be taken seriously. Let us hope that he will give up for a time the writing of "colossai" works and learn to express himself simply, gracefully and beautifully.

The symphonic movement from Franck's "Redemption" is not an example of Franck at his greatest; the phrase for trombones, while it is energetic, is dangerously near the commonplace, but the long melodic phrase at the beginning is serenely beautiful, eminently Franckian, and it is used afterwards in a masterly manner. Note also the clearness throughout, the luminous thought and expression. Franck taking no less a subject than "the joy of the world which is changed and made radiant by the words of Christ" found an ordinary orchestra sufficient. Although he was an organist, he did not think it necessary to introduce that instrument, nor did he summon to the rescue an extra pair of kettle drums, cymbals, triangle, snare drum, bass drum, tom-tom, bells and two harps.

Mme. Culp, accompanied by the orchestra led by Dr. Muck, who was loudly applauded when he appeared, gave much pleasure by her voice and art. Schubert's "Sei mir gegruesst," however, seemed too long by reason of the unvaried treatment of the strophes, but this might be said of other songs by Schubert. Schoenberg's instrumentation for the "Serenade" is discreet and effective. Note again what can be done with a few instruments. Mahler's songs are melodically interesting, especially "Ich atmet' einen Lindenduft," and ingeniously orchestrated; witness the absence of violoncellos and double basses, the few wind instruments used unerringly. Mme. Culp sang with her accustomed fervor. She did not indulge as in the past in certain mannerisms, such as a vexing slowness in tempo to show her command of breath with injury to the melodic line. Her performance of "Rheinlegendchen" was vocally not so secure as that of the preceding songs, but she sang with delightful appreciation of the folk spirit.

Mr. Chadwick wrote his variations and fugue to show the possibilities of combining and contrasting a modern organ with the orchestra. It was said long ago that the use of organ with orchestra was unwise; that the one would not brook a union with the other. This was said when organs were distinctively organs; with dominating diapason tone. The modern organ, devised to obtain orchestral effects, generally weak in true diapason quality, is another machine. Mr. Chadwick's piece, which was played at a Symphony concert eight years ago, when Wallace Goodrich was the organist, is well constructed to show his purpose.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Debussy, Gigues (first time here); Iberia, Rondes de Printemps; Schubert, Symphony in C major.

From the Traveler April 7, 1918.

NEW AMERICAN SYMPHONY MAKES GOOD IMPRESSION

A new symphony by an American composer in which the orchestra was led the composer was the feature of yesterday afternoon's Symphony concert. The symphony was that of Philip Greely Clapp of Dartmouth College. The program was: Clapp, syniphony in E-flat major (first performance); songs with orchestra: Schubert, sei mir gegrusset, and Staendchen; R. Strauss, Morgan; Cesar Franck Symphonic piece from "The Redemption"; songs with orchestra; Wolf, Verborgenheit; Mahler. Ich atmet' einen Lindenduft and Rheinlegendchen; Chadwick, Theme, Variations and Fugue for organ and orchestra.

The symphony made a favorable impression as did also Mr. Clapp as conductor. Mr. Clapp is rather more fortunate in his use of the strings and woodwind than with the brasses. His work gives the impression of one who had a lot of things to say with time to complete but a few of them. There are too many abrupt changes for the full enjoyment of the work.

Mr. Clapp was several times recalled at the close of the number.

The apeparance of Julia Culp, mezzo soprano, as soloist, was another feature of the concert. Her singing, ever a treat, is never more so than when she appears with the orchestra. Exceptionally fine work was done by the orchestra in the accompaniments. She was recalled and recalled.

Mr. Chadwick's number provided a fitting close for an interesting and varied concert. The reception accorded Dr. Muck was noticeably cordial.

From the Transcript April 9, 17.

AT the Symphony Concert of Saturday Dr. Muck was applauded at his first entrance no less enthusiastically than on Friday, confirming the broad-mindedness of both audiences, who can separate their political opinions from their personal esteem and admiration. So, passing the critical test, may the season's Symphony Concerts be presumed to end in all good faith and good will. In respect to the music, there was a noticeable challenge which can hardly go unanswered in respect to the final piece for organ and orchestra by Mr. Chadwick. In every measure of the music Mr. Chadwick seems to say: "This question of the blending of the modern organ and orchestra has dawdled along beyond patience. Let us have it out, here and now." Whereupon he makes many variations upon an acceptable and lively theme, putting each medium through its separate and combined paces in every possible way, so that the work comprises a full argument and exposition. The whole proposition is laid forth in bald, unquestionable and workmanlike manner. The various woodwind stops are compared and contrasted with their originals, the organ makes a foundation or swells it, the full instrument speaks canonically with the full orchestra, and the pedal is exercised freely to its very lowest, making the very stones of the auditorium rumble "in sympathy." After it all, there seems nothing left to say, except the verdict, which must be a "no," for the piece eloquently makes its own detailed denial. The organ undoubtedly fills its wide and lasting place in the world, notably in those localities where the orchestra which it imitates is scarce—but so direct a comparison is as unfair to it as it is detrimental to its reputation. For those celestial stops become unlovely indeed in uncompromising juxtaposition to actual flutes, clarinets and the rest, and the larger harmonies which the "mixture" of stops produces may be assimilated equably at best only through long custom, but with its intricate overtones, confuses and clouds the orchestral mass of tone completely. It is an instrument of mechanical emotionalism, with a false dignity won and preserved by ancient association with the Church. Whether moving-picture shows will by lay associations eventually deprive it of this dignity is beside the point. Suffice it that traditional association permits its use in oratorios, that it is seldom used effectively even so, except to give body and impressiveness to a chorus, where a small and simple orchestra has limited voice for such a purpose. Perhaps it has never been used with a modern orchestra for lay purposes except in such an instance as the introduction to the very pagan "Zarathusta," where the pedal supplies a fulness and impressiveness of tone notably lacking in the lowest depths of orchestral range. Further argument or illustration is useless, for Mr. Chadwick's piece is at once definitive argument and illustration.

[116]

From the Globe April 28, 1917.

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT BUT ONE

Miss Christie as Soloist Take Mme Kurt's Place

Mr Converse Conducts New Tone Poem at First Time Here

Mme Melanie Kurt, dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who was to have made her first appearance in Boston in concert, did not sing yesterday at the last symphony program on Friday but one of the season. Owing to illness, her place was hastily taken by Miss Winifred Christie, the young pianist who has played here twice in recital, once in one of the Sunday afternoon concerts, and has appeared as soloist in out-of-town concerts with the orchestra.

Frederick S. Converse conducted his new tone poem, "Ave atque Vale," now performed for the first time in Boston. He disclaims any attempt to write program music or the inspiration of any particular poem. His intention rather was "a subjective expression of the feelings of one who bids farewell at the call of duty to all that is infinitely loved and cherished." Mr Converse was warmly applauded and twice recalled.

The texture of the work is woven out of a long-breathed, songful phraseology, in general of a contemplative, reflective character, sombre, yet not repining nor elegiac; on the contrary, there is quiet purposefulness, strength, rising at moments to nobility. Growing from this reminiscent mood expressive of tenderness and devotion, appears a more agitated, terse rhythmic figuration, set off by accent, which rises to climaxes, two of them of marked emotional intensity. It may be that these are to suggest the shock of battle. The piece ends with the characteristics of the dirge.

Plastic Melodic Vein

In the development of the first theme, which influences strongly the entire composition, Mr Converse has shown a rich and plastic melodic vein. Contrapuntal invention and harmonic resource add to it. To adhere to one prevailing mood, not of wide emotional compass, one which cannot admit dramatic writing, but must rather remain subjective, yet not to overdo monotony in the development of a few salient ideas, as in rhythmic figuration, or in the relief of periods of stress and of repose, is a test in composition. Particularly in the long sustained lines approaching the climaxe Mr Converse has found a sympatheti orchestral expression of sentiments which, aside from their timeliness, have nobility and beauty. Mr Converse conveyed easily his wishes to the orchestra

Miss Christie shows a musical nature just, discriminating, as yet judicial more than emotional, but in all keenly sensitive to what is beautiful and worthy of reverence. There was not a note of this fourth concerto of Beethoven, from the opening theme, announced by the piano alone with a majesty which is worshipful, wherein the pianist did not reveal the sincerity of her study and the purity of her ideals

Her Mechanism Admirable

Her mechanism is admirable, her feeling that born of a fine mind and sense. It will be interesting to watch the growth of this unusual young artist, as she learns to command more broadly, to mold rhythm in such a work and such a hall rather than be swept along too much before it, to make her points with more authority, yet with no less spontaneity. Miss Christie was applauded with enthusiasm.

Dr Muck gave a beautiful reading of Brahms' second symphony, in these near-ending concerts; one to remember for its clearness, its definitely profiled moods—the lyric character of much of the first and second movements, the gracious caprice of the scherzo, the tumultous joy of the finale, which was not mere noise. A brilliant performance of Berlioz' overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" was added.

From the Post April 22, 1917.

There continue to arise inquiries as to the future of the German conductor and the German players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, hence of the future of the concerts of the orchestra itself. An answer can be made briefly and reassuringly. As neither Dr. Muck, who is strongly in sympathy, as he has a perfect right to be, with his country in the present struggle, nor the players under him, have been convicted of utterances or actions unbecoming them in the present situation, they will remain where they are today, and be unmolested in their legitimate activities. Incidentally, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has almost completed the arrangements for next season's concerts in Boston and in the various cities which it visits each season.

THE POPS

The 32d season of Pop Concerts will open in Symphony Hall Monday evening, May 7, and continue for 10 weeks thereafter, the closing concert being given on Saturday evening, July 14. The characteristics which have made the Pop Concerts a unique institution of Boston and have held them in such high favor for so many years will be maintained. The concerts will run from 8 o'clock until about 11. A number of special nights have been arranged for which will be announced in due course. The orchestra employed will number a minimum of 75 musicians.

From the Post April 1, 1917.

This afternoon in Symphony Hall: Pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor. See special notice.

Tomorrow afternoon in Jordan Hall: Joint recital by Harold Bauer, pianist, and Jacques Thibaud, violinist. Sonatas for violin and piano by Mozart in B flat, Beethoven in G minor, op. 20, Cesar Franck in A major.

Friday afternoon in Symphony Hall: Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor. The first performance anywhere of Philip Clapp's symphony in G major, the composer conducting. This is Mr. Clapp's second symphony. The first, when performed some seasons ago by the Boston Symphony, aroused argument and invective. The second will be hearkened to with the more curiosity. The soloist at this concert will be Mme. Julia Culp. She will sing Schubert's "Sei mir gegrusst" and "Standchen," with accompaniments orchestrated by Arnold Schonberg; Hugo Wolf's "Verborgenheit," Mahler's "Ich atmet einen Lindenluft" and "Rheinlegendchen." The other orchestral pieces will be the symphonic piece from Franck's poem-symphony, "The Redemption" and George W. Chadwick's "Theme, Variations and Fugue" for organ and orchestra.

Saturday afternoon in Symphony Hall: Last recital this season in Boston by Ignace Paderewski. The Brahms-Handel Variations, Beethoven's sonata in B flat, op. 27, Schumann's "Carnival," Ballade in F minor, Three Etudes, Nocturne in G major, Mazurka and Scherzo in B flat minor, Chopin.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The second concert of the season in aid of the pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall this (Sunday) afternoon at half past 3. For the first time in nearly 12 years a chorus will be used. Choral music in Harvard University has made great strides of late under the direction of Dr. A. T. Davison and Mrs. H. H. Gallison. Mrs. Gallison has succesfully organized and directed the Radcliffe Choral Society of over 100 voices, and under Dr. Davison's leadership the Harvard University Glee Club has been enlarged and has accomplished much. Dr. Davison has been drilling these two choruses during the past winter and Dr. Muck was so greatly pleased with their singing that he invited them to assist in this pension fund concert. Altogether there will be about 200 voices.

The choral numbers will be a Motet, "I Wrestle and Pray," by Bach, and Brahms' "Song of Destiny." The latter work was first done in Boston in 1890 by the Cecilia Society and three years later it was heard at the Symphony concerts under Mr. Nikisch.

The programme will open with the Rheinberger theme and variations for violin and organ, Opus 150. The organ part of this will be played by Mr. John P. Marshall, while instead of a solo violin Dr. Muck will employ the entire section of 30 violins. The rest of the programme will be Wagner. In its entirety it is as follows:

Theme and Variations for Violin and Organ, Opus 150 ..... Rheinberger
Motet, "I wrestle and pray" ..... Bach
Prelude to "Tristan and Isolde" ..... Wagner
Song of Destiny ..... Brahms
Prelude to "Parsifal," Selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung," Funeral Music from "Gotterdammerung," Overture to "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner

From the Transcript April 4, 1917.

THE NEW SYMPHONY

A Note from Mr. P. G. Clapp About His Music to Be Played for the First Times at the Symphony Concerts of This Week

AT the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the orchestra will play for the first times anywhere a new symphony by Philip Greeley Clapp, professor of music in Dartmouth College, conductor as well as composer, writer for the reviews as well as teacher of students. The new piece, to be played from manuscript with the composer conducting, is Mr. Clapp's third symphony in succession to his first, which he regards as too experimental for performance and his second heard at the Symphony Concerts a few years ago. It bears no other title than the routine "Symphony in E-flat Major, No. 3," and it is without programme in the usual sense of that word as applied to music. Concerning the course and the character of the symphony, however, Mr. Clapp has courteously handed to The Transcript the following note:

The new symphony in E-flat has but three movements, of which the last is the shortest. The first is exuberant in character, except for two short episodes soon after the beginning, one of which forecasts the agitation of the second movement and the other the eventual peaceful conclusion. In contrast with the confident enthusiasm of the first movement, the second movement is in part agitated and full of strife, in part contemplative in a very serious manner. The finale begins playfully, and ends calmly and happily. A large modern orchestra is called for in the score, but except in the second movement there is little complexity.

The foregoing arrangement of movements and succession of moods may arouse suspicion of a "programme." To enter life buoyantly in a spirit of adventure must be a common experience among young men; to find experience somewhat grimmer than dreams is surely not unheard of, and to cleave to idealism in such circumstances is widely recommended; while to emerge from experience into a happiness less boisterous but more understanding than the easy confidence of youth and consequently more lasting and helpful, is what most thoughtful men try to accomplish. These three states of feeling are not out of keeping with the successive movements of the new symphony; the hearer who probes for more descriptive detail will not find it, unless he introduces it himself.

Technically the symphony is not radical. The succession of a brilliant, a stormy, and a quiet movement is not new; Schumann's C major Fantasy for pianoforte offers a stormy, a brilliant and a quiet movement in succession. In this symphony there are no "generative" themes—though the coda of the finale reminisces a bit concerning the other movements—but passages in different movements designed to recall each other sometimes use the same keys and instruments without actually quoting themes. The harmonies are in the main rather diatonic and the contrapuntal texture simple. The formal treatment is free but not involved; the first movement has three themes, the others two each. A large orchestra is used for the sake of sonority, but the score is not intricate. The entire symphony is less than forty minutes in length.

From the Traveler
April 2,1917.

CROWD HALL FOR PENSION CONCERT

Dr. Muck, the Boston Symphony orchestra and singers from Radcliffe and Harvard all contributed to what was in many respects the most satisfying concert in behalf of the orchestra's pension fund yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall that has been given. The program was: Rheinberger, theme and variations for violin and organ, Op. 150 (John P. Marshall, organist, and the entire violin section); J. C. Bach, Motet, "I Wrestle and Pray," conducted by Dr. A. T. Davidson; Wagner, prelude to "Tristan and Isolde"; Brahms, "Song of Destiny," Op. 54, conducted by Dr. Muck; Wagner, prelude to "Parsifal." Selections from "Siegfried" and "Goetterdaemmerung" (arranged by Richter); Funeral Music from 'Goetterdaemmerung"; overture to "Tannhaeuser."

The features in an exceptionally interesting program were the singing of the chorus and the organ-violins number. With such singers at his disposal as those of Mrs. H. H. Gallison, Dr. A. T. Davidson and Stephen Townsend choral selections at out symphony concerts can be taken as assured. The hall was crowded.

From hte
April 1,1917
Globe

Pension Fund Concert
Today in Symphony Hall

The second concert of the season in aid of the pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall this afternoon at 3:30 o'clock, and for the first time in nearly a dozen years a chorus will be used. Under the direction of Dr A. T. Davison and Mrs H. H. Gallison choral music in Harvard University has made great strides of late. Mrs Gallison has organized and directed with much success the Radcliffe Choral Society of more than 100 voices, and under Dr Davison's leadership the Harvard University Glee Club has been enlarged and has accomplished much.

The choral numbers will be a motet, "I Wrestle and Pray," by Bach, and Brahms' "Song of Destiny." This latter work was first done in Boston in 1890 by the Cecilia Society and three years later at the Symphony concerts under Mr Nikisch.

The program will begin with Rheinberger's Theme and Variations for violin and organ, op 150. The organ part will be played by J. P. Marshall, and the violin part by the entire violin section instead of by one instrument. In the first part of the program also will be found the prelude to "Tristan und Isolde."

The second part will be wholly Wagner, to comprise the prelude to "Parsifal," Hans Richter's arrangement of selections from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung," the magnificent funeral music from the last act of "Gotterdammerung" and the "Tannhauser" overture.

Julia Culp Soloist and New Clapp Symphony

At the 20th pair of Symphony concerts this week Julia Culp will be soloist and a new Symphony by Philip Greeley Clapp will be played. Mr Clapp has been at work upon his composition for a year and will conduct it himself.

Mme Culp will sing these songs with orchestra: Schubert, "Sei mir gegruesst," "Staendchen" (orchestrated by Arnold Schoenberg), Strauss "Morgen"; Hugo Wolf, "Verborgenheit"; Mahler, "Ich atmet einen Lindenduft," "Rheinlegendchen." Cesar Franck's Symphonic piece from the Poem-Symphony, "The Redemption," and Mr Chadwick's theme, variations and Fugue for organ and orchestra will complete the program. The symphony will precede the intermission.

From the Trancript
April 12,1917.

At the Symphony Concerts of next week Dr. Muck and the orchestra will play for the first times hereabouts and possibly for the first times in America, a symphony by Heinrich Noren, the composer of a set of pictorial, satirical and generally adroit variations—"The Kaleidoscope"—that made the round of Europe and the United States eight years ago. The symphony, the score and parts for which have long lain in the library of the orchestra, is of similar large dimensions and modern action. The title, "Vita"—"Life"—hints at a "programme" behind it.

The appearance of Mme. Kurt of the Metropolitan Opera House at the Symphony Concerts has been deferred from Friday and Saturday, April 20 and 21, to Friday and Saturday, April 27 and 28.

At the final concert for the season in Cambridge by the Symphony Orchestra on Thursday evening of next week it will be heard in Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring"; Schubert's Unfinished Symphony; Wagner's prelude to his opera "Die Meistersinger"; and Tchaikovski's concerto for pianoforte in B-flat minor. Needless, almost, to say, a woman, Miss Forbes, will play the solo part in a concerto, which, since it exacts power, is beloved beyond all others by the gentler sex.

Fromthe
Traveler
April 14,1917.

The Symphony Concert.

Dr. Muck has but two numbers on his program for next week's Symphony concerts. These will be Noren's "Vita" Symphony for modern orchestra and Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Joseph Haydn. The symphony will be given its first performance in America at these concerts. Noren's name has appeared on the Symphony programs but once before, when Mr. Fieldler gave his "Kaleidoscope," original theme and variations for orchestra.

JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.
APR 11 1917

SYMPHONY RENDERS LAST CONCERT HERE

Ethel Leginska, English Pianist, is Soloist.

PLAYING THRILLS AUDIENCE

Young Woman Given Enthusiastic Reception at Infantry Hall.—Orchestral Numbers Please in Boston Organization's Final Appearance of Season in This City.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its sixth, and final, concert of the season in Infantry Hall last evening, with Ethel Leginska as soloist. It was a substantial and interesting programme, brilliantly played, the performance being equal to the best Dr. Muck has offered during the course. There were but two orchestral numbers and a concerto for pianoforte and orchestra. These were as follows:

Symphony in C-major, with Fugue-Finale, "Jupiter" ..... Mozart
- Allegro vivace.
- Andante cantabile.
- Menuetto: Allegretto: Trio.
- Finale: Allegro molto.

Concerto, D-minor, No. 4, for pianoforte and orchestra ..... Rubinstein
- Moderato.
- Moderato assai.
- Allegro assai.

Introduction and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner

A glance over the list of works performed during this season shows a splendid array of orchestral compositions. And there has been no lack of excellent soloists. Last evening's performance was fully up to the high standard maintained by Dr. Muck's incomparable band. Indeed there seemed to be an unusual amount of enthusiasm shown by the players, and their conductor was enabled to present both the symphony and the "Tannhauser" excerpt in a wonderfully effective way.

The Mozart symphony, although an old acquaintance, seems ever fresh and beautiful and in its reading Dr. Muck realized nobility of thought and grandeur of style, which are its essential characteristics.

The Fugue-Finale was given with a clearness and brilliance that was a fitting climax to the excellent playing of the earlier movements.

The Introduction and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" is a good closing number for a programme. Its coloring and overpowering tonal effects were magnificently brought out.

The soloist, Ethel Leginska, played the Rubinstein concerto and proved to be an artist of the first rank. The demands of this composition of the great Russian composer-pianist are, in many ways, great. That such a slight young woman could produce such tremendous tonal volume was indeed surprising. Her performance was electrifying. Seldom do we hear a pianist who plays with such abounding vitality. The first and last movements were given with such fire and exuberance of style that the audience was plainly thrilled and gave the soloist a most enthusiastic reception. The Rubinstein D-minor, is, happily, one of the few piano concertos that give the artist an opportunity to display his ability—to good advantage.

The soloist is not constantly submerged by the orchestra, and the first and last movements are particularly showy. Mme. Leginska possesses a technique that is remarkably deft and fleet, and her tone is very pure. One is immediately conscious of her artistic nature the moment she begins to play. She is a player who holds the listener's attention every minute, and she inspires in her audience the feeling that so plainly dominates her—enthusiasm.

It is with regret that symphony patrons read of the contemplated change in the orchestra's plans for next season, when the six orchestral concerts will be replaced by the Ellis course, in which there will be but three visits here by the orchestra, the other three concerts being recitals by noted vocal and instrumental artists. The Boston orchestra has been the backbone of the local musical season for the past 36 years, and has been a mighty force for musical culture in this community. It is a pity that the management cannot see its way clear to continue the regular number of concerts.

From the
Herald
April 14,1917.

SYMPHONY'S 21ST CONCERT

Compositions by Debussy and Schubert Make up Orchestra's Program.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 21st concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Debussy, Images (Gigues, Iberia and Rondes de Printemps); Schubert, Symphony in C major.

Debussy's "Images" was performed here for the first time. Although it is placed as No. 1 of the "Images" it was the last of the three to be composed and performed in Paris. The original title was "Gigue Triste." It is a pity that this title was not retained, for it characterizes the composition, which must be ranked high among the works of the elusive and fascinating Debussy. The two chief themes are strongly defined, more direct in their melodic appeal than is customary with this musician; the melodic contents and the pronounced rhythm will be appreciated by those who persuade themselves that the music of the modern French school is "vague"; but the great charm of "Gigues" to others is in the prevailing mood and in the exquisite instrumentation. The composition might be called "The Ghostly Jig," for surely no feet of clay ever danced to the two tunes. It is haunting music; music that reminds one of De Quincey's eloquent sentences in which he spoke of the sadness incited in the breast of one seeing dancers, fair and young, gallantly dressed, radiant in their evolutions in a festal, gorgeous hall.

"Iberia" has been heard here several times, but the performance yesterday outstripped all those preceding. The second section, "The Odorous Night," is incomparable in its beauty. Walt Whitman's famous apostrophe to the night of the large, few stars, "mad, naked, summer night," might serve as motto. How admirably this movement comes between the two dazzling impressions of Spanish life and gaiety! The performance of these impressions was extremely brilliant; that of "The Odorous Night" was entrancing.

"Rondes de Printemps," in which the old French children's song "Nous n'irons plus au bois" serves as the leading idea, but ingeniously transformed and often veiled, is not so noteworthy as the other "Images," yet it breathes the freshness and joy of spring.

Then came a noble rendering of Schubert's great and—long symphony.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week includes Noren's symphony "Vita" (first time in America) and Brahms' Variations on a Chorale of Haydn.

From the Monitor
April 14,1917.

DR. MUCK GIVES INTERPRETATION OF DEBUSSY WORK

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Karl Muck Conductor — Twenty-first program, presented in Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass., afternoon of April 13, 1917: Debussy, "Images," for orchestra, comprising "Gigues," "Iberia" and "Rondes de printemps"; Schubert, Symphony in C major, No. 7.

Dr. Muck has at last made a success with Debussy. He has found how to bring the most elusive of modern orchestral thinkers under control. He has studied the ingenious composer's ways of handling rhythm and tone color until he can tell listeners all about them. He has scrutinized the scores of the strange writer and has ascertained the secret of their thematic and harmonic structure. He has brought this man to book.

An annotation on the program pointed out that "Gigues," which is the first of three pieces going under the general title of "Images," was never played before at the Boston Symphony concerts. "Gigues," then, calls for remark as being a novelty. But so does each of its companion pieces. For if "Iberia" and "Rondes de printemps" have been on former programs, they had to wait until this occasion for thorough and replete presentation.

Unquestionably the conductor has studied Debussy's rhythms and tone coloring with zeal. He has studied them, listeners on Friday must have thought, with the conviction that rhythm and color are the great finalities of orchestral music. For he made the three pieces veritable rhapsodies. His "Gigues" was but another version of the story told in Chabrier's "España." This little work undeniably has a dance derivation. Its name indicates that. But who before has ever thought of Debussy in association with a precisely measured beat and a perfectly regular recurrence of accent?

Successful, nevertheless, Dr. Muck's readings were, because they were frankly made according to his own musical predilections and were not modeled after Parisian methods of conducting. Though many will object that his performance of the "Images" is not Debussy, that will be because they have preconceptions of their own about musical atmosphere and impressionism, and other intangibilities. The truth of the matter doubtless is that Debussy, as a great composer, will take interpretation after any school and will sound well presented in any style.

At all events the audience as a whole was highly pleased with the concert Debussy pieces. It also gave enthusiastic approval of the conductor's work in the Schubert symphony.

Noren's symphony for modern orchestra, entitled "Vita," is to be produced at the Symphony concerts of April 20 and 21 for the first time in the United States. With the Noren work will be performed the Brahms variations on a theme by Haydn.

[illegible]

From BULLETIN
Address: PROVIDENCE, R.
Date APR 11

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS PROVIDENCE CONCERT SEASON

Ethel Leginska, English Pianist, is Soloist, Receiving Enthusiastic Reception. — Orchestral Numbers Received with Great Favor.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its sixth, and final, concert of the season in Infantry Hall last evening, with Ethel Leginska as soloist. It was a substantial and interesting programme, brilliantly played, the performance being equal to the best Dr. Muck has offered during the course. There were but two orchestral numbers and a concerto for pianoforte and orchestra. These were as follows:

Symphony in C-major, with Fugue-Finale, "Jupiter" ..... Mozart
- Allegro vivace.
- Andante cantabile.
- Menuetto: Allegretto: Trio.
- Finale: Allegro molto.

Concerto, D-minor, No. 4, for pianoforte and orchestra ..... Rubinstein
- Moderato.
- Moderato assai.
- Allegro assai.

Introduction and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner

A glance over the list of works performed during this season shows a splendid array of orchestral compositions. And there has been no lack of excellent soloists. Last evening's performance was fully up to the high standard maintained by Dr. Muck's incomparable band. Indeed there seemed to be an unusual amount of enthusiasm shown by the players, and their conductor was enabled to present both the symphony and the "Tannhauser" excerpt in a wonderfully effective way.

The Mozart symphony, although an old acquaintance, seems ever fresh and beautiful and in its reading Dr. Muck realized nobility of thought and grandeur of style, which are its essential characteristics.

The Fugue-Finale was given with a clearness and brilliance that was a fitting climax to the excellent playing of the earlier movements.

The Introduction and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" is a good closing number for a programme. Its coloring and overpowering tonal effects were magnificently brought out.

The soloist, Ethel Leginska, played the Rubinstein concerto and proved to be an artist of the first rank. The demands of this composition of the great Russian composer-pianist are, in many ways, great. That such a slight young woman could produce such tremendous tonal volume was indeed surprising. Her performance was electrifying. Seldom do we hear a pianist who plays with such abounding vitality. The first and last movements were given with such fire and exuberance of style that the audience was plainly thrilled and gave the soloist a most enthusiastic reception. The Rubinstein D-minor, is, happily, one of the few piano concertos that give the artist an opportunity to display his ability—to good advantage.

The soloist is not constantly submerged by the orchestra, and the first and last movements are particularly showy. Mme. Leginska possesses a technique that is remarkably deft and fleet, and her tone is very pure. One is immediately conscious of her artistic nature the moment she begins to play. She is a player who holds the listener's attention every minute, and she inspires in her audience the feeling that so plainly dominates her—enthusiasm.

It is with regret that symphony patrons read of the contemplated change in the orchestra's plans for next season, when the six orchestral concerts will be replaced by the Ellis course, in which there will be but three visits here by the orchestra, the other three concerts being recitals by noted vocal and instrumental artists. The Boston orchestra has been the backbone of the local musical season for the past 36 years, and has been a mighty force for musical culture in this community. It is a pity that the management cannot see its way clear to continue the regular number of concerts.

BULBUN
m Providence, R. I.
dress:
e APR 11 191

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT

Fine Program Rendered by Orchestra and Ethel Leginska, Pianist.

The last concert for their season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the last in which this aggregation of musicians is to appear here in a separate series of entertainments drew a large audience to Infantry Hall last evening. There was more than ordinary interest in this event in view of the conditions under which it was given, but there was no disappointment for anyone, however eager and strong had been the anticipation. The soloist for the occasion was Ethel Leginska, the English pianist, and she gave entire satisfaction.

Dr. Muck, the conductor, was as happy as ever in his choice of the numbers for the orchestra and they were rendered in the competent manner that has become inseparably associated with this orchestra. The opening selection was Mozart's Symphony in C-major or "Jupiter." This is much more than a century old, but is as fresh and delightful to-day as when it was written. There is an air of modernity about it that is deceptive as to its age, while the composition is of a character of which one never tires, however frequently it is repeated.

The other numbers of the orchestra was Wagner's Introduction and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," act one, Paris version. This selection was composed by Wagner while at the height of his power and has an interesting history. It does not, however, fail in interest in itself and as played by this orchestra is full of beauty and power.

Madame Leginska chose for her number Rubenstein's Concerto in D-minor. This is regarded as one of the greatest works ever written for the piano and easily ranks as a masterpiece. It is marked by the brilliance and strength that were characteristic of the noted pianist and composer, and it was played by Madame Leginska with orchestra accompaniment with marked skill, revealing fine mastery of the instrument. The pianist has an artistic touch and remarkable force, while her technique seems almost flawless.

The program in proper form was as follows:

Symphony in C-major, with Fugu-Finale, "Jupiter" ..... Mozart
- Allegro vivace.
- Andante cantabile.
- Menuetto: Allegretto: Trio.
- Finale: Allegro molto.

Concerto, D-minor, No. 4, for pianoforte and orchestra ..... Rubenstein
- Moderato.
- Moderato assai.
- Allegro assai.

Introduction and Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has given the people of this city a series of concerts this winter that has compared very favorably with those of other years and has brought here soloists who have highly entertained the large audiences. It is a matter of regret to many that the season has ended and still further that next winter the opportunity to hear this admirable orchestra will be more limited. It is gratifying, however, that the present series came to an end with such a satisfying program.

From the Advertiser
April 14.1917.

"IMAGES" HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

ENTIRE WORK BY DEBUSSY PERFORMED

Schubert Composition Also Given—Played With Dash And Energy

At the twenty-first concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon the works performed were Debussy's "Images" for Orchestra and Schubert's Symphony in C major No. 7.

The three "Images" were heard in their entirety for the first time in the succession that the composer designed at the Colonne concerts in Paris—"Gigues," "Iberia," "Rondes de Printemps." Both the second and third have been played in former seasons by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as well as by other American orchestras, but the "Gigues" were heard here for the first time at yesterday's performance, although performed by the Chicago Orchestra on Nov. 13, 14, 1914.

Whereas the "Gigues" and "Rondes de Printempts" may be counted, theoretically at least, as music of thematic development, "Iberia" may be considered as purely impressionistic. The grouping of the three "Images" is an arbitrary arrangement, since there is little essential unity between them.

In the "Gigues" Debussy would seem to have striven to attain the impossible. On the one hand we find the composer's peculiar notions of tonalities, harmonies and rhythm; on the other the "Gigue" development according to the orthodox rules. In the elastic treatment of the classic form of "Gigue" Debussy has fallen short, for he has evidently sought to create a new form along the characteristic lines of his music—the lines more in accord with the freedom of melody, rhythm and tonality, with the result of music that is full of laborious details in its strife for an obviously missed goal.

"Iberia," the second of the "Images," is not lengthy, a characteristic closely adhered to with its composer, but contrary to many of his colleagues of other nationalities. It suggests the earlier as well as the maturer Debussy through the finely interwoven delicacy in shading, fineness of harmonic background, subtle imagination, musical explorations for the discovery of possibilities—all attaining that unfathomable effect of iridescence and haunting vagueness which pervade his music of earlier years. On the other hand, is felt the influence of the bolder and richer instrumental colors and the more decisive rhythms of maturer years. Yet, in the respect that "Iberia" treats of life is it contrasted with the emotionalism and fleeting ...vided into three sections—"By ...ards and Lanes," "The Perfumes of ...e Night" and "Morning of a Fete ...ay"—we are told that the picture of ...beria" is painted in Spain—the composer's personal impressions and not descriptive reminiscences. Much use of castanets, bells and such like tell the story of the joyous wayfarer, then night falls through curious effects of what one may call slowly palpitating melody, for strings and woodwind chiefly. Dawn is announced and the world is awakened to life through bells and aubades. The second movement is the most musicianly of the three. Tonal color and not harmonic design are the salient points of the work which is an unquestionable manifestation of the genius of Debussy in his efforts to break away from the thraldom of the classic and despotic in music.

"Rondes de Printemps" is designed to be taken as a roundelay invoking the spirit of spring. The chief motive, through the incisive rhythm, suggests the exuberant open air dance of the vernal festival and the tumultuous character of the polyphony and instrumentation well colors the picture. But it must be confessed that the plentiful provision of acrid harmonies makes little for musical beauty. However, the one idea which permeates the work is deftly handled. This idea, which originated in an old children's song, is an unceasing melody germinating and springing from melody gradually becoming varied until it takes on new motives. While it is evident that the work is fundamentally musical in essence, it tells the story in its own untranslatable medium, making an imaginative appeal from its native suggestibility of unity of rhythm, harmony of line, disposition of plan, a sense of proportion, a fitness and balance.

The marring element of Debussy's composition was a slight hesitancy and wavering in rhythmic values noticeable throughout the composition as the complexities were unravelled.

In the Schubert Symphony, Dr. Muck again wisely chose, thus satisfying the tastes of those who do not revel in the intricacies of harmony and rhythm and, to their minds, the resulting indefiniteness of the modern school.

Schubert's great masterpiece, the Symphony in C major, No. 7, also known as No. 10, almost the last work the master's hand touched, ranks with the greatest compositions of its kind for the nobility of its themes and the splendor of their elaboration. The composer seems to have been greatly impressed by it himself, for he returns again and again to his subjects, not merely because the symphonic plan required him to, but because he apparently loved them so well that he was loth to finally leave them. Hence some of the movements are very long, and the first, in particular, seems to have reached a fit climax twice before the real ending comes. A deep purpose seems to underlie the work, and even the Scherzo is only so in name, for contented and gay though it appears to be, it is never merry and the trio is almost a serious strain. From the first smooth measures of the horn, speaking alone and as if from afar, to the triumphant fulness of the Finale, there is a steady progression and growth.

This symphony has many Hungarian touches, without doubt due to Schubert's stay at Zelesz. It teems with beautiful melodies and tasteful contrasts, which characteristics cause Schubert to be generally appreciated by the music-loving public.

To the horn which was played in yesterday's performance with excellent shading was given the introduction. In the coda of the first movement credit is due the trombones. The grand effect of these instruments was triumphantly brought forth in the ending which was an augmentation of the horn phrase of the introduction, thus ending the movement symmetrically.

In the second movement the honors must be given to the first oboe which played its themes with much delicacy and finesse.

The speed of the Finale was not such as to spoil the effect of the four accented notes with the brunt of the work at first falling upon the strings, which stood their task well. In the Scherzo smoothness was for the most part well preserved.

Summing up, it may be emphatically stated that yesterday's performance of Schubert's great masterpiece brought out and used to every possible advantage all the merits and strong points of our orchestra. The dash and energy, the touches of Hungarian spice, delicate refinements of shading, breadth and balance, all of these united to make a performance not soon to be forgotten.

A. E. W.

From the
Journal
April 14,1917.

'GIGUES,' PLAYED BY SYMPHONY, DRAW APPLAUSE

Orchestra Finally Has to Rise and Acknowledge Plaudits of Audience.

By F. Esposito

Thin, tingling, eerie dissonances, resolving by quaint phrases down-stepping in the mauve tones of fagotto or clarinet; a saucy melody wrenched into infinite sadness—as it might be if a maimed girl sought to repeat the graceful dances of her perfect youth—and always striving through trials of one choir after another for some lost beauty; these are some of the impressions of the "Gigues" which took their place among Debussy's "Images" at yesterday's Symphony rehearsal.

Never Played Here Before

The "Gigues" have never been played in Boston before, though they were made a part of a suite with his "Iberia" and the "Rondes de Printemps," which have had several performances here. The suite was wildly applauded, and Dr. Muck was finally forced to make his orchestra rise and acknowledge the plaudits of the audience.

This is the younger Debussy, the student who had won the Prix de Rome and whose compositions, sent back from his proud exile, were at first refused performance. To be sure, these particular works were written long after "Pelleas et Melisande," but though they already show the Debussy who believed in tone-painting rather than set form of development of themes, and traditional successions of tempo and sentiment, the Debussy of the "Apres-Midi d'un Faune," there is little of the vague, drifting cloud of strange dissonance that characterizes that opera and much of Debussy's later music.

Even as the "Iberia" has its clinking castanets and tambourines, its syncopated and characteristc dance-measure, its overlapping and insistent, little, monotonously repeated phrase of the semi-barbaric dance; even as the keen, long-drawn note of "les parfums de la nuit" is cut across by odd and twisted incidents of phrase, and the morning comes with ever-growing excitement in "Le matin d'un jour de fete," the "Gigues" play throughout with a little tune.

There is story and incident and picture for whomsoever will construct it. The commentators have remarked, unfortunately, the resemblance of the little song to a well-known cavalry trot-march which is founded on an old Scottish song,—after reading which, it is impossible to forget it. But nothing further from the spirit and mental level of the "Keel Row" can be imagined than Debussy's "Gigues." One has only to set the words down to display the incongruity.

Uses Large Orchestra

The composer, as always, has made use of a large orchestra; harps, bells, unusual drums and effects produced with mutes, all help the ever-changing color of his tonalities. It is a suite that ought to be heard often in these concerts.

No greater contrast could be possible, also, than that between Debussy's esoteric and formless sheets of tone, and Schubert's always sweet, always formal symphony in C. It was like coming from the dim and mysterious home of love-once-removed into the office of a conservative manufacturer, to remain through the rest of the concert. The old work was wonderfully played, of course, with all the fervor of worshipers of tradition—but it was hopelessly commonplace after the other.

Schubert is Schubert, and the Seventh symphony is not to be thrown out of the window by any lover of modern music, of course. Many lovers of music there are who sighed with relief to recognize again the clearly stated theme, the carefully resolved harmonies, the formally developed and differentiated phrases. Here was something that could be understood, a man with a tune, an intention, an intellectual treat that nevertheless carried no headache with it. Nobody got up and went out; on the contrary, the wonderful, fiery finale received almost as much fervent adoration as Debussy' himself.

From the
Globe
April 14,1917.

DEBUSSY "IMAGES" WONDERFULLY PLAYED

"Gigues" of the Suite Done First Time

Dr Muck's Conducting of "Iberia"

It is difficult to believe Debussy's "Iberia," conducted yesterday afternoon by Dr Muck, with infinite imagination, now sumptuous, now exquisite, to be the same score as that heard under the name by this orchestra in 1911.

A marvelous performance, one of the most remarkable of a season which has contained Liszt's "Faust" symphony, revealed yesterday the gorgeous palette of colors of this music released its poignant, unescapable appeal to sense, and crowned orchestral euphony with transporting exotic illusion.

Debussy's "Iberia" (1907), with its three subdivisions (the last two without intervening pause) and "Rondes de Printemps" (1909), had been played here separately. The composer's purpose to make them respectively second and third in order in a suite to be called "Images" was realized when in 1912 the "Gigues" was completed for the first part of the suite. Its performance yesterday was the first here, as was that of the complete suite.

In the "Gigues" Debussy has written as one recalling the quaint charm of an old dance tune, mellowed in memory. No other wood-wind of the orchestra could catch in tone the exquisite, tender fragrance of the revived oboe d'amore. The instrument Mr Lenom employed and the skill with which he played its haunting theme reminds of the fragile, elusive beauty of its associate in strings—the viola d'amore. The score is archaic in the idiom of one who loves the things of yesterday, and speaks fluently their language. There is the keen fancy and delicacy of expression in the vein of Debussy while his ravishing sense of color and wealth of invention were not impaired. There are not the gorgeous tints of the "Iberia" which paints an illusion of Spain the Spaniards themselves have not found, but there is the magical cunning and touch. The song of Spring while graceful and containing charming passages might better precede than follow "Iberia," with its red-blooded, stirring echoes of the country festival.

Schubert's symphony in C major, No. 7, which seemed curiously materialistic, even literal, after the first half of the program, was admirably played with no attempt to gloss its sturdy, inspirational character. Here is music fresh in mood, individual and prophetic in its day, and for many even yet it may have been more grateful yesterday than what had gone before. Next week Noren's "Vita" symphony (first time here) and Brahm's variations on a theme by Haydn will be played.

From he
POST
April 14,1917.

DEBUSSY'S WORKS BY SYMPHONY

His "Images" Heard for First Time at These Concerts

BY OLIN DOWNES

The complete set of Debussy's "Images" for orchestra was performed yesterday afternoon at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, in Symphony Hall. The "Images" include the "Gigues," heard for the first time in Boston yesterday; the three pieces: "In the Streets and Waysides," "Perfumes of the Night" and "The Morning of a Fete Day," which are called, collectively, "Iberia"; and the "Rondes de Printemps." Schubert's long and beautiful symphony in C major completed the programme.

TYPICALLY FRENCH MUSIC

Both Debussy and Schubert feel nature intimately, and whether Debussy's expression of nature is more fundamental, or as much so, as Schubert's is a matter cheerfully left to posterity to decide. But this may be said: That in writing pieces essentially and typically French in the clarity, simplicity, frankness and masterly arrangement of detail, Debussy has evolved new practices of harmony and form which have already had an important effect on composition.

He is, if you like, an impressionist. That is, his effects are effects of rhythm and color rather than melody, which is in a sense the musical equivalent of line. But he is not an impressionist in a slap-dash manner. His effects of color are achieved by a marvellous care and certainty of method. That the multiplicity of detail neither annoys nor distracts us is only the proof of the mastery of the composer and the sincerity of his method. A thousand brush-strokes, as an evocation of "perfumes of the night!"

Repetition and Contrast

As for form, there is unquestionably present in these pieces structure of the utmost delicacy and logic. There is another kind of form than that which consists in the slavish repetition and contrast of stated melodies. That form is rhythmic form—the arrangement and development of rhythm. Underlying the apparently thoughtless clash of harmonies and [illegible] of phrases used with the true instinct of the "decadent" is the juxtaposition and the fruitful interplay of rhythmical motives. They give the music its substance and its life, and they represent that god of the classicists, "development"—"development" which is here a true germination of elements inherent in the musical body.

But let us not talk of technic. This is only the machinery of Debussy. This only serves to convey, as simply and as obviously to those who will lend an unprejudiced ear as the method of Schubert, Debussy's impressions of nature, his memories of songs that echo along the highways and byways of Spain, the thrumming of guitars, the shouts and the colors of a fete-day and the marvellous song of spring. Of the "Ronde de Printemps."

Dr. Muck's Skill

Dr. Muck gave a performance that must be classed with the greatest he has given in Boston, so subtle was its feeling, so spontaneous its expression. We cannot but believe that such a performance would have delighted the composer, for it was as Debussyish in its clearness and its just relation of detail as it was in its haunting song, its rhythmic life and exuberance.

When Dr. Muck chooses to exert his remarkable rhythmic gift—the gift which he abused, as we felt, in the slow movement of the Schubert symphony—he can improvise like a master on his orchestra. This orchestra in the performance of Debussy's piece rushed forward, or hesitated for an instant, or slackened its pace so naturally that it was indeed as the inevitable impulse of the music.

Schubert's Symphony

The performance of Schubert's symphony was very brilliant, but at times tonally rough, which is a thing hard to agree with in Schubert as in Debussy or Chopin or Mendelssohn. In the tonal sense, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke was the never-to-be-forgotten interpreter of this symphony. He was not as dramatic as Dr. Muck in the climax of the second movement. He was not as modern in his feeling, and let us admit that a touch of modernism such as Dr. Muck displayed in the climax referred to is impressive and true to the composer's meaning, but Gericke was incomparably beautiful and successful in attaining the Olympic beauty and repose which underlies the most brilliant passages of this symphony, this explosion of genius. In its performance there should never be a hint of roughness, or undue capriciousness of rhythm, as in the slow movement. The orchestra should be radiant and glowing, but never hard. For the C major symphony is one of the most beautiful and classic works, despite its romantic undercurrent of feeling, that there is in the world today. The audience applauded all performances with exceptional warmth, recalling the conductor, who, in acknowledgment, summoned the orchestra to its feet.

From the
Transcript
April 11,1917.

Mme. Leginska with Orchestra

At the final concert of the season in Providence by the Symphony Orchestra, which befell last evening, Mme. Leginska, the pianist, was the "assisting artist," and at it, as at the rehearsal with Dr. Muck and the band in Boston on Tuesday morning, made no slight impression upon her hearers. Though she has fast made her way in concerts of her own in Boston of recent remembrance, never before has she played with orchestra hereabouts in the pomp and circumstance of a concerto. She chose Rubinstein's in D minor—a piece that the composer-pianist himself, and Mr Hoffman after him, often played and that frankly displays piano and virtuoso rather than merges them into a primarily symphonic music. In the first movement, the pianist may give proof of technical range and resource, of declamatory force in the enunciation of theme and melody, of vivid "passage-work," of command of color and bravura with the orchestra or in contrast to it. In the second, the pianist almost monopolizes the music which nows first in slow and then swifter song of musing matter and manner. In the finale—the usual rondo—comes opportunity for the sharp-set play of rhythms, for whirls of tone and for large and sustained pianistic power.

Throughout the concerto, with orchestra and audience happily disposed, Mme. Legenska was mistress of herself, her music and her instrument, playing in the large and ornate style that the concerto inherently invites with full-voiced magnificence of tone, with vigor of declamation, with ardor in the more songful measures, with sweep and opulence of technical display. To Rubinstein and to his worthy successors with the piece, the music bade the pianist strike rhythmic fire, fill full the slow song, match the piano at need against the orchestra and in the finale at least bear all before it. In unusual degree for a woman, Mme. Leginska has the energy of spirit and the power of fingers and wrist to achieve this amplitude and force of feeling and utterance. More than once and often through many measures she gained and sustained the "grand manner" in which Rubinstein designed the piece, while in the songful second movement and in the less displayful passages of the first, she enriched the music by the deep beauty of tone and the warmth of the color with which she flecked it. And in a symphony concert, only a little less than in a recital of her own, do her hearers feel the communicating force of her singular personality.

From the
Transcript
April 20,1917.

Items and Announcements

At the Symphony Concerts of next week, Dr. Muck and the orchestra will play for the first times here Mr. Converse's newest piece, the tone-poem, "Ave atque Vale," originally produced last January in St. Louis by Mr. Zach and his band. The music traces the more intimate moods of soldierly sacrifice for one's country, and is written for full modern orchestra. The [illegible] phony in D major and airs from "Fidelio" and "Oberon" to be sung by Mme. Kurt of the Metropolitan Opera House, hitherto heard here in opera only.

"The Pops" of 1917

A few of those singular persons who believe that the present sum of human existence is the war—or, in some instances, talk about the war—have been industriously spreading the report that there were to be no "Pop" concerts at Symphony Hall through May and June contrary to the custom of thirty-odd years. They, it appeared, were not minded to them; therefore the public, which, like all of us, they are prone to see in their own image, was not minded to them. As an actual fact of the theatres and the concert-halls that public, so far, is as much disposed to seek entertainment in them as it ever was. As an actual fact also "The Pops" are to run their usual course and even a longer one than has been the wont. They will begin at Symphony Hall at the end of the regular Symphony Concerts—that is to say on Monday, May 7, and they will continue for ten weeks, instead of the usual nine—that is through July 14. As last year for the first time, the orchestra will number seventy-five under sundry conductors whose names are yet to be announced; "special nights" of various kinds will occur and recur as in previous seasons; and the general arrangements and plan of the concerts be maintained as usual.

From the
Herald
April 21,1917

DR. MUCK GIVES NOREN'S 'VITA'

Presents Noisy Work in His Program for the Afternoon.

22D SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE.

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Noren, "Vita," symphony for modern orchestra; Brahms, variations on a theme of Haydn.

Noren's symphony was produced at a Gewandhaus concert in Leipsic early in January, 1912. It was played in Berlin in January of the following year. The performance yesterday was the first in this country. In Leipsic and Berlin the symphony was harshly criticised. And no wonder.

An old English philosopher remarked that the life of man was short, brutal and nasty. With the substitution of "long" for "short" this description might justly be applied to the "Vita" of Heinrich Gottlieb Noren.

The composer has taken pains to state that this music is not a portrayal of life, certainly not his life. If it were, it would be a sad commentary on a noisy career, and we are informed that Mr. Noren in private is a highly respectable citizen. No, his symphony, as he has said, is a meditation on life, "half contemplative, half impassioned up to the finale, in which reflection gives way to the external enjoyment of life." Mr. Noren has also said that it was far from his intention to write a "program symphony." Yet at least two German critics have declared that the "Vita" symphony might be entitled "Faust," with the Scherzo picturing the Walpurgis night, the finale Auerbach's Cellar, while the first and third movements are as monologues of Faust.

Mr. Noren entitles his Scherzo "Doubt" and gives the further explanation "in a bizarre manner." The third movement is "Former Years"; the finale, "The Joy of Life."

While it would have been better if the Prologue had been written for a military band and for performance out of doors, the movement is on the whole the most thoughtfully conceived one of the four, the one with the most musically dramatic ideas, the one that is the most skilfully constructed. If this music, as those that follow, were not so abominably noisy! Mr. Noren outvies in sheer noise even our own Mr. Clapp. Mr. Noren, too, employs a huge orchestra. The absence of anvils and a wind machine is unaccountable.

The Scherzo is indeed "bizarre." The scherzo section, proper is in poor imitation of Berlioz's manner; but Berlioz was a genius; Mr. Noren is an industrious German, who founded a conservatory of music at Crefeld, was a professor in a Berlin school, and has studied diligently without acquiring taste or style. His admirers might say in reply that he is efficient; that is to say, he has massed in this instance a great body of players and attempted to carry an audience by brute force.

The third movement is inherently commonplace, platitudinous. Stripped of its orchestral clothing, the musical body would be as thin, feeble, anaemic, as Louis XV in the famous triptych of Thackeray. The Finale expresses "The Joy of Life." It reminds one of a college freshman's idea of the joyous life; smashing lamp-posts, pulling down signs and removing an iron dog from some worthy townsman's lawn. There is a short and mournful episode, possibly expressing Mr. Noren's remorse over what he had been doing for nearly an hour.

It is not easy to see why Dr. Muck, a musician of fastidious taste, should have spent his energy and skill on the production of this banal and pretentious symphony. The explanation may be this: He wished by a tour de force, by his own genius and as leader of the superb orchestra, to make the music plausible; to persuade the audience that, after all, this symphony was worthy of its attention. For Dr. Muck can be ironical, and he has a lively sense of humor.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week will include Brahms's Symphony No. 3, Converse's "Ave Atque Vale" and Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini." Mme. Kurt will sing arias from "Fidelio" and "Oberon."

The program of the last concerts of the season, May 4, 5, will be as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 4; Liszt, "Tasso"; Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration"; Wagner, Prelude to "The Master Singers of Nuremberg."

From the
Journal
April 14,1917.

'GIGUES,' PLAYED BY SYMPHONY, DRAW APPLAUSE

Orchestra Finally Has to Rise and Acknowledge Plaudits of Audience.

By F. Esposito

Thin, tingling, eerie dissonances, resolving by quaint phrases down-stepping in the mauve tones of fagotto or clarinet; a saucy melody wrenched into infinite sadness—as it might be if a maimed girl sought to repeat the graceful dances of her perfect youth—and always striving through trials of one choir after another for some lost beauty; these are some of the impressions of the "Gigues" which took their place among Debussy's "Images" at yesterday's Symphony rehearsal.

Never Played Here Before

The "Gigues" have never been played in Boston before, though they were made a part of a suite with his "Iberia" and the "Rondes de Printemps," which have had several performances here. The suite was wildly applauded, and Dr. Muck was finally forced to make his orchestra rise and acknowledge the plaudits of the audience.

This is the younger Debussy, the student who had won the Prix de Rome and whose compositions, sent back from his proud exile, were at first refused performance. To be sure, these particular works were written long after "Pelleas et Melisande," but though they already show the Debussy who believed in tone-painting rather than set form of development of themes, and traditional successions of tempo and sentiment, the Debussy of the "Apres-Midi d'un Faune," there is little of the vague, drifting cloud of strange dissonance that characterizes that opera and much of Debussy's later music.

Even as the "Iberia" has its clinking castanets and tambourines, its syncopated and characteristc dance-measure, its overlapping and insistent, little, monotonously repeated phrase of the semi-barbaric dance; even as the keen, long-drawn note of "les parfums de la nuit" is cut across by odd and twisted incidents of phrase, and the morning comes with ever-growing excitement in "Le matin d'un jour de fete," the "Gigues" play throughout with a little tune.

There is story and incident and picture for whomsoever will construct it. The commentators have remarked, unfortunately, the resemblance of the little song to a well-known cavalry trot-march which is founded on an old Scottish song,—after reading which, it is impossible to forget it. But nothing further from the spirit and mental level of the "Keel Row" can be imagined than Debussy's "Gigues." One has only to set the words down to display the incongruity.

Uses Large Orchestra

The composer, as always, has made use of a large orchestra; harps, bells, unusual drums and effects produced with mutes, all help the ever-changing color of his tonalities. It is a suite that ought to be heard often in these concerts.

No greater contrast could be possible, also, than that between Debussy's esoteric and formless sheets of tone, and Schubert's always sweet, always formal symphony in C. It was like coming from the dim and mysterious home of love-once-removed into the office of a conservative manufacturer, to remain through the rest of the concert. The old work was wonderfully played, of course, with all the fervor of worshipers of tradition—but it was hopelessly commonplace after the other.

Schubert is Schubert, and the Seventh symphony is not to be thrown out of the window by any lover of modern music, of course. Many lovers of music there are who sighed with relief to recognize again the clearly stated theme, the carefully resolved harmonies, the formally developed and differentiated phrases. Here was something that could be understood, a man with a tune, an intention, an intellectual treat that nevertheless carried no headache with it. Nobody got up and went out; on the contrary, the wonderful, fiery finale received almost as much fervent adoration as Debussy' himself.

Divided into three sections—"By Roards and Lanes," "The Perfumes of the Night" and "Morning of a Fete Day"—we are told that the picture of "Iberia" is painted in Spain—the composer's personal impressions and not descriptive reminiscences. Much use of castanets, bells and such like tell the story of the joyous wayfarer, then night falls through curious effects of what one may call slowly palpitating melody, for strings and woodwind chiefly. Dawn is announced and the world is awakened to life through bells and aubades. The second movement is the most musicianly of the three. Tonal color and not harmonic design are the salient points of the work which is an unquestionable manifestation of the genius of Debussy in his efforts to break away from the thraldom of the classic and despotic in music.

"Rondes de Printemps" is designed to be taken as a roundelay invoking the spirit of spring. The chief motive, through the incisive rhythm, suggests the exuberant open air dance of the vernal festival and the tumultuous character of the polyphony and instrumentation well colors the picture. But it must be confessed that the plentiful provision of acrid harmonies makes little for musical beauty. However, the one idea which permeates the work is deftly handled. This idea, which originated in an old children's song, is an unceasing melody germinating and springing from melody gradually becoming varied until it takes on new motives. While it is evident that the work is fundamentally musical in essence, it tells the story in its own untranslatable medium, making an imaginative appeal from its native suggestibility of unity of rhythm, harmony of line, disposition of plan, a sense of proportion, a fitness and balance.

The marring element of Debussy's composition was a slight hesitancy and wavering in rhythmic values noticeable throughout the composition as the complexities were unravelled.

In the Schubert Symphony, Dr. Muck again wisely chose, thus satisfying the tastes of those who do not revel in the intricacies of harmony and rhythm and, to their minds, the resulting indefiniteness of the modern school.

Schubert's great masterpiece, the Symphony in C major, No. 7, also known as No. 10, almost the last work the master's hand touched, ranks with the greatest compositions of its kind for the nobility of its themes and the splendor of their elaboration. The composer seems to have been greatly impressed by it himself, for he returns again and again to his subjects, not merely because the symphonic plan required him to, but because he apparently loved them so well that he was loth to finally leave them. Hence some of the movements are very long, and the first, in particular, seems to have reached a fit climax twice before the real ending comes. A deep purpose seems to underlie the work, and even the Scherzo is only so in name, for contented and gay though it appears to be, it is never merry and the trio is almost a serious strain. From the first smooth measures of the horn, speaking alone and as if from afar, to the triumphant fulness of the Finale, there is a steady progression and growth.

This symphony has many Hungarian touches, without doubt due to Schubert's stay at Zelesz. It teems with beautiful melodies and tasteful contrasts, which characteristics cause Schubert to be generally appreciated by the music-loving public.

To the horn which was played in yesterday's performance with excellent shading was given the introduction. In the coda of the first movement credit is due the trombones. The grand effect of these instruments was triumphantly brought forth in the ending which was an augmentation of the horn phrase of the introduction, thus ending the movement symmetrically.

In the second movement the honors must be given to the first oboe which played its themes with much delicacy and finesse.

The speed of the Finale was not such as to spoil the effect of the four accented notes with the brunt of the work at first falling upon the strings, which stood their task well. In the Scherzo smoothness was for the most part well preserved.

Summing up, it may be emphatically stated that yesterday's performance of Schubert's great masterpiece brought out and used to every possible advantage all the merits and strong points of our orchestra. The dash and energy, the touches of Hungarian spice, delicate refinements of shading, breadth and balance, all of these united to make a performance not soon to be forgotten.

A. E. W.

From the
Globe
April 14,1917.

DEBUSSY "IMAGES" WONDERFULLY PLAYED

"Gigues" of the Suite Done First Time

Dr Muck's Conducting of "Iberia"

Of Sumptuous Imagination

It is difficult to believe Debussy's "Iberia," conducted yesterday afternoon by Dr Muck, with infinite imagination, now sumptuous, now exquisite, to be the same score as that heard under the name by this orchestra in 1911.

A marvelous performance, one of the most remarkable of a season which has contained Liszt's "Faust" symphony, revealed yesterday the gorgeous palette of colors of this music released its poignant, unescapable appeal to sense, and crowned orchestral euphony with transporting exotic illusion.

Debussy's "Iberia" (1907), with its three subdivisions (the last two without intervening pause) and "Rondes de Printemps" (1909), had been played here separately. The composer's purpose to make them respectively second and third in order in a suite to be called "Images" was realized when in 1912 the "Gigues" was completed for the first part of the suite. Its performance yesterday was the first here, as was that of the complete suite.

In the "Gigues" Debussy has written as one recalling the quaint charm of an old dance tune, mellowed in memory. No other wood-wind of the orchestra could catch in tone the exquisite, tender fragrance of the revived oboe d'amore. The instrument Mr Lenom employed and the skill with which he played its haunting theme reminds of the fragile, elusive beauty of its associate in strings—the viola d'amore. The score is archaic in the idiom of one who loves the things of yesterday, and speaks fluently their language. There is the keen fancy and delicacy of expression in the vein of Debussy while his ravishing sense of color and wealth of invention were not impaired. There are not the gorgeous tints of the "Iberia" which paints an illusion of Spain the Spaniards themselves have not found, but there is the magical cunning and touch. The song of Spring while graceful and containing charming passages might better precede than follow "Iberia," with its red-blooded, stirring echoes of the country festival.

Schubert's symphony in C major, No. 7, which seemed curiously materialistic, even literal, after the first half of the program, was admirably played with no attempt to gloss its sturdy, inspirational character. Here is music fresh in mood, individual and prophetic in its day, and for many even yet it may have been more grateful yesterday than what had gone before. Next week Noren's "Vita" symphony (first time here) and Brahm's variations on a theme by Haydn will be played.

From he
POST
April 14,1917.

DEBUSSY'S WORKS BY SYMPHONY

His "Images" Heard for First Time at These Concerts

BY OLIN DOWNES

The complete set of Debussy's "Images" for orchestra was performed yesterday afternoon at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, in Symphony Hall. The "Images" include the "Gigues," heard for the first time in Boston yesterday; the three pieces: "In the Streets and Waysides," "Perfumes of the Night" and "The Morning of a Fete Day," which are called, collectively, "Iberia"; and the "Rondes de Printemps." Schubert's long and beautiful symphony in C major completed the programme.

TYPICALLY FRENCH MUSIC

Both Debussy and Schubert feel nature intimately, and whether Debussy's expression of nature is more fundamental, or as much so, as Schubert's is a matter cheerfully left to posterity to decide. But this may be said: That in writing pieces essentially and typically French in the clarity, simplicity, frankness and masterly arrangement of detail, Debussy has evolved new practices of harmony and form which have already had an important effect on composition.

He is, if you like, an impressionist. That is, his effects are effects of rhythm and color rather than melody, which is in a sense the musical equivalent of line. But he is not an impressionist in a slap-dash manner. His effects of color are achieved by a marvellous care and certainty of method. That the multiplicity of detail neither annoys nor distracts us is only the proof of the mastery of the composer and the sincerity of his method. A thousand brush-strokes, as an evocation of "perfumes of the night!"

Repetition and Contrast

As for form, there is unquestionably present in these pieces structure of the utmost delicacy and logic. There is another kind of form than that which consists in the slavish repetition and contrast of stated melodies. That form is rhythmic form—the arrangement and development of rhythm. Underlying the apparently thoughtless clash of harmonies and scraps of phrases used with the true instinct of the "decadent" is the juxtaposition and the fruitful interplay of rhythmical motives. They give the music its substance and its life, and they represent that god of the classicists, "development"—"development" which is here a true germination of elements inherent in the musical body.

But let us not talk of technic. This is only the machinery of Debussy. This only serves to convey, as simply and as obviously to those who will lend an unprejudiced ear as the method of Schubert, Debussy's impressions of nature, his memories of songs that echo along the highways and byways of Spain, the thrumming of guitars, the shouts and the colors of a fete-day and the marvellous song of spring. Of the "Ronde de Printemps."

Dr. Muck's Skill

Dr. Muck gave a performance that must be classed with the greatest he has given in Boston, so subtle was its feeling, so spontaneous its expression. We cannot but believe that such a performance would have delighted the composer, for it was as Debussyish in its clearness and its just relation of detail as it was in its haunting song, its rhythmic life and exuberance.

When Dr. Muck chooses to exert his remarkable rhythmic gift—the gift which he abused, as we felt, in the slow movement of the Schubert symphony—he can improvise like a master on his orchestra. This orchestra in the performance of Debussy's piece rushed forward, or hesitated for an instant, or slackened its pace so naturally that it was indeed as the inevitable impulse of the music.

Schubert's Symphony

The performance of Schubert's symphony was very brilliant, but at times tonally rough, which is a thing hard to agree with in Schubert as in Debussy or Chopin or Mendelssohn. In the tonal sense, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke was the never-to-be-forgotten interpreter of this symphony. He was not as dramatic as Dr. Muck in the climax of the second movement. He was not as modern in his feeling, and let us admit that a touch of modernism such as Dr. Muck displayed in the climax referred to is impressive and true to the composer's meaning, but Gericke was incomparably beautiful and successful in attaining the Olympic beauty and repose which underlies the most brilliant passages of this symphony, this explosion of genius. In its performance there should never be a hint of roughness, or undue capriciousness of rhythm, as in the slow movement. The orchestra should be radiant and glowing, but never hard. For the C major symphony is one of the most beautiful and classic works, despite its romantic undercurrent of feeling, that there is in the world today. The audience applauded all performances with exceptional warmth, recalling the conductor, who, in acknowledgment, summoned the orchestra to its feet.

From the
Transcript
April 11,1917.

Mme. Leginska with Orchestra

At the final concert of the season in Providence by the Symphony Orchestra, which befell last evening, Mme. Leginska, the pianist, was the "assisting artist," and at it, as at the rehearsal with Dr. Muck and the band in Boston on Tuesday morning, made no slight impression upon her hearers. Though she has fast made her way in concerts of her own in Boston of recent remembrance, never before has she played with orchestra hereabouts in the pomp and circumstance of a concerto. She chose Rubinstein's in D minor—a piece that the composer-pianist himself, and Mr Hoffman after him, often played and that frankly displays piano and virtuoso rather than merges them into a primarily symphonic music. In the first movement, the pianist may give proof of technical range and resource, of declamatory force in the enunciation of theme and melody, of vivid "passage-work," of command of color and bravura with the orchestra or in contrast to it. In the second, the pianist almost monopolizes the music which nows first in slow and then swifter song of musing matter and manner. In the finale—the usual rondo—comes opportunity for the sharp-set play of rhythms, for whirls of tone and for large and sustained pianistic power.

Throughout the concerto, with orchestra and audience happily disposed, Mme. Legenska was mistress of herself, her music and her instrument, playing in the large and ornate style that the concerto inherently invites with full-voiced magnificence of tone, with vigor of declamation, with ardor in the more songful measures, with sweep and opulence of technical display. To Rubinstein and to his worthy successors with the piece, the music bade the pianist strike rhythmic fire, fill full the slow song, match the piano at need against the orchestra and in the finale at least bear all before it. In unusual degree for a woman, Mme. Leginska has the energy of spirit and the power of fingers and wrist to achieve this amplitude and force of feeling and utterance. More than once and often through many measures she gained and sustained the "grand manner" in which Rubinstein designed the piece, while in the songful second movement and in the less displayful passages of the first, she enriched the music by the deep beauty of tone and the warmth of the color with which she flecked it. And in a symphony concert, only a little less than in a recital of her own, do her hearers feel the communicating force of her singular personality.

From the
Transcript
April 20,1917.

Items and Announcements

At the Symphony Concerts of next week, Dr. Muck and the orchestra will play for the first times here Mr. Converse's newest piece, the tone-poem, "Ave atque Vale," originally produced last January in St. Louis by Mr. Zach and his band. The music traces the more intimate moods of soldierly sacrifice for one's country, and is written for full modern orchestra. The programme includes [illegible] symphony in D major and airs from "Fidelio" and "Oberon" to be sung by Mme. Kurt of the Metropolitan Opera House, hitherto heard here in opera only.

"The Pops" of 1917

A few of those singular persons who believe that the present sum of human existence is the war—or, in some instances, talk about the war—have been industriously spreading the report that there were to be no "Pop" concerts at Symphony Hall through May and June contrary to the custom of thirty-odd years. They, it appeared, were not minded to them; therefore the public, which, like all of us, they are prone to see in their own image, was not minded to them. As an actual fact of the theatres and the concert-halls that public, so far, is as much disposed to seek entertainment in them as it ever was. As an actual fact also "The Pops" are to run their usual course and even a longer one than has been the wont. They will begin at Symphony Hall at the end of the regular Symphony Concerts—that is to say on Monday, May 7, and they will continue for ten weeks, instead of the usual nine—that is through July 14. As last year for the first time, the orchestra will number seventy-five under sundry conductors whose names are yet to be announced; "special nights" of various kinds will occur and recur as in previous seasons; and the general arrangements and plan of the concerts be maintained as usual.

From the
Herald
April 21,1917

DR. MUCK GIVES NOREN'S 'VITA'

Presents Noisy Work in His Program for the Afternoon.

22D SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE.

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Noren, "Vita," symphony for modern orchestra; Brahms, variations on a theme of Haydn.

Noren's symphony was produced at a Gewandhaus concert in Leipsic early in January, 1912. It was played in Berlin in January of the following year. The performance yesterday was the first in this country. In Leipsic and Berlin the symphony was harshly criticised. And no wonder.

An old English philosopher remarked that the life of man was short, brutal and nasty. With the substitution of "long" for "short" this description might justly be applied to the "Vita" of Heinrich Gottlieb Noren.

The composer has taken pains to state that this music is not a portrayal of life, certainly not his life. If it were, it would be a sad commentary on a noisy career, and we are informed that Mr. Noren in private is a highly respectable citizen. No, his symphony, as he has said, is a meditation on life, "half contemplative, half impassioned up to the finale, in which reflection gives way to the external enjoyment of life." Mr. Noren has also said that it was far from his intention to write a "program symphony." Yet at least two German critics have declared that the "Vita" symphony might be entitled "Faust," with the Scherzo picturing the Walpurgis night, the finale Auerbach's Cellar, while the first and third movements are as monologues of Faust.

Mr. Noren entitles his Scherzo "Doubt" and gives the further explanation "in a bizarre manner." The third movement is "Former Years"; the finale, "The Joy of Life."

While it would have been better if the Prologue had been written for a military band and for performance out of doors, the movement is on the whole the most thoughtfully conceived one of the four, the one with the most musically dramatic ideas, the one that is the most skilfully constructed. If this music, as those that follow, were not so abominably noisy! Mr. Noren outvies in sheer noise even our own Mr. Clapp. Mr. Noren, too, employs a huge orchestra. The absence of anvils and a wind machine is unaccountable.

The Scherzo is indeed "bizarre." The scherzo section, proper is in poor imitation of Berlioz's manner; but Berlioz was a genius; Mr. Norén is an industrious German, who founded a conservatory of music at Crefeld, was a professor in a Berlin school, and has studied diligently without acquiring taste or style. His admirers might say in reply that he is efficient; that is to say, he has massed in this instance a great body of players and attempted to carry an audience by brute force.

The third movement is inherently commonplace, platitudinous. Stripped of its orchestral clothing, the musical body would be as thin, feeble, anaemic, as Louis XV in the famous triptych of Thackeray. The Finale expresses "The Joy of Life." It reminds one of a college freshman's idea of the joyous life; smashing lamp-posts, pulling down signs and removing an iron dog from some wôrthy townsman's lawn. There is a short and mournful episode, possibly expressing Mr. Noren's remorse over what he had been doing for nearly an hour.

It is not easy to see why Dr. Muck, a musician of fastidious taste, should have spent his energy and skill on the production of this banal and pretentious symphony. The explanation may be this: He wished by a tour de force, by his own genius and as leader of the superb orchestra, to make the music plausible; to persuade the audience that, after all, this symphony was worthy of its attention. For Dr. Muck can be ironical, and he has a lively sense of humor.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week will include Brahms's Symphony No. 2, Converse's "Ave Atque Vale" and Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini." Mme. Kurt will sing arias from "Fidelio" and "Oberon."

The program of the last concerts of the season, May 4, 5, will be as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 4; Liszt, "Tasso"; Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration"; Wagner, Prelude to "The Master Singers of Nuremberg."

From the Advertiser
April 21,1917.

VARIED PROGRAM AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Two Compositions Contrast as Radical Modern and Conservative

NOREN STRONGLY RESEMBLES STRAUSS

Work Big and Noisy—Performance of Variations by Brahms Beautiful

By LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAM.

Noren. "Vita." Symphony for modern orchestra.
Brahms. Orchestral Variations on a Theme by Haydn.

It sounded menacing, "A Symphony for Modern Orchestra," all the more so when we remembered that Heinrich Gottlieb Noren had a few years ago launched at our heads a set of orchestral variations, with tremendous orchestration, and nearly an hour in length. Nevertheless, in that work, as in the present symphony, there was so much of modern tone-color displayed that they did not become tiresome. It is quite evident that Noren is likely to rival Richard Straus in the wholesale character of his scoring in the skilful jugglery of changing rhythms, and in his complexity of figure development.

There are several men alive who have outstripped Wagner in scoring, while Beethoven in his ninth symphony, once thought to be the Ultima Thule of orchestration, sounds quite simple beside many a modern score. History repeats itself, in different Arts. After Michael Angelo and the giants, there came a number of men who achieved the technical skill of their forerunners, and tried to put this technical skill in the place of ideas. If Noren and Strauss had as many grand or beautiful musical thoughts as they have highly colored tints they would be masters indeed, but as it is, they lag far behind Beethoven or Wagner.

It is quite possible that the fortissimo character of much of this work will give rise to rumors, in the interior of New England, that Boston was bombarded yesterday afternoon. The symphony is called "Vita"—"Life"—and it is evident that Noren does not believe in "a short life and a merry one" but in one that is long and noisy. He carrics out Mahler's idea of denying that he is giving program music while using all of its dramatic touches.

The work is big, big, big, and scorns the "still, small voice." The first movement is largely given over to brasses fortissimo, although it ends very softly, as if the vehement struggle had brought exhaustion. The second movement was labelled "Doubt," but it was a doubt that we could not solve. It often had more of impatience than doubt. Then came "Memories" and the composer proved that he had a long memory. There was too much of ruminating here, but there were plenty of brass crashes also.

The finale was "Lebenslust." Noren's "Joie de Vivre" seemed to consist largely in smashing things; gong, tamborine, cymbals,—all the percussion gave all kinds of percussedness. What was the chief instrument of this finale? No one would ever guess. It was the xylophone! ! And it was better played than it has ever been in the Howard Athenaeum. But it was rather odd to have the xylophone become the obligato instrument in a symphony, and in the Boston Symphony concerts! There was some good counterpoint in the finale, however, but, in summing up we can only say that there is much more skill than beauty, much more excitement than pleasure, in the work. It received a great performance and was enthusiastically applauded.

In spite of the fact that Brahms is not so overwhelming in his scoring as Noren, yet one finds that he chooses his instruments here with good taste and achieves all possible effect. The St. Anthony theme itself is a splendid one and charms quite unadorned. It has all the character of a Pilgrim's Song, with earnest devotion combined with a march-like swing.

Brahms does not try, in this, to march out each department of the orchestra in dress parade, as so many orchestral variations are prone to do, but contents himself with good contrasts of major and minor, with some ingenious rhythmic changes and with some reasonable changes of Tempo.

He avoids also the temptation of going on with his transformations interminably. We have often stated that a learned composer becomes dangerous when he yields to the variation fascination. He always sees some further possible changes of the theme and is apt to end by becoming boresome. Even Beethoven did not always escape this, and Prahms in some of his piano variations goes to extreme lengths. But in this work he shows admirable self-control and does not fatigue the auditor. The sixth and seventh variations were specially effective, but one always felt that the composer could have gone on with a dozen more changes of the theme had he chosen to do so. Everything was fluent and unforced, with the fatal fluency of the great master in the field in which skill distances emotion.

The performance was altogether beautiful. The conductor, in such a work, has also his chance of display, for on his constantly changing balance of parts, bringing now this, now that, set of instruments into the foreground, depends the full effect of the work. In this, however, Dr. Muck is a consummate master, and the orchestra nowadays understands and carries out his slightest and subtlest suggestion. Therefore these variations, heard often before, were not of the cut-and-dried exhibition order but at times became loftly and majestic and worked up to a most legitimate climax in the finale. Nor did Brahms think it necessary to present the conventional fugue in the finale, which most composers give as a "P. P. C.," a formal exit, but ended without the strict contrapuntal exhibition.

We always enjoy it especially when the orchestra shines purely on its own merits, and it certainly did so in this particular concert, which was throughout a noble display of technique.

From the
Post
April 21,1917

SYMPHONY PERFORMS NEW WORK

Noren's "Life" Heard for First Time in Boston

BY OLIN DOWNES

A new symphony, "Vita," by Gustav Noren, was played for the first time in Boston at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Why?

CONVENTIONAL MUSIC

Dr. Muck might answer that one work of Noren, his "Kaleidoscope," had been produced in Boston by Mr. Fielder in 1909, with some success, and furthermore, that the Noren symphony, a series of sonorous platitudes of the most conventional and approved variety, though now somewhat old, was yesterday applauded with enthusiasm. But an immediately enthusiastic reception of a new work is seldom very convincing proof of its originality or solidity, and if one is to go by previous successes, why continually perform many works by modern Europeans which are palpably worthless, as Dr. Muck has often done, and why not perform more frequently certain works which have made successes and deserve to be performed oftener than is the case?

For five seasons back, for instance, we have heard no music by Henry Gilbert, a Boston composer, whose "Comedy on Negro Themes," performed by Mr. Fielder in April, 1913, was one of the most successful novelties of several Symphony seasons, and so reckoned by a majority of press and public. Yet Dr. Muck has been shown music by Mr. Gilbert, who is in all probability the most original, and perhaps the only original American composer of today, and the Metropolitan Opera Company has recently accepted a work of Mr. Gilbert's for performance next winter in New York.

Poorest Works Picked

We have instead listened at the Symphony concerts to many abortive compositions by Europeans and Americans, and apparently in performing American works Dr. Muck has taken care to pick out the poorest, so far as recent symphony programmes have shown. We emphasize the case of Mr. Gilbert, because it seems to us unfortunate that a Boston composer who lacks social influence or long established reputation should go so long and unjustly neglected in his own city, while many mediocrities, local and otherwise, have been persistently and repeatedly encouraged.

There is no need to talk at length about this symphony. When we say it is platitudinous in the German fashion we say this with not the slightest political bias. The Noren symphony is hopeless commonplace and out of date. It can scarcely be called bad Strauss, since it is almost old-fashioned enough to be considered poor Mendelssohn. The variations of Noren were incomparably better.

First Movement the Best

The symphony has as its title "Life." Its first movement, the best of the four, containing the only salient musical theme of the work, is called a "Prologue." The second movement, a scherzo, is called "Doubt"; the third movement "Former Years," and the fourth movement "Joy of Life." It is too bad that the composer felt obliged to prefix these suggestive titles, for in writing programme music of a sort he is naive and ineffective. His "Joy of Life" is cheaper than the cheapest of Offenbach and amusing because of its earnest triviality. His scherzo could be anything but "Doubt," since it is not in the least subjective or psychological, but merely a pleasing and harmless collocation of scherzo noises such as all truly conventional symphonies offer. The sentimentality of the slow movement, the pseudo-dramatic recurrence in this movement of a choral passage heard already in the first movement, are evidently more natural to the composer. The instrumentation is glibly routine, with somewhat of over-emphasis of the brass. It all goes with a hip and a hurrah and a light-hearted pleasure in the obvious that might well hearten the thoughtless listener.

The well known and excellent variations by Brahms on the St. Anthony theme of Haydn completed the concert. The symphony was brilliantly performed.

From the Monitor
April 21,1917.

DR. MUCK GIVES PERFORMANCE OF NOREN SYMPHONY

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Karl Muck, Conductor—Twenty-second program, presented in Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass., afternoon of April 20, 1917: Noren, "Vita" symphony (first performance in Boston); Brahms, variations on a theme by Haydn.

In the mathematics of symphony writing, the man who is half an humorist is twice an humorist. And that is the kind of man the composer of the "Vita" symphony is. For he has written two of the four movements of his work in consistent comedy vein, when he could have filled all classical requirements by writing only one movement that way. Following Beethoven's practise, he has made one of his divisions, the second, a formal scherzo. Then, going farther than Beethoven, he has cast his final movement in humorous mold, conveying by it not the idea of jollity merely, for that would be nothing unusual, but the idea of wit and satire.

Humor is a thing which few composers give in double quantity. The Italian word that designates the humorous division of a cyclic piece of music occurs far less often in symphony scores than "andante" and other words of heavy-paced meaning. Generally speaking, writers have been fain to get through their task with a quarter part of their pages devoted to humor, and the majority of them dilute that quarter with contemplative interludes. Before Beethoven, the idea of orchestral satire may be said scarcely to have existed, except in accompaniments to vocal music, as in Mozart's operas and in scattered pages of Haydn's oratorios. Good nature, pleasant manners and pastoral merriment were expressed abundantly, but formal humor had yet to be developed. Since Beethoven's time, many composers have avoided their obligations to the muse of comedy, some like Dvorak, inventing a substitute for the scherzo; others, like Franck, balking at the problem of humor altogether. On the other hand, there are orchestral writers, preeminent among them Strauss, who have made satire of the tone poem as vivid as that of the novel.

If Noren were considered in regard only to the first three movements of his "Vita" symphony, he would be found to have triumphed in no small way. If he were judged as humorist merely on what he does with his regular scherzo, he would deserve uncommon praise, inasmuch as this division of the piece is delightfully contrasted with the serious prologue and the earnest slow movement. But when he is studied in relation to his whole symphony, he is found to have made a significant contribution to the orchestral repertory. For in this work he is individual in making humor the main element of his plan instead of a casual element. Consequently he writes a new kind of closing movement and introduces an unfamiliar emphasis into the symphony form, and in so doing, he succeeds, not like Tschaikowsky in the "Pathetic" symphony, in sentimentalizing his finale, but in socializing it. He is a Laurence Sterne among composers. He puts his hearers on intimate terms with one another, causing them to think of their human environment in all its Shandyism and concreteness and showing them wherefore they should laugh at it. He plainly regards such a procedure as better worth while than the usual symphony composer's farewell, which calls listeners away from actualities to the contemplation of some remote, if glowing, ideal.

The audience applauded the performance of the symphony with enthusiasm. It also showed keen interest in the variations of Brahms, surprised, no doubt, that orchestration which used to sound heavy is light in comparison with that of a modern work like Noren's.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its last Cambridge concert in Sander's Theater, Harvard University, on the evening of Thursday, April 26, with Miss Claire Forbes, pianist, assisting. The program is as follows:

Goldmark, overture, "In the Spring"; Schubert, "Unfinished" symphony; Tschaikowsky, concerto in B flat minor for piano and orchestra; Wagner, prelude to "Meistersinger."

The Symphony Orchestra gives its twenty-third pair of Boston concerts in Symphony Hall on the afternoon of April 27 and the evening of April 28, with Mme. Melanie Kurt, soprano, as soloist. The "Ave atque Vale" tone poem of Converse will be presented for the first time at the concerts. The program is as follows:

Brahms, second symphony in D major; Beethoven, aria from "Fidelio;" Converse, "Ave atque Vale" tone poem; Weber, aria from "Oberon"; Berlioz, overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."

The thirty-second season of Pop concerts, given by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opens in Symphony Hall on the evening of Monday, May 7, and closes on the evening of Saturday, July 14. It is understood that a conductor outside the orchestra will direct the performances, as in the supplementary season of Pops last fall. The programs, according to present plans, will be made according to the practice of former series of spring concerts and will not regularly include singing by soloists, as in the fall. Special college nights and nights more or less exclusively devoted to social organizations of one kind and another will be arranged as heretofore. The performances will begin at 8 o'clock in the evening and will last until about 11 o'clock. The players in the Pop Orchestra will number about 75 men.

From the
Journal
April 21,1917.

NOREN SHOUTS IN SYMPHONY TERMED "VITA"

Massing of Tone Masterly, But Emotional Thrill Is Lacking.

By F. Esposito

If Heinrich Gottlieb Noren well and truly recorded in his symphony, "Vita," which had its first performance in Boston at yesterday's rehearsal, his "meditation on life, half-contemplative, half-impassioned," he has a brutal mind.

Life to him presents ideas to be shouted in brass, principally; ugly thoughts for themes, strongly drawn in unisons of strings; repetitions endless and with so slight variation as to seem nearly meaningless—and swift, dance-rhythm smartnesses in which the screaming flutes rush up to the edge of chromatic cliffs, and fall with explosions on great drums and symbals.

The work is in four movements. The first is called a "prologue"—there is a great temptation to apply an adjective to this movement—and is stressed and strenuous from the first long-drawn phrase of a so-called elegiac theme. Immediately a jerky, unhappy theme crosses the first, bawled almost as loudly; but before this discussion develops the insistent brass breaks in—and from then on Herr Noren speaks his emphatic message mostly in sounding trumpets and clanging cymbals.

The rhythms grow strong and the instrumentation thickens, clouding the beauty of the great string orchestra. It was hard to believe that this was the orchestra which played Debussy's music only a week ago.

The second movement, named "Skepsis," or "Doubt," is marked "scherzo bizarramente," and one knew pretty well what to expect; croaking bassoons in pawky melody, flickering swiftness, much chuckling triplets and grace-noted flute phrases, all scored over a rushing dancing rhythm with artful breaks and syncopations simulating passionate departure from the line. There broke in an anguished melody, smoothly drawn in the strings, and the obviousness of the contrast between this section and the rest of the movement told the whole story of the symphony.

The third movement was the least coherent, the most repetitional, the most uninteresting of all; the finale, "Lebenslust," was more of the lightning-like play of fluid melody and diabolically swift accompaniment, with a coda that might have been shortened by half.

Noren handles his instruments in masterly fashion, so far as massing tone or drawing a melodic line goes, but he converses always in shouts, and gives neither an emotional thrill nor an intellectual treat.

Brahms' variations on a choral by Josef Haydn furnished the rest of this week's concert. The graceful, many-tinted work was in grateful contrast to the symphony, and was played con amore by the orchestra.

Only two symphony concerts remain in this season. Next week the orchestra will be assisted by Mme. Melanie Kurt, who will sing two arias, one from "Fidelio" and the other from "Oberon." A tone-poem by F. S. Converse will have its first performance, and the symphony is the Brahms [illegible]

From the
Globe
April 21,1917.

NOREN'S SYMPHONY

Long, Noisy Score, Full of Sound

Yet Contains No Parts for Cannon or a Steam Whistle

Heinrich Gottlieb Noren goes in heavily for the demonstrative life. Does he recommend high living and plain thinking, or is he a rugged man of bold and fearless speech? When his symphony "Vita," op 36, was performed in Berlin he was said to have contended that it was not his purpose to write a "program symphony." His music was not to be a "portrayal of life, but a meditation upon it, half-contemplative, half-impassioned up to the Final, in which reflection made way for external enjoyment in life."

Yesterday afternoon Boston heard the symphony for the first time. If portions of it are but "half-contemplative, half-impassioned," the hearer well may tremble at the prospect of complete fulfillment. Mr Noren's idea of th eenjoyment of life may be an excellent one, but it would be preferable to learn of it in colors, by pantomime, in solid, well-buttressed prose, or, if needs be, by sound, then much mellowed by distance.

Noting the demands of the score for large families of instruments, with the last of the group interchangeable—as in wood and brass—with one of deeper voice, one feels mild surprise that there should have been no part for the thunder machine or a steam whistle. At certain climatic moments the firing of cannon would round out the din.

This is noisy bruiting abroad of ideas that better merit modesty or deep seclusion. The general texture of the thought is for the greater part pompously serious, cumbersome, prolix or obvious. But little is left for the hearer's conjecture. Rhythmic figures are harped upon, without end. The "restless" theme of the first movement engages in a dramatic duel with a broader one. It is seldom out of the ring and dies hard in augmentation in the horns, and finally in the bassoons. One similar to it, but of more flimsy outline appears in the last, and leads to the inevitable fugue. There is little freshness or fertility in invention. Sequnce restates many an idea which grows the more stale. The composer's intent appears to be to keep the orchestra churning sounds into a huge mixture which gorges the ear and only causes relief when it ceases.

There is a certain artisan's skill in the prosaic logic with which the score is put together, and in the orderly use of the instruments. At least there is continuity, and for a few moments in the latter part of the slow movement, there appeared a glimpse of feeling and sensibility. But of imagination, of inherent fineness of sentiment, of nobility or strength beyond massive weight or turgidity, of that individuality of expression which by its very conviction, inevitability, even daring in form and manner, if not by its significance of content—there is little in this hour long resume of platitudes.

Dr Muck did all that a conductor could do, for more than most would have had the grace of the genius to do, and the players were obedient, but it was hard to believe that this could be the same body of instruments which last week in Debussy's music, made sounds too wonderful to be deluged within a week. A performance of Brahms' variations on a theme by Josef Haydn followed. Appreciating Dr Muck's efforts the audience applauded conductor and players enthusiastically after the symphony.

From the
Herald
April 22,1917.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Melanie Kurt, dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will make her first appearance as soloist with the orchestra at the 23d pair of Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. She will sing "Abscheulicher, we eilst du hin," from "Fidelio," and "Ocean Thou Mighty Monster," from "Oberon." An interesting feature will be the first performance in Boston of a new tone poem for orchestra by Frederick S. Converse, entitled "Ave atque Vale." It was first performed last January by the St. Louis Symphony orchestra. The Symphony will be Brahms's in D major. Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" will end the concert.

SYMPHONY IN CAMBRIDGE

The final Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening at 8 o'clock. Miss Claire Forbes, pianist, will play Tschaikowsky's concerto in B-flat minor. The program comprises Goldmark's Overture "In the Spring," Schubert's symphony in B-minor, "Unfinished," Tschaikowsky's concerto for piano in B-flat minor and Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers."

THE POPS

The 32d season of Pop concerts will open in Symphony Hall Monday evening, May 7, and continue for 10 weeks thereafter, the closing concert being given on Saturday evening, July 14. The characteristics which have made the Pop concerts a unique institution and have held them in high favor for many years will be maintained. The concerts will be run from 8 o'clock until about 11. A number of special nights have been arranged, which will be announced in due course. The orchestra will number a minimum of 75.

[113]

From the Transcript
April 21, 1917.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

FROM NOREN'S COMMONPLACE TO BRAHMS' CHARM

Programme of Contrasts That Began with a Sterile and Lifeless Symphony by a Rediscovered Composer, and That Ended with the Smiling Variations After Haydn Played to Perfection

TWO pieces filled the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon—Noren's "symphony for modern orchestra," with "Vita" or "Life" for sub-title, played for the first time on this side of the Atlantic and Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn familiar through the repetitions of thirty years. The symphony was the music of a living composer who has failed thus far to sustain the reputation that he first won ten years ago. The variations were the music of a composer already classic and of such of that music as time mellows and deepens to those who play it, upon those who hear it. The symphony continued through at least sixty minutes; the variations through less than thirty. The composer of the symphony multiplied the chosen instruments; the composer of the variations wrote for a relatively sparse assemblage of them. The symphony was devoid of any sort of invention outside occasional ingenuities with harmonies and timbres; the variations teemed with fruitful tonal ideas, happy tonal fancies, frequent felicities of handling. In the symphony was neither poetry nor passion—only will and labor. Out of the variations smiled rich creative impulse and blossoming imagination. And so forth with comparisons "all to the good" of the variations, "all to the bad" of the symphony.

In only two respects were the two musics akin. Each according to its kind was played to the utmost of the ability of orchestra and conductor and each was warmly applauded by the audience. A week ago those same hearers warmed to the diverse beauty, the fineness of imagination, the subtleties of expression, the glamor of mood, atmosphere, picture in Debussy's three "Images." Yesterday they lavished even heartier plaudits upon the crass sterilities of Noren's symphony. There is a catholicity of mind and sensation that responds to music of widely divergent substance, style, suggestion, so long as each species is eloquent of kind—the catholicity that hears Strauss, for example, as candidly as it hears Franck. There ought also to be a discrimination of mind and sensation that will differentiate music of pretentious commonplace from music of individual imagination. Yesterday, to judge by the plaudits that twice recalled the conductor and brought the orchestra to its feet at the end of Noren's symphony, that faculty, often in pleasurable evidence in Symphony Hall, had for the time gone a-wool-gathering. But perhaps, as the cynics of the intermission remarked, the applause rewarded the performance—and duty done.

It is a vain thing to speculate upon the why and wherefore of the inclusion of Noren's symphony in the scheme of the concerts— as vain as it is to try to account for the performance of this or that faintly remembered piece, no more deserving from American, Parisian, Russian or German hands. Perhaps Dr. Muck would ease his mind of some fancied obligation toward a symphony that has lain three years and more upon the shelves of the library and so doing inform his hearers of the mediocrity that besets many a Ger- n follower of Strauss and Mahler. Perhaps recollection of the piece that first ave Noren standing in symphony conerts at home and abroad—the well invented, imaginatively treated and sometimes shrewdly pointed variations of the "Kaleidoscope" of 1907—still glamored the composer's name, if not his music. Or perhaps, the symphony "read" better even to Dr. Muck's practised eye and mind than in rehearsal it "sounded" upon his ear or in performance upon the ears of his hearers. And perhaps, finally, and by no means unplausibly, he may have thought as well of it as did by all outward tokens most of them. Fortunately or unfortunately even the omniscience of the programme-book may not discover the motives of a conductor in his choice of novel music and surely it is not obligated to set them down. What, for example, if upon a day it should disclose that a conductor being human, had acted from not easily explainable impulse?

The fact remains that Noren's symphony was played after as assiduous rehearsal as though it were a masterpiece. Group by group, choir by choir, or in full numbers assembled Dr. Muck schooled the orchestra in a music that multiplies difficulties, intricacies and seemingly merely wilful exactions to no purpose of definition, suggestion or projection. Between the acumen, coördination and zeal of the conductor and the individual and collective abilities of the men, the symphony was probably more eloquently played than it ever was in a short round of German concert-halls in 1912, and there is not a reasonable doubt that it was heard yesterday in characteristic voice and full stature. So heard the design stood plain—a hackneyed plan, almost, among the German and the Russian makers of symphonies and tone-poems in our day. Call the symphony "Life"—a meditation, as Noren explains "half-contemplative and half-impassioned" upon the moods and the impulses of men. Set to a first movement now grave and now restless of voice with the contrasting motives developed into conflict. Proceed with a second movement of disordered course and color, of discordant interval and bizarre harmonies, as of haunting, troubling, fantastic phantoms. "Doubt" Noren chooses to call this division of his symphony. Pass to a third movement of alternately wistful or broken song—the memories of youth as maturity harks back to the theme, and a conclusion that is solemn and strange.

It is possible that this piece is a little too long, and that the composer might beware of too much sameness of rhythmical accompaniment figures, but this fault, if it proves, with repeated hearings of the music, to exist, can be quickly remedied by the elimination of a few measures. What is important is the characteristic quality of the theme itself, its unassuming sentiment, its nobility of impulse, and the fine length of line that the music shows. The orchestration is simple, so is the harmony. The theme is not exotic in character, but is the expression of a manly thought, and the conclusion is dramatic as it is unassuming.

Mr. Converse conducted with an authority not often realized by those who take the stick in hand as seldom as he. The performance was impressive, because it was so truly of a piece, and because the conviction of the composer were so clearly reflected in what he achieved as author and interpreter.

The passionately dramatic music of Berlioz, under Dr. Muck's compelling hand, flamed like a holacaust! Miss Christie is in many respects the ideal pianist for the Beethoven G major concerto, today the most individual of all Beethoven's works in that form and the most intimate and romantic in its appeal. The last movement could have had more variety of color, and more humor.

From the Record
April 26, 1917.

LAST SYMPHONY IN SANDERS THEATRE

The final Cmabridge concert of the year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Sanders Theatre this evening at 8 o'clock. The soloist will be Miss Claire Forbes, who will play Tschaikowsky's concerto in B-flat minor. The program will include works by Wagner, Goldmark and Schubert.

From the Herald
April 28, 1917.

SYMPHONY'S 23D CONCERT

Interesting Program Conducted by Dr. Muck—Brahms Work Performed.

PIANIST GIVES PLEASURE

By PHILIP HALE.

The 23d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Brahms, Symphony No. 2, D major; Converse, Tone Poem, "Ave Atque Vale" (first time here); Beethoven, Concerto in G major, No. 4, for piano (Miss Winifred Christie, pianist); Berlioz, overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."

The concert was an interesting one. Dr. Muck and the orchestra gave a singularly impressive performance of Brahms's Symphony. One of the most brilliant of overtures was the final number.

Mr. Converse's tone poem, composed in the summer of 1916, was performed for the first time last January in St. Louis by the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra. It was not his intention to compose "program music," nor had he any poem in mind, not even the pathetic verses of Catullus, in which the poet bade eternal farewell to his brother in imperishable lines. It was the composer's intention to express subjectively "the feelings of one who bids farewell at the call of duty to all that is infinitely loved and cherished." The music is in free form. There is an introduction with a plaintive theme of Celtic character. This introduction, largely developed, is used as the concluding episode. The main body of the composition is an Allegro containing various episodes, now tender, now stern, now passionate.

The introduction has marked character, in musical material, and in orchestral expression. It serves admirably for an imposing close. A particularly striking episode in the Allegro is the one for oboe solo with a sighing accompaniment. As a whole the composition, while it shows Mr. Converse's facility and his knowledge of orchestral resources, does not seem to us as firmly knit and definite as certain other pieces by him for orchestra. There is too much repetition of phrases and passages; repetition without varying effect. Climaxes are too long delayed; there are disturbing pauses in the flow of musical thought. Mr. Converse, who conducted, was recalled several times.

Mme. Kurt telegraphed on Thursday that she was unable to sing on account of hoarseness. Miss Christie was substituted at very short notice. She had fortunately played the concerto of Beethoven with the orchestra at Hartford, Ct., this season, and played it with uncommon success. In Boston she was already and most favorably known by her recitals. We have seldom, if ever, heard a more musical, beautiful, poetic interpretation of this concerto than that of Miss Christie's yesterday. Saying this, we are not unmindful of the greatest pianists who have played the concerto here and elsewhere. Miss Christie's performance was especially remarkable for its exquisite proportion, its intimate relationship with the orchestra. There was the finest phrasing, a charming quality of tone, sure, but not ostentatious technic, brilliance when the music demanded it, above all poetic comprehension, grasp, expression. As a player in recitals Miss Christie is one of [illegible] few pianists visiting us that give [illegible]yed pleasure. Now she has shown [illegible] her rare ability as a player with [illegible]tra.

[illegible] concert will be repeated this [illegible]g. The program of the last con- [illegible] of the season, May 5, 6, will be [illegible]lows: Beethoven, Symphony No. [illegible]szt, Tasso Lamento e Trionfo; [illegible]ss "Death and Transfiguration"; [illegible]er, Prelude to "The Mastersingers [illegible]remberg."

From the Traveler
April 28, 1917

Final Programme For Symphony Season

Feature Number Liszt Symphonic Poem "Tasso" Which Dr. Muck Will Conduct Here for the First Time.

By FRANK BERTWALL.

The coming week with its final concerts for the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra practically marks the farewell of public concerts and recitals until fall. The void will be filled for two months at least by the annual season of Pop concerts, which begin May 7.

All and all the year has been a successful one. True Boston has had but a minimum in the way of operatic offering but has promise of more next year with the assured coming of the Chicago Opera Company and a possible visit by the Metropolitan forces.

As usual the Symphony concerts have been the feature. In view of the war handicap Dr. Muck has been successful in arranging his programs. One might take exception to some of his selections from the works of American composers. The Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony hall have broken all records for popularity. Thanks to the war Boston has enjoyed exceptional opportunities for hearing the world's best musical talent in concerts and recitals, notably in the Jordan Hall engagements. The passing the Kneisel Quartet is to be regretted but we still have the peerless Flonzaleys, not to mention others.

Final Symphony Concerts.

For the final Symphony concerts, next week Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dr. Muck offers the following program: Beethoven, fourth symphony; Liszt, symphonic poem, "Tasso"; Richard Strauss, tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The Liszt selection will be given by Dr. Muck for the first time at these concerts.

From the Post
April 28, 1917.

SYMPHONY LED BY CONVERSE

Composer Conducts New Orchestral Work

BY OLIN DOWNES

Brahms Second Symphony, a new orchestral piece by F. S. Converse, "Ave atque Vale," conducted by the composer; Beethoven's G major piano concerto, played by Miss Winifred Christie, and Berlioz' Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" made up the programme of the 23rd concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

There is no attempt at a programme, beyond only an emotional sequence of moods, in Mr. Converse's orchestral piece, which we consider one of the simplest and finest things he has done, "Hail and Farewell." One about to face a grave duty bids farewell to all he leaves behind him. There is a slow introduction which states a principal theme of a simple and noble character. This theme is freely developed, with subsidiary matter in an allegro. Then there is a dramatic climax, a harking back to the theme, and a conclusion that is solemn and strange.

It is possible that this piece is a little too long, and that the composer might beware of too much sameness of rhythmical accompaniment figures, but this fault, if it proves, with repeated hearings of the music, to exist, can be quickly remedied by the elimination of a few measures. What is important is the characteristic quality of the theme itself, its unassuming sentiment, its nobility of impulse, and the fine length of line that the music shows. The orchestration is simple, so is the harmony. The theme is not exotic in character, but is the expression of a manly thought, and the conclusion is dramatic as it is unassuming.

Mr. Converse conducted with an authority not often realized by those who take the stick in hand as seldom as he. The performance was impressive, because it was so truly of a piece, and because the conviction of the composer were so clearly reflected in what he achieved as author and interpreter.

The passionately dramatic music of Berlioz, under Dr. Muck's compelling hand, flamed like a holacaust! Miss Christie is in many respects the ideal pianist for the Beethoven G major concerto, today the most individual of all Beethoven's works in that form and the most intimate and romantic in its appeal. The last movement could have had more variety of color, and more humor.

From the Monitor
April 28, 1917.

MR. CONVERSE'S "AVE ATQUE VALE" TONE POEM HEARD

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Karl Muck, Conductor; Miss Winifred Christie, Soloist —Twenty-third program, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass., afternoon of April 27, 1917: Brahms, symphony No. 2, in D major, op. 73; Converse, "Ave atque Vale," tone poem (conducted by the composer); Beethoven, concerto in G major, for piano and orchestra, op. 58; Berlioz, overture to the opera, "Benvenuto Cellini."

For nearly 10 years Frederick S. Converse, the composer of the new tone poem, "Ave atque Vale," has been accepted by his community as a man thoroughly familiar with the mechanics of instrumentation and as a master craftsman generally at music writing. Ever since he produced his operas, "The Pipe of Desire" and "The Sacrifice," he has been entitled to stand among the foremost orchestral technicians. But able as he is at executing a task like the score of an opera or of a symphonic piece, he is a long way yet from proving himself an artist with liberated powers of expression, or even a designer with inventive knack. He has the disposition of a musical engineer, rather than that of a musical architect. What he builds has the firmness and solidity of things carved out of the solid rock, instead of the lightness and poise of articulated and membered structures.

It is not strange that a composer of this type should seek a Roman sentiment to develop into a tone poem. Or, supposing him first to have written his piece—a lament for men fallen in battle—and afterwards to have looked for a title, it is not strange that he found a formula of words from the columbaria of the Appian Way, which once served Catullus as a cadence for a threnody, to be exactly what he wanted. It is not strange, again, that after setting out to sing in an elegiac strain, he should keep up the song impressively and exaltedly; yes, and monotonously too. Furthermore, it is not strange that he should leave out of his stanzas all processional color.

The Brahms second symphony, which opened the program, was presented in a magnificently pliant style under Dr. Muck. On the other hand, in a rather stiff manner and with a distinctly harsh quality of tone the Berlioz overture was presented, which closed the concert. The G major piano concerto of Beethoven, with Miss Christie as soloist, was delicately performed, the men of the orchestra maintaining an unusually restrained and gracious attitude to the lightly scored text. The assisting artist gave an admirable study of the first third of the work and recorded a smooth and pleasing performance of the remaining two thirds. She could have caused nobody to regret that she was chosen to take the duties of soloist in place of the singer, Mme. Kurt.

The closing Symphony concerts of the season will be given on May 4 and 5. The program will be as follows:

Beethoven, symphony No. 4; Liszt, "Tasso," symphonic poem; Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration," tone poem; Wagner, prelude to "Meistersinger."

The manager of the concerts is sending notices to subscribers of their privilege to renew for next year the seats they have held this year.

The pop concerts, given in Symphony Hall by an orchestra of Boston Symphony men in the early summer weeks, will open the evening of May 7. Programs of light music will be presented every week-day night, the performances lasting from 8 until 11 o'clock.

From the Globe
April 22, 1917.

New Converse Tone Poem at Week's Symphony Concerts

Dr Muck will play at the Symphony concerts this week for the first time in Boston a new tone poem by Frederick S. Converse of this city. "Ave et que Vale." The poem is a war song, built upon the aspirations and meditations of a soldier who is at the front. It was played for the first time last January by the St Louis Symphony Orchestra, under Max Zach.

Mme Melanie Kurt, the dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, will make her first appearance as soloist at these concerts. She will sing two familiar arias, "Abscheuliches, wo eilst du hin," from "Fidelio," and "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from "Oberon." During the visit of the Metropolitan Opera Company in Boston in April a year ago, Mme Kurt took these roles at her first appearance in this city: Isolda, April 5; the Princess in "The Rosscavilier," April 20, and Kundry, April 21.

The program will be as follows: Brahms' second symphony, Bethoven aria; Mr Converse's tone poem; aria from "Oberon," Berlox' overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."

Last Cambridge Symphony

The final Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening at 8 o'clock. The soloist will be Miss Claire Forbes, the young pianist who has won most favorable attention in Boston during the past year or so. Miss Forbes will play Tschaikowsky's concerto in B-flat minor. The program in its entirety comprises Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring"; Schubert's symphony in B minor, "Unfinished"; Tschaikowsky's concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in B-flat minor and Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

A Novel Tone-Poem by Mr. Converse—Mme. Kurt with the Symphony Orchestra—Choral Pieces from Mr. Townsend's Singers—Miscellaneous Recitals

FOR the final new piece of the season Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra will play at the Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next a new tone-poem, "Ave atque Vale," written by Mr. Converse and heard last January for the first times anywhere in St. Louis from Mr. Zach and his band. The music is designed for full modern orchestra and reflects the moods of devotion and the moods of regret against the background of warfare in a soldier about to give himself for his government—a topical tone-poem, so to say, and the first piece suggested by the war to be heard hereabouts. The other purely orchestral numbers of the programme are Brahms's songful and ingratiating second symphony, in D major and Berlioz's pictorial overture to his opera of "Benvenuto Cellini." To the concerts also will come the last "assisting artist" of the year—Mme. Kurt of the Metropolitan, who in opera, a year ago, has already proved in Boston the richness of her voice and the largeness of her style. She will sing two of the stock pieces of such sopranos of German training and experience—Leonora's monologue, "Abscheulicher!" from Beethoven's opera, "Fidelio," and the apostrophe to the ocean from Weber's opera, "Oberon."

In Sanders Theatre at Cambridge on Thursday evening next the Symphony Orchestra will end the current series of concerts at Harvard. For this eighth programme Dr. Muck has assembled Goldmark's overture of the spring, Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, Tchaikovski's concerto for piano in B-flat and the prelude to Wagner's opera, "Die Meistersinger." In the concerto, Miss Claire Forbes, the able young pianist, will play the solo part.

Friday afternoon, May 4, in Symphony Hall, the twenty-fourth and final afternoon concert of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck and unassisted. The programme traverses Beethoven's fourth symphony; Liszt's symphonic poem "Tasso," Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration"; and Wagner's prelude to his opera "Die Meistersinger."

Saturday evening, May 5, in Symphony Hall, the twenty-fourth and final evening concert of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck and unassisted, with the programme just noted.

measure after measure, thickly, bluntly; but hardly ever does the breath even of tonal life, much less of tonal passion or poetry animate it. No orchestra, no conductor, could glorify such commonplace. In solemn platitude went the beginning; in racing platitude went the end; and in variously paced and variously patterned platitude went all the rest between.

No wonder Brahms's variations seemed in contrast to smile with a new freshness, fancy, beauty as conductor and orchestra now plied their distinctions of tone, felicities of euphony, grace of musical line, charm of accent and glamor of tint upon music that was no bald and turgid prose. The songful theme out of Haydn vested in the shadowy color that Brahms could search out of his wind choir wooed the ear to the invention he was about to exercise upon it. The variations rans their course not in abstruse calculation or displayful scholarship, but with a seeming ease of fancy that hid more than one feat of resource and imagination achieved out of a fecundity not too usual even with a Brahms enkindled. And a smiling Brahms to boot that would have most of his exercises upon Haydn's theme as ingratiating as maybe is the Divertimento from which he took it. In the sheer loveliness upon ear and fancy of the final variations, in the light and happy energy of the end, recollection of Noren and his symphony vanished. Often Dr. Muck has summoned the graver beauty, the larger power of Brahms. Yesterday he evoked the charm that may also upspring from his music. H. T. P.

[114]

From the Transcript April 21, 1917.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

FROM NOREN'S COMMONPLACE TO BRAHMS' CHARM

Programme of Contrasts That Began with a Sterile and Lifeless Symphony by a Rediscovered Composer, and That Ended with the Smiling Variations After Haydn Played to Perfection

TWO pieces filled the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon—Noren's "symphony for modern orchestra," with "Vita" or "Life" for sub-title, played for the first time on this side of the Atlantic and Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn familiar through the repetitions of thirty years. The symphony was the music of a living composer who has failed thus far to sustain the reputation that he first won ten years ago. The variations were the music of a composer already classic and of such of that music as time mellows and deepens to those who play it, upon those who hear it. The symphony continued through at least sixty minutes; the variations through less than thirty. The composer of the symphony multiplied the chosen instruments; the composer of the variations wrote for a relatively sparse assemblage of them. The symphony was devoid of any sort of invention outside occasional ingenuities with harmonies and timbres; the variations teemed with fruitful tonal ideas, happy tonal fancies, frequent felicities of handling. In the symphony was neither poetry nor passion—only will and labor. Out of the variations smiled rich creative impulse and blossoming imagination. And so forth with comparisons "all to the good" of the variations, "all to the bad" of the symphony.

In only two respects were the two music akin. Each according to its kind was played to the utmost of the ability of orchestra and conductor and each was warmly applauded by the audience. A week ago those same hearers warmed to the diverse beauty, the fineness of imagination, the subtleties of expression, the glamor of mood, atmosphere, picture in Debussy's three "Images." Yesterday they lavished even heartier plaudits upon the crass sterilities of Noren's symphony. There is a catholicity of mind and sensation that responds to music of widely divergent substance, style, suggestion, so long as each species is eloquent of kind—the catholicity that hears Strauss, for example, as candidly as it hears Franck. There ought also to be a discrimination of mind and sensation that will differentiate music of pretentious commonplace from music of individual imagination. Yesterday, to judge by the plaudits that twice recalled the conductor and brought the orchestra to its feet at the end of Noren's symphony, that faculty, often in pleasurable evidence in Symphony Hall, had for the time gone a-wool-gathering. But perhaps, as the cynics of the intermission remarked, the applause rewarded the performance—and duty done.

It is a vain thing to speculate upon the why and wherefore of the inclusion of Noren's symphony in the scheme of the concerts— as vain as it is to try to account for the faintly remembered piece, no more deserving from American, Parisian, Russian or German hands. Perhaps Dr. Muck would ease his mind of some fancied obligation toward a symphony that has lain three years and more upon the shelves of the library and so doing inform his hearers of the mediocrity that besets many a German follower of Strauss and Mahler. Perhaps recollection of the piece that first gave Noren standing in symphony concerts at home and abroad—the well invented, imaginatively treated and sometimes shrewdly pointed variations of the "Kaleidoscope" of 1907—still glamored the composer's name, if not his music. Or perhaps, the symphony "read" better even to Dr. Muck's practised eye and mind than in rehearsal it "sounded" upon his ear or in performance upon the ears of his hearers. And perhaps, finally, and by no means unplausibly, he may have thought as well of it as did by all outward tokens most of them. Fortunately or unfortunately even the omniscience of the programme-book may not discover the motives of a conductor in his choice of novel music and surely it is not obligated to set them down. What, for example, if upon a day it should disclose that a conductor being human, had acted from not easily explainable impulse?

The fact remains that Noren's symphony was played after as assiduous rehearsal as though it were a masterpiece. Group by group, choir by choir, or in full numbers assembled Dr. Muck schooled the orchestra in a music that multiplies difficulties, intricacies and seemingly merely wilful exactions to no purpose of definition, suggestion or projection. Between the acumen, coördination and zeal of the conductor and the individual and collective abilities of the men, the symphony was probably more eloquently played than it ever was in a short round of German concert-halls in 1912, and there is not a reasonable doubt that it was heard yesterday in characteristic voice and full stature. So heard the design stood plain—a hackneyed plan, almost, among the German and the Russian makers of symphonies and tone-poems in our day. Call the symphony "Life"—a meditation, as Noren explains "half-contemplative and half-impassioned" upon the moods and the impulses of men. Set to a first movement now grave and now restless of voice with the contrasting motives developed into conflict. Proceed with a second movement of disordered course and color, of discordant interval and bizarre harmonies, as of haunting, troubling, fantastic phantoms. "Doubt" Noren chooses to call this division of his symphony. Pass to a third movement of alternately wistful or broken song—the memories of youth as maturity harks back to them. Then, for the finale, switch to the composer's scheme. Then, for the finale, switch keen-rhythmed, clamant, what better serves than "The Joy of Living?" A workable scheme by a score of proofs: Tchaikovski, for example, more than once used it with effect; a scheme that invites music and provides tonal contrast, that gives room for the breadth, strength, energy, opulence, harmonic and instrumental resource of the composing generation patterning itself after Strauss and Mahler; a design that suits sentimental Teutonic exaltation, expansion, introspection. As the variations of old suggested, Noren does not lack circumspection, even shrewdness.

Then and there, however, Noren stops. The motives from which he would have his music spring succeed each other, whatever his intent and implication in them, without significance or individuality, without stimulus to the ear, or power upon the imagination. Invention and impetus, mood and feeling are equally lacking in them. They become the commonplaces of music laid flat upon those that hear. Noren sets them in conflict or consonance; he amplifies or attenuates them and again the outcome is barren. He enriches his music from a full palette of timbres and harmonies; he keeps it moving in sonorous masses or makes rents therein with sharp discords; he breaks rhythms or intricately crosses them; he tosses phrases about and about; he plies many a trick of the modern German composer's trade; he is tireless in iteration. Yet again neither emotion nor illusion rises from his symphony. Like the motives that are the germs of the music, it all lies flat. There is the willed mood, the labelled and labored suggestion of each movement, but almost never may Noren catch his hearers within it or bear forward his design as by spontaneous impulsion. By taking thought in toil has he set down measure after measure, thickly, bluntly; but hardly ever does the breath even of tonal life, much less of tonal passion or poetry animate it. No orchestra, no conductor, could glorify such commonplace. In solemn platitude went the beginning; in racing platitude went the end; and in variously paced and variously patterned platitude went all the rest between.

No wonder Brahms's variations seemed in contrast to smile with a new freshness, fancy, beauty as conductor and orchestra now plied their distinctions of tone, felicities of euphony, grace of musical line, charm of accent and glamor of tint upon music that was no bald and turgid prose. The songful theme out of Haydn vested in the shadowy color that Brahms could search out of his wind choir wooed the ear to the invention he was about to exercise upon it. The variations rans their course not in abstruse calculation or displayful scholarship, but with a seeming ease of fancy that hid more than one feat of resource and imagination achieved out of a fecundity not too usual even with a Brahms enkindled. And a smiling Brahms to boot that would have most of his exercises upon Haydn's theme as ingratiating as maybe is the Divertimento from which he took it. In the sheer loveliness upon ear and fancy of the final variations, in the light and happy energy of the end, recollection of Noren and his symphony vanished. Often Dr. Muck has summoned the graver beauty, the larger power of Brahms. Yesterday he evoked the charm that may also upspring from his music. H. T. P.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

A Novel Tone-Poem by Mr. Converse—Mme. Kurt with the Symphony Orchestra—Choral Pieces from Mr. Townsend's Singers—Miscellaneous Recitals

FOR the final new piece of the season Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra will play at the Symphony Concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next a new tone-poem, "Ave atque Vale," written by Mr. Converse and heard last January for the first times anywhere in St. Louis from Mr. Zach and his band. The music is designed for full modern orchestra and reflects the moods of devotion and the moods of regret against the background of warfare in a soldier about to give himself for his government—a topical tone-poem, so to say, and the first piece suggested by the war to be heard hereabouts. The other purely orchestral numbers of the programme are Brahms's songful and ingratiating second symphony, in D major and Berlioz's pictorial overture to his opera of "Benvenuto Cellini." To the concerts also will come the last "assisting artist" of the year—Mme. Kurt of the Metropolitan, who in opera, a year ago, has already proved in Boston the richness of her voice and the largeness of her style. She will sing two of the stock pieces of such sopranos of German training and experience—Leonora's monologue, "Abscheulicher!" from Beethoven's opera, "Fidelio," and the apostrophe to the ocean from Weber's opera, "Oberon."

In Sanders Theatre at Cambridge on Thursday evening next the Symphony Orchestra will end the current series of concerts at Harvard. For this eighth programme Dr. Muck has assembled Goldmark's overture of the spring, Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, Tchaikovski's concerto for piano in B-flat and the prelude to Wagner's opera, "Die Meistersinger." In the concerto, Miss Claire Forbes, the able young pianist, will play the solo part.

Friday afternoon, May 4, in Symphony Hall, the twenty-fourth and final afternoon concert of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck and unassisted. The programme traverses Beethoven's fourth symphony; Liszt's symphonic poem "Tasso," Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration"; and Wagner's prelude to his opera "Die Meistersinger."

Saturday evening, May 5, in Symphony Hall, the twenty-fourth and final evening concert of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck and unassisted, with the programme just noted.

From the Globe April 22, 1917.

New Converse Tone Poem at Week's Symphony Concerts

Dr Muck will play at the Symphony concerts this week for the first time in Boston a new tone poem by Frederick S. Converse of this city. "Ave et que Vale." The poem is a war song, built upon the aspirations and meditations of a soldier who is at the front. It was played for the first time last January by the St Louis Symphony Orchestra, under Max Zach.

Mme Melanie Kurt, the dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, will make her first appearance as soloist at these concerts. She will sing two familiar arias, "Abscheuliches, wo eilst du hin," from "Fidelio," and "Ocean, Thou Mighty Monster," from "Oberon." During the visit of the Metropolitan Opera Company in Boston in April a year ago, Mme Kurt took these roles at her first appearance in this city: Isolda, April 5; the Princess in "The Rosscavilier," April 20, and Kundry, April 21.

The program will be as follows: Brahms' second symphony, Bethoven aria; Mr Converse's tone poem; aria from "Oberon," Berloz' overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."

Last Cambridge Symphony

The final Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening at 8 o'clock. The soloist will be Miss Claire Forbes, the young pianist who has won most favorable attention in Boston during the past year or so. Miss Forbes will play Tschaikowsky's concerto in B-flat minor. The program in its entirety comprises Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring"; Schubert's symphony in B minor, "Unfinished"; Tschaikowsky's concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in B-flat minor and Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

From the Monitor April 28, 1917.

MR. CONVERSE'S "AVE ATQUE VALE" TONE POEM HEARD

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Karl Muck, Conductor; Miss Winifred Christie, Soloist —Twenty-third program, Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass., afternoon of April 27, 1917: Brahms, symphony No. 2, in D major, op. 73; Converse, "Ave atque Vale," tone poem (conducted by the composer); Beethoven, concerto in G major, for piano and orchestra, op. 58; Berlioz, overture to the opera, "Benvenuto Cellini."

For nearly 10 years Frederick S. Converse, the composer of the new tone poem, "Ave atque Vale," has been accepted by his community as a man thoroughly familiar with the mechanics of instrumentation and as a master craftsman generally at music writing. Ever since he produced his operas, "The Pipe of Desire" and "The Sacrifice," he has been entitled to stand among the foremost orchestral technicians. But able as he is at executing a task like the score of an opera or of a symphonic piece, he is a long way yet from proving himself an artist with liberated powers of expression, or even a designer with inventive knack. He has the disposition of a musical engineer, rather than that of a musical architect. What he builds has the firmness and solidity of things carved out of the solid rock, instead of the lightness and poise of articulated and membered structures.

It is not strange that a composer of this type should seek a Roman sentiment to develop into a tone poem. Or, supposing him first to have written his piece—a lament for men fallen in battle—and afterwards to have looked for a title, it is not strange that he found a formula of words from the columbaria of the Appian Way, which once served Catullus as a cadence for a threnody, to be exactly what he wanted. It is not strange, again, that after setting out to sing in an elegiac strain, he should keep up the song impressively and exaltedly; yes, and monotonously too. Furthermore, it is not strange that he should leave out of his stanzas all processional color.

The Brahms second symphony, which opened the program, was presented in a magnificently pliant style under Dr. Muck. On the other hand, in a rather stiff manner and with a distinctly harsh quality of tone the Berlioz overture was presented, which closed the concert. The G major piano concerto of Beethoven, with Miss Christie as soloist, was delicately performed, the men of the orchestra maintaining an unusually restrained and gracious attitude to the lightly scored text. The assisting artist gave an admirable study of the first third of the work and recorded a smooth and pleasing performance of the remaining two thirds. She could have caused nobody to regret that she was chosen to take the duties of soloist in place of the singer, Mme. Kurt.

The closing Symphony concerts of the season will be given on May 4 and 5. The program will be as follows:

Beethoven, symphony No. 4; Liszt, "Tasso," symphonic poem; Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration," tone poem; Wagner, prelude to "Meistersinger."

The manager of the concerts is sending notices to subscribers of their privilege to renew for next year the seats they have held this year.

The pop concerts, given in Symphony Hall by an orchestra of Boston Symphony men in the early summer weeks, will open the evening of May 7. Programs of light music will be presented every week-day night, the performances lasting from 8 until 11 o'clock.

From the Traveler April 28, 1917

Final Programme For Symphony Season

Feature Number Liszt Symphonic Poem "Tasso" Which Dr. Muck Will Conduct Here for the First Time.

By FRANK BERTWALL.

The coming week with its final concerts for the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra practically marks the farewell of public concerts and recitals until fall. The void will be filled for two months at least by the annual season of Pop concerts, which begin May 7.

All and all the year has been a successful one. True Boston has had but a minimum in the way of operatic offering but has promise of more next year with the assured coming of the Chicago Opera Company and a possible visit by the Metropolitan forces.

As usual the Symphony concerts have been the feature. In view of the war handicap Dr. Muck has been successful in arranging his programs. One might take exception to some of his selections from the works of American composers. The Sunday afternoon concerts in Symphony hall have broken all records for popularity. Thanks to the war Boston has enjoyed exceptional opportunities for hearing the world's best musical talent in concerts and recitals, notably in the Jordan Hall engagements. The passing the Kneisel Quartet is to be regretted but we still have the peerless Mlonzaleys, not to mention others.

Final Symphony Concerts.

For the final Symphony concerts, next week Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dr. Muck offers the following program: Beethoven, fourth symphony; Liszt, symphonic poem, "Tasso"; Richard Strauss, tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The Liszt selection will be given by Dr. Muck for the first time at these concerts.

From the Post April 28, 1917.

SYMPHONY LED BY CONVERSE

Composer Conducts New Orchestral Work

BY OLIN DOWNES

Brahms Second Symphony, a new orchestral piece by F. S. Converse, "Ave atque Vale," conducted by the composer; Beethoven's G major piano concerto, played by Miss Winifred Christie, and Berlioz' Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" made up the programme of the 23rd concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

There is no attempt at a programme, beyond only an emotional sequence of moods, in Mr. Converse's orchestral piece, which we consider one of the simplest and finest things he has done, "Hail and Farewell." One about to face a grave duty bids farewell to all he leaves behind him. There is a slow introduction which states a principal theme of a simple and noble character. This theme is freely developed, with subsidiary matter in an allegro. Then there is a dramatic climax, a harking back to the theme, and a conclusion that is solemn and strange.

It is possible that this piece is a little too long, and that the composer might beware of too much sameness of rhythmical accompaniment figures, but this fault, if it proves, with repeated hearings of the music, to exist, can be quickly remedied by the elimination of a few measures. What is important is the characteristic quality of the theme itself, its unassuming sentiment, its nobility of impulse, and the fine length of line that the music shows. The orchestration is simple, so is the harmony. The theme is not exotic in character, but is the expression of a manly thought, and the conclusion is dramatic as it is unassuming.

Mr. Converse conducted with an authority not often realized by those who take the stick in hand as seldom as he. The performance was impressive, because it was so truly of a piece, and because the conviction of the composer were so clearly reflected in what he achieved as author and interpreter.

The passionately dramatic music of Berlioz, under Dr. Muck's compelling hand, flamed like a holacaust! Miss Christie is in many respects the ideal pianist for the Beethoven G major concerto, today the most individual of all Beethoven's works in that form and the most intimate and romantic in its appeal. The last movement could have had more variety of color, and more humor.

From the Record April 26, 1917.

LAST SYMPHONY IN SANDERS THEATRE

The final Cmabridge concert of the year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Sanders Theatre this evening at 8 o'clock. The soloist will be Miss Claire Forbes, who will play Tschaikowsky's concerto in B-flat minor. The program will include works by Wagner, Goldmark and Schubert.

From the Herald April 28, 1917.

SYMPHONY'S 23D CONCERT

Interesting Program Conducted by Dr. Muck—Brahms Work Performed.

PIANIST GIVES PLEASURE

By PHILIP HALE.

The 23d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Brahms, Symphony No. 2, D major; Converse, Tone Poem, "Ave Atque Vale" (first time here); Beethoven, Concerto in G major, No. 4, for piano (Miss Winifred Christie, pianist); Berlioz, overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."

The concert was an interesting one. Dr. Muck and the orchestra gave a singularly impressive performance of Brahms's Symphony. One of the most brilliant of overtures was the final number.

Mr. Converse's tone poem, composed in the summer of 1916, was performed for the first time last January in St. Louis by the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra. It was not his intention to compose "program music," nor had he any poem in mind, not even the pathetic verses of Catullus, in which the poet bade eternal farewell to his brother in imperishable lines. It was the composer's intention to express subjectively "the feelings of one who bids farewell at the call of duty to all that is infinitely loved and cherished." The music is in free form. There is an introduction with a plaintive theme of Celtic character. This introduction, largely developed, is used as the concluding episode. The main body of the composition is an Allegro containing various episodes, now tender, now stern, now passionate.

The introduction has marked character, in musical material, and in orchestral expression. It serves admirably for an imposing close. A particularly striking episode in the Allegro is the one for oboe solo with a sighing accompaniment. As a whole the composition, while it shows Mr. Converse's facility and his knowledge of orchestral resources, does not seem to us as firmly knit and definite as certain other pieces by him for orchestra. There is too much repetition of phrases and passages; repetition without varying effect. Climaxes are too long delayed; there are disturbing pauses in the flow of musical thought. Mr. Converse, who conducted, was recalled several times.

Mme. Kurt telegraphed on Thursday that she was unable to sing on account of hoarseness. Miss Christie was substituted at very short notice. She had fortunately played the concerto of Beethoven with the orchestra at Hartford, Ct., this season, and played it with uncommon success. In Boston she was already and most favorably known by her recitals. We have seldom, if ever, heard a more musical, beautiful, poetic interpretation of this concerto than that of Miss Christie's yesterday. Saying this, we are not unmindful of the greatest pianists who have played the concerto here and elsewhere. Miss Christie's performance was especially remarkable for its exquisite proportion, its intimate relationship with the orchestra. There was the finest phrasing, a charming quality of tone, sure, but not ostentatious technic, brilliance when the music demanded it, above all poetic comprehension, grasp, expression. As a player in recitals Miss Christie is one of [illegible] few pianists visiting us that give [illegible]ved pleasure. Now she has shown [illegible]her rare ability as a player with [illegible]rchestra.

[illegible] concert will be repeated this [illegible]g. The program of the last con[illegible] of the season, May 5, [illegible] follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. [illegible]iszt, Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo; [illegible]ss "Death and Transfiguration"; [illegible]er, Prelude to "The Mastersingers [illegible]remberg."

[114]

From the
Transcript
April 27,1917.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

EXTRA PIECES AND THE SUNDAY CONCERTS

The Need of the Same Agreement There as Prevails at Similar Weekday Entertainment—A Harvard Wreath for Dr. Muck—The End of the Operatic Year—And Now a New Counterpoint—Items, Information and Opinions

FOR the most part the eminent singers, pianists and violinists who undertook concerts of their own in Boston on week-days through the season now ending played no extra pieces until they had finished the appointed programme. Their audiences anticipated, indeed demanded, such additional numbers; but usually there was tacit agreement between auditorium and stage that they should be reserved to the end of the concert. Then, those that craved them could take their fill; while other listeners could depart, having heard the music for which they had come in the order in which the singer or virtuoso chose to set it forth, without distraction along the way and within the time that it would normally fill. Those that had engagements to keep lost none of the concert because of an unforeseen lengthening of the programme. The singer, the pianist, the violinist gave unity and contrast to pieces and performance according to his sense of such things; while those to whom no concert is complete until it is swelled by "extras" were not deprived of their perverse pleasure. If there must be "additional numbers" at concerts, so may they be sung or played with injustice to none—except possibly the tired artist—and seemingly with satisfaction to all concerned.

Now, if these conditions are possible, acceptable, commendable in Jordan Hall on week-days, why should they not also prevail in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoons, when the usual series of concerts there begins again next autumn? Frequenters of them have written more than once to this department in the current season, complaining that they have missed this or that number toward the end of the programme because extra pieces lengthened it beyond the time they could give to the concert. Forced into such additions to the appointed list, the singer, the pianist, the violinist, has been the victim of the duel between his own reluctance and the insistence of a part of the audience upon more and "right now"—a duel unseemly in itself and distasteful to the other part of the assembly content to have the concert take undisturbed course. Yielding, he sees his carefully devised programme go awry while he himself is fatigued beyond the necessities of the occasion before he reaches the end. Then, indeed, the insatiable may multiply their demands but until then, by the courteous exercise of a little managerial persuasion, they might be schooled to reserve them. Suppose, for example, a line or two on the programmes next autumn limited extra numbers to the end of the concert, it a single artist were undertaking it, or to the final appearance of the several artists who might be sharing the day. It is not likely that the public would long resent such a mild regulation, since American audiences are complaisant, since in the end even the gluttons would have their fill and since such a distribution of appointed and additional numbers would be a "square deal" to all concerned. So stimulated, the same tacit agreement over "extras" that has long obtained in other "serious" concerts in Boston might also obtain in the one exception to present rule and custom—those on Sundays at Symphony Hall. The manifold public that frequents them can hardly be so different from the rest or so "sot in its ways" as to lessen under such a reasonable amenity. Even if it were, the experiment would not be the less worth the trying.

Dr. Muck and Miss Forbes

Much applause and a wreath as tribute from the Harvard and Radcliffe Glee clubs greeted Dr. Muck at the final concert of the season by the Symphony Orchestra at Cambridge last evening. It was a typical spring programme, with light and exuberant music. From Goldmark, for beginning came the overture, "In the Spring," holding charm of melody and pastoral suggestion in spite of convention of form and outdated style. Then the "Unfinished" Symphony of Schubert, which remains everlastingly fresh, graceful and spontaneous when the conductor and his orchestra jealously and devotedly keep it so through endless repetitions. It is truly music of spring and youth, the more so for its delicate wistfulness, and the succeeding Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" is as youthful, with its intensified gayety and splendor. It progresses bravely and brightly, never lingering under Dr. Muck's hand, but moving in a huge glittering mass—never too ponderous either, rich and intricate in detail, but with the combined themes simplifying and enforcing rather than obscuring each other. A glorious close for a season with its uplifting and exultant final flourish, and it is to close the Boston season also, as it has closed others before. All three of these numbers are of the sort that lapse easily into the indifference of routine, but Dr. Muck always gives his keenest energy and care to perfection and life with them.

But, final concert or other, a Cambridge audience, it seems, would never be completely satisfied without its soloist, and hence Miss Claire Forbes with Tchaikovski's first concerto. It was music not in keeping with the rest: artificial, contrived, and barren of inspiration in comparison with what went before and after, but also, it was not the conductor's choice—a concerto which no orchestra or even pianist could keep from wearing and fraying at the edges with time. It is not entirely clap-trap; the first and last movements have their rhythmic energy and brilliant vigor, where a pianist may gratefully expend any superabundant vitality needing release. The themes, ornaments and general attractions are obvious enough throughout. But for all that, the pianistic usages are from first to last no more than derived and incorporated, more or less successfully; certain parts are loosely hitched together, and the slow movement is unmistakably a reflection of more memorable ones by the same composer more eloquently conceived and expressed. Miss Forbes is by precedent and by her performance last evening a true musician in thoroughness of method, skill, motive, energy and enthusiasm, and sense of fitness and proportion. A young pianist of her sex, with an exacting conductor looming above her and an orchestra all around, not to mention the virile music before her, requiring a great deal more than her feminine grace and utmost output of muscle can give it, may well be anxious over her heaped-up responsibilities. Miss Forbes met them desperately—and efficiently. She maintained a strict precision with the best of Dr. Muck, let the pulse and progress of the music bear her along and stimulate her best strength in the flinging-out of chords, and her fullest emotional feeling in the melodic and solo parts. The result was successful and highly pleasing, in spite of the under-emphasis of pianistic tone. Yet the best of Miss Forbes's musical nature and abilities are to be found in the more quiet and thoughtful part of her art; the part that puts fine impulse above brilliant and showy execution.

Here in Boston

Musical America—of course "from a reliable source"—caps the climax in the issue of today of grotesque war-time rumor about the Symphony Orchestra. It has learned that a certain Mr. Higginson of Boston was the founder and has been for many years the chief supporter of the band; that by some malign influences not otherwise specified, a German conductor—one Karl Muck—has been foisted upon it much to his indignation—and that accordingly, he intends to withdraw from its affairs until a conductor and a "personnel" have been chosen that more accords with his sympathies in the war. Even in a "journal of music," it is doubtful whether egregious nonsense ever departed quite so far from the fact known these thirty years—that Mr. Higginson himself chooses the conductor of the orchestra and signs the contracts with him and with the players. It is easy to believe sometimes that various writers about music in New York and Philadelphia are so besotted with jealousy of the Boston Orchestra as to lose all sense of fact and reason.

The "assisting artists" for the Symphony Concerts for next season will be announced in the course of the spring, instead of in the autumn, according to the new custom that began last year with the sale of tickets by continuing subscription instead of the annual auction.

The Unexpected at the Symphony Concerts

(Photograph by Stern of New York)

Winifred Christie, Pianist

From the
Transcript
April 28,1917.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

A RARE AFTERNOON OF ROMANTIC MUSIC

From Brahms's Symphony That Most Gains Such Voice Through Beethoven's Concerto of Like Speech to a Flamboyant Overture of Berlioz—For Interlude Mr. Converse's New Tone-Poem and for Surprise Miss Christie

ROMANTIC music played with the fervor intrinsic in it and the glamor upspringing from it filled the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon. One of the appointed pieces, Berlioz's overture to his opera of "Benvenuto Cellini," is almost hackneyed; another, Brahms's second symphony, is familiar by biennial repetition; yet both in the performance of Friday sounded with the strangeness that, joined to beauty, yields romantic impression. Perhaps, indeed, the touchstone of the warmer-minded, freer-spoken, less-mannered Brahms—the Brahms of the first two symphonies, of "A German Requiem" and the "Song of Destiny"—is to treat him as a romantic composer, continuing in his own fashion the line of Beeethoven (when so speaking), Schubert, Schumann, even Mendelsschn. As Brahms's music first became known in his own Germany and to the West thereof, the pedants and the pundits took unfair possession of it. Behold, they said, the loyal continuator of the orthodox tradition, the master of form and development, the reflective, the abstruse composer content to write music for its own sake and not for the expression of this, that or the other sensation "foreign" to it. To them it mattered little that the orthodox tradition was no such dry and wizened thing as they imagined it since their minds dwelt less upon the masters in whom it bloomed than upon the dry-as-dusts, who grubbed imitatively about it. Still less cared they that the music of Brahms which they most exalted was the music in which the ear of average intelligence and sensibility could discover least interest, imagination, beauty or power. Rather, by their choice, did they prove their superiority—and incidentally his—to the common view. As usual such assertion and presumption prevailed for the time—and the dryer Brahms could be made to sound in the concert-hall the better. Reduced to lifelessness, made "reflective" and "recondite," he emerged as the perfect formalist, the ideal classicist of this Brahmin notion.

Admittedly, Brahms could write in this wise. There is enough and to spare of this voice and manner in his third and fourth symphonies and still more in not a little of his chamber music. But if he was willing and pre-disposed heir to this warped and clouded orthodoxy—think back to the brightness of Mozart and Haydn, who truly practised the true faith!—he was heir also to the romantic temper and achievement of the composers that immediately preceded him and not without inclination toward their way of tonal speech their faculty of tonal imagination. Hearing their voice, but speaking in his own accents, continuing their matter and seeking the illusion they evoked but by individual impulse, imagination, procedure, he wrote his first two symphonies, the choral pieces already specified, not a few of his songs. His means were the age-old means to such expressive ends—pliant rhythm to keep the music in changeful motion and insistent propulsive power; warm melody to maintain it in varied voice of moody or passionate song; and imaginative and apt harmonic and instrumental dress to give it background and color.

Recall the ardor of melody as mood modulates into mood, the diverse energy of rhythm, sure and spontaneous, the richness of progression, the light and shade of the instrumental voices through the first movement of the symphony in D major as Dr. Muck and the orchestra played it yesterday—and what romantic impulsion bore it forward, what glow of feeling and voice rose from it. Not architecture, but ardor fashioned the music. Recall again the succeeding slow movement with motive expanding slowly and deeply into song and then led from guise to guise as intensified mood played upon it—the romantic voice of Brahms when it is most characteristic since the reflection within, as the music passes from key to key and rhythm to rhythm, seems but the prompting of the imagination without. The scherzo, as it was played yesterday, Brahms writes with actual glee over his racing figures, his lightly snapping modulations—fancy free, fancy on the instant finding the means, fancy whipped by the pleasure of its play. Childish some of the pedants like to call this scherzo. Child-like in freshness and grace of fancy they might better have called it. Then in the finale Brahms returns to the large voice of ardent song, the exhaustless vigor and variety of rhythm, the spontaneous expansion of mood, the golden tonal background, but now bright oftener than dusky, of the allegro of the beginning. Beauty, strangeness, wonder, transporting power—four sensations from romantic music—abide perennially in it. Long, indeed, they abode there and in the whole symphony mute and obscure because there was none—such was the force of "the tradition" and the power of the pundits—to release them. In our day Mr. Nikisch, Mr. Weingartner, Dr. Muck have done the deed because they dared to listen to the voice of the music unclouded, to fashion it as it stirred their imagination, as it asked their skill. When the historians come to reckon the musical achievements of our time, not the least will be the rescue and the revealing of the Brahms who was and remains romantic.

Beside this Brahms—as the new ordering of the programme went after illness had disabled Mme. Kurt and cut away her two airs—was Beethoven, romantic too and in a concerto a century old. He could write the concerto that is almost an austere and grandiose symphonic piece for orchestra with pianoforte, like "The Emperor," when Mr. Paderewski or Mr. Hofmann or Mr. Busoni plays it. He could write the concerto that charms out of the fancy and the suppleness with which he manipulates into beauty the voice of the music and the voice of the displayed instrument as in the over-played concerto for violin. He could write also, as in this concerto in G major for pianoforte, the music of romantic invention, imagination, glamor that hid—yet glorified—the means in the illusion they wrought. Again the touchstone holds; for, as Miss Christie, Dr. Muck and the orchestra played the piece yesterday it sounded in beauty, strangeness, wonder, transporting power. Brief as is the intermediate andante, romantic imagination and glamor flower in it, when the pensive and plaintive song of the piano persists against the rude interventions of the orchestra, cajoles, subdues them to smile, as it were, out of triumph as it darts into the thick-coming tonal fancies of the finale. And there again the rhythm that renews itself in change; the melody that rises brighter and more vibrant. Even the first movement, in spite of its condescensions to orthodox form and procedure bears the romantic impress. The beginning for the pianoforte alone, still has savor of romantic daring—the teeming fancy that will not be stayed for formal introduction, that will have its tonal word, imagery, illusion, on the instant. The displayful passages for the piano gleam out of the music in light rhapsody upon the motives that suggest them. The rhythm that brings motion and life, the melody that sings mood, the background that is mirror-like against them only beat or warm or glow the more for the two-fold medium that bears them.

This romantic impression and illusion penetrated the more deeply on Friday for Miss Christie's playing of the piano part. Her tone was pellucid, iridescent, crystalline, yet without a trace of metallic glint; her phrases melted edgeless and transparent into the flow of melody that she animated with light and elastic rhythm; her ornament seemed as the flowering of fancy out of the touch that wrought it; her euphonies with the orchestra were as the momentary suffusion of the two voices in a single beauty; not only did she give the music a strange new loveliness, but she so glamored also into romantic speech the comparatively prosaic voice of the piano. She glorified and transmuted her instrument into a means of song, she enriched out of herself the mood and speech of Beethoven romantic. She wrapped her hearers in the illusion of the music—and pianist.

Even Mr. Converse's new tone-poem, written only last summer and led by the composer himself above an orchestra that generously returned his obvious trust in it, had grave romantic voice. "Ave atque Vale," he entitles it; and it is music of the masculine emotion that stirs loyally, intensely to self-sacrifice and yet knows the longing for the old, dear, familiar things that forever, perhaps, it surrenders—a music of isolated and abstracted mood, without background except as the vague din of struggle stirs behind these self-communings. In large progressions, sombre color, music that dreams and visions out of haunting memories, summons the soliloquy. It rises from them into high resolution and quiet exaltation; again they return in harmonic veils as loved phantoms; again the mood and the motives of fortitude and austere devotion; measures that speak nobly of the soul, measures that consecrate as they mourn the sacrifice. This inner content as it seems, Mr. Cone would impart by a grave loftiness of al speech. His music moves in long lodic lines, in large phrases, to deep-set rhythms, against dark backgrounds, in a ber, willed and not unfitting monotony of olor; in austere climax that reticence deepens. The working means are the means of counterpoint and plastic development, the play of tonal strand and rhythmic figure rather than of harmonies and timbres.

[115]

As Mr. Converse is grave in the designing of his tone-poem so he is austere to economy in the use of his means. Never once will he exceed out of the reticences of a deep masculine feeling correspondingly expressed. So setting himself within the limitations of his matter and his method, he cannot escape a measure of monotony in his music alike of mood and procedure. Moreover, his just reticence hardly summons sometimes the emotions that prompt his soliloquy—and even to the sympathetic ear the tone-poem becomes inarticulate and dun. As it seems to the cursory hearer, a yet deeper concentration might avoid repetition; while, again, a warmer expansion might quicken answering emotions. Yet as it is, "Ave atque Vale" embodies moods of men in a masculine musical speech that by its mingled reticence and exaltation has quality rare in the music of American composers. In a sense mood, matter, method are universal. Yet, as with some of Mr. Chadwick's music, the listener feels that only an American would so imagine and so write.

Finally, that the romantic vein of the concert, might round full circle, the flamboyance and the grandiloquence of Berlioz's overture to the opera, "Benvenuto Cellini" that mocked by dryness and dulness the two flaming preludes with which he graced it. He fought for time and leisure in which to write his overture; yet as it sounds he might have flung it off in a single Heat. His fervid vision of a manifold Rome of renaissance romance flames through the music—fete and fighting, cardinals stately, artist-adventurers amorous or mocking, fine frenzies of play, fine frenzies of passion and tumult almost always. Equally across the music glows his passion for rhythmic energy, for melodic intensity, for the flare and the force of tonal color. No wonder the overture abides the years, changeless as romance itself. Not even Lizst of the Venice of "Tasso" has matched it. H. T. P.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Dr. Muck's Final Programme for the Year —The Cecilia in "The Damnation of Faust"—Mme. Galli-Curci Again—Other Singers and Various Choral Pieces

THE final Symphony Concerts for the year befall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next in Symphony Hall. As usual at them, conductor and orchestra will be unassisted and the programme will assemble established pieces classic and romantic, viz. from Beethoven, his symphony in B-flat major, No. 4, of relatively light substance and voice; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso," in which Dr. Muck has not hitherto conducted in Boston; Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," in which he has many times been eloquent; and his favorite pièce d'adieu, the upswelling prelude to Wagner's opera, "The Mastersingers."

From the Advertiser
April 28,1917.

NEW AMERICAN SYMPHONY HEARD

Work by Frederick S. Converse Is Typical of the Composer

MISS CHRISTIE TAKES PLACE OF MME. KURT

Performance in Cadenzas Is Brilliant—Dr. Muck Reads Brahms Exquisitely

By LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAM

Brahms—Second Symphony, D Major.
Converse—"Ave atque Vale" Tone-poem.
Beethoven—Piano Concerto, No 4, G Major.
Berlioz—"Benvenuto Cellini" Overture.

Dr. Muck is paying assiduous court to the American Muse, and many of the recent programs have contained works by native composers. While this fashion lasts we would suggest Henry F. Gilbert as a typical American composer who has done at least as good work as some of the New England composers who have been chosen this season.

Frederick S. Converse is one of the most poetic of the American composers. He is never crabbed or ugly; he does not senselessly rush into gigantic scoring; he does not go to extreme lengths nor continue after he has nothing more to say; in short, he does not display mere technical skill in the place of musical ideas. Therefore we are always glad to see one of his works on the Symphony program.

"Ave atque Vale" is new to Boston. It is a tone-poem for a large orchestra, not derived from any literary source; but its opening elegiac character might suggest "Morituri Salutamus," as if the "Hail and Farewell" were an eternal parting. Its dignity was impressive, even "if we must prefer the excellent composer less in 'King Cambyses' vein." Mr. Converse co[nducted] his own work. His best is not as expressive or decisive as that of a Muck or a Gericke, and it is possible that there is more in the work than was brought out at a first performance.

It was a good test to come after a great Brahms Symphony and yet make a profound impression. This the Converse composition certainly did, and the composer was received with much enthusiasm and twice recalled at the end of his work. The tender interlude, the fine contrasts, the lofty working up of climaxes, the shivery suggestions of dread, all made up a work much above the average, a worthy addition to the repertoire if not at Mr. Converse's highest level.

A sudden change was made in yesterday afternoon's program. Mme. Kurt was taken ill, and Miss Winifred Christie was called in to take her place, and Weber's grand scena, "Ocean, thou Mighty Monster" (very fitting in these U-boat days) was changed into Beethoven's fourth piano concerto. A welcome change, since the instrumentalist fits better than the vocalist in these symphony programs. And the G major concerto is to our thinking the noblest of all the piano concertos, even if it is not quite so ambitious as the "Emperor."

In these distorted days when barren poetasters take refuge in "vers libre," when artists who cannot paint conceal their weakness in cubist and vortex pictures, and idealess piano composers do everything short of sitting upon the keyboard, it is refreshing to get a taste of music which was intended to please, which actually tried to be, and succeeded in being, beautiful.

And Miss Christie entered well into the spirit of this gentler style, she did not magnify the work unduly, nor thrust the piano part too strongly into the foreground; she made it, what Beethoven intended it to be, a symphony with a thread of solo work woven through it. The balance of parts, the ensemble, was excellent, especially when the suddenness of the substitution is considered.

Miss Christie's work in the cadenzas (they were Clara Schumann's, we believe) was most brilliant, and the second one gave heed to Beethoven's request—"La Cadenza sia corta." Altogether Miss Christie, in spite of the suddenness of the call, won a triumph and was recalled at the end with abundant enthusiasm.

There is nothing new to say about Brahms's second symphony. It is serenely beautiful from first to last. All the modern symphonies with gigantic scoring, and with labyrinthine complexities, become puny in concorta." Altogether Miss Christie, in such calmness of expression. Dr. Muck read the work with his usual poetic charm and the orchestra played it to perfection. Happy are those nations which have no histories, and delightful are those symphonies which require no reviews. The work was appreciated fully by the audience and the enthusiasm was very marked, with two recalls and an uprising of the orchestra. This symphony is certainly the most popular and easiest comprehended of Brahms' set of four. The first may be more ambitious, but this one is the more inspired, and the finale was made especially triumphant.

At the end came Berlioz's brilliant overture. It is not so great a work as its sister overture, the "Carnaval Romaine," but it is nevertheless a fine display of orchestration and has plenty of that feverish excitement which Berlioz knows so well how to express. Here, then, was a program both classical and modern, in which everything was intelligible, poetic and attractive. One could not help contrasting it with some of the heavy, over-swollen, intensely complicated numbers of the recent past. Yesterday music became again an art to enjoy, and not a Juggernaut car to crush its devotees.

From the Monitor
April 31,1917.

JOSEPH MALKIN HAS SOLO PART IN DVORAK CONCERTO

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Karl Muck, Conductor, Joseph Malkin, Soloist—Nineteenth program, presented in Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass., afternoon of March 29; Haydn, symphony in C major, B. & H. No. 90; Rameau, ballet suite arranged by Kretzschmar; Handel, concerto grosso in D, No. 21, arranged by Seiffert; Dvorak, concerto for violoncello and orchestra, op. 104.

As an example of writing, the Dvorak work in which Mr. Malkin appeared is doubtless one of the most successful concertos to be found. The violoncello part is so well ordered that it stands out continually clear, while the orchestral part is so skillfully adjusted as to avoid the fault either of obtrusiveness or of reticence. The solo melody has other merit, too, besides clearness. It maintains itself at a comfortable and agreeable average of the instrument's vast range, preferring an easy middle flight to those falcon-like alternations of poise and swoop that make violoncello music, ordinarily, something to wonder at instead of to enjoy. Then, what a full and satisfying sonority the accompanying forces keep up! All the choirs have [a] freedom of voice for an artist with talent and serious aims. At the same time, the day will come when the reins can be loosed a little. Then, even if Miss Forbes should do things not indicative of the settled convictions of many, many years, and substitute the impetuousness of a younger person, these things will be her own, and convincing because of that and the true musical feeling certain, with her, to be present. She does well to work as she is working now, and the result is admirable. It is interesting even more for what it promises as a future possibility than for what is accomplished at the present time.

string, brass and wood sections join in the thematic developments as unhesitatingly as they would in a symphonic poem. And for all that, there is never a note of the principal player blunted by the orchestra, never a phrase blurred.

The score of this concerto has the texture of hand-woven things, every thread running an individual thought into the fabric, and no repeated, standardized processes used. It is a delightful piece of craftsmanship. And yet, with all its advantages in quality and style of make, it is hardly a work to win the hearts of listeners. Not a passage can be selected from either its highly colored first division, or from its neatly patterned second, that can compare in fervor and glow with random passages in the opening allegro and the largo of the Dvorak symphony, "From the New World."

An artist interpreting the solo part of the concerto could be expected to mirror more or less exactly the traits of the composer. So it happened, at any rate, on this occasion. As Dvorak showed at his best in the mechanics of orchestral balance and contrast, so the violoncellist showed at his best in tone and phrasing and in other technical particulars. On the other hand, as the writer kept expression at low intensity, the soloist, correspondingly, rose to but a moderate level of eloquence.

For the first half of the program, the conductor brought out a strange assortment of old music. In doing this, he can give a valuable lesson in musical history, inasmuch as everything, except the Haydn symphony, was in the form of a more or less ponderous arrangement. The Haydn work was played with energetic, yet subtle rhythms, and with a scheme of shading that could be achieved only in an orchestra with a remarkable string section. The four dance movements from Rameau's "Acanthe et Céphise" and "Platée," as adapted by Kretzschmar, have more of the learned about them than the quaint. Eighteenth Century music, magnified and distorted as it is in this compilation, is about as pleasant to hear as a remodeled and modernized Eighteenth Century building is to look upon. The concerto grosso of Handel may have seemed to some to endure enlargement better than the Rameau pieces. For it is a common mistake for hearers to suppose that whatever is Handelian is big. Performances of "The Messiah" with enormous choruses have made that idea popular. The audience found much interest in the conductor's directing the concerto grosso from the piano. There was in that, perhaps, a picture of 150 years ago that could give a justifiable instant of pleasure.

From the
Post
April 28,1917

Miss Claire Forbes' performance of the Tschaikowsky B-flat minor concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck, conductor last Thursday night in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, was an achievement gratifying to many musicians and music lovers, besides those immediately interested in the development of the talent of this young artist. Miss Forbes is a pianist of indisputable gifts. Excellently trained, she has also an inherently musical and emotional quality in her playing which no one can teach. Her reading of Tschaikowsky's concerto was exceptionally well knit, well balanced, and legitimately effective. Miss Forbes has the tone that makes of the piano something more than a box of wires and keys, and deludes the hearer into the belief that after all this instrument can produce all sorts of nuances and tone colors which as a matter of fact it cannot produce; and she has back of her playing a youthful impulse and glow which are contagious.

She has also exceptional physical power, which is well controlled, a surprisingly big tone, a sense of rhythm never lacking last Thursday evening, despite the often difficult rhythmical changes of the last movement of the concerto. She has the sense of the virtuoso, and an elasticity and responsiveness of temperament which distinguish her from the great majority of pianists of her years. This is an inherent and very valuable musical quality of her nature. Given opportunity, she immediately fulfils the demands of music, whatever they may be. A quickening rhythm does not leave her cold or merely delighted in an opportunity for virtuoso display. When she accelerates there is a human excitement felt by the listener as well as the player. Her playing of melodic passages was altogether admirable, especially the pastoral theme of the slow movement, when the tone, even in pianissimo, carried to the utmost limits of the hall, and had the melting beauty demanded by the passage. The performance was stimulating because of its youthful spirit and its generous sentiment as it was a gratifying testimony to the work of Miss Forbes and her teachers.

She should continue to progress as interestingly in the future as in the past. Ten years from now her performance of the Tschaikowsky concerto will in all probability be informed by true individuality as well as the sheer musical feeling and the reverent attention to the smallest item of the score shown last week. Miss Forbes, in praiseworthy deference to the teachings of great musicians, dotted her i's and crossed her t's in precise accordance with their instructions. The wonder is that she understood so well what they intended. She herself realizes her artistic debt to these men, and benefits with [a] modesty and

There was, of course, other music on the programme, but none which fascinated us more than this from the programme book concerning Goldmark's "Spring" overture: "The composer of 'Sakuntala,' 'The Queen of Sheba' and 'The Country Wedding,' a composer of an overture to spring. His music was as his blood, half Hungarian, half Hebraic. His melodies were like unto the century-old chants solemnly intoned by priests with drooping eyes or dreamed of by eaters of leaves and flowers of hemp. His harmonies, with their augmented fourths and diminished sixths and restless shiftings from major to minor, were as the stupefying odors of charred frankincense and grated sandal wood. To western people he was as the disquieting Malay who knocked at de Quincy's door in the mountain region."

"Over a hundred years before Diderot had reproached de Saint-Lambert, the author of a poem, 'The Seasons,' for having 'too much azure, emerald, topaz, sapphire, enamel, crystal, on his pallette when he atempted to picture spring.'"

"And lo, Goldmark disappointed these lifters of eyebrows and shakers of heads. The overture turned out to be fresh, joyous, occidental, without suggestion of sojourn in the east, without the thought of the temple."

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT

The 36th season of Boston Symphony concerts will end next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. From every point of view the season has been the most successful in the history of the orchestra. The patronage in Boston and elsewhere has never been so large. The new method of disposing of the tickets for the Boston concerts by subscription at fixed prices instead of by auction has worked out admirably, to the entire satisfaction both of patrons of the orchestra and of the management. This method will be continued in the future, and already notices of renewals are being sent personally to the subscribers so that they may secure their seats for the season of 1917-1918.

The artistic achievements of the orchestra, if the unanimous verdict of the public is to be believed, has never been so high as this year. Dr. Muck's programmes have had much variety,

THE POPS

One week remains before the opening of the 32d season of Pop concerts in Symphony Hall. The opening night, as already announced, is set for Monday, May 7, and they will run thereafter until Saturday evening, July 14, making a season of 10 weeks, the longest the Pops have ever had.

The concerts will be given every week day evening from 8 to 11, and the programme will be made up of popular music with a judicious admixture of lighter music from the Symphony repertoire. There will be the usual number of special college nights and other occasions of like interest. Light refreshments will, of course, be served.

From the
Transcript
April 23,1917.

WEEK-END CONCERTS

TWO PIANISTS, A TENOR AND A CONDUCTOR

Dr. Muck Crowns His Way with the Classics—Mr. Bauer and Mr. Gabrilowitsch in the Mingled Work and Play of Music for Two Pianos—The Virtues in Which They Excel All Rivals, and the Handicap of Pieces That Besets Them with the Rest — Mr. McCormack from Three Angles

THROUGH all the seven years during which Dr. Muck has led the Symphony Orchestra, he and it have hardly excelled their performance, at the concerts on Friday and Saturday last, of Brahms's Variation on a Theme, by Haydn. When he first came hither as conductor, he early included the piece in one of his programmes, and even then, it sounded as Bostonian ears had never heard it before. When he returned to begin his present term, he set it among the classics deserving biennial repetition and so to be brought more and more nearly to full and perfect voice. For it is not Dr. Muck's custom to regard these repetitions of Beethoven's and Brahms's symphonies, or Wagner's preludes, of Weber's overtures, as the mere routine of conductor and orchestra. "Repertory pieces" they certainly are; but, in his view, for that very reason they demand the more care and pains to each performance. Being classics in the true and fine sense of the word they should be perennially fertile in new suggestion to those that play them and sound perennially fresh in the ears of those that hear them.

The devoted preparation that Dr. Muck bestows upon music new to the Symphony Concerts, whatever the quality of it, whatever his individual judgment of it, is an old story. The similar study, zeal and work at rehearsal that he bestows upon the classics and upon "repertory pieces" in general is less understood. For a third, a fourth, a fifth time from his hands the public of the concerts hears with keen pleasure a familiar symphony. A few, learned in the score and quick with recollection of previous performances, recognize and applaud new modulations of pace, new em-tonal color, that quality of intensity of voice of the music. The rest hear with their usual delight, or a little more, and are content therewith. Only now and then, as with Schubert's symphony in C major ten days ago and with Brahms's Variations of last week, does the sense of new beauty, power and character in the music penetrate them from the new glories of the performance.

In particular does all this hold of the repetition of the Variations. It is quite possible for a conductor and an orchestra to take for granted the bad name that Brahms's music used to bear, sometimes deservedly, as often undeservedly, for instrumental fluidity and color. It is as possible to them to take it as they would the music of some highly reputed orchestral colorist and bestow upon it the finest of euphonies, the smoothest of suavities, the full riches and the subtle delicacies of timbre at their command. In this latter fashion Dr. Muck and the orchestra now set themselves to the Variations, with outcome in a loveliness of tonal surface that made them seem on Saturday evening as a cameo in tones cut soft upon the air, while the lights and shadows of harmonies and timbres played upon it. Seldom has any of Brahms's symphonic music seemed of such iridescent surface as did these Variations so carved and painted.

Similarly, it is possible to take the Variations as so much scholarly, meditated and polished music-making—Brahms, as it were, laying out Haydn's purling little melody before him and drawing from it a series of propositions in tones much as a mathematician may work upon and from a theorem in geometry. In the earlier days of Brahms's music in symphony concerts, the world over, most conductors so approached the Variations. Yet, in fact, when "the tradition" is brushed aside, when conductors, players and hearers, eye the music face to face and listen to it ear to ear, it teems with the invention, the imagination, the grace that exhaled from it on Friday and Saturday in Symphony Hall. A lovelier poetry of tones in themselves, a purer beauty of music for its own sake, a more fanciful play of the creative impulse, Brahms rarely achieved. It is the signal fortune, the crowning distinction of Dr. Muck to be as open-minded and as sensitive as a photographic plate to the music that he essays and so to reflect it, whatever the matter and the manner, in undistorted and unclouded image. In such a mirror the Variations could sound with no other than this true voice of fanciful invention and warm imagination, this true glamor of impulsive modulation, felicitous detail and iridescent color. Yet as there was a touch of inspiration in Brahms's writing of them, so was there also in Dr. Muck's playing.

From the
Traveler
April 27,1917.

MME. KURT ILL; WILL NOT SING THIS WEEK

Mme. Melanie Kurt of the Metropolitan Opera Company, announced for soloist at the Symphony concerts this (Friday) afternoon and tomorrow evening, on account of sickness, is unable to appear. Her physician will not allow her to sing. Miss Winifred Christie, a pianist who is most favorably known here, will play Beethoven's Concerto in G major, which she has already played with great success with the orchestra in Hartford, Ct.

From the
Herald
April 29,1917.

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT

The 36th season of Symphony concerts will end next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. From every point of view the season has been the most successful in the history of the orchestra. The patronage in Boston and elsewhere has never been so large. The new method of disposing of the tickets for the Boston concerts by subscription at fixed prices instead of by auction has wholly satisfied patrons and management. This method will be continued Already notice of renewals are being sent personally to the subscribers so that they may secure their seats for the season of 1917-1918.

The artistic achievements of the orchestra, if the unanimous verdict of the public is to be believed, has never been so high as this year. Dr. Muck has brought out new works and given particular attention to American composers.

The last concert is planned along conservative lines, although it contains one work of importance which Dr. Muck has never conducted here: Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Tasso." The symphony will be the Fourth of Beethoven. In the second part will appear Liszt's "Tasso," Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

From the Post May 6,1917.

Another Symphony season comes to an end, and the Pop concerts commence tomorrow night in Symphony Hall with Mr. Maquarre as conductor. The Pop is the early forerunner of spring in Boston. "Spring?"

The occasion calls for some remarks concerning Dr. Muck's programmes. They have never been so interesting or well balanced. Some miss certain names. We would fain hear Dr. Muck play such works as the second symphony of Vincent D'Indy and other music by this great composer. We have already spoken of the unfortunate omission of the name of Henry F. Gilbert from the list of American composers heard this season, since he is one of, if not the most original American composers of the present day. But as a whole Dr. Muck has never gone farther in showing catholicity, curiosity, appreciation of music of many schools. Some of his programmes have been ill-balanced, as of yore, but it is not easy to make 24 Symphony programmes, each one interesting in all its details, considerate of the choice of the soloist who sings or plays the concerto, and pleasing all and offending none.

Composers of all the countries and all schools have figured on the lists. In addition to classic German composers and moderns such as Strauss and Mahler, the names of Balakireff, Borodin, Rachmaninoff, Rimsky-Korsakoff and Tschaikowsky represented Russia; Berlioz, Chabrier, Chausson, Debussy, Rameau, France; Ballantyne, Clapp, Chadwick, Converse, Loeffler, Schelling, America. Franck, Goldmark, Smetana, Sibelius are composers of a peculiarly personal type, standing as individuals rather than as representatives of a national school.

Most of the American works were novelties, and reflected pleasantly on Dr. Muck's disposition to encourage American composers rather than distinction as compositions. Yet, despite the experimental character of works such as Mr. Clapp's second symphony and Mr. Ballantyne's immature "Eve of St. Agnes," there were Converse's "Ave atque Vale," which we personally find one of the composer's most representative compositions, and Mr. Loeffler's "Hora Mystica," for orchestra and male chorus, perplexing a majority by its ultra modernity and the subtlety of its moods, yet leaving an ineffaceable impression of music of commanding individuality and imaginativeness, of an expression perhaps the most exalted and individual that this individualist among composers has achieved. This was one of the works of the season which should have been immediately repeated. That it had not a popular success was self-evident, but neither had D'Indy's second symphony a popular success when it was first heard here. Neither did the simple and lyrical symphony of Franck, now one of the most popular items of the orchestral repertoire wherever serious orchestral music is known, have a popular success in Boston when it was first performed here by Mr. Gericke. And Mr. Loeffler is at least sufficiently celebrated for his mastery of his art and the distinction of his taste and his musical personality to receive not one but several very careful hearings of a work upon which he himself had lavished the greatest pains, the most careful thought, the most sincere idealism.

Of the novelties not by Americans, the most interesting were the "Three Jewish Poems" by Ernst Bloch, who conducted the performances of his works in person; Debussy's "Gigues," No. 1 of the images for orchestra, heard for the first time here; Sibelius' symphonic poem after an episode of the Kalevala; "Pohjola's Daughter," and Schelling's violin concerto, played by Mr. Kreisler early in the season.

It was more than a pleasure to discover in the music of Mr. Bloch a completely new individuality, a new note, as personal as it was racial with the composer. To write music which should constitute a revelation of oneself, and consistent with this revelation, of self's people; of the temperament and aspirations of the Jewish race; of the glowing soul, as the composer puts it, that reveals itself in the Old Testament and in other chapters of the stupendous history of a great people, is not a small accomplishment. To Mr. Bloch may be confidently extended congratulations in having achieved this, comparatively early in his career, in a remarkable degree. His music is oriental and hot-hearted, prophetic with the grandeur of the old exhortations, warm, melodic, and withal naive as we believe all great music, in essence, to be. This music made an immediate and profound impression, as did the personality of the composer, other of whose compositions will doubtless be heard in Boston in the future.

Debussy's "Gigue" is a worthy companion piece to the other pieces which make the series of "Images" for orchestra. Sibelius' tone poem is a superb portrayal of northern nature, and again is music naive with the spirit of its land and people. Fascinating music, unique in its appeal. "The Oceansides," by the same composer, performed at the same concert, is highly imaginative and elemental in its suggestion, but not so distinctive in its idiom as "Pohjola's Daughter." "Night Ride and Sunrise" is memorable for certain atmospheric effects, of darkness and suspense, of the calm and glorious rising of the sun, rather than for sustained line or architecture, or strength and balance of form. There are pages which only Sibelius at his imaginative height might hope to pen, orchestral effects as unusual as they are simple. But the work is of uneven invention and merit.

Mr. Schelling's violin concerto was for the writer a welcome surprise, far superior to any of Mr. Schelling's compositions for piano and orchestra, heard at these concerts. The violin concerto is written with esprit and real invention. Perhaps it is too heavily and a little inexpertly instrumentated, but this is a thing which may be corrected. On the whole we have in this work one of the most interesting of the few interesting modern concertos for the violin.

The novelties were few. It was said that conditions of the war made it hard to secure them here. But both the Philadelphia and Chicago orchestras have had many novelties during the season past, and musicians in Boston have not found it impossible to secure music for small groups of instruments from Europe. Surely there are enough music firms between Germany and America not unable to send new music to this country to furnish us with some new flavors, in spite of embargoes and submarines.

Let it be said once more, in response to irresponsible and wholly unfounded rumors that the Boston Symphony Orchestra may disintegrate next season on account of difficulties attendant on the nationality of its conductor and many of its personnel, that the plans for next season, including the soloists, are now well on toward completion, and there is not the slightest reason for any apprehension of a cessation of orchestral activities at Symphony Hall.

From the Transcript May 5.1917.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

RITES AND PIECES OF ANNUAL LEAVE-TAKING

With a Tone-Poem of Liszt, Hitherto Unheard Under Dr. Muck, for Exception to Precedent—The Audience and the Conductor—"Tasso," Years and Fashions—Beethoven, Strauss and Wagner in the Usual Glories of the Occasion

FOR the most part, foreseen pleasures filled the concert of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. The frequenters of Symphony Hall on Fridays know the pattern of Dr. Muck's final programmes of a season—the classic symphony by Beethoven; the romantic symphonic poem by Liszt; the more modern tone-poem from Strauss's earlier music; and, for good measure, a sonorous prelude from Wagner or, maybe, a severer piece by Brahms. Every such frequenter knows also that for this final occasion conductor, orchestra and audience will be on their mettle. Parquet and balconies have first opportunity to give proof of this temper in applause for the entering leader. Yesterday it was quick, prolonged, sincere as from man and woman below or above the stage to man and master upon it. Twice Dr. Muck turned to orchestra and score and twice his hearers insisted that he heed them first. Twice, again, it recalled him, and once with the whole band on its feet as well, at the end of the symphony, while at the close of the concert it would not have done until it had four times summoned him to listen to its plaudits. Familiar incident, it is easy to say, of these final concerts for the five successive years through which he has now led them; but incident that yesterday gained warmth and meaning from the circumstance of the time. Out of this background the audience was giving its testimony of admiration and liking for conductor and man; out of this background no less he was answering to it with an equally sincere personal emotion. Not yet have the wars silenced the arts among us or weakened the ties between those who give and those who receive the ministration of them. The omens, like the official announcements, for the autumn and a new season could hardly be fairer.

Within the patterned programme stood two pieces long familiar in the voice that Dr. Muck and the orchestra give them—Strauss's tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Wagner's prelude to his opera, "The Mastersingers"; a third that by some perverse anomaly usually sounds unfamiliar, though once in every two or three years conductor and band play it, Beethoven's light symphony in B-flat, and a fourth that with all the leader's zeal for Liszt he had never before undertaken in Boston, the symphonic poem of "Tasso." The composer's "Faust Symphony" has been born anew at the Symphony Concerts; once Dr. Muck has reanimated to the utmost of his powers the "Dante Symphony"; he has resurrected two of the usually neglected symphonic poems, "Hungaria" and "Ce qu'on Entend sur la Montagne"; he has sustained "Mazeppa" in the active repertory; but until yesterday he had not added to it this "Tasso," of old the most familiar of all these pieces. Perhaps the inevitable questionings were sufficiently answered in the quality of the music as it so came new to ear, mind and fancy. The melody to which Liszt heard gondoliers of Venice singing the verses of Tasso and in which as germinating motive he would personify the poet, touches others' imaginations less than it did his. Before it quickens them, he must enrich it with a passion less intrinsic than acquired from his own transfiguring ardor, as in the passage in which the poet, mournful, self-absorbed, longing, first emerges in this tonal vesture; or set it, grave and pensive, against the flowing and ornate measures of his courtly masque. Then for an instant, Liszt's hearers may hear in the imagery of the ear his "veritable portrait in music of the knightly singer."

But this same Tasso of Liszt's vision wails wofully over a neglectful world or beats angrily against it, and then the composer can invent for him only a strident, clamorous, incessantly chromatic music that nowadays seems little more than the tonal commonplace of a romantic time and a familiar method. Liszt's quick-speeding imagination saw the luminous points in his design—the rise of Tasso's grave and melancholy figure against a turbulent background; the progress of it through fete and pageant to final apotheosis; but he overlooked the musical matter, and the light and the shade to be distributed between. Then, seemingly, he "filled in" the piece, and such filling when it is of a time and a temperament that were no strangers to romantic fustian does not well bear the years. Moreover, the Lisztian apotheosis, repeated in more than one of the symphonic poems, has become a familiar and almost hackneyed tonal pomp. The listener knows by habit when [illegible] brass, the excited rushings of the strings, the sonorities of the whole orchestra, the contrasting passages suave and songful. Dr. Muck indeed clothed "Tasso" in the richest of tonal robes that he could draw from the orchestra; he warmed the music with romantic heat; by pace and rhythm he sought to give it insistent motion and vivid life. But when all was done the music, outside a few graphic and ardent passages, sounded labored and mannered, went thin and threadbare beside not a little in other of Liszt's symphonic poems less often played, less conventionally praised.

As became the occasion, the other pieces of the day sounded in the ears of the audience with the familiar glories in which conductor and orchestra are wont to clothe them. As some will have it, Dr. Muck takes the prelude to "The Mastersingers" at too fast a pace and too little stresses the pregnant phrases or periods with which Wagner anticipates the contents of his operatic comedy. Seemingly, however, the conductor would have it a glad and eager music, flung off at a heat, with detail springing spontaneously into place, a kind of rhapsody in polyphony from which should emerge by the sheer ardor of idea, emotion, process, the figures, moods and glow of the romantic folk-piece to follow. He would have the prelude as swift, changeful and colorful as a kaleidoscope, yet making it so, he would still have every particle of the counterpoint fall duly into the continuing and expanding design. It is possible to play the prelude to "The Mastersingers" as an exposition of the principal motives whence the music of the opera is to spring. It is possible to draw it out long with sentimentality and loud with clamor of the theatre. It is also possible to run it off in a kind of glamorous blur. It is the way of Dr. Muck to escape these pitfalls, to keep it a wondrous polyphonic web, but to weave it also in the lights and the shadows of romance and the streaming ardor of melody and rhythm that is the life of the prelude and of all the opera to come.

Here were the discriminating mind and the apprehending imagination playing over the music in hand, whereas in Beethoven's lyric symphony, the more narrowly musical qualities of the conductor came uppermost.

In him is the divination that finds the pace and places the accent that shall give the slow movement the voice—almost the Mozartean voice—of serenely melancholy and tender song that keeps it a music of sentiment, yet never sentimentalizes, while to Dr. Muck's ear as to the ears of the audience, the orchestra answers with soft lustres and suave euphonies of tone. Each phrase takes contour and color as in the voice of a single singer, only to melt into the long and softly glowing line of the whole. Again the technical skill, fancy, felicity of the conductor go hand in hand in the celebrated crescendo of the first movement in which tonal sparks, paling and melting, finally coalesce in radiant ascent. The rhythms of the scherzo reaffirm for the thousandth time the intuition of the conductor, the elasticity of his hand, the sensibility and the surety of the orchestra. And though the finale races gleaming to the end or plunges in sheer excitement into the interrupting chords, never once does the tonal web sag, break or turn colorless. The technical mastery is but the means to the fuller release of the music: the technical finesse is but the instrument to the fancy that prompts it. Once more the true virtuoso pieces of conductor and orchestra seem the finer-textured symphonies of Mozart and of Beethoven light and lyric.

For the day, for the year, all these powers and many another culminated in conductor and orchestra in the playing of Strauss's tone-poem of life and death and of the glorification that at the end the music sheds over them. Now a single voice penetrated the ear as when the oboe sings the piteous childhood memories that haunt the wasting man; again the whole orchestra in the might and the magnificence of a tone that yet never loses beauty scale radiant the opening heavens of the transfiguration. For no single instant do they stay the forward and upward sweep of the periods of the music as music; yet underneath they keep the tremors of the emotional ecstasy. Between these two extremes, each choir within the orchestra, each group of instruments with those choirs, each man within those groups, plays an exacting music as with no thought of the exactions; plays it as though he was the expressive voice upon whom the graphic power of the whole tone-poem depended; yet plays it with the eloquence that is of the conductor's infused self. At Dr. Muck's will, no less than Strauss's, the music summons not the externals of the scene, which is but an unworthy and usually a futile task for music, but the pity, the pain, the passion for it. Out of the orchestra no less than out of the music rise the haunting visions of life, lived, remembered, and well fought; the presence of death; the relentless end; the transmuting reward—the ideal and the real as the ideal transfigures it. And from beginning to end Friday, there was no distinguishing between the music and the voices that were uttering it. Conductor, orchestra, composer, piece and performance were one and indivisible and beyond such goal the creative and the expressive arts of music may not go.

H. T. P.

From the Advertiser May 5,1917.

SYMPHONY SEASON ENDS WITH SUCCESS

Final Concert Marked by a Purely Orchestral Program

DR. MUCK IS GIVEN BIG OVATION BY AUDIENCE

Works of Native Composers Receive Unusual Attention

By LOUIS C. ELSON

PROGRAM

Beethoven—Fourth Symphony.
Liszt—Tasso. Symphonic Poem.
Strauss—"Death and Transfiguration." (Tone-poem.)
Wagner—Prelude to "The Mastersingers."

The Symphony season ended, as it began, with a purely orchestral program, and very brilliantly. Good times or hard times, peace times or war times, the Bostonian demands his weekly symphony, and the concerts always have large, representative and enthusiastic audience in attendance. Yesterday afternoon the enthusiasm was at fever heat. When the late Dr. Muck (he was 10 minute late) appeared, he was greeted with even more than usual applause.

This season Dr. Muck has paid more than usual attention to native composers, although there are one or two who might well be added to the list. Mr. Arthur M. Curry, for example, has not been heard in these concerts for a full half-dozen years, and yet has done as good work in the large forms as any of the composers who have recently been honored in them. He made a good impression both as conductor and composer in 1911.

And this leads to a word about the different composer-conductors we have had this season. It might be better if Dr. Muck did not give his great orchestra to too many to play with. Astyanax cannot swing the sword of Hector. Several native compositions would be better if Dr. Muck directed them himself.

There is nothing to tell regarding Beethoven's Fourth Symphony. The syncopations of its so-called minuet—which is not a Minuet at all—were well-marked; the little canons in the first movement were delicately given; the strong contrasts of the work were given in Dr. Muck's broadest manner, and the contrabasses in the final coda played with a rapidity and clearness that gave the violin figure as if it had been played by those more flexible instruments, on which it appears in the beginning. Beethoven may be called the liberator of the contrabasses. There were no such passages before he composed the fourth and fifth symphonies. It was an excellent performance altogether, and gave great opportunities for contrasts of shading and expression, which were made the most of. The public, judging by the applause, have not been weaned from Beethoven by any of the recent tonal wholesalers. Dr. Muck repeated even the exposition of the first movement, and, of course, the excessive repetitions demanded by Beethoven in the third movement.

One cannot make quite so much out of Liszt's "Tasso" as out of his "Faust," yet Dr. Muck makes more out of Liszt than any other conductor that we know of. He can even glorify moments of bombast into majesty. There is a bit of realism in the first part of this work, where a Venetian Gondolier's boat-song is made prominent. We fancy that Liszt was somewhat more inspired by Byron's "Lament of Tasso," than by Goethe's picture, and a reading of that poem will put one "en rapport" with much of the sorrow and anguish expressed in the first portion of the work. The whole tone-poem seems more successful than the "Dante" symphony.

We admired the daintiness with which the later portion of Part I was read and played. It pictures Tasso at the court of Ferrara. Then comes frenzy and finally Triumph. In the interpretation of both of these emotions Dr. Muck is at his strongest. The final apotheosis was overwhelming. The trumpets blared, the percussion thundered, and Tasso's Triumph was an emphatic but noisy one. After all Liszt is a species of Hungarian Byron, laying on his touches in the strongest fashion and in the highest lights. But such music cannot fail to be exciting when Dr. Muck and the Symphony Orchestra give it, and it aroused the expected enthusiasm on this occasion, although there was enthusiasm after every number of this brilliantly played program.

To our mind the greatest music on the program was Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration." This is the one work where Strauss shows himself entirely a genius, and it is far more equal than his "Heldenleben," or his Wife and Baby Symphony. The frenzy of the dying man was far more poetic than the frenzy of the persecuted poet, and the final victory was greater than the triumph which Liszt accorded to poor Tasso, even if it was somewhat less blatant.

As both works seemed somewhat upon the same lines, one could not but imagine that Dr. Muck placed them in juxtaposition, with malice aforethought, in order to show Strauss's superiority to Liszt in a similar theme. Otherwise there would have been no purpose in placing two laments and triumphs together.

The concert and the season ended with the greatest Prelude ever written, but it is unnecessary to say how clear the guiding-motives were brought out, how briskly the march-motive in diminution was caught up, how [illegible] burst forth; all these things are expected from our orchestra and from our director, but the audience showed in every way they appreciated their advantages and at the end of the program they remained to call Dr. Muck out four times! Something phenomenal for a matinee audience.

The glorious performance deserved the recognition it received. We never were so proud of our orchestra as yesterday afternoon; there is no other such orchestra in the world.

From the Herald May 5,1917.

PLAYS SEASON'S FINAL PROGRAM

Symphony Orchestra Gives Last Concert, but One, for Year.

WILL REPEAT IT TONIGHT

By PHILIP HALE.

The 24th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 4; Liszt, Tasso: Lament and Triumph; Strauss, Death and Transfiguration; Wagner, Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg": all sound and approved compositions. Even the ultra-conservative now look on Liszt's symphonic poem and Wagner's overture as orthodox pieces in good and regular standing, while the radicals are tolerant towards Liszt and Wagner and cheerfully admit that, like Hannibal, they were very pretty fellows in those days.

It is hardly necessary to speak at length concerning the compositions chosen for the final pair of concerts this season. Some might have preferred another symphony, for, in spite of Berlioz's rhapsody, the fourth is not among the greatest achievements of Beethoven in this field. It was a pleasure to hear "Tasso." It had not been performed at these concerts since 1911. The symphonic poem is not without a few measures of circus pomp, but as a whole it is sonorous and gorgeous, with a middle section of aristocratic elegance. "Death and Transfiguration" is among the better works of Strauss, composed before he attempted to supply a musical setting to the universe with himself and family as central figures, or to translate a volume of Nietzsche into tones. With this work the concert might have ended. The Prelude to "The Mastersingers" was superfluous. And, whereas the performance of the preceding compositions was remarkably beautiful, brilliant, impressive, that of the Prelude was perfunctory; hurried, as though Dr. Muck had suddenly realized that the concert was too long; almost commonplace.

In the course of this season 44 composers were represented. Wagner was credited with eight performances, of which only three were purely orchestral. Beethoven and Brahms shared alike with seven. Next to them came Liszt, Mozart and Strauss with five each (the "Faust" symphony of Liszt having been repeated); Debussy and Sibelius four each, while four songs of Wolf were sung—that is, three were sung, one of which was repeated during the season. Homer and Franck are credited with three each, for Mme. Homer sang, as a devoted wife, three of her husband's songs.

Fourteen works were performed for the first time in Boston, five of which were by American composers, for Mr. Loeffler may be so reckoned. Of these new works the most conspicuous for worth were Bloch's "Jewish Poems," Debussy's "Gigues" and Loeffler's mystical symphony.

There was a larger number of soloists than usual—five singers, seven pianists, three violinists, two violoncellists and one organist. The singing of Mmes. Culp, Gadski and Mr. McCormack and the piano playing of Miss Christie, Messrs. Gebhard and Paderewski were especially noteworthy. Miss Christie and Messrs. Friedberg, pianists; McCormack, tenor, and Spalding, violinist, appeared at these concerts for the first time.

The season was more remarkable for the superb quality of the performances than for the freshness of the programs, but Dr. Muck has the faculty of giving life to that which is thrice familiar or was reckoned moribund; he even made Noren's bombastically platitudinous symphony seem important for the moment. There were many memorable performances, too many for enumeration here; yet there may be mention of the symphonies by Franck and Loeffler, the symphony in C-major by Haydn, Mozart's "Jupiter," Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" and "Death and Transfiguration" and Liszt's "Faust," in which Mr. Hackett and the male chorus prepared by Mr. Townsend assisted. It is not extravagant to say that this season, as far as orchestral performance was concerned, was the most brilliant within our recollection, which goes back to the first concert led by Mr. Nikisch. The glory is to conductor and players alike. Nor should it be forgotten that men of various nationalities and various sympathies, united in the purpose of maintaining the high reputation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, knew in rehearsals and concerts only one country, the great republic of

From the Post May 5,1917.

SYMPHONY AT FINAL MATINEE

Beethoven, Wagner, Liszt and Strauss on Programme

BY OLIN DOWNES

The last of the Friday afternoon concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The programme consisted of Beethoven's fourth symphony, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso," which Dr. Muck conducted for the first time in Boston; Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Wagner's overture to "Die Meistersinger."

Dr. Muck was given a long extended greeting when he appeared on the platform, and at the end of the concert.

JUSTICE TO LISZT

Liszt's tone poem, banal as it is in its development, is a gorgeous piece of color, even for this composer of gorgeous music. The orchestration is exceptionally sure and vivid, for a tone poem which comes early in the list of the works of this great composer. It is orchestration which makes the more evident the great debt of the modern Russians to Liszt. This music is still impressive, for all the paucity of the melodic ideas. The main theme is stated with true feeling and imagination—the theme Liszt heard in Venice, and which he chose as the expression of the downcast Tasso. Thanks to this true feeling, and the richness of coloring which must have been almost unexampled in 1849, and thanks, too, to Dr. Muck's masterly treatment of the music, it fascinated the audience and aroused great enthusiasm.

Dr. Muck does the justice that few conductors of today do Liszt. Without over-refining his music, he takes from it the tinge of the wholly obvious and banal. Its bombast becomes impassioned rhetoric—extravagant, overdone, but rhetoric with the true passion of the romantic behind it, and in play of imagination the conductor stood yesterday beside the composer.

But the climax of the concert was Strauss' superb tone poem. When all is said and done, little that this composer has given the world bears the burning brand of truth in every measure as does "Death and Transfiguration." First the fearful prelude to the last struggle; the approach of the grim enemy; the orchestra riven in twain by conflicting themes as a body might be riven by mortal agony; the blazoning forth of the theme that is the embodiment of the ideal, flung forth with a splendor and a majesty that are awesome from the orchestral turmoil, and then the apotheosis of this theme, as it ascends solemnly from the depths of the orchestra—all this is a glorification of the art of music and a pronouncement sure to move any hearer at all sensitive to musical tone and at all thoughtful as to the experience that waits for all.

The performance was exceptionally eloquent. The music has seldom sounded so impressively in Boston. Dr. Muck's interpretation of the Meistersinger overture is well known. There is no greater music. The orchestra, with the conductor, rose and acknowledged the applause.

From the Traveler May 5,1917.

32d Season of Pops to Open Monday

Will Continue for Ten Weeks—Andre Maquarre to Conduct —First Program.

Boston's annual season, the 32d, of Pop concerts, in Symphony Hall, will be inaugurated Monday night, and will continue 10 weeks. Andre Maquarre will conduct. The program will be:

Overture, "Jubilee".....Weber
Overture, "Fra Diavolo".....Auber
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song".....Strauss
Selection, "Eileen".....Herbert
Two Dances from "Feramors".....Rubinstein
Selection, "Samson and Delilah".....Saint-Saens
"The Last Slumber of the Virgin" (for strings only).....Massenet
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber-Berlioz
"The Star-Spangled Banner."
Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys".....Lalo
"Indian March" (for strings only).....Maquarre
Waltz, "The Skaters".....Waldteufel
March, "Stars and Stripes".....Sousa

The orchestra will, as usual, be selected from the ranks of the Boston Symphony players, with 75 members as the minimum number to play. There will be the usual number of special nights. The first college night is Amherst night, May 22, which will be followed on May 25 by the annual gathering of the alumni of the Roxbury Latin school.

Symphony Hall has already been sold out for Galli-Curci's concert tomorrow afternoon at 3:30. Mr. Berenguer, flutist, will assist. The program will be:

Se tu m'ami.....Pergolese
La Pastorella delle Alpi.....Rossini
Polonaise (from I Puritani).....Bellini
"Il Flauto Magico" (with flute obligato).....Mozart
Little Dorry.....Seppilli
Maiden's Wish.....Chopin
Carceleras (in Spanish).....Chapi
Caro nome (from Rigoletto).....Verdi
Andante e Czardas.....Popp
Mr. Berenguer.
Maman dites moi, Nanette, Les amours de Jean — Bergettes of 18th century
Valse, from Dinorah (with flute obligato).....Meyerbeer

Well Known Music Closes Symphony Season

Good, solid, substantial music featured the final Friday afternoon concert of the season for the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon. The program was: Beethoven, Symphony No. 4; Liszt, Tasso: Lament and Triumph; Strauss, Death and Transfiguration; Wagner, Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

The feature of the concert was Dr. Muck's reading of the Liszt symphonic poem, a most interesting work and given at these concerts for the first time under the direction of Dr. Muck. The audience appreciating the fact that it was the last concert of the season was even more cordial than usual towards the conductor, recalling him to the stage again and again even after the close of the concert.

The new season opens Oct. 12 to run the usual course of 24 concerts with Dr. Muck again the conductor. There will be the usual list of eminent soloists. Subscribers have until June 1 to reengage their present seats for the new season.

From the Globe M May 5,1917.

SYMPHONY SEASON ENDS BRILLIANTLY

Dr Muck Is Recalled With Enthusiasm

"Death and Transfiguration" Nobly Performed

The 36th season of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will close this evening. The concert yesterday afternoon was a brilliant one. At its close Dr Muck was recalled twice to the stage after he had bidden the orchestra stand with him, and this notwithstanding the concert had been all of two hours or more and the hour late.

Beethoven's fourth symphony was played with reverence for the repose of the opening bars, recalling the facade of a Greek temple, for the serene beauty of the song of the slow movement, leaving radiant in memory the art of the three chief virtuosi of the woodwind choir.

Liszt's "Tasso," reminding of the hectic, the theatrical Liszt as of the romanticist, and the prelude to "The Mastersingers," to close, were done well and the former provoked marked applause, but the second part of the program needed no more than the superb performance of Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," a noble interpretation, sympathetically achieved. The marvelous choral theme in the last pages was transcendant with inspiriting beauty.

Tomorrow, with a cursory recollection of the new music, singers and players of the year, something more will be said of the sustained incomparability of our orchestra, of Maj Higginson and Dr Muck, who are colaborers to such end, who are above embroiling chatter and of the privilege with which we sit under the illuminating genius of the great conductor.

From the Globe, April 29,1917

Last Symphony Concerts of Thirty-Sixth Season

The thirty-sixth season of Symphony concerts will end next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. From every point of view the season has been the most successful in the history of the orchestra. The patronage in Boston and elsewhere has never been so large. The new method of disposing of the tickets for the Boston concerts by subscription at fixed prices instead of by auction has worked out admirably, to the entire satisfaction both of patrons of the orchestra and of the management. This method will be continued in the future, and already notices of renewals are being sent personally to the subscribers, so that they may secure their seats for the season of 1917-1918.

The last concert is planned along conservative lines, although it contains one work of importance which Dr Muck has never performed in Boston. This is Liszt's symphonic poem, "Tasso." The symphony will be the fourth of Beethoven. In the second part will appear Liszt's "Tasso," Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Tod und Verklaren," and the prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

"Pop" Concert Season

The opening of the 32d season of "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall is set for Monday, May 7, and they will run thereafter until Saturday evening, July 14, making a season of 10 weeks, the longest the "Pops" have ever had. The concerts will be given every week-day evening from 8 to 11 and the program will be made up of popular music with a judicious admixture of lighter music from the Symphony repertory. There will be the usual number of special college nights and other occasions of like interest. Light refreshments will, of course, be served.

BLANK PAGE

THIRTY-SECOND SEASON, 1917

POPS

Orchestra of Symphony Players

Mr ANDRÉ MAQUARRE, Conductor

From the
Traveler
May 11,1917.

AN EVENING WITH THE POPS - - - - - - By De

Looking in on Wagner on a Rainy Evening

The Pops Provide Material for the Confessions of a Musical Proletariat.

By TORREY FORD.

IT was a case of just following along. Dennis had ordered the tickets before we even heard about the excursion. Probably he had a big idea for a little picture and expected us just to fill in the space.

"How," we asked, as he delivered the ultimatum, "do you expect me to get a story out of fiddles and claret lemonade?"

"Why," says Dennis, with the patronizing air of a higher art, "the Pops are an institution, distinctly Bostonese and quite the thing. Surely, you don't have to worry about finding material for your trivial little sayings. Just suppose you had to go up there and come back with sketches for a regular drawing as I—"

"All right, all right," we consented, growing warm around the collar, as we always do in discussions with people who wear flowing Windsor ties, "but just pick an evening without the 'Blue Danube.' I'm off that song for life. You hear it in the evening, it runs through your dreams all night and you shave to it the next morning. Please, a program without the 'Blue Danube.'"

And it was only last night we laid in a stock of Fatimas and set out for Symphony Hall.

We carried our own scenery; that is, we had two fair companions just to decorate the table and free ourselves from the taint of professionalism. Besides, Dennis needed some attractive figures for the foreground of his picture, and said we wouldn't do at all.

As we tripped into the big claret lemonade arena, escorted by four ushers and the head waiter, with the orchestra thundering out Suppe's "Light Cavalry" overture—honest, Gen. Joffre's triumphant entry into the great West paled in comparison.

It's funny how a little music can transform a dejected dramatic critic into the foremost writer of the age. And we profess no knowledge of music either. To be sure, we like to gather on the shady corner of the porch and roll off a few bars of "I've Been Working on the Railroad"; we linger on the curb when the blind fiddler squeaks out the rag-time melodies he learned before he lost his sight; but you never found us holding down even a back-row stall at a symphonic concert.

We have a musical soul and can finger out "In the Good Old Summer Time" blindfolded, but somehow, we just balk at Wagner, Verdi and the rest.

But the Pops are different. Of course, they do swing off into channels of lofty foreign strains more or less frequently, but then, they give you something to do with your hands, face and feet meanwhile. Music can reach our soul any rainy evening. If we could only cultivate a classical poise for our face during the playing of a single measure from the great composers, why we might be drafted in as a musical critic and have Philip Hale and H. T. P. back in the cub reporter class.

At the Pops you can sip something through a straw, drap your feet over a nearby chair, play jackstones with the pretzels, and drink in Wagner with the self-content of Wagner himself. It's the only institution in the U. S. A. that recognizes the existence of the musical proletariat.

After you have been listening a while, with an occasional glance at the program to keep posted on whether it is Ponchielli or Hennebains at bat, along come a few strains that sound kind of familiar. You scratch your head, think way back to last winter, and it suddenly dawns that you are hearing selections from that musical comedy that played two weeks to paper houses and died in Fitchburg.

Say, with the symphony orchestra down in the pit taking care of the score, the musical comedy producers could turn out seven hits a week and one on Sunday.

And then we glanced around just to find something to write about.

Up on the platform there were a million violins swaying to the pleadings of a long, thin man who spells his name M-a-q-u-a-r-r-e and looks it. Probably they were first, second, third and fourth violins, with an occasional 'cello, but to us, they were just violins. Over on one side, there were horns—French, English and Scandinavian. We get the maximum enjoyment from brass music only when we can get up close enough to stick our head in the horn and watch the music come out.

Down on the floor, around the tables littered with bottles and chocolate ice cream, were representations from nearly every class of music patrons. There were those who drank ginger ale and listened to the music; those who drank Scotch ale and went to sleep; and a few who ate ham sandwiches without mustard. We couldn't eat a ham sandwich without mustard if there were twenty symphony orchestras to accompany us.

The attention of those present traveled along in inverse ratio to the program. During the first four numbers, the majority held a conventional silence, realizing that there was music to be heard and it was well to appear absorbed, even if you were thinking of the price of potatoes.

The composure dropped to a mere nothing during the intermediate selections. The conductor rapped imperiously with his baton many times in a useless attempt to break up the gossipy discussions, the playful flirtations and the square meal party down by the third exit.

With the final numbers came that dispassioned complacency, born of the immediate knowledge that it's more fun to sit pleasantly and listen to the strains of Puccini than to get out and try to hop on a crowded trolley car.

There was one little incident during the evening that gave us satisfaction, revenge and a long laugh. After many minutes of arranging and rearranging, we were all set in a rigid pose and Dennis had the outlines of his picture sketched in. Just then the orchestra boomed forth with the "Star Spangled Banner" and poses, sketches and everything were forgotten in a grand burst of stand-up patriotism.

When the spirit of nationalism interferes with art, it is high time to become a hyphenate.

From the
Herald
May 8,1917.

POP CONCERTS OPEN SEASON

Orchestra of 75 Symphony Men Appears Under Conductor Maquarre.

NATIONAL HYMN IS PLAYED

Almost every year comes an abominable spring, and always the perennial Pops. The 32d season of these concerts, nearly as well known as performances of the Boston Symphony in its formal season, commenced in Symphony Hall last evening, with an orchestra of 75 Symphony men, led by Andre Maquarre.

The band, in happy mood, exerted enlivening influence upon the audience, which, in recent years, has often seemed to receive these performances solemnly. There is no conviviality when waiters will not take orders during a performance of music by Wagner.

Mr. Maquarre's program for the opening night was judiciously made. Seething patriotism was satisfied with Sousa's "Stars and Stripes" and "The Star Spangled Banner," which liberated the great organ and full capacity of a very sonorous but vocally unsteady chorus. Of our national hymn it may be said that all Americans sing it badly, and some worse than others. If "F. P. A." is wrong in his contention that only a boy whose voice is changing can follow it all the way through, choral conductors ought to undertake a "Star Spangled" drill as their part of the preparedness program.

Last night's program embraced waltzes by Strauss and Waldteufel; selections from "Fra Diavolo," and Victor Herbert's latest opera, "Eileen"; Weber's "Jubilee" Overture, and the Weber-Berlioz "Invitation to the Dance"; music from "Samson and Delilah," and two selections for strings only—"The Last Slumber of the Virgin," by Massenet, and Maquarre's "Indian Dance," not reminiscent of the aborigine, but very agreeably orchestrated. Fresh from exacting labor under Dr. Muck, the orchestra played as a band of virtuosi. Tonight's program follows:

March, "Our Director".....Bigelow
Overture, "Haus Helling".....Marschner
Waltz, "Barcarole".....Waldteufel
Selection, "Miss Springtime".....Kalman
Two dances from "Coppelia".....Delibes a, Waltz. b, Czardas.
Selection, "Rigoletto".....Verdi
Serenade, "Les Millions d'Arlequin"..Drigo
Overture, "1812".....Tschaikowsky
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Ballet music from "Faust".....Gounod
Reve Angelique.....Rubinstein
Waltz, "Artists' Life".....Strauss
March, "Second Connecticut".....Reeves

From the
Post
May 8,1917.

POP SEASON OPENS WITH FULL HOUSE

Largest Band Yet Employed—Singing by Audience

The 32d season of the Pop concerts opened last night in Symphony Hall, Andre Maquarre, the first flutist of the orchestra, conducting. There was an unusually big audience in attendance—in spite of the cool weather—which practically bought out the hall, and crowded the galleries as well as the floor.

LARGEST ORCHESTRA YET

The orchestra was larger than ever before in the history of these concerts. It was, in fact, of symphonic proportions, and there are few modern scores to which it would have failed to do justice, either as regarded the number of players or the skill they brought to bear on the rendering of the music.

At the tables the smoke curled and the entire hall listened attentively whenever the music was sounding. The programme was well chosen and contrasted; the refreshments were pleasant as of yore. Mr. Maquarre conducted with special authority and enthusiasm. The proportions of the orchestra made possible an impressive response to his wishes. This orchestra played, among other pieces, Weber's "Jubilee" Overture, which ends with the tune known in America as "My Country, 'Tis of Thee," and in England as "God Save Our Precious Queen"; Auber's sparkling overture to "Fra Diavolo"; Strauss' waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song"; Herbert's selections from "Eileen"; two dances from Rubinstein's ballet, "Feramors"; selections from Saint-Saens' "Samson and Dalilah"; Massenet's "Last Slumber of the Virgin," for strings alone—music which in its sensuous appeal is anything but religious or virginal; Weber-Berlioz's "Invitation to the Dance"; Lalo's overture, "Le Roi d'Ys"; Maquarre's "Indian March," for strings alone; Waldteufel's waltz, "The Skaters," and John Philip Sousa's march, "The Stars and Stripes Forever."

The climax of the evening came when, in addition to the other patriotic music on the programme, the organ and orchestra struck up "The Star Spangled Banner," and the audience rose to its feet and commenced to sing the song. This song will be sung every night at these concerts during the Pop season. As heard last night, intoned by hundreds of voices with the support of the big orchestra and the great organ, it had an overwhelming effect.

The concert was a very auspicious opening of the season. The audience was so pleased with the efforts of Mr. Maquarre that an encore was necessitated after nearly every number on the programme.

From the
Journal
May 14,1917.

ETHEL LEGINSKA - THE POPS

From the
Herald
May 8,1917.

POPS SEASON OPENS AT SYMPHONY HALL

ANDRE MAQUARRE IS FIRST CONDUCTOR

Program Made Up of Familiar Music, Which Makes Quick Appeal

The 32d season of the Pops at Symphony Hall was auspiciously opened last night and will continue for 10 weeks. Andre Maquarre conducted this program:—

"Jubilee" Overture.....Weber
Overture, "Fra Diavolo".....Auber
Waltz, "Wine, Women and Son".....Strauss
Selection, "Eileen".....Herbert

Two Dances from "Feramors".....Rubinstein
Selection, "Samson and Delilah"..Saint-Saens
"The Last Slumber of the Virgin" (For Strings only).....Massenet
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber-Berlioz

THE STAR SPANGLED BANNER

Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys".....Lalo
"Indian March" (For Strings only).Maquarre
Waltz, "The Skaters".....Waldteufel
March, "Stars and Stripes".....Sousa

As the regular Symphony closes and the series of popular concerts open, we have come to think of the latter event as a harbinger of Summer. By reason of its longevity the Pops is an institution that might justly lay claim to space in the Old Farmer's Almanac, wherein, during the long winter evenings the T. B. M. (tired business man) in the bosom of his family, in the perusal of the aforesaid classic, would find among the early dates of May, this legend "about this time look for the Pops, and expect warm weather." The Pops have arrived on schedule time, but the warm weather has been delayed en route by either a blow out or faulty ignition. Present atmospheric conditions are more suggestive of Yuletide festivities than the delights of the Pops. After carefully wrapping up our snow shovel in moth balls according to the calendar and looking with some misgiving at our 1916 model panama, it was rather a surprise to find it necessary to be obliged to wear our mittens to the opening of the Pops.

However we are sanguine enough to anticipate more seasonable weather soon, for if these polar zephyrs continue to waft in this direction, the management will be obliged to change the temperature of the beverages sold at these concerts.

The program last night, and those that are promised, comprise familiar music that makes a quick appeal by reason of melodic and rhythmic charm. With the large orchestra of skilled players and an able conductor, the inherent beauties of the compositions are enhanced in a large measure. Mr. Maquarre led the orchestra with vigor and skill and aroused fine enthusiasm in the large audience.

F. M. W.

[120]

From the
Globe
May 8,1917.

"POPS" OPEN WITH ENLARGED ORCHESTRA

Mr Maquarre Conducts Seventy-Five Players

Patriotic Note Features in First Program of Season

With an orchestra of Symphony players enlarged to 75 men, Mr Maquarre opened the 32d season of the "Pops" last night at Symphony Hall. Year by year the management has shown its appreciation of Boston's pleasure in this favorite form of entertainment by increasing the size of the orchestra. The additions this season are entirely in the strings, bringing its choirs practically up to the numerical strength of the Winter season, and great indeed is the improvement in the balance and euphony of tone.

The note of patriotism marked the spirit of the hour. Men in uniform were seen here and there about the tables and partiotic music was not forgotten. Preceding the final group, which begins at 10, "The Star Spangled Banner" was featured. Mr Maquarre probably assumed that to all Americans the melody which ends Weber's "Jubel" overture, familiar despite its contrapuntal furbelows, is always and everywhere "America." Adoption often can obliterate origin, and for all practical purposes it matters not that Weber knew the tune as "Heil dir im Siegerkranz," published in Berlin in 1793, that he introduced it into a cantata, that Beethoven used it in a set of variations and in his Battle Symphony. We were not the only borrowers, for Denmark made it her National air about 15 years after the colonists and the Britishers had an argument with muskets out at Lexington, and all that was 42 years before Lowell Mason had taught the school children of Boston, including the late Edward Everett Hale, to sing for the first time "My country, 'tis of thee," to the same tune, here at the Park Street Church.

With the probability that the war will call out its own music, there could be no better time or place to make known stirring new songs of patriotic character, already written or about to be written, than through a sort of community singing, even as the college songs on the special nights are done. Perhaps from the war will come original and not borrowed music, growing out of the time and reflecting its spirit to the degree that by official sanction it will become representative and National.

Mr Maquarre steadily has shown improvement in the practices of the conductor, and last night secured impressive and enjoyable effects from his fine orchestra; one which would stand as the symphonic organization of many a lesser city. Selections from Herbert's ingratiating "Eileen" from "Samson and Delilah," the "Invitation to the Dance" (Berlioz arr) and "Wine, Women and Song" for waltzes, were among the principal numbers. Mr Maquarre's new "Fandango" sounds like a sure bid for a successful "extra" and was warmly applauded. The house was practically filled and the caterers were merrily employed.

The program this evening will be as follows: March, "Our Director," Bigelow; overture, "Hans Heiling," Marschner; waltz, "Barcarole," Waldteufel; selection, "Miss Springtime," Kalman; two dances from "Coppelia," Delibes; selection, "Rigoletto," Verdi; serenade, "Les Millions d'Arlequin," Drigo; overture, "1812," Tschaikowsky; "The Star Spangled Banner"; ballet music from "Faust," Gounod; "Reve Angelique," Rubinstein; waltz, "Artists' Life," Strauss; march, "Second Connecticut," Reeves.

From the
Journal
May 8,1917.

BIG AUDIENCE AT FIRST POP CONCERT

A large audience was present at the opening of the 32d season of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall last night. There was an orchestra of 75 Symphony Orchestra players, led by Andre Maquarre. An unmistakable note of patriotism marked the program, which was executed with admirable effect.

The program embraced waltzes by Strauss and Waldteufel; selections from "Fra Diavolo," and Victor Herbert's latest opera, "Eileen"; Weber's "Jubilee" Overture, and the Weber-Berlioz "Invitation to the Dance"; music from "Samson and Delilah," and two selections for strings only—"The Last Slumber of the Virgin," by Massenet, and Maquarre's "Indian Dance," not reminiscent of the aborigine, but very agreeably orchestrated. Fresh from exacting labor under Dr. Muck, the orchestra played as a band of virtuosi. Tonight's program follows:

March, "Our Director" ..... Bigelow
Overture, "Hans Helling" ..... Murschner
Waltz, "Barcarole" ..... Waldteufel
Selection, "Miss Springtime" ..... Kalman
Two dances from "Coppelia," (a) Waltz;
(b) Czardas ..... Delibes
Selection, "Rigoletto" ..... Verdi
Serenade, "Les Millions d'Arlequin" ..... Drigo
Overture, "1812" ..... Tschaikowsky
The Star Spangled Banner
Ballet music from "Faust" ..... Gounod
Reve Angelique ..... Rubinstein
Waltz, "Artists' Life" ..... Strauss
March, "Second Connecticut" ..... Reeves

From the
Herald
May 6,1917.

THE POPS

For the next 10 weeks Symphony Hall will be devoted to its regular spring season of Pops. This will be the 32d season of these favorite concerts and Boston's summer would not seem properly introduced without them.

The Bostonian traveling in other parts of the country soon discovers that the Pops are only less famous than the Symphony orchestra, for the report of these concerts is carried far by the large number of visitors that Boston has during the spring. With singular success they have kept their character from the beginning. There is a large orchestra of skilled musicians from the Symphony orchestra, a competent and popular conductor, and programs made up of the better sort of popular music, excerpts from current musical plays and operettas, with a judicious admixture of the lighter classics.

This year the orchestra will be large. There will never be less than 75 men in it and often the number will run over 80. In other words, Boston's popular concerts employ an orchestra as large as the usual Symphony orchestra and, it is needless to say, of much higher quality.

The conductor for the opening weeks at least will be Mr. Andre Maquarre, who long since won his way in the public favor, and has the vivacity of his race and the faculty of making programs that appeal to the widest public.

During the season there will be the usual number of special nights. The first college night is Amherst night, May 22, which will be followed on May 25 by the annual gathering of the alumni of the Roxbury Latin school.

The program for the opening is as follows:

Overture, "Jubilee" ..... Weber
Overture, "Fra Diavolo" ..... Auber
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song" ..... Strauss
Selection, "Eileen" ..... Herbert
Two Dances from "Feramors" ..... Rubinstein
Selection, "Samson and Delilah" ..... Saint-Saens
"The Last Slumber of the Virgin" ..... Massenet
(For strings only.)
Invitation to the Dance ..... Weber-Berlioz
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys" ..... Lalo
"Indian March" ..... Maquarre
(For strings only.)
Waltz, "The Skaters" ..... Waldteufel
March, "Stars and Stripes" ..... Sousa

From the
Globe
May 6,1917

"Pop" Concert Season Opens Tomorrow in Symphony Hall

For the next 10 weeks Symphony Hall will be devoted to its regular Spring season of "Pops." This will be the 32d season of these favorite concerts, and Boston's Summer would not seem properly introduced without them. The Bostonian traveling in other parts of the country soon discovers that the "Pops" are only less famous than the Symphony Orchestra, for the report of these concerts is carried far by the large number of visitors that Boston has during the Spring. With singular success they have kept their character from the beginning.

There is a large orchestra of skilled musicians from the Symphony Orchestra, a competent and popular conductor and programs made up of the better sort of popular music, excerpts from current musical plays and operettas, with a judicious admixture of the lighter classics.

This year the orchestra will never be less than 75 men and often the number will run over 80. The conductor, for the opening weeks at least, will be Andre Maquarre, who long since won his way in the public favor. Mr Maquarre, a Frenchman, has the vivacity of his race, which is found in all the music he plays.

During the season there will be the usual number of special nights. The first college night is Amherst Night, May 22, which will be followed May 25 by the annual gathering of the alumni of the Roxbury Latin School.

The program for tomorrow evening: is as follows: Overture, "Jubilee," Weber; overture, "Fra Diavolo," Auber; waltz, "Wine, Women and Song," Strauss; selection, "Eileen," Herbert; two dances from "Feramore," Rubinstein; selection, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; "The Last Slumber of the Virgin," for strings only, Massenet; "Invitation to the Dance," Weber-Berlioz; "The Star Spangled Banner"; overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," Lalo; "Indian March," Maquarre; waltz, "The Skaters," Waldteufel; march, "Stars and Stripes," Sousa.

From the American
May 6,1917.

THE POPS

For the next ten weeks Symphony Hall will be devoted to its regular Spring season of Pops. This will be the thirty-second season of these favorite concerts, and Boston's Summer would not seem properly introduced without them.

This year the orchestra will be large. There will never be less than seventy-five men in it, and often the number will run over eighty. The conductor for the opening weeks at least will be Mr. Andre Maquarre, who long since won his way into public favor. Mr. Maquarre, a Frenchman, has the vivacity of his race, which is found in all the music he plays. He also has the faculty of making programs which appeal to the widest public.

From the
Transcript
May 15,1917.

SONG AT "THE POPS"

An Assisting Singer, Mme. Fornia, for the First Time in a Spring Series—Not Altogether Happy Outcome

INNOVATION was the word at "The Pops" last evening, when for the first time within long memory of the spring series an assisting singer appeared at them —Mme. Rita Fornia of the Metropolitan Opera House. Yet, though she showed considerable musical taste and vocal skill, though the audience was absorbed, quietly attentive and courteous, though there were no delays or mishaps, the new order of things somehow did not run smoothly and in the vein. In the first place, Mme. Fornia's voice far from filled the auditorium, and the increase in brilliance and echo in the orchestral tone, owing to the removed seats, seemed to deprive the love song from "Samson and Delilah" of its glamor, and to overpower whatever romantic glow there might have been in Mme. Fornia's singing of it. And her songs with piano sounded thin and small in direct comparison to the clash and glitter of an orchestral evening. Although everyone lent his best ear, the French songs by Hahn and Massenet seemed not in the mood of the occasion and needed saving by the appreciation and applause which the house showed "The Lass with the Delicate Air." The purely orchestral part with numerous repetitions and "extras," made as long an evening as the most insatiable could desire. There was emphasis on French opera, with two excerpts from "Samson and Delilah," and the overture to "Mignon," a stanch friend of the "Pops." But most applauded of all was Händel's "Largo," with violin solo, harp and organ to increase its eloquence. Unrivalled in all music for combined age and popularity, the immortal "Largo" proves the supremacy of its composer in one respect at least. It appeals to every sort of audience, and adapts itself to every style and combination, from a rather unpretentious opera aria to a solemn and majestic piece for full orchestra.

The programme for the "Pop" concert this evening in Symphony Hall, with Mme. Fornia as the assisting singer, traverses the following pieces:

Overture to "The Barber of Seville" ..... Rossini
Waltz, "Sentiers Fleuris" ..... Waldteufel
Selection from "Miss Springtime" ..... Kalman
Psyché ..... Franck
Dance Macabre ..... Saint-Saëns
Air, "Mon coeur à ta voix," from "Samson and Delilah" ..... Saint-Saëns
Selection from "La Bohème" ..... Puccini
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci" ..... Leoncavallo
Songs with Piano:
L'heure exquise ..... Hahn
Ouvre tes yeux bleus ..... Massenet
The Lass with the Delicate Air ..... Arne
Overture to "Tannhäuser" ..... Wagner
March, "Le Père de la Victoire" ..... Ganne

From the
Journal
May 14,1917.

FORNIA AT POPS

A change in the plans of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall this week has been made necessary by the illness of Madame Ethel Leginska, the English pianist, who was to have been soloist throughout the entire week. C. A. Ellis, manager of the concerts, has received news that Madame Leginska has broken down nervously. It will be two or three weeks before she will be able to play.

Mr. Ellis happened to meet Saturkday afternoon Madame Rita Fornia of the Metropolitan Opera Company in its remarkable tour of the West last fall. Mr. Ellis immediately engaged Madame Fornia to take Madame Leginska's place, so that instead of a pianist there will be a most skilled and excellent singer.

At her first appearance this evening, Madame Fornia will sing twice. Her first number will be the favorite aria from "Samson and Delilah," "My Heart at Thy Dear Voice." This will be followed by a group of songs in French and English. The French songs are "L'heure Exquise" by Reynaldo Hahn and "Ouvre tes Yeux Bleus" by Massenet.

The revised program for the concert tonight is as follows:

Overture, "If I Were King" ..... Adam
Waltz, "Roses from the South" ..... Strauss
Selection, "You're in Love" ..... Friml
Selection, "Aida" ..... Verdi
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" ..... Saint-Saens
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Aria, "Mon coeur a ta voix" from "Samson et Dalila" ..... Saint-Saens
Largo ..... Handel
(Violin, Mr. Hoffmann; harp, Mr. Holy; Organ, Mr. Marshall.)
Overture, "Mignon" ..... Thomas
Songs with piano—
(a) L'heure exquise ..... Reynaldo Hahn
(b) Ouvre tes yeux bleus ..... Massenet
(c) Song in English.
Waltz, "Pomona" ..... Waldteufel
March, "Boccaccio" ..... Suppe

From the
Post
May 14,1917.

MME. FORNIA, POP SOLOIST

As announced yesterday, the illness of Madame Leginska, who was to have been soloist at all the Pop Concerts this week, has necessitated a considerable change in the programmes. Mr. Ellis was fortunate enough to find Madame Rita Fornia of the Metropolitan Opera Company in Boston Saturday, after the news of Madame Leginska's illness had reached him, and engaged her for the six concerts of this

From the Record
May 11,1917.

POPS DRAW CROWDS TO SYMPHONY

Light Programs Please Patrons

Paderewski Starts Tour Telling Americans of Poland's Woes

By J. V. Clark

The second week of the season of Pops opened at Symphony Hall Monday. The first week has seen large audiences, which has expressed complete approval of the programs offered by Andre Maquarre. They have been for the most part extremely light, which is what the majority of the Pops' patrons desire.

Mr. Maquarre has gone to the better operettas and musical comedies of the season for some selections. This, too, immensely delights a large portion of Symphony Hall's present clientele.

The coming week will hear some of the members of the orchestra as soloists. Wednesday Jacques Hoffmann, the concert-master, will play Saint-Saëns' Rondo Capriocciso. Thursday Theodore Cella, the harpist, will play the first movement of Reinecke's concerto for harp and orchestra. Friday Mr. Hoffmann will play the "Thais" meditation, and Saturday evening Charles de Mailly, the fluteist, will play Chaminade's concertina for flute and orchestra.

All the stories that went the rounds of the town, of New York and the musical magazines about war trouble with the Symphony Orchestra seem to have been definitely stopped by the opening of the Pop season. The orchestra is maintaining its usual way. War or no war, Boston will keep its great band.

From the
Herald
May 15,1917.

RITA FORNIA SINGS SOLOS AT SYMPHONY POP CONCERT

Orchestra, Under Conductor Marquarre, Pleases.

Monday brought sunshine to Boston, and the first soloist of the season to the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall. Rita Fornia, who was known to patrons of English opera as Rita Newman before she became a singer of the Metropolitan opera, commenced her engagement for a week at the Pops with rather tepid singing of Saint-Saens's "Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix," from "Samson and Delilah." Later she gave songs by Massenet, Mrs. Beach, Arne and Reynaldo Hahn with quick perception of mood and vocal art productive of deserved applause. She should be a popular soloist.

The orchestra was in fine fettle, with a program ranging from Adam to Friml. As usual, Mr. Marquarre was liberal with encores, including the ever popular Barcarolle from "Tales of Hoffmann," and Pierne's quaint "March of the Little Lead Soldiers." Tonight's program follows:

Overture, "The Barber of Seville" .. Rossini
Waltz, "Sentiers fleuris" ..... Waldteufel
Selection, "Miss Springtime" ..... Kalman
Psyche ..... Cesar Franck
Danse Macabre ..... Saint-Saens
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Aria, "Mon coeur a ta voix" from "Samson and Delilah" ..... Saint-Saens
Madame Fornia.
Selection, "La Boheme" ..... Puccini
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci" ... Leoncavallo
Songs with piano:
(a) L'heure exquise ..... Reynaldo Hahn
(b) Ouvre tes yeux bleus ..... Massenet
(c) The Lass with the Delicate Air .. Dr. Arne
Madame Fornia.
Overture, "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
March, "Le pere de la victoire" ..... Ganne

From the Advertiser
May 14,1917.

RITA FORNIA TO APPEAR AT POPS

Madame Leginska Is Ill and Will Be Unable to Play for Several Weeks

A change in the plans of the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall this week has been necessary by the illness of Madame Ethel Leginska, the English pianist, who was to have been soloist. C. A. Ellis, manager of the concerts, received news that Madame Leginska had broken down nervously and that [illegible] two or three weeks before [illegible] Rita Fornia of the Metropolitan Opera Co. He immediately engaged her to take Madame Leginska's place, so that instead of a pianist there will be a most skilled and excellent singer.

Madame Fornia is an American and for a number of years has been a prominent member of the Metropolitan Opera Co. of New York. As such she has been heard in Boston many times and she has always proved her worth as a singer of uncommon merit.

She is an artist of great experience and has, naturally, a large repertoire, so that she will be able to vary her numbers from night to night.

At her first appearance tonight Madame Fornia will sing twice. Her first number will be the favorite aria from "Samson and Delilah," "My Heart at Thy Dear Voice." This will be followed by a group of songs in French and English. The French songs are "L'heure Exquise," by Reynaldo Hahn, and "Ouvre Tes Yeux Bleus," by Massenet.

The revised program for the concert tonight is as follows:—

Overture, "If I Were King" ..... Adam
Waltz, "Roses from the South" ..... Strauss
Selection, "You're in Love" ..... Friml
Selection, "Aida" ..... Verdi
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" ..... Saint-Saens
THE STAR SPANGLED BANNER
Aria, "Mon coeur a ta voix," from "Samson et Dalila" ..... Saint-Saens
Largo ..... Handel
Violin, Mr. Hoffman; harp, Mr. Holy; organ, Mr. Marshall.
Overture, "Mignon" ..... Thomas
Songs with piano:
(b) L'heure exquise ..... Reynaldo Hahn
(b) Ouvre tes yeux bleus ..... Massenet
(c) Song in English.
Waltz, "Pomona" ..... Waldteufel
March, "Boccaccio" ..... Suppe

From the
Traveler
May 12,1917.

Ethel Leginska to Be Soloist at the Pops

A radical change in the policy of conducting the spring season of Pop concerts in Symphony Hall begins Monday night, when there will be a soloist at each of the concerts during the week. The soloist for the week beginning next Monday evening will be Ethel Leginska, the English pianist.

Mme. Leginska will appear twice on each program. Her first number will be the first and third movements of Rubinstein's Concerto in D minor for piano and orchestra. For her second number she will play the eighth Hungarian Rhapsody of Liszt.

The program at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall this evening is as follows:

Waltz, "Espana" ..... Waldteufel
March, "Cruiser Harvard" ..... Strube
"The Shamrock" ..... Middleton
Wedding March ..... Mendelssohn
Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 2 ..... Bizet
Largo ..... Handel
Violin, Mr. Hoffmann; harp, Mr. Holy; organ, Mr. Marshall.
Selection, "La Boheme" ..... Puccini
March, "Pomp and Circumstance" ..... Elgar
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Overture, "Mignon" ..... Thomas
Waltz, "Girls of Baden" ..... Komzak
Fandango ..... Maquarre
March, "Up the Street" ..... Morse

From the
Traveler
May 15,1917.

RITA FORNIA IS SOLOIST AT POPS

Taking a leaf out of the success of the fall season of the Pops when vocal soloists appeared at these concerts for the first time, the management last night had Rita Fornia, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company for soloist. The result was a big house and enthusiasm that all but doubled the scheduled numbers. Miss Fornia repeated the success of her operatic days in this city. She will sing at each concert this week.

Tonight's program will be:

Overture, "The Barber of Seville" .. Rossini
Waltz, "Sentiers fleuris" ..... Waldteufel
Selection, "Miss Springtime" ..... Kalman
Psyche ..... Cesar Franck
Danse Macabre ..... Saint-Saens
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Aria, "Mon coeur a ta voix" from "Samson and Delilah" ..... Saint-Saens
Madame Fornia.
Selection, "La Boheme" ..... Puccini
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci" ... Leoncavallo
Songs with piano:
(a) L'heure exquise ..... Reynaldo Hahn
(b) Ouvre tes yeux bleus ..... Massenet
(c) The Lass with the Delicate Air .. Dr. Arne
Madame Fornia.
Overture, "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
March, "Le pere de la victoire" ..... Ganne

From the
Globe
May 15, 1917.

MME FORNIA WELCOMED AS SOLOIST AT THE "POPS"

The first night's audience of the second week of the "Pops" approved heartily the new policy of a soloist—for this occasion Mme Rita Fornia of the Metropolitan Opera Company. As Suzuki and in other roles Mme Fornia has been heard in Boston in opera, but not in any conspicuous appearance heretofore in concert. Mme Ethel Leginska, the pianist, had been announced, but illness necessitated a substitute.

[121]

From the
Globe
May 8,1917.

"POPS" OPEN WITH ENLARGED ORCHESTRA

Mr Maquarre Conducts Seventy-Five Players

Patriotic Note Features in First Program of Season

With an orchestra of Symphony players enlarged to 75 men, Mr Maquarre opened the 32d season of the "Pops" last night at Symphony Hall. Year by year the management has shown its appreciation of Boston's pleasure in this favorite form of entertainment by increasing the size of the orchestra. The additions this season are entirely in the strings, bringing its choirs practically up to the numerical strength of the Winter season, and great indeed is the improvement in the balance and euphony of tone.

The note of patriotism marked the spirit of the hour. Men in uniform were seen here and there about the tables and partiotic music was not forgotten. Preceding the final group, which begins at 10, "The Star Spangled Banner" was featured. Mr Maquarre probably assumed that to all Americans the melody which ends Weber's "Jubel" overture, familiar despite its contrapuntal furbelows, is always and everywhere "America." Adoption often can obliterate origin, and for all practical purposes it matters not that Weber knew the tune as "Heil dir im Siegerkranz," published in Berlin in 1793, that he introduced it into a cantata, that Beethoven used it in a set of variations and in his Battle Symphony. We were not the only borrowers, for Denmark made it her National air about 15 years after the colonists and the Britishers had an argument with muskets out at Lexington, and all that was 42 years before Lowell Mason had taught the school children of Boston, including the late Edward Everett Hale, to sing for the first time "My country, 'tis of thee," to the same tune, here at the Park Street Church.

With the probability that the war will call out its own music, there could be no better time or place to make known stirring new songs of patriotic character, already written or about to be written, than through a sort of community singing, even as the college songs on the special nights are done. Perhaps from the war will come original and not borrowed music, growing out of the time and reflecting its spirit to the degree that by official sanction it will become representative and National.

Mr Maquarre steadily has shown improvement in the practices of the conductor, and last night secured impressive and enjoyable effects from his fine orchestra; one which would stand as the symphonic organization of many a lesser city. Selections from Herbert's ingratiating "Eileen" from "Samson and Delilah," the "Invitation to the Dance" (Berlioz arr) and "Wine, Women and Song" for waltzes, were among the principal numbers. Mr Maquarre's new "Fandango" sounds like a sure bid for a successful "extra" and was warmly applauded. The house was practically filled and the caterers were merrily employed.

The program this evening will be as follows: March, "Our Director," Bigelow; overture, "Hans Heiling," Marschner; waltz, "Barcarole," Waldteufel; selection, "Miss Springtime," Kalman; two dances from "Coppelia," Delibes; selection, "Rigoletto," Verdi; serenade, "Les Millions d'Arlequin," Drigo; overture, "1812," Tschaikowsky; "The Star Spangled Banner"; ballet music from "Faust," Gounod; "Reve Angelique," Rubinstein; waltz, "Artists' Life," Strauss; march, "Second Connecticut," Reeves.

From the
Journal
May 8,1917.

BIG AUDIENCE AT FIRST POP CONCERT

A large audience was present at the opening of the 32d season of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall last night. There was an orchestra of 75 Symphony Orchestra players, led by Andre Maquarre. An unmistakable note of patriotism marked the program, which was executed with admirable effect.

The program embraced waltzes by Strauss and Waldteufel; selections from "Fra Diavolo," and Victor Herbert's latest opera, "Eileen"; Weber's "Jubilee" Overture, and the Weber-Berlioz "Invitation to the Dance"; music from "Samson and Delilah," and two selections for strings only—"The Last Slumber of the Virgin," by Massenet, and Maquarre's "Indian Dance," not reminiscent of the aborigine, but very agreeably orchestrated. Fresh from exacting labor under Dr. Muck, the orchestra played as a band of virtuosi. Tonight's program follows:

March, "Our Director".....Bigelow
Overture, "Hans Helling".....Marschner
Waltz, "Barcarole".....Waldteufel
Selection, "Miss Springtime".....Kalman
Two dances from "Coppelia," (a) Waltz;
(b) Czardas.....Delibes
Selection, "Rigoletto".....Verdi
Serenade, "Les Millions d'Arlequin".....Drigo
Overture, "1812".....Tschaikowsky
"The Star Spangled Banner"
Ballet music from "Faust".....Gounod
Reve Angelique.....Rubinstein
Waltz, "Artists' Life".....Strauss
March, "Second Connecticut".....Reeves

From the
Herald
May 6,1917.

THE POPS

For the next 10 weeks Symphony Hall will be devoted to its regular spring season of Pops. This will be the 32d season of these favorite concerts and Boston's summer would not seem properly introduced without them.

The Bostonian traveling in other parts of the country soon discovers that the Pops are only less famous than the Symphony orchestra, for the report of these concerts is carried far by the large number of visitors that Boston has during the spring. With singular success they have kept their character from the beginning. There is a large orchestra of skilled musicians from the Symphony orchestra, a competent and popular conductor, and programs made up of the better sort of popular music, excerpts from current musical plays and operettas, with a judicious admixture of the lighter classics.

This year the orchestra will be large. There will never be less than 75 men in it and often the number will run over 80. In other words, Boston's popular concerts employ an orchestra as large as the usual Symphony orchestra and, it is needless to say, of much higher quality.

The conductor for the opening weeks at least will be Mr. Andre Maquarre, who long since won his way in the public favor, and has the vivacity of his race and the faculty of making programs that appeal to the widest public.

During the season there will be the usual number of special nights. The first college night is Amherst night, May 22, which will be followed on May 25 by the annual gathering of the alumni of the Roxbury Latin school.

The program for the opening is as follows:

Overture, "Jubilee".....Weber
Overture, "Fra Diavolo".....Auber
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song".....Strauss
Selection, "Eileen".....Herbert
Two Dances from "Feramors".....Rubinstein
Selection, "Samson and Delilah".....Saint-Saens
"The Last Slumber of the Virgin".....Massenet
(For strings only.)
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber-Berlioz
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys".....Lalo
"Indian March".....Maquarre
(For strings only.)
Waltz, "The Skaters".....Waldteufel
March, "Stars and Stripes".....Sousa

From the
Globe
May 6,1917

"Pop" Concert Season Opens Tomorrow in Symphony Hall

For the next 10 weeks Symphony Hall will be devoted to its regular Spring season of "Pops." This will be the 32d season of these favorite concerts, and Boston's Summer would not seem properly introduced without them. The Bostonian traveling in other parts of the country soon discovers that the "Pops" are only less famous than the Symphony Orchestra, for the report of these concerts is carried far by the large number of visitors that Boston has during the Spring. With singular success they have kept their character from the beginning.

There is a large orchestra of skilled musicians from the Symphony Orchestra, a competent and popular conductor and programs made up of the better sort of popular music, excerpts from current musical plays and operettas, with a judicious admixture of the lighter classics.

This year the orchestra will never be less than 75 men and often the number will run over 80. The conductor, for the opening weeks at least, will be Andre Maquarre, who long since won his way in the public favor. Mr Maquarre, a Frenchman, has the vivacity of his race, which is found in all the music he plays.

During the season there will be the usual number of special nights. The first college night is Amherst Night, May 22, which will be followed May 25 by the annual gathering of the alumni of the Roxbury Latin School.

The program for tomorrow evening is as follows: Overture, "Jubilee," Weber; overture, "Fra Diavolo," Auber; waltz, "Wine, Women and Song," Strauss; selection, "Eileen," Herbert; two dances from "Feramore," Rubinstein; selection, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; "The Last Slumber of the Virgin," for strings only, Massenet; "Invitation to the Dance," Weber-Berlioz; "The Star Spangled Banner"; overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," Lalo; "Indian March," Maquarre; waltz, "The Skaters," Waldteufel; march, "Stars and Stripes," Sousa.

From the American
May 6,1917.

THE POPS

For the next ten weeks Symphony Hall will be devoted to its regular Spring season of Pops. This will be the thirty-second season of these favorite concerts, and Boston's Summer would not seem properly introduced without them.

This year the orchestra will be large. There will never be less than seventy-five men in it, and often the number will run over eighty. The conductor for the opening weeks at least will be Mr. Andre Maquarre, who long since won his way into public favor. Mr. Maquarre, a Frenchman, has the vivacity of his race, which is found in all the music he plays. He also has the faculty of making programs which appeal to the widest public.

From the
Transcript
May 15,1917.

SONG AT "THE POPS"

An Assisting Singer, Mme. Fornia, for the First Time in a Spring Series—Not Altogether Happy Outcome

INNOVATION was the word at "The Pops" last evening, when for the first time within long memory of the spring series an assisting singer appeared at them—Mme. Rita Fornia of the Metropolitan Opera House. Yet, though she showed considerable musical taste and vocal skill, though the audience was absorbed, quietly attentive and courteous, though there were no delays or mishaps, the new order of things somehow did not run smoothly and in the vein. In the first place, Mme. Fornia's voice far from filled the auditorium, and the increase in brilliance and echo in the orchestral tone, owing to the removed seats, seemed to deprive the love song from "Samson and Delilah" of its glamor, and to overpower whatever romantic glow there might have been in Mme. Fornia's singing of it. And her songs with piano sounded thin and small in direct comparison to the clash and glitter of an orchestral evening. Although everyone lent his best ear, the French songs by Hahn and Massenet seemed not in the mood of the occasion and needed saving by the appreciation and applause which the house showed "The Lass with the Delicate Air." The purely orchestral parts with numerous repetitions and "extras" made as long an evening as the most insatiable could desire. There was emphasis on French opera, with two excerpts from "Samson and Delilah," and the overture to "Mignon," a stanch friend of the "Pops." But most applauded of all was Händel's "Largo," with violin solo, harp and organ to increase its eloquence. Unrivalled in all music for combined age and popularity, the immortal "Largo" proves the supremacy of its composer in one respect at least. It appeals to every sort of audience, and adapts itself to every style and combination, from a rather unpretentious opera aria to a solemn and majestic piece for full orchestra.

The programme for the "Pop" concert this evening in Symphony Hall, with Mme. Fornia as the assisting singer, traverses the following pieces:

Overture to "The Barber of Seville".....Rossini
Waltz, "Sentiers Fleuris".....Waldteufel
Selection from "Miss Springtime".....Kalman
Psyché.....Franck
Dance Macabre.....Saint-Saëns
Air, "Mon coeur à ta voix," from "Samson and Delilah".....Saint-Saëns
Selection from "La Bohème".....Puccini
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
Songs with Piano:
L'heure exquise.....Hahn
Ouvre tes yeux bleus.....Massenet
The Lass with the Delicate Air.....Arne
Overture to "Tannhäuser".....Wagner
March, "Le Père de la Victoire".....Ganne

From the
Journal
May 14,1917.

FORNIA AT POPS

A change in the plans of the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall this week has been made necessary by the illness of Madame Ethel Leginska, the English pianist, who was to have been soloist throughout the entire week. C. A. Ellis, manager of the concerts, has received news that Madame Leginska has broken down nervously. It will be two or three weeks before she will be able to play.

Mr. Ellis happened to meet Saturkday afternoon Madame Rita Fornia of the Metropolitan Opera Company in its remarkable tour of the West last fall. Mr. Ellis immediately engaged Madame Fornia to take Madame Leginska's place, so that instead of a pianist there will be a most skilled and excellent singer.

At her first appearance this evening, Madame Fornia will sing twice. Her first number will be the favorite aria from "Samson and Delilah," "My Heart at Thy Dear Voice." This will be followed by a group of songs in French and English. The French songs are "L'heure Exquise" by Reynaldo Hahn and "Ouvre tes Yeux Bleus" by Massenet.

The revised program for the concert tonight is as follows:

Overture, "If I Were King".....Adam
Waltz, "Roses from the South".....Strauss
Selection, "You're in Love".....Friml
Selection, "Aida".....Verdi
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah".....Saint-Saens
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Aria, "Mon coeur a ta voix" from "Samson et Dalila".....Saint-Saens
Largo.....Handel
(Violin, Mr. Hoffmann; harp, Mr. Holy; Organ, Mr. Marshall.)
Overture, "Mignon".....Thomas
Songs with piano—
(a) L'heure exquise.....Reynaldo Hahn
(b) Ouvre tes yeux bleus.....Massenet
(c) Song in English.
Waltz, "Pomona".....Waldteufel
March, "Boccaccio".....Suppe

From the
Post
May 14,1917.

MME. FORNIA, POP SOLOIST

As announced yesterday, the illness of Madame Leginska, who was to have been soloist at all the Pop Concerts this week, has necessitated a considerable change in the programmes. Mr. Ellis was fortunate enough to find Madame Rita Fornia of the Metropolitan Opera Company in Boston Saturday, after the news of Madame Leginska's illness had reached him, and engaged her for the six concerts of this [121]

From the Record
May 11,1917.

POPS DRAW CROWDS TO SYMPHONY

Light Programs Please Patrons

Paderewski Starts Tour Telling Americans of Poland's Woes

By J. V. Clark

The second week of the season of Pops opened at Symphony Hall Monday. The first week has seen large audiences, which has expressed complete approval of the programs offered by Andre Maquarre. They have been for the most part extremely light, which is what the majority of the Pops' patrons desire.

Mr. Maquarre has gone to the better operettas and musical comedies of the season for some selections. This, too, immensely delights a large portion of Symphony Hall's present clientele.

The coming week will hear some of the members of the orchestra as soloists. Wednesday Jacques Hoffmann, the concert-master, will play Saint-Saens' Rondo Capriocciosо. Thursday Theodore Cella, the harpist, will play the first movement of Reinecke's concerto for harp and orchestra. Friday Mr. Hoffmann will play the "Thais" meditation, and Saturday evening Charles de Mailly, the fluteist, will play Chaminade's concertina for flute and orchestra.

All the stories that went the rounds of the town, of New York and the musical magazines about war trouble with the Symphony Orchestra seem to have been definitely stopped by the opening of the Pop season. The orchestra is maintaining its usual way. War or no war, Boston will keep its great band.

From the
Herald
May 15,1917.

RITA FORNIA SINGS SOLOS AT SYMPHONY POP CONCERT

Orchestra, Under Conductor Marquarre, Pleases.

Monday brought sunshine to Boston, and the first soloist of the season to the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall. Rita Fornia, who was known to patrons of English opera as Rita Newman before she became a singer of the Metropolitan opera, commenced her engagement for a week at the Pops with rather tepid singing of Saint-Saens's "Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix," from "Samson and Delilah." Later she gave songs by Massenet, Mrs. Beach, Arne and Reynaldo Hahn with quick perception of mood and vocal art productive of deserved applause. She should be a popular soloist.

The orchestra was in fine fettle, with a program ranging from Adam to Friml. As usual, Mr. Marquarre was liberal with encores, including the ever popular Barcarolle from "Tales of Hoffmann," and Pierne's quaint "March of the Little Lead Soldiers." Tonight's program follows:

Overture, "The Barber of Seville"..Rossini
Waltz, "Sentiers fleuris".....Waldteufel
Selection, "Miss Springtime".....Kalman
Psyche.....Cesar Franck
Danse Macabre.....Saint-Saens
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Aria, "Mon coeur a ta voix" from "Samson and Delilah".....Saint-Saens
Madame Fornia.
Selection, "La Boheme".....Puccini
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci"...Leoncavallo
Songs with piano:
(a) L'heure exquise.....Reynaldo Hahn
(b) Ouvre tes yeux bleus.....Massenet
(c) The Lass with the Delicate Air.
Dr. Arne
Madame Fornia.
Overture, "Tannhauser".....Wagner
March, "Le pere de la victoire".....Ganne

From the Advertiser
May 14,1917.

RITA FORNIA TO APPEAR AT POPS

Madame Leginska Is Ill and Will Be Unable to Play for Several Weeks

A change in the plans of the Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall this week has been necessary by the illness of Madame Ethel Leginska, the English pianist, who was to have been soloist. C. A. Ellis, manager of the concerts, received news that Madame Leginska had broken down nervously and that it would be two or three weeks before she would be able to play.

Mr. Ellis happened to meet Madame Rita Fornia of the Metropolitan Opera Co. He immediately engaged her to take Madame Leginska's place, so that instead of a pianist there will be a most skilled and excellent singer.

Madame Fornia is an American and for a number of years has been a prominent member of the Metropolitan Opera Co. of New York. As such she has been heard in Boston many times and she has always proved her worth as a singer of uncommon merit.

She is an artist of great experience and has, naturally, a large repertoire, so that she will be able to vary her numbers from night to night.

At her first appearance tonight Madame Fornia will sing twice. Her first number will be the favorite aria from "Samson and Delilah," "My Heart at Thy Dear Voice." This will be followed by a group of songs in French and English. The French songs are "L'heure Exquise," by Reynaldo Hahn, and "Ouvre Tes Yeux Bleus," by Massenet.

The revised program for the concert tonight is as follows:—

Overture, "If I Were King".....Adam
Waltz, "Roses from the South".....Strauss
Selection, "You're in Love".....Friml
Selection, "Aida".....Verdi
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah".....Saint-Saens
THE STAR SPANGLED BANNER
Aria, "Mon coeur a ta voix," from "Samson et Dalila".....Saint-Saens
Largo.....Handel
Violin, Mr. Hoffman; harp, Mr. Holy; organ, Mr. Marshall.
Overture, "Mignon".....Thomas
Songs with piano:
(b) L'heure exquise.....Reynaldo Hahn
(b) Ouvre tes yeux bleus.....Massenet
(c) Song in English.
Waltz, "Pomona".....Waldteufel
March, "Boccaccio".....Suppe

From the
Traveler
May 12,1917.

Ethel Leginska to Be Soloist at the Pops

A radical change in the policy of conducting the spring season of Pop concerts in Symphony Hall begins Monday night, when there will be a soloist at each of the concerts during the week. The soloist for the week beginning next Monday evening will be Ethel Leginska, the English pianist.

Mme. Leginska will appear twice on each program. Her first number will be the first and third movements of Rubinstein's Concerto in D minor for piano and orchestra. For her second number she will play the eighth Hungarian Rhapsody of Liszt.

The program at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall this evening is as follows:

Waltz, "Espana".....Waldteufel
March, "Cruiser Harvard".....Stroube
"The Shamrock".....Middleton
Wedding March.....Mendelssohn
Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 2.....Bizet
Largo.....Handel
Violin, Mr. Hoffmann; harp, Mr. Holy; organ, Mr. Marshall.
Selection, "La Boheme".....Puccini
March, "Pomp and Circumstance".....Elgar
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Overture, "Mignon".....Thomas
Waltz, "Girls of Baden".....Komzak
Fandango.....Maquarre
March, "Up the Street".....Morse

From the
Traveler
May 15,1917.

RITA FORNIA IS SOLOIST AT POPS

Taking a leaf out of the success of the fall season of the Pops when vocal soloists appeared at these concerts for the first time, the management last night had Rita Fornia, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company for soloist. The result was a big house and enthusiasm that all but doubled the scheduled numbers. Miss Fornia repeated the success of her operatic days in this city. She will sing at each concert this week.

Tonight's program will be:

Overture, "The Barber of Seville"..Rossini
Waltz, "Sentiers fleuris".....Waldteufel
Selection, "Miss Springtime".....Kalman
Psyche.....Cesar Franck
Danse Macabre.....Saint-Saens
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Aria, "Mon coeur a ta voix" from "Samson and Delilah".....Saint-Saens
Madame Fornia.
Selection, "La Boheme".....Puccini
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci"...Leoncavallo
Songs with piano:
(a) L'heure exquise.....Reynaldo Hahn
(b) Ouvre tes yeux bleus.....Massenet
(c) The Lass with the Delicate Air.
Dr. Arne
Madame Fornia.
Overture, "Tannhauser".....Wagner
March, "Le pere de la victoire".....Ganne

From the
Globe
May 15, 1917.

MME FORNIA WELCOMED AS SOLOIST AT THE "POPS"

The first night's audience of the second week of the "Pops" approved heartily the new policy of a soloist—for this occasion Mme Rita Fornia of the Metropolitan Opera Company. As Suzuki and in other roles Mme Fornia has been heard in Boston in opera, but not in any conspicuous appearance heretofore in concert. Mme Ethel Leginska, the pianist, had been announced, but illness necessitated a substitution.

From the Transcript May 14,1917.

Here in Boston

For the present, Mme. Leginska the pianist, is unable to keep her engagement at "The Pops." In her stead Mme. Rita Fornia, the mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, who has often been heard and applauded in Boston, will be the "assisting artist" throughout the current week, singing each evening an operatic air and sundry songs. For this, Monday, evening her numbers and the orchestral numbers are:

Overture, "If I Were King".....Adam
Waltz, "Roses from the South".....Strauss
Selection from "You're in Love".....Friml
Selection from "Aida".....Verdi
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah"..
Saint-Saëns
Air, "Mon cœur à ta voix" from "Samson and Delilah".....Saint-Saëns
Largo.....Händel
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Songs with Piano—
L'heure exquise.....Reynaldo Hahn
Ouvre tes yeux bleus.....Massenet
English pieces.
Waltz from "Pomona".....Waldteufel
March, "Boccaccio".....Suppé

Mr. Knoblock's comedy, "The Cottage in the Air" will not be acted at the Copley Theatre next week. Instead, the Jewett Players will be seen in Pinero's early farce, "Dandy Dick," hardly seen in Boston in professional performance since it was a new play at the Museum.

From the Transcript May 12,1917.

THE PROGRESS OF THE "POPS"

Mme. Leginska, the Pianist, to Appear at Each of the Concerts Next Week for New Interest

POSSIBLY the last of the "Pop" concerts at Symphony Hall to follow familiar routine will be that of this evening. To management and public alike, the experience of the week has made clear that they required a new and enlivening interest such as the abilities of Mr. Pasternach as conductor and the assisting singers brought to them last September. Accordingly, there are again to be "assisting artists" with solo numbers as well as ensemble pieces with orchestra. Thus, beginning next Monday and continuing through the week, Mme. Leginska, the pianist, will play each evening with the orchestra, the first and the last movements of Rubinstein's concerto in D minor and by herself the eighth of Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodies. Both are displayful music for a virtuosa of notable range and energy of technical skill, who commands singing tone and rhythmic fire and who plays with vivid force of talent and temperament. For Mme. Leginska, as the public of Boston has come gradually to know is both pianist and personality. The programmes for next week will be rearranged accordingly. Meanwhile that for this evening stands.

Waltz, "España".....Waldteufel
March, "Cruiser Harvard".....Strube
"The Shamrock".....Middleton
Wedding March.....Mendelssohn
Suite, "L'Arlésienne" No. 2.....Bizet
Largo.....Händel
Selection from "La Bohème".....Puccini
March, "Pomp and Circumstance".....Elgar
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Waltz, "Girls of Baden".....Komzak
Fandango.....Maquarre
March, "Up the Street".....Morse

From the Post May 15,1917.

POP AUDIENCE LIKES SINGER

Mme. Fornia Given Enthusiastic Welcome

The second week of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall opened last night with an assisting soloist—Mme. Rita Fornia, mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, long popular in operatic performances in Boston. Mme. Fornia sang the famous aria, "My Heart at Thy Dear Voice," from Saint-Saen's "Samson et Dalilah"; and songs by Reynaldo Hahn, Massenet, and English airs with piano accompaniment. The audience gave her an ovation. The orchestra of 75 musicians—the largest orchestra in the history of these concerts—played a variegated programme. There were many encores, Mr. Maquarre being in his happiest vein. The audience was a big one. Mme. Fornia sings again tonight.

From the Herald May 14,1917.

WILL SING ARIA FROM "SAMSON" AT POP CONCERT

Mme. Rita Fornia of the Metropolitan Opera Company, engaged for the six Pop concerts of the coming week at Symphony Hall to replace Mme. Leginska, whose sudden illness necessitated postponement of her appearance as a soloist, will vary her numbers from night to night. At her first appearance tonight she will sing as an aria "My Heart at Thy Dear Voice," from Saint-Saens's opera, "Samson and Delilah," and three songs, one in English, with piano accompaniment.

The revised program is as follows:

Overture, "If I Were King".....Adam
Waltz, "Roses from the South".....Strauss
Selection, "You're in Love".....Friml
Selection, "Aida".....Verdi
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah."
Saint-Saens
The Star Spangled Banner.
Aria, "Mon coeur a ta voix," from Samson et Dalila.....Saint-Saens
Largo.....Handel
(Violin, Mr. Hoffman; harp, Mr. Holy; organ, Mr. Marshall.)
Overture, "Mignon".....Thomas
Songs with piano:
(a) "L'heure Exquise".....Reynaldo Hahn
(b) "Ouvre tes Yeux Bleus".....Massenet
(c) Song in English.
Waltz, "Pomona".....Waldteufel
March, "Boccaccio".....Suppe

From the Transcript May 11,1917.

Items and Announcements

For innovation at the "Pops," lest the concerts settle overmuch into the routine of years, Mme. Leginska, the noted pianist, will play at each of the concerts next week, repeating the same pieces nightly—with orchestra the first and the last movements of Rubinstein's concerto in D minor and by herself the eighth Hungarian Rhapsody of Liszt. All three are music in which her technical range and energy, her fire and color of tone and her force of personality should tell with a public that already knows her for a remarkable and a singular pianist.

The pieces to be played at the "Pop" concert this evening at Symphony Hall are:

March, "En Avant".....Gungl
Overture to "Masaniello".....Auber
Waltz, "Vienna Blood".....Strauss
Selection from "Eileen".....Herbert
Suite, "Peer Gynt," No. 1.....Grieg
Selection from "Il Trovatore".....Verdi
Clair de Lune.....Maquarre
Hungarian March.....Berlioz
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai
Moment Musicale.....Schubert
Waltz, "Gitana".....Buccalossi
March, "Gruss Gott".....Komzak

From the American May 13,1917.

ETHEL LEGINSKA, English pianist, who is soloist at the "Pops."

THE POPS.

The Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall are in the full swing of their usual prosperity. Despite the unfavorable weather of the past week, the audiences have been uniformly large. There is a long standing tradition that the proper weather for the pop concert is when the thermometer is well into the 80's, but as a matter of fact, there is no more pleasant way of spending a cold evening than by going to Symphony Hall and listening to the music. Mr. Maquarre, without neglecting the well-tried favorites of past years, has added a number of new pieces which have had much success. The past season has been particularly rich in successful musical comedies and musical plays and all of these are represented in selections on the programs from time to time.

It has been decided to use soloists at "The Pops," and Ethel Leginska, the pianist, has been engaged for the week beginning tomorrow. Leginska will play two numbers at each concert.

From the Record May 11,1917.

Mme. Fornia Is Soloist Tonight At Boston "Pops"

RITA FORNIA.

The Pops start their season of soloists this evening with Mme. Rita Fornia, mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Co., as soloist, rather than Mme. Leginska, the pianist. Mme. Leginska, who was announced, is ill, and Mme. Fornia will take her place. Tonight she will sing "My Heart Opens at Thy Voice" from "Samson et Dalila," and a number of songs.

Mme. Fornia is well known here, especially for her Suzuki, which she has sung many times to Mme. Farrar's Butterfly. She has an extensive repertoire and will change her numbers each evening.

From the Monitor May 12,1917.

A radical change in the policy of conducting the spring season of Pop concerts in Symphony Hall will begin next Monday night when there will be a distinguished soloist at each of the concerts during the week. The soloist for the week beginning next Monday evening, May 14, will be Mme. Ethel Leginska, pianist. As a result of the engagement of a soloist for these concerts there will follow a considerable remodeling of the program. The pianist will appear twice each evening next week. Her first number will be the first and third movements of Rubinstein's concerto in D minor for piano and orchestra; her second number will be the eighth Hungarian rhapsody of Liszt.

From the May 19,1917 Traveler

Special Nights Begin Next Week at the Pops

Amherst Alumni of Greater Boston to Celebrate Tuesday Evening.

Next week, the third of the Pops season, marks the beginning of those special nights which feature these concerts.

Tuesday evening is the annual night taken by the alumni of Amherst College. "Amherst Nights" are always among the most pleasurable of a Pop season, for Amherst men are famously good singers and have good songs. "Bill" Merrill, whose very presence lends "pep" to the proceedings, will lead the singing. A feature will be the appearance as soloist in a group of songs with piano of George H. Boynton. Wednesday evening will be "Italian opera night," when all except three of the selections will be from Italian operas, and these three will be by Italian composers. Friday night the Roxbury Latin school has its annual celebration.

Monday night Jacques Hoffmann will be the soloist playing the prelude to Saint-Saens's "Le Deluge." Wednesday night Gustave Heim, the first trumpet of the orchestra, will play di Capua's "O Sole Mio." Thursday night Joseph Keller, 'cellist, will be the soloist playing pieces by Chopin and Gabriel Marie. Friday night Mr. Heim will play Sullivan's "The Lost Chord," while Saturday night Mr. Hoffmann will play Saint-Saens's "Rondo Capriccioso." The program for tonight is as follows:

Overture, "Zampa".....Herold
Waltz, "Estudiantina".....Waldteufel
Selection, "Katinka".....Friml
Concertino for Flute.....Chaminade
Mr. C. de Mailly.
Rapsodie, "Espana".....Chabrier
"The Star-Spangled Banner."
Aria, from "Les Huguenots".....Meyerbeer
Mme. Fornia.
Selection, "Die Walkure".....Wagner
Marche Miniature.....Tschaikowsky
Songs with piano.....
Mme. Fornia.
Overture, "1812".....Tschaikowsky

The program for Monday night is:

March, "Venetia".....Fabriani
Overture, "Zanetta".....Auber
Waltz, "Lima".....Lincke
Selection, "Chin-Chin".....Caryll
Bal Costume.....Rubinstein
a, Pecheur Napolitain; b, Toreador et Andalouse; c, Royal Tambour et Vivandiere.
Prelude to "Le Deluge".....Saint-Saens
Solo violin, Mr. Hoffmann.
Selection, "Lucia di Lammermoor".....Donizetti
Ballet Music, "Coppelia".....Delibes
a, Valse; b, Czardas.
"The Star-Spangled Banner."
Overture, "Gwendoline".....Chabrier
Waltz, "Acceleration".....Strauss
Spinning Song.....Mendelssohn
March, "Serenade".....Herbert

From the Journal May 23,1917.

AMHERST NIGHT AT THE POPS

Lord Geoffrey Amherst and a strong gathering of his followers made Symphony Hall echo and re-echo last night with the songs of the college up in the hills. It was Amherst night at the "Pops," and bunting and flags were hung all over the walls.

Billy Merrill, '99, led the singing for a while, but the job proved too arduous for him. He called on his understudy to help him out, and Frederick Merrill, his 12-year-old son, made the big hit of the evening by mounting the platform, instructing Mr. Maquarre, the leader, where to begin, and dancing around as well as his father had done. The son will receive his diploma from Amherst in 1926, according to Billy Merrill.

George H. Boynton, '05, was roundly applauded for his singing of "In Maytime." During the intermission a number of grads gathered in the middle of the hall and harmonized as they did in bygone days.

"Cheer for Old Amherst," "Paige's Horse" and "To the Fairest College" were sung many times, and even as the audience was leaving the hall a quartet went over into a corner of the hall and began all over again.

From the Traveler May 28,1917.

LAST CALL FOR SYMPHONY TICKETS

Notice comes from Symphony Hall calling attention to the fact that the time limit for holders of tickets for the season of the Boston Symphony orchestra just closed to renew their subscriptions for the coming season expires on Friday of this week. Those seats not then renewed will be allotted as far as they go to the names on the waiting list. The notice is scarcely necessary in one sense, for practically all of last year's subscribers have renewed their subscriptions. At the same time, in order to be perfectly fair the notice is given.

The houses have already been sold out for the New York and Brooklyn appearance of the orchestra for the new season, and every indication points to the same condition of affairs in Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore.

As has already been stated in these columns, Dr. Muck will again lead the orchestra. There will, as usual, be the best musical talent obtainable as soloists. The programs will be as they ever have been under Dr. Muck—thoroughly catholic.

NOTED ITALIAN WILL CONDUCT THE "POPS"

Great interest is shown in the first appearance this evening as the conductor of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall of Agide Jacchia, the eminent Italian conductor, who has been specially engaged for the remainder of the season. Mr. Jacchia has had several rehearsals and made a most favorable impression on all who have heard his work. He is a man of great vitality and temperament and, in the phrase of the hour, undoubtedly will give much "pep" to the concerts.

From the Advertiser May 28,1917.

Agide Jacchia Conducts Pops This Evening

Famous Italian Leader Will Make First Appearance Here Tonight

Great interest is shown in the first appearance this evening, as the conductor of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall, of Agide Jacchia, the eminent Italian conductor, who has been specially engaged for the remainder of the season. Mr. Jacchia has had several rehearsals and made a most favorable impression on all who have heard his work. He is a man of great vitality and temperament and, in the phrase of the hour, undoubtedly will give much "pep" to the concerts.

The program for tonight is as follows:—

1. March from "The Queen of Sheba," Gounod
2. Selection, "Carmen".....Bizet
3. Waltz, "Espana".....Waldteufel
4. Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini
5. Dance of the Hours.....Ponchielli
6. Selection, "La Boheme".....Puccini
7. Minuet.....Boccherini
8. Intermezzo from "L[illegible]ico Fritz," Mascagni

The Star Spangled Banner

9. Fantasia from "Aida".....Verdi
10. Dance of the "Priestesses of Dagon," Saint-Saens
11. Waltz, "The Skaters".....Waldteufel
12. Two Hungarian Dances (D Major) (G Minor).

From the Advertiser May 28,1917.

MUST RENEW SEATS BY FRIDAY, JUNE 1

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PROSPECTS VERY GOOD

Only Small Number of Last Season's Subscribers Has Yet to Apply

Subscribers of the past season to the Symphony concerts who have not done so have only until next Friday, June 1, in which to renew their subscription and retain the seats they held last winter. Of such there are only a comparative few, for the renewals which have been coming in since the first of April have been larger than the management had counted on. Only a small percentage of last season's subscribers have so far failed to renew for the coming season, and there is already a considerable list of applicants whose orders will be filled after June 1.

The prospect for the Symphony Orchestra next year is most encouraging from every point of view. Already a subscription in Boston as large as for last season is practically assured, and the chances are that by next fall the number of seats taken will even be larger. It will be remembered that every seat for the Friday afternoon concerts was taken last season, and only a comparatively few seats were unsold for the season for the Saturday night concerts.

What is true in Boston is true in all the other cities where the orchestra gives a series of subscription concerts. The two series of five concerts to be given in New York are already sold out. The same is true in Brooklyn, while undoubtedly a like condition will exist in Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. The policy of the management in ignoring the many "silly" stories printed during the past spring about the disbandment of the orchestra has won warm praise from the patrons in all the cities the orchestra visits. There has never been the least scintilla of truth in any of these stories, say officials.

It should be impressed upon the subscribers of the Boston concerts who have not yet renewed their subscriptions for the coming season that unless this is done by next Friday, June 1, they will lose their seats, as their failure to subscribe by that date throws the seats automatically over to the management to dispose of to others.

From the Herald May 29,1917.

NEW CONDUCTOR AT THE POPS

Agide Jacchia, Noted Italian, Proves Welcome Addition to Concerts.

PROGRAM IS ATTRACTIVE

Agide Jacchia made his first appearance in Boston as conductor of the Pops last evening at Symphony Hall. A pupil of Mascagni, he is a graduate of the Conservatory of Pesaro. He conducted operatic performances in this city as a member of the Rabinoff forces.

Mr. Jacchia at once showed himself a welcome addition to these concerts. He has both authority and poise, dramatic force and discretion. In its more fervent moments, his conducting resembles that of his master, Mascagni. He shows the same glowing intensity, the same fondness for broad effects.

The attractive program contained much operatic music, pieces from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba," Bizet's "Carmen," Rossini's "William Tell," Mascagni's "L'Abilo Fritz." A waltz or two by Waldteufel, a minuet by Boccherian and two Hungarian dances by Brahms lent contrast and variety. An audience of good size recognized Mr. Jacchia as capable, sympathetic, pleasing and signified its approval by hearty applause. The program for this evening will be as follows:

Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai
Waltz, "Waves of the Danube".....Ivanovici
Funeral March of Marionette.....Gounod
Selection, "Samson and Delilah".....Saint-Saens
Prelude to third act of "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Minuet.....Bolzoni
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly".....Puccini
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Overture, "La Gazza Ladra".....Rossini
Selection, "Faust".....Gounod
Intermezzo, "William Ratcliff".....Mascagni
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber-Berlioz

[122]

From the Transcript May 14,1917.

Here in Boston

For the present, Mme. Leginska the pianist, is unable to keep her engagement at "The Pops." In her stead Mme. Rita Fornia, the mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House, who has often been heard and applauded in Boston, will be the "assisting artist" through the current week, singing each evening an operatic air and sundry songs. For this, Monday, evening her numbers and the orchestral numbers are:

Overture, "If I Were King".....Adam
Waltz, "Roses from the South".....Strauss
Selection from "You're in Love".....Friml
Selection from "Aida".....Verdi
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah"...
Saint-Saëns
Air, "Mon cœur à ta voix" from "Samson and Delilah".....Saint-Saëns
Largo.....Händel
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Songs with Piano—
L'heure exquise.....Reynaldo Hahn
Ouvre tes yeux bleus.....Massenet
English pieces.
Waltz from "Pomona".....Waldteufel
March, "Boccaccio".....Suppé

Mr. Knoblock's comedy, "The Cottage in the Air" will not be acted at the Copley Theatre next week. Instead, the Jewett Players will be seen in Pinero's early farce, "Dandy Dick," hardly seen in Boston in professional performance since it was a new play at the Museum.

From the Transcript May 12,1917.

THE PROGRESS OF THE "POPS"

Mme. Leginska, the Pianist, to Appear at Each of the Concerts Next Week for New Interest

POSSIBLY the last of the "Pop" concerts at Symphony Hall to follow familiar routine will be that of this evening. To management and public alike, the experience of the week has made clear that they required a new and enlivening interest such as the abilities of Mr. Pasternach as conductor and the assisting singers brought to them last September. Accordingly, there are again to be "assisting artists" with solo numbers as well as ensemble pieces with orchestra Thus, beginning next Monday and continuing through the week. Mme. Leginska, the pianist, will play each evening with the orchestra, the first and the last movements of Rubinstein's concerto in D minor and by herself the eighth of Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodies. Both are displayful music for a virtuosa of notable range, and energy of technical skill, who commands singing tone and rhythmic fire and who plays with vivid force of talent and temperament. For Mme. Leginska, as the public of Boston has come gradually to know is both pianist and personality. The programmes for next week will be rearranged accordingly. Meanwhile that for this evening stands.

Waltz, "España".....Waldteufel
March, "Cruiser Harvard".....Strube
"The Shamrock".....Middleton
Wedding March.....Mendelssohn
Suite, "L'Arlésienne" No. 2.....Bizet
Largo.....Händel
Selection from "La Bohème".....Puccini
March, "Pomp and Circumstance".....Elgar
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Waltz, "Girls of Baden".....Komzak
Fandango.....Maquarre
March, "Up the Street".....Morse

From the Post May 15,1917.

POP AUDIENCE LIKES SINGER

Mme. Fornia Given Enthusiastic Welcome

The second week of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall opened last night with an assisting soloist—Mme. Rita Fornia, mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, long popular in operatic performances in Boston Mme. Fornia sang the famous aria, "My Heart at Thy Dear Voice," from Saint-Saen's "Samson et Dalilah"; and songs by Reynaldo Hahn, Massenet, and English airs with piano accompaniment. The audience gave her an ovation. The orchestra of 75 musicians—the largest orchestra in the history of these concerts—played a variegated programme. There were many encores, Mr. Maquarre being in his happiest vein. The audience was a big one. Mme. Fornia sings again tonight.

From the Herald May 14,1917.

WILL SING ARIA FROM "SAMSON" AT POP CONCERT

Mme. Rita Fornia of the Metropolitan Opera Company, engaged for the six Pop concerts of the coming week at Symphony Hall to replace Mme. Leginska, whose sudden illness necessitated postponement of her appearance as a soloist, will vary her numbers from night to night. At her first appearance tonight she will sing as an aria "My Heart at Thy Dear Voice," from Saint-Saens's opera, "Samson and Delilah," and three songs, one in English, with piano accompaniment.

The revised program is as follows:

Overture, "If I Were King".....Adam
Waltz, "Roses from the South".....Strauss
Selection, "You're in Love".....Friml
Selection, "Aida".....Verdi
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah."
Saint-Saens
The Star Spangled Banner.
Aria, "Mon coeur a ta voix," from Samson et Dalila.....Saint-Saens
Largo.....Handel
(Violin, Mr. Hoffmann; harp, Mr. Holy; organ, Mr. Marshall.)
Overture, "Mignon".....Thomas
Songs with piano:
(a) "L'heure Exquise".....Reynaldo Hahn
(b) "Ouvre tes Yeux Blues".....Massenet
(c) Song in English.
Waltz, "Pomona".....Waldteufel
March, "Boccaccio".....Suppe

From the Transcript May 13,1917.

ETHEL LEGINSKA, English pianist, who is soloist at the "Pops."

THE POPS.

The Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall are in the full swing of their usual prosperity. Despite the unfavorable weather of the past week, the audiences have been uniformly large. There is a long standing tradition that the proper weather for the pop concert is when the thermometer is well into the 80's, but as a matter of fact, there is no more pleasant way of spending a cold evening than by going to Symphony Hall and listening to the music. Mr. Maquarre, without neglecting the well-tried favorites of past years, has added a number of new pieces which have had much success. The past season has been particularly rich in successful musical comedies and musical plays and all of these are represented in selections on the programs from time to time.

It has been decided to use soloists at "The Pops," and Ethel Leginska, the pianist, has been engaged for the week beginning tomorrow. Leginska will play two numbers at each concert.

From the Transcript May 11,1917.

Items and Announcements

For innovation at the "Pops," lest the concerts settle overmuch into the routine of years, Mme. Leginska, the noted pianist, will play at each of the concerts next week, repeating the same pieces nightly—with orchestra the first and the last movements of Rubinstein's concerto in D minor and by herself the eighth Hungarian Rhapsody of Liszt. All three are music in which her technical range and energy, her fire and color of tone and her force of personality should tell with a public that already knows her for a remarkable and a singular pianist.

The pieces to be played at the "Pop" concert this evening at Symphony Hall are:

March, "En Avant".....Gungl
Overture to "Masaniello".....Auber
Waltz, "Vienna Blood".....Strauss
Selection from "Eileen".....Herbert
Suite, "Peer Gynt," No. 1.....Grieg
Selection from "Il Trovatore".....Verdi
Clair de Lune.....Maquarre
Hungarian March.....Berlioz
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor".....
Nicolai
Moment Musicale.....Schubert
Waltz, "Gitana".....Buccalossi
March, "Gruss Gott".....Komzak

From the Record May 11,1917.

Mme. Fornia Is Soloist Tonight At Boston "Pops"

RITA FORNIA.

The Pops start their season of soloists this evening with Mme. Rita Fornia, mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Co., as soloist, rather than Mme. Leginska, the pianist. Mme. Leginska, who was announced, is ill, and Mme. Fornia will take her place. Tonight she will sing "My Heart Opens at Thy Voice" from "Samson et Dalila," and a number of songs.

Mme. Fornia is well known here, especially for her Suzuki, which she has sung many times to Mme. Farrar's Butterfly. She has an extensive repertoire and will change her numbers each evening.

From the Monitor May 12,1917.

A radical change in the policy of conducting the spring season of Pop concerts in Symphony Hall will begin next Monday night when there will be a distinguished soloist at each of the concerts during the week. The soloist for the week beginning next Monday evening, May 14, will be Mme. Ethel Leginska, pianist. As a result of the engagement of a soloist for these concerts there will follow a considerable remodeling of the program. The pianist will appear twice each evening next week. Her first number will be the first and third movements of Rubinstein's concerto in D minor for piano and orchestra; her second number will be the eighth Hungarian rhapsody of Liszt.

From the May 19,1917 Traveler

Special Nights Begin Next Week at the Pops

Amherst Alumni of Greater Boston to Celebrate Tuesday Evening.

Next week, the third of the Pops season, marks the beginning of those special nights which feature these concerts.

Tuesday evening is the annual night taken by the alumni of Amherst College. "Amherst Nights" are always among the most pleasurable of a Pop season, for Amherst men are famously good singers and have good songs. "Bill" Merrill, whose very presence lends "pep" to the proceedings, will lead the singing. A feature will be the appearance as soloist in a group of songs with piano of George H. Boynton. Wednesday evening will be "Italian opera night," when all except three of the selections will be from Italian operas, and these three will be by Italian composers. Friday night the Roxbury Latin school has its annual celebration.

Monday night Jacques Hoffmann will be the soloist playing the prelude to Saint-Saens's "Le Deluge." Wednesday night Gustave Heim, the first trumpet of the orchestra, will play di Capua's "O Sole Mio." Thursday night Joseph Keller, 'cellist, will be the soloist playing pieces by Chopin and Gabriel Marie. Friday night Mr. Heim will play Sullivan's "The Lost Chord," while Saturday night Mr. Hoffmann will play Saint-Saens's "Rondo Capriccioso." The program for tonight is as follows:

Overture, "Zampa".....Herold
Waltz, "Estudiantina".....Waldteufel
Selection, "Katinka".....Friml
Concertino for Flute.....Chaminade
Mr. C. de Mailly.
Rapsodie, "Espana".....Chabrier
"The Star-Spangled Banner."
Aria, from "Les Huguenots".....Meyerbeer
Mme. Fornia.
Selection, "Die Walkure".....Wagner
Marche Miniature.....Tschaikowsky
Songs with piano,
Mme. Fornia.
Overture, "1812".....Tschaikowsky

The program for Monday night is:

March, "Venetia".....Fabriani
Overture, "Zanetta".....Auber
Waltz, "Luna".....Lincke
Selection, "Chin-Chin".....Caryll
Bal Costume.....Rubinstein
a, Pecheur Napolitain; b, Toreador et Andalouse; c, Royal Tambour et Vivandiere.
Prelude to "Le Deluge".....Saint-Saens
Solo violin, Mr. Hoffmann.
Selection, "Lucia di Lammermoor".....Donizetti
Ballet Music, "Coppelia".....Delibes
a, Valse; b, Czardas.
"The Star-Spangled Banner."
Overture, "Gwendoline".....Chabrier
Waltz, "Acceleration".....Strauss
Spinning Song.....Mendelssohn
March, "Serenade".....Herbert

From the Journal May 23,1917.

AMHERST NIGHT AT THE POPS

Lord Geoffrey Amherst and a strong gathering of his followers made Symphony Hall echo and re-echo last night with the songs of the college up in the hills. It was Amherst night at the "Pops," and bunting and flags were hung all over the walls.

Billy Merrill, '99, led the singing for a while, but the job proved too arduous for him. He called on his understudy to help him out, and Frederick Merrill, his 12-year-old son, made the big hit of the evening by mounting the platform, instructing Mr. Maquarre, the leader, where to begin, and dancing around as well as his father had done. The son will receive his diploma from Amherst in 1926, according to Billy Merrill.

George H. Boynton, '05, was roundly applauded for his singing of "In Maytime." During the intermission a number of grads gathered in the middle of the hall and harmonized as they did in bygone days.

"Cheer for Old Amherst," "Paige's Horse" and "To the Fairest College" were sung many times, and even as the audience was leaving the hall a quartet went over into a corner of the hall and began all over again.

From the Traveler May 28,1917.

LAST CALL FOR SYMPHONY TICKETS

Notice comes from Symphony Hall calling attention to the fact that the time limit for holders of tickets for the season of the Boston Symphony orchestra just closed to renew their subscriptions for the coming season expires on Friday of this week. Those seats not then renewed will be allotted as far as they go to the names on the waiting list. The notice is scarcely necessary in one sense, for practically all of last year's subscribers have renewed their subscriptions. At the same time, in order to be perfectly fair the notice is given.

The houses have already been sold out for the New York and Brooklyn appearance of the orchestra for the new season, and every indication points to the same condition of affairs in Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore.

As has already been stated in these columns, Dr. Muck will again lead the orchestra. There will, as usual, be the best musical talent obtainable as soloists. The programs will be as they ever have been under Dr. Muck—thoroughly catholic.

NOTED ITALIAN WILL CONDUCT THE "POPS"

Great interest is shown in the first appearance this evening as the conductor of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall of Agide Jacchia, the eminent Italian conductor, who has been specially engaged for the remainder of the season. Mr. Jacchia has had several rehearsals and made a most favorable impression on all who have heard his work. He is a man of great vitality and temperament and, in the phrase of the hour, undoubtedly will give much "pep" to the concerts.

From the Advertiser May 28,1917.

Agide Jacchia Conducts Pops This Evening

Famous Italian Leader Will Make First Appearance Here Tonight

Great interest is shown in the first appearance this evening, as the conductor of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall, of Agide Jacchia, the eminent Italian conductor, who has been specially engaged for the remainder of the season. Mr. Jacchia has had several rehearsals and made a most favorable impression on all who have heard his work. He is a man of great vitality and temperament and, in the phrase of the hour, undoubtedly will give much "pep" to the concerts.

The program for tonight is as follows:—

1. March from "The Queen of Sheba," Gounod
2. Selection, "Carmen".....Bizet
3. Waltz, "Espana".....Waldteufel
4. Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini
5. Dance of the Hours.....Ponchielli
6. Selection, "La Boheme".....Puccini
7. Minuet.....Boccherini
8. Intermezzo from "L[illegible]ico Fritz," Mascagni

The Star Spangled Banner

9. Fantasia from "Aida".....Verdi
10. Dance of the "Priestesses of Dagon," Saint-Saens
11. Waltz, "The Skaters".....Waldteufel
12. Two Hungarian Dances (D Major) (G Minor).

From the Advertiser May 28,1917.

MUST RENEW SEATS BY FRIDAY, JUNE 1

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PROSPECTS VERY GOOD

Only Small Number of Last Season's Subscribers Has Yet to Apply

Subscribers of the past season to the Symphony concerts who have not done so have only until next Friday, June 1, in which to renew their subscription and retain the seats they held last winter. Of such there are only a comparative few, for the renewals which have been coming in since the first of April have been larger than the management had counted on. Only a small percentage of last season's subscribers have so far failed to renew for the coming season, and there is already a considerable list of applicants whose orders will be filled after June 1.

The prospect for the Symphony Orchestra next year is most encouraging from every point of view. Already a subscription in Boston as large as for last season is practically assured, and the chances are that by next fall the number of seats taken will even be larger. It will be remembered that every seat for the Friday afternoon concerts was taken last season, and only a comparatively few seats were unsold for the season for the Saturday night concerts.

What is true in Boston is true in all the other cities where the orchestra gives a series of subscription concerts. The two series of five concerts to be given in New York are already sold out. The same is true in Brooklyn, while undoubtedly a like condition will exist in Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. The policy of the management in ignoring the many "silly" stories printed during the past spring about the disbandment of the orchestra has won warm praise from the patrons in all the cities the orchestra visits. There has never been the least scintilla of truth in any of these stories, say officials.

It should be impressed upon the subscribers of the Boston concerts who have not yet renewed their subscriptions for the coming season that unless this is done by next Friday, June 1, they will lose their seats, as their failure to subscribe by that date throws the seats automatically over to the management to dispose of to others.

From the Herald May 29,1917.

NEW CONDUCTOR AT THE POPS

Agide Jacchia, Noted Italian, Proves Welcome Addition to Concerts.

PROGRAM IS ATTRACTIVE

Agide Jacchia made his first appearance in Boston as conductor of the Pops last evening at Symphony Hall. A pupil of Mascagni, he is a graduate of the Conservatory of Pesaro. He conducted operatic performances in this city as a member of the Rabinoff forces.

Mr. Jacchia at once showed himself a welcome addition to these concerts. He has both authority and poise, dramatic force and discretion. In its more fervent moments, his conducting resembles that of his master, Mascagni. He shows the same glowing intensity, the same fondness for broad effects.

The attractive program contained much operatic music, pieces from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba," Bizet's "Carmen," Rossini's "William Tell," Mascagni's "L'Ahilo Fritz." A waltz or two by Waldteufel, a minuet by Boccherian and two Hungarian dances by Brahms lent contrast and variety. An audience of good size recognized Mr. Jacchia as capable, sympathetic, pleasing and signified its approval by hearty applause. The program for this evening will be as follows:

Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai
Waltz, "Waves of the Danube".....Ivanovici
Funeral March of Marionette.....Gounod
Selection, "Samson and Delilah".....Saint-Saens
Prelude to third act of "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Minuet.....Bolzoni
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly".....Puccini
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Overture, "La Gazza Ladra".....Rossini
Selection, "Faust".....Gounod
Intermezzo, "William Ratcliff".....Mascagni
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber-Berlioz

[122]

From the
Journal
May 28,1917.

FOURTH WEEK OF POPS

Much is expected of Agide Jacchia, the Italian conductor, who makes his debut at the Pops tonight. Mr. Jacchia is a man of more than usual pleasing personality. Facially he bears a strong resemblance to Pasquale Amato, but he is taller and more slender. Such work as Mr. Jacchia is undertaking now at the Pops is in a measure new to him, as the greater part of his career has been devoted to opera. For a number of years Mr. Jacchia was closely associated with Mascagni, whose pupil he was, and he gave great help to the composer when the latter was working on his opera "Iris." Moreover, Mr. Jacchia is a graduate of the famous Conservatory of Music of Pesaro, which preserves so carefully the best traditions of Rossini.

The new conductor's opening program is most attractive. He draws for half of his numbers from the rich stores of Italian opera. With the splendid orchestra with which he has to work some very stirring performances of this stirring music may be looked for.

The program for tonight is as follows:

March from "The Queen of Sheba"....Gounod
Selection, "Carmen".....Bizet
Waltz, "Espana".....Waldteufel
Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini
Dance of the Hours.....Ponchielli
Selection, "La Boheme".....Puccini
Minuet.....Boccherini
Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz"....Mascagni
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Fantasia from "Aida".....Verdi
Dance of the Priestesses of Dagon..Saint-Saens
Waltz, "The Skaters".....Waldteufel
Two Hungarian dances (D major) (G minor)

SUBSCRIPTION SALE TO SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Subscribers of the past season to the Symphony concerts who have not done so have only until next Friday in which to renew their subscription and retain the seats they held last winter. Of such there are only a comparative few, for the renewals which have been coming in since the first of April have been larger than the management counted on. Only a small percentage of last season's subscribers have so far failed to renew for the coming season and there is already a considerable list of applicants whose orders will be filled after June 1.

The prospect for the Symphony Orchestra next year is most encouraging from every point of view. Already a subscription in Boston as large as for last season is practically assured and the chances are that by next fall the number of seats taken will even be larger. It will be remembered that every seat for the Friday afternoon concerts was taken last season and only a comparatively few seats were unsold for the season for the Saturday night concerts.

From the
Globe
May 28,1917.

AGIDE JACCHIA WILL CONDUCT POPS TONIGHT

Great interest is shown in the first appearance this evening as the conductor of the pop concerts in Symphony Hall of Agide Jacchia, the eminent Italian conductor, who has been specially engaged for the remainder of the season. Mr Jacchia has had several rehearsals and made a most favorable impression on all who have heard his work. He is a man of great vitality and temperament and, in the phrase of the hour, undoubtedly will give much "pep" to the concerts.

SYMPHONY SUBSCRIBERS HAVE UNTIL NEXT FRIDAY

Subscribers of the past season to the Symphony concerts who have not done so have only until next Friday, June 1, in which to renew their subscription and retain the seats they held last Winter. Only a small percentage of last season's subscribers have so far failed to renew, and there is already a considerable list of applicants whose orders will be filled after June 1.

The prospect for the Symphony Orchestra next year is most encouraging from every point of view. Already the subscription in Boston, as large as for last season, is practically assured, and the chances are that by next Fall the number of seats taken will even be larger. It will be remembered that every seat for the Friday afternoon concerts was taken last season, and only a comparatively few seats were unsold for the season for the Saturday night

From the
Globe
May 29.1917.

New Conductor This Week at Symphony Hall "Pops"

Agide Jacchia, the Italian conductor, makes his debut at the "Pops" tomorrow evening. Such work as Mr Jacchia is undertaking now is in a measure new to him as the greater part of his carecr has been devoted to opera. But experience has long since shown that a man with a sound training in the theatre is better skilled for any task put before him than a man whose experience has been limited to concert halls.

For a number of years Mr Jacchia was closely associated with Mascagni, whose pupil he was, and he gave great help to the composer when the latter was working on his opera "Iris." Moreover, Mr Jacchia is a graduate of the famous Conservatory of Music of Pesaro, which preserves so carefully the best traditions of Rossini.

The new conductor's opening program is largely drawn from the rich stores of Italian opera. It is interesting to note that the familiar overture to "William Tell" is on the program, and this will be played, possibly for the first time in Boston, strictly according to the Rossini traditions of Pesaro.

The program for Monday night is as follows: March from "The Queen of Sheba," Gounod; selection, "Carmen," Bizet; waltz, "Espana," Waldteufel; overture, "William Tell," Rossini; "Dance of the Hours," Ponchielli; selection, "La Boheme," Puccini; minuet, Boccherini; intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz," Mascagni; "The Star Spangled Banner"; fantasia from "Aida," Verdi; "Dance of the Priestesses of Dagon," Saint-Saens; waltz, "The Skaters," Waldteufel; two Hungarian dances,

From the
Globe
May 29,1917.

JACCHIA'S DEBUT AT POPS BRILLIANT

Agide Jacchia, making his debut last night at the "Pop" concerts, proved himself at once a conductor of brilliant talents and the man whom the management has sought. He has individuality, dominating yet not aggressive; his authority is instant and unquestioned; his style is that of the sensitive musician, distinctly Latin in its fervor and poignancy, yet escaping the boisterousness of too many of his compatriots, and he knows how to build a well relieved and contrasting program.

An Italian, he nevertheless conducted music from "Carmen" with an exquisite sense of its brilliant and sparkle, and gave to the fine old minuet of Boccherini its just, quaint and mellowed elegance. The "William Tell" overture, played as these concerts in no recent times have heard it, gave him an excellent opportunity in the spirited final movement, done with admirable and telling variety in nuance.

His regard for Puccini's long melodic line and vitalizing accentuation gave distinctive beauty to the excerpts from "La Boheme" and made the rarely heard intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz" a feature.

Particular interest attached to this performance, and the superb, recreating one of the well-worn intermezzo from its successor, "Cavalleria Rusticana," by reason of the fact that Jacchia was a pupil and assistant to Mascagni at the Conservatory of Pesaro, and came with him on his ill-fated tour to this country.

A conductor of constant operatic experience—in this country as chief with the Montreal and Century (New York) companies—Mr Jacchia is at home particularly in the operas of his fellow countrymen. Ponchielli's "Dance of the Hours," from "Gioconda," was to be remarked for its variety in dramatic and lyric moods, its fine rhythmic sense and wealth of color.

With this superb orchestra at his command, and with continued association, Mr Jacchia should speedily restore the "Pop" concerts to their traditional brilliance and characteristic gayety, for it is clear he does not confound their atmosphere with that of the symphony season.

From the Record
May 29,1917.

NEW OPERA CONDUCTOR LEADS POPS

Jaachia Makes Pleasing Impression at his First Concert

Italian conductors are a rare sight in Symphony Hall. One associates them rather with the opera house. Occasionally, however, some concert, some opera in concert form, draws an Italian conductor to the kuilded music cage.

Last evening an Italian conductor of the Italians, Agide Jaachia, made his Symphony Hall debut. He was appearing as conductor at the Pops concerts. He followed where Frenchmen, Germans and Americans preceeded him. He stirred things up a bit, he put the pep into Pop, he played the Dance of the Hours and the William Tell overture in the good old stvle. o effect was too broad. N

He spurned Nikisch methods of controlling an orchestra with the slightest movement of the hand or the flash of a conducting eye. He took a leaf, a very small leaf to be sure from Mr. Creatore's book, and added gymnastics to conducting. In other words, he is an Italian opera conductor.

Boston already knows Mr. Jacchia through the performances of the Boston Opera Co. He then, if memory is not tricky, lead the Puccini operas and others in Mr. Rabinoff's repertoire and impressed his auditors as a well trained man.

He has been much described in the newspapers as a great friend and pupil of Mascagni. Out of respect for his master he added the Cavalleria intermezzo last evening. The audiences like it.

On his regular program he put the intermezzo from "L'Ami Fritz," stupid music, which gets no where, which is filled with sound and fury signifying nothing. His friendship for Mascagni need not necessarily lead him to clutter his programs with the composer at his second best.

The management in engaging a fiery leader and occasional soloist is evidently making all possible attempts at getting the Pops out of anything that resembles a rut. The management made one good move last evening. It is to be hoped that attractive soloists will add to the pleasure of these delightful, and distinctly Bostonical, entertainments. J. V. C.

From the
Traveler
May 12,1917

Pops Start in on Their Sixth Week

The sixth week of the Pops in Symphony Hall which begins Monday evening will be one of the most attractive of the entire season. There will be a soloist each night except Tuesday night. This will be "Norwegian night" and instead of a soloist the Norwegian Singing Society, of which A. Sutterud is conductor, will sing a number of Norwegian songs. Moreover, there will be a considerable amount of Scandinavian music on the program.

Monday and Friday nights the soloist will be Arthur Hackett, the young American tenor. He will sing on both evenings Lohengrin's Narrative from the third act of "Lohengrin" and the exquisite air, "Ah, Moon of My Delight," from Liza Lehmann's "In a Persian Garden."

The soloist Thursday night will be Miss Mary Desmond, the English contralto who for five years was a member of the Hammerstein Opera Company.

The soloist for Wednesday and Saturday evenings will be Mario Laurenti, one of the younger baritones of the Metropolitan Opera Company. On both evenings his numbers will be the prologue to "Pagliacci" and the Patter song, "Largo al factotum" from the "Barber of Seville."

Mr. Jacchia's favor with the public continues to grow. His programs are admirable and of wide variety. In his first two weeks he played no less than 109 different pieces.

The plan announced by the management to help boom the Liberty loan by giving away a $50 bond this week and a $500 bond at the end of the season has excited much enthusiasm.

The program for tonight is:

Overture, "La Forza del Destino".....Verdi
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube".Strauss
Intermezzo, "Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
Fantasia, "Mefistofele".....Boito
Scenes Pittoresque.....Massenet
Violin Solo, "Romance".....Svendsen
Jaques Hoffmann.
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin"..Wagner
"The Star-Spangled Banner."
Overture, "Zampa".....Herold
Minuet.....Bolzoni
Selection, "Lucia di Lammermoor"....Donizetti
March, "Semper Fidelis".....Sousa

The program for Monday night is:

Arthur Hackett, soloist.
Overture, "The Sicilian Vespers".....Verdi
Waltz, "Estudiantina".....Waldteufel
a, Fascination; b, Capriccio.....H. K. Hadley
Suite, "Coppelia".....Delibes
a, Valse; b, Czardas.
Danse Boheme from "Carmen".....Bizet
Lohengrin's Narrative from "Lohengrin," Act III.....Wagner
Valse Caprice, "Tilly".....R. Nagel
Fantasia, "Faust".....Gounod
Overture, "Poet and Peasant".....Suppe
Song, "Ah, Moon of My Delight," from "In a Persian Garden".....Lehmann
Turkish Patrol.....Michaelis
March, "Boston Normal School".....Mulrey

From the Monitor
May 29,1917.

MR. JACCHIA APPEARS AS 'POP' CONDUCTOR

Agide Jacchia began his engagement as conductor of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall Monday night, presenting a program largely of Italian opera music. He took up his new task with the authority of a man who is thoroughly familiar with his scores, who knows precisely the effects he wants to secure and who can give performers the necessary indications at the right moment. The Boston Symphony men who make up the orchestra obeyed their new director implicitly, seeming to enjoy responding to his wishes. The audience, in turn, gave close attention to the playing and applauded as though it relished the interpreter's methods.

Selections in which the conductor showed to especial advantage were Ponchielli's "Dance of the Hours" and the intermezzo to Mascagni's "L'Amico Fritz." An artist who can bring out the individual color and style of the work of minor orchestral poets in their rare moments of inspiration can be trusted to handle the work of the major composers successfully. Of particular interest is the conductor's manner of phrasing, each section of his melody being joined to the one following it, and each at the same time keeping its contour. Such phrasing gives an undulatory rhythm, with wave crests and hollows and momentary nodes of equipoise. The effect is never one of mere drive and lull, of mechanical emphasis and release.

Tonight Mr. Jacchia will present a program of pieces by Nicolai, Ivanovici, Gounod, Saint-Saëns, Wagner, Bolzoni, Puccini, Chabrier, Rossini, Mascagni and Weber-Berlioz.

From the Traveler
May 29,1917.

New Leader Makes Big Hit at the Pops

A most interesting program and equally interesting conductor made last night's Pops concert easily the most successful of the season to date. It was the debut of Agide Jacchia as conductor at these concerts and that debut was highly successful. Evidently the large audience knew of the merits of the new leader for he was given an exceptionally cordial welcome and after the first number was greeted with such a burst of applause as fairly shook the roof.

There is no question of Mr. Jacchia's nationality once the music is under way. His first name might well be Agility, for he is all over the lot. But he gets results, such results as the Pops haven't developed since last fall's memorable extra season.

To night's program will be:

Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai
Waltz, "Waves of the Danube".....Ivanovici
Funeral March of Marionette.....Gounod
Selection, "Samson and Delilah"....Saint-Saens
Prelude to third act of "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Minuet.....Bolzoni
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly".....Puccini
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Overture, "La Gazza Ladra".....Rossini
Selection, "Faust".....Gounod
Intermezzo, "William Ratcliff".....Mascagni
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber-Berlioz

From the
Transcript
May 29.1917.

RECENT DEATHS

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA LIBRARIAN

Johann Sauerquell Was a Native of Austria, and a Brother in-Law of Franz Kneisel

Johann Sauerquell, for nearly thirty years the librarian of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died at his home, 4 Marbury terrace, Jamaica Plain, Monday evening, after an illness which had kept him confined to his house for most of the past year. Mr. Sauerquell, through the post which he held for so many years with the Symphony Orchestra, was one of the best known men in music in this country. He was born in Cernowitz, Bukowina, May 12, 1846. In that city he spent his boyhood and went through the University. He became an officer in the Austrian army and saw active service in the war with Prussia in 1866, winning a medal for gallantry in action. He left the army and went to Roumania, first in Jassy and then Bucharest, where he was for many years connected with the State railways, and during the Turko-Russian War of 1876-77 he was second in charge of the railway transportation of Roumania.

In 1876 Mr. Sauerquell married Marie Kneisel, who survives him, the elder sister of Franz Kneisel. He came to this country in 1888 and almost immediately became librarian of the Symphony Orchestra, which post he held up to the time of his death. When the Kneisel Quartet was formed he became its secretary, but he relinquished this position several years ago

From the
Herald
May 31,1917.

EVENING AT "POPS" ENDS B. U. PROGRAM

Symphony Hall Is Filled with University People.

An evening at "Pops" wound up Boston University's commencement festivities last night, when members and friends of the university with the graduating class in the place of honor filled the entire floor of Symphony Hall. The men's and women's glee clubs, under the leadership of Moses R. Lowell, '17, and Esther Nazarian, '17, sang the college song, "Clarissima," and several other popular student songs during intermission. Each woman of the graduating class received a model in ice cream of the university building on Boylston street.

Among those present occupying tables were President and Mrs. L. H. Murlin, Dr. William E. Huntington, ex-president of the university; Dean William M. Warren, College of Liberal Arts; Dean Everett W. Lord of the business administration, Dean J. A. Sutherland of the School of Medicine, Dr. Arthur W. Weysse, chairman of the executive committee, Graduate School; Silas Peirce, treasurer of the university; Lee C. Haskell, Edwin Holt Hughes, resident bishop of the M. E. Church; Frank W. Kimball, the Rev. Dillon Bronson, Dr. Wesley T. Lee, Dr. David W. Welles, Mrs. Everett O. Fiske, Capt. Herbert F. Hartwell, U. S. A., and L. R. Talbot, executive secretary of the university.

From the
Transcript
May 29,1917.

Agide Jacchia, Conductor

Agide Jacchia made his first ... ance in Boston as conductor of the ... last evening at Symphony Hall. ... pupil of Mascagni and a graduate ... Conservatory of Pesaro. He ... operatic performances in this ... member of the Rabinoff forces. ... Jacchia is a welcome addition ... concerts, for he has authority ... dramatic force and discretion.

The programme contained ... from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba" ... "Carmen," Rossini's "William Tell" ... cagni's "L'Amico Fritz." An ... good size recognized Mr. Jacchia ... ble and sympathetic. The programme ... this evening is:

Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor"
Waltz, "Waves of the Danube"
Funeral March of Marionette
Selection, "Samson and Delilah"
Prelude to third act of "Lohengrin"
Minuet
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly"
Rhapsody, "España"
"The Star Spangled Banner"
Overture, "La Gazza Ladra"
Selection, "Faust"
Intermezzo, "William Ratcliff"
Invitation to the Dance

From the
Globe
May 31,1917.

BOSTON UNIVERSITY CLOSES ITS YEAR

Record Class Graduated in the Morning

Convocation Informed No Change Will Be Made In Schedule

Boston University's 48th annual Commencement closed last night with Boston University Night at the pop concert in Symphony Hall. Graduation exercises were held in the morning in Tremont Temple and the annual meeting of the university convocation in the College of Liberal Arts building in the afternoon. All three events were largely attended. At the graduation 70 degrees were awarded, the largest number in the history of the university.

At the concert last night a program of popular music was rendered by the orchestra, led by conductor Jacchia, including a selection from the light opera "Katinka," the "William Tell" overture, the "Nut-Cracker" suite, Sullivan's "Lost Chord," played as a trumpet solo by Mr Heim; the "1812" overture and the "Largo" of Handel. Prof John P. Marshall, head of the music department of the university, who is also organist of the Symphony Orchestra, presided at the organ.

The Men's and Women's Glee Clubs of the College of Liberal Arts, the former under the leadership of Moses R. Lowell, '17, of Millis, and the latter under the direction of Miss Esther Nazarian, '17, of Boston, led in singing "Clarissima," the university song. Other university songs were sung by the glee clubs during the intermission.

Among those who occupied tables with friends were Pres and Mrs L. H. Murlin, Ex-Pres William E. Huntington, Dean William M. Warren of the College of Liberal Arts, Dean Everett W. Lord of the College of Business Administration, Dean John P. Sutherland of the School of Medicine, Chairman Arthur W. Weysse of the executive committee of the Graduate School, Treas Silas Peirce of the university, Bishop Edwin H. Hughes, Lee C. Haskell, Frank W. Kimball, Rev Dillon Bronson, Dr Wesley T. Lee, Dr David W. Welles, Mrs Robert L. O'Brien, Mrs Everett O. Fiske, Capt Herbert F. Hartwell, U. S. A., and Executive Sec L. Raymond Talbot of the university.

Sitting in sections were the members with various members of the faculty of all six departments of the university. The alumni were represented by the classes of '92, '97, '02, '07 and '12.

From Transcript
June

POPS BOOM LIBERTY LOAN

Beginning with tonight every person of the Pop concerts will become a candidate for the posession of a $50 bond which will be given Saturday evening, June 16, and a $500 bond which will be given at the last concert of the season.

Special numbered coupons have been printed, one to be given with every ticket sold at the box office from today until the end of the season.

C. A. Ellis, manager of the concerts, has picked out two numbers, one for the $50 bond, and one for the $500 bond. These numbers have been deposited with the State Street Trust Company, and are known only to Mr. Ellis and the State Street Trust Company. The number of the coupon calling for the $50 bond will be posted at Symphony Hall, Saturday evening, June 16, and the bond will be given to the person presenting the coupon at Mr. Ellis's office. If the actual bonds have not reached Boston by that date a temporary certificate will be given. In like manner the number of the coupon calling for the $500 bond will be posted at Symphony Hall on the closing night of the Pop season, and the bond will be given to the person presenting the coupon at the manager's office.

[123]

From the
Journal
May 28,1917.

FOURTH WEEK OF POPS

Much is expected of Agide Jacchia, the Italian conductor, who makes his debut at the Pops tonight. Mr. Jacchia is a man of more than usual pleasing personality. Facially he bears a strong resemblance to Pasquale Amato, but he is taller and more slender. Such work as Mr. Jacchia is undertaking now at the Pops is in a measure new to him, as the greater part of his career has been devoted to opera. For a number of years Mr. Jacchia was closely associated with Mascagni, whose pupil he was, and he gave great help to the composer when the latter was working on his opera "Iris." Moreover, Mr. Jacchia is a graduate of the famous Conservatory of Music of Pesaro, which preserves so carefully the best traditions of Rossini.

The new conductor's opening program is most attractive. He draws for half of his numbers from the rich stores of Italian opera. With the splendid orchestra with which he has to work some very stirring performances of this stirring music may be looked for.

The program for tonight is as follows:

March from "The Queen of Sheba".....Gounod
Selection, "Carmen".....Bizet
Waltz, "Espana".....Waldteufel
Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini
Dance of the Hours.....Ponchielli
Selection, "La Boheme".....Puccini
Minuet.....Boccherini
Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz".....Mascagni
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Fantasia from "Aida".....Verdi
Dance of the Priestesses of Dagon..Saint-Saens
Waltz, "The Skaters".....Waldteufel
Two Hungarian dances (D major) (G minor)

SUBSCRIPTION SALE TO SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Subscribers of the past season to the Symphony concerts who have not done so have only until next Friday in which to renew their subscription and retain the seats they held last winter. Of such there are only a comparative few, for the renewals which have been coming in since the first of April have been larger than the management counted on. Only a small percentage of last season's subscribers have so far failed to renew for the coming season and there is already a considerable list of applicants whose orders will be filled after June 1.

The prospect for the Symphony Orchestra next year is most encouraging from every point of view. Already a subscription in Boston as large as for last season is practically assured and the chances are that by next fall the number of seats taken will even be larger. It will be remembered that every seat for the Friday afternoon concerts was taken last season and only a comparatively few seats were unsold for the season for the Saturday night concerts.

From the
Globe
May 28,1917.

AGIDE JACCHIA WILL CONDUCT POPS TONIGHT

Great interest is shown in the first appearance this evening as the conductor of the pop concerts in Symphony Hall of Agide Jacchia, the eminent Italian conductor, who has been specially engaged for the remainder of the season. Mr Jacchia has had several rehearsals and made a most favorable impression on all who have heard his work. He is a man of great vitality and temperament and, in the phrase of the hour, undoubtedly will give much "pep" to the concerts.

SYMPHONY SUBSCRIBERS HAVE UNTIL NEXT FRIDAY

Subscribers of the past season to the Symphony concerts who have not done so have only until next Friday, June 1, in which to renew their subscription and retain the seats they held last Winter. Only a small percentage of last season's subscribers have so far failed to renew, and there is already a considerable list of applicants whose orders will be filled after June 1.

The prospect for the Symphony Orchestra next year is most encouraging from every point of view. Already the subscription in Boston, as large as for last season, is practically assured, and the chances are that by next Fall the number of seats taken will even be larger. It will be remembered that every seat for the Friday afternoon concerts was taken last season, and only a comparatively few seats were unsold for the season for the Saturday night

From the
Globe
May 29,1917.

New Conductor This Week at Symphony Hall "Pops"

Agide Jacchia, the Italian conductor, makes his debut at the "Pops" tomorrow evening. Such work as Mr Jacchia is undertaking now is in a measure new to him as the greater part of his career has been devoted to opera. But experience has long since shown that a man with a sound training in the theatre is better skilled for any task put before him than a man whose experience has been limited to concert halls.

For a number of years Mr Jacchia was closely associated with Mascagni, whose pupil he was, and he gave great help to the composer when the latter was working on his opera "Iris." Moreover, Mr Jacchia is a graduate of the famous Conservatory of Music of Pesaro, which preserves so carefully the best traditions of Rossini.

The new conductor's opening program is largely drawn from the rich stores of Italian opera. It is interesting to note that the familiar overture to "William Tell" is on the program, and this will be played, possibly for the first time in Boston, strictly according to the Rossini traditions of Pesaro.

The program for Monday night is as follows: March from "The Queen of Sheba," Gounod; selection, "Carmen," Bizet; waltz, "Espana," Waldteufel; overture, "William Tell," Rossini; "Dance of the Hours," Ponchielli; selection, "La Boheme," Puccini; minuet, Boccherini; intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz," Mascagni; "The Star Spangled Banner"; fantasia from "Aida," Verdi, "Dance of the Priestesses of Dagon," Saint-Saens; waltz, "The Skaters," Waldteufel; two Hungarian dances, Brahms.

From the
Globe
May 29,1917.

JACCHIA'S DEBUT AT POPS BRILLIANT

Agide Jacchia, making his debut last night at the "Pop" concerts, proved himself at once a conductor of brilliant talents and the man whom the management has sought. He has individuality, dominating yet not aggressive; his authority is instant and unquestioned; his style is that of the sensitive musician, distinctly Latin in its fervor and poignancy, yet escaping the boisterousness of too many of his compatriots, and he knows how to build a well relieved and contrasting program.

An Italian, he nevertheless conducted music from "Carmen" with an exquisite sense of its brilliant and sparkle, and gave to the fine old minuet of Boccherini its just, quaint and mellowed elegance. The "William Tell" overture, played as these concerts in no recent times have heard it, gave him an excellent opportunity in the spirited final movement, done with admirable and telling variety in nuance.

His regard for Puccini's long melodic line and vitalizing accentuation gave distinctive beauty to the excerpts from "La Boheme" and made the rarely heard intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz" a feature.

Particular interest attached to this performance, and the superb, recreating one of the well-worn intermezzo from its successor, "Cavalleria Rusticana," by reason of the fact that Jacchia was a pupil and assistant to Mascagni at the Conservatory of Pesaro, and came with him on his ill-fated tour to this country.

A conductor of constant operatic experience—in this country as chief with the Montreal and Century (New York) companies—Mr Jacchia is at home particularly in the operas of his fellow countrymen. Ponchielli's "Dance of the Hours," from "Gioconda," was to be remarked for its variety in dramatic and lyric moods, its fine rhythmic sense and wealth of color.

With this superb orchestra at his command, and with continued association, Mr Jacchia should speedily restore the "Pop" concerts to their traditional brilliance and characteristic gayety, for it is clear he does not confound their atmosphere with that of the symphony season.

From the Record
May 29,1917.

NEW OPERA CONDUCTOR LEADS POPS

Jaachia Makes Pleasing Impression at his First Concert

Italian conductors are a rare sight in Symphony Hall. One associates them rather with the opera house. Occasionally, however, some concert, some opera in concert form, draws an Italian conductor to the kuilded music cage.

Last evening an Italian conductor of the Italians, Agide Jaachia, made his Symphony Hall debut. He was appearing as conductor at the Pops concerts. He followed where Frenchmen, Germans and Americans preceeded him. He stirred things up a bit, he put the pep into Pop, he played the Dance of the Hours and the William Tell overture in the good old stvle. o effect was too broad. N

He spurned Nikisch methods of controlling an orchestra with the slightest movement of the hand or the flash of a conducting eye. He took a leaf, a very small leaf to be sure from Mr. Creatore's book, and added gymnastics to conducting. In other words, he is an Italian opera conductor.

Boston already knows Mr. Jacchia through the performances of the Boston Opera Co. He then, if memory is not tricky, lead the Puccini operas and others in Mr. Rabinoff's repertoire and impressed his auditors as a well trained man.

He has been much described in the newspapers as a great friend and pupil of Mascagni. Out of respect for his master he added the Cavalleria intermezzo last evening. The audiences like it.

On his regular program he put the intermezzo from "L'Ami Fritz," stupid music, which gets no where, which is filled with sound and fury signifying nothing. His friendship for Mascagni need not necessarily lead him to clutter his programs with the composer at his second best.

The management in engaging a fiery leader and occasional soloist is evidently making all possible attempts at getting the Pops out of anything that resembles a rut. The management made one good move last evening. It is to be hoped that attractive soloists will add to the pleasure of these delightful, and distinctly Bostonical, entertainments. J. V. C.

From the
Traveler
May 12,1917

Pops Start in on Their Sixth Week

The sixth week of the Pops in Symphony Hall which begins Monday evening will be one of the most attractive of the entire season. There will be a soloist each night except Tuesday night. This will be "Norwegian night" and instead of a soloist the Norwegian Singing Society, of which A. Sutterud is conductor, will sing a number of Norwegian songs. Moreover, there will be a considerable amount of Scandinavian music on the program.

Monday and Friday nights the soloist will be Arthur Hackett, the young American tenor. He will sing on both evenings Lohengrin's Narrative from the third act of "Lohengrin" and the exquisite air, "Ah, Moon of My Delight," from Liza Lehmann's "In a Persian Garden."

The soloist Thursday night will be Miss Mary Desmond, the English contralto who for five years was a member of the Hammerstein Opera Company.

The soloist for Wednesday and Saturday evenings will be Mario Laurenti, one of the younger baritones of the Metropolitan Opera Company. On both evenings his numbers will be the prologue to "Pagliacci" and the Patter song, "Largo al factotum" from the "Barber of Seville."

Mr. Jacchia's favor with the public continues to grow. His programs are admirable and of wide variety. In his first two weeks he played no less than 109 different pieces.

The plan announced by the management to help boom the Liberty loan by giving away a $50 bond this week and a $500 bond at the end of the season has excited much enthusiasm.

The program for tonight is:

Overture, "La Forza del Destino".....Verdi
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube".Strauss
Intermezzo, "Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
Fantasia, "Mefistofele".....Boito
Scenes Pittoresque.....Massenet
Violin Solo, "Romance".....Svendsen
Jaques Hoffmann.
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin"..Wagner
"The Star-Spangled Banner."
Overture, "Zampa".....Herold
Minuet.....Bolzoni
Selection, "Lucia di Lammermoor".....Donizetti
March, "Semper Fidelis".....Sousa

The program for Monday night is:

Arthur Hackett, soloist.
Overture, "The Sicilian Vespers".....Verdi
Waltz, "Estudiantina".....Waldteufel
a, Fascination; b, Capriccio.....H. K. Hadley
Suite, "Coppelia".....Delibes
a, Valse; b, Czardas.
Danse Boheme from "Carmen".....Bizet
Lohengrin's Narrative from "Lohengrin," Act III.....Wagner
Valse Caprice, "Tilli".....R. Nagel
Fantasia, "Faust".....Gounod
Overture, "Poet and Peasant".....Suppe
Song, "Ah, Moon of My Delight," from "In a Persian Garden".....Lehmann
Turkish Patrol.....Michaelis
March, "Boston Normal School".....Mulrey

From the Monitor
May 29,1917.

MR. JACCHIA APPEARS AS 'POP' CONDUCTOR

Agide Jacchia began his engagement as conductor of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall Monday night, presenting a program largely of Italian opera music. He took up his new task with the authority of a man who is thoroughly familiar with his scores, who knows precisely the effects he wants to secure and who can give performers the necessary indications at the right moment. The Boston Symphony men who make up the orchestra obeyed their new director implicitly, seeming to enjoy responding to his wishes. The audience, in turn, gave close attention to the playing and applauded as though it relished the interpreter's methods .

Selections in which the conductor showed to especial advantage were Ponchielli's "Dance of the Hours" and the intermezzo to Mascagni's "L'Amico Fritz." An artist who can bring out the individual color and style of the work of minor orchestral poets in their rare moments of inspiration can be trusted to handle the work of the major composers successfully. Of particular interest is the conductor's manner of phrasing, each section of his melody being joined to the one following it, and each at the same time keeping its contour. Such phrasing gives an undulatory rhythm, with wave crests and hollows and momentary nodes of equipoise. The effect is never one of mere drive and lull, of mechanical emphasis and release.

Tonight Mr. Jacchia will present a program of pieces by Nicolai, Ivanovici, Gounod, Saint-Saëns, Wagner, Bolzoni, Puccini, Chabrier, Rossini, Mascagni and Weber-Berlioz.

From the Traveler
May 29,1917.

New Leader Makes Big Hit at the Pops

A most interesting program and equally interesting conductor made last night's Pops concert easily the most successful of the season to date. It was the debut of Agide Jacchia as conductor at these concerts and that debut was highly successful. Evidently the large audience knew of the merits of the new leader for he was given an exceptionally cordial welcome and after the first number was greeted with such a burst of applause as fairly shook the roof.

There is no question of Mr. Jacchia's nationality once the music is under way. His first name might well be Agility, for he is all over the lot. But he gets results, such results as the Pops haven't developed since last fall's memorable extra season.

To night's program will be:

Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai
Waltz, "Waves of the Danube".....Ivanovici
Funeral March of Marionette.....Gounod
Selection, "Samson and Delilah".....Saint-Saens
Prelude to third act of "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Minuet.....Bolzoni
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly".....Puccini
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Overture, "La Gazza Ladra".....Rossini
Selection, "Faust".....Gounod
Intermezzo, "William Ratcliff".....Mascagni
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber-Berlioz

From the
Transcript
May 29.1917.

RECENT DEATHS

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA LIBRARIAN

Johann Sauerquell Was a Native of Austria, and a Brother in-Law of Franz Kneisel

Johann Sauerquell, for nearly thirty years the librarian of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died at his home, 4 Marbury terrace, Jamaica Plain, Monday evening, after an illness which had kept him confined to his house for most of the past year. Mr. Sauerquell, through the post which he held for so many years with the Symphony Orchestra, was one of the best known men in music in this country. He was born in Cernowitz, Bukowina, May 12, 1846. In that city he spent his boyhood and went through the University. He became an officer in the Austrian army and saw active service in the war with Prussia in 1866, winning a medal for gallantry in action. He left the army and went to Roumania, first in Jassy and then Bucharest, where he was for many years connected with the State railways, and during the Turko-Russian War of 1876-77 he was second in charge of the railway transportation of Roumania.

In 1876 Mr. Sauerquell married Marie Kneisel, who survives him, the elder sister of Franz Kneisel. He came to this country in 1888 and almost immediately became librarian of the Symphony Orchestra, which post he held up to the time of his death. When the Kneisel Quartet was formed he became its secretary, but he relinquished this position several years ago

From the
Herald
May 31,1917.

EVENING AT "POPS" ENDS B. U. PROGRAM

Symphony Hall Is Filled with University People.

An evening at "Pops" wound up Boston University's commencement festivities last night, when members and friends of the university with the graduating class in the place of honor filled the entire floor of Symphony Hall. The men's and women's glee clubs, under the leadership of Moses R. Lowell, '17, and Esther Nazarian, '17, sang the college song, "Clarissima," and several other popular student songs during intermission. Each woman of the graduating class received a model in ice cream of the university building on Boylston street.

Among those present occupying tables were President and Mrs. L. H. Murlin, Dr. William E. Huntington, ex-president of the university; Dean William M. Warren, College of Liberal Arts; Dean Everett W. Lord of the business administration, Dean J. A. Sutherland of the School of Medicine, Dr. Arthur W. Weysse, chairman of the executive committee, Graduate School; Silas Peirce, treasurer of the university; Lee C. Haskell, Edwin Holt Hughes, resident bishop of the M. E. Church; Frank W. Kimball, the Rev. Dillon Bronson, Dr. Wesley T. Lee, Dr. David W. Welles, Mrs. Everett O. Fiske, Capt. Herbert F. Hartwell, U. S. A., and L. R. Talbot, executive secretary of the university.

From the
Transcript
May 29,1917.

Agide Jacchia, Conductor.

Agide Jacchia made his first appearance in Boston as conductor of the Pops last evening at Symphony Hall. He is a pupil of Mascagni and a graduate of the Conservatory of Pesaro. He conducted operatic performances in this city as a member of the Rabinoff forces. Mr. Jacchia is a welcome addition to these concerts, for he has authority and dramatic force and discretion.

The programme contained selections from Gounod's "Queen of Sheba," Bizet's "Carmen," Rossini's "William Tell" and Mascagni's "L'Amico Fritz." An audience of good size recognized Mr. Jacchia as capable and sympathetic. The programme for this evening is:

Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai
Waltz, "Waves of the Danube".....Ivanovici
Funeral March of Marionette.....Gounod
Selection, "Samson and Delilah".....Saint-Saens
Prelude to third act of "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Minuet.....Bolzoni
Fantasia, "Madama Butterfly".....Puccini
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Overture, "La Gazza Ladra".....Rossini
Selection, "Faust".....Gounod
Intermezzo, "William Ratcliff".....Mascagni
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber-Berlioz

From the
Globe
May 31,1917.

BOSTON UNIVERSITY CLOSES ITS YEAR

Record Class Graduated in the Morning

Convocation Informed No Change Will Be Made in Schedule

Boston University's 48th annual Commencement closed last night with Boston University Night at the pop concert in Symphony Hall. Graduation exercises were held in the morning in Tremont Temple and the annual meeting of the university convocation in the College of Liberal Arts building in the afternoon. All three events were largely attended. At the graduation 90 degrees were awarded, the largest number in the history of the university.

At the concert last night a program of popular music was rendered by the orchestra, led by conductor Jacchia, including a selection from the light opera "Katinka," the "William Tell" overture, the "Nut-Cracker" suite, Sullivan's "Lost Chord," played as a trumpet solo by Mr Heim; the "1812" overture and the "Largo" of Handel. Prof John P. Marshall, head of the music department of the university, who is also organist of the Symphony Orchestra, presided at the organ.

The Men's and Women's Glee Clubs of the College of Liberal Arts, the former under the leadership of Moses R. Lowell, '17, of Millis, and the latter under the direction of Miss Esther Nazarian, '17, of Boston, led in singing "Clarissima," the university song. Other university songs were sung by the glee clubs during the intermission.

Among those who occupied tables with friends were Pres and Mrs L. H. Murlin, Ex-Pres William E. Huntington, Dean William M. Warren of the College of Liberal Arts, Dean Everett W. Lord of the College of Business Administration, Dean John P. Sutherland of the School of Medicine, Chairman Arthur W. Weysse of the executive committee of the Graduate School, Treas Silas Peirce of the university, Bishop Edwin H. Hughes, Lee C. Haskell, Frank W. Kimball, Rev Dillon Bronson, Dr Wesley T. Lee, Dr David W. Welles, Mrs Robert L. O'Brien, Mrs Everett O. Fiske, Capt Herbert F. Hartwell, U. S. A., and Executive Sec L. Raymond Talbot of the university.

Sitting in sections were the seniors with various members of the faculty of all six departments of the university. The alumni were represented by the classes of '92, '97, '02, '07 and '12.

From the
Journal
June 1,1917.

POPS BOOM LIBERTY LOAN

Beginning with tonight every person of the Pop concerts will become a candidate for the posession of a $50 bond which will be given Saturday evening, June 16, for a $500 bond which will be given at the last concert of the season.

Special numbered coupons have been printed, one to be given with every ticket sold at the box office from today until the end of the season.

C. A. Ellis, manager of the concerts, has picked out two numbers, one for the $50 bond, and one for the $500 bond. These numbers have been deposited with the State Street Trust Company, and are known only to Mr. Ellis and the State Street Trust Company. The number of the coupon calling for the $50 bond will be posted at Symphony Hall, Saturday evening, June 16, and the bond will be given to the person presenting his coupon at Mr. Ellis's office. If the actual bonds have not reached Boston by that date a temporary certificate will be given. In like manner the number of the coupon calling for the $500 bond will be posted at Symphony Hall on the closing night of the Pop season, and the bond will be given to the person presenting that coupon at the manager's office.

[123]

...uductor
...is first appear-
...ctor of the Pops
... Hall. He is a ... graduate of the
... He conducted
... this city as a
...nort forces. Mr.
...addition to these
...thority and poise,
...retion.
...mained selections
...of Sheba," Bizet's
...Mam Tell" and Mas-
... An audience of
...r. Jacchia as capa-
...the programme for
...s of Windsor" Nicolai
...nube".....Ivanovici
...tte.....Gounod
...elilah".....Saint-Saëns
...Lohengrin".....Wagner
.....Bolzoni
...erity".....Puccini
.....Chabrier
...gled Banner."
...r".....Rossini
...toile".....Gounod
.....Mascagni
.....Weber-Berlioz

1917.

VERSITY
ITS YEAR

Graduated in rning

...med No Change
In Schedule

...s 48th annual Com-
...at night with Bos-
... at the pop con-
... Hall. Graduation
... in the morning in
... the annual meet-
...convocation in the
...ts building in the
...events were large-
... graduation 349 de-
... the largest num-
... the university.
..., night a program
...s rendered by the
...ductor Jacchia, in-
...from the light opera
..."William Tell" over-
...er" suite, Sullivan's
...ed is a trumpet solo
..."1812" overture and
...nade. Prof John P.
... the music department
...who is also organist
... Orchestra, presided

...Women's Glee Clubs of
...eral Arts, the former
...d of Moses R. Lovell,
... the latter under the
... Esther Nazarian, '17,
...inging "Clarissima,"
... Other university
...ng.. by the glee clubs dur-
...on.
...occupied tables with
...and Mrs L. H. Murlin,
...E. Huntington, Dean
...ren, of the College of
...Everett W. Lord of
...siness Administration,
...etherland of the School
...hairman Arthur W.
...xecutive committee of
...ool Treas Silas Peirce
...Bishop Edwin H.
...askell, Frank W. Kim-
...ronson, Dr Westley T.
... Welles, Mrs Robert
...Everett O. Fiske, Capt
...well, U. S. A., and
... Raymond Talbot of
...
...lons were the seniors
...bers of the faculty of
...ents of the university.
...re represented by the
...'06 '07 and '12.

the et
'17

LIBERTY LOAN
...onight every patron of
...will become a candidate
...for a $50 bond which will
...evening, June 16, or a
...ill be given at the last
...on.
...e coupons have been
...ven with every ticket
...ice from today until
...on.
...ger of the concerts,
...numbers, one for the
...r the $500 bond. These
...deposited with the ... Company, and are
... Ellis and the State
...any. The number of
...for the $50 bond will
...hony Hall, Saturday
...and the bond will be
...presenting the coupon
...At the actual bonds
...Boston by that day a
...te will be given in
...umber of the coupon
...bond will be posted at
... the closing night of
...nd the bond will be
...son presenting that
...ager's office.

"POPS" CONDUCTOR TALKS OF WORK

New Leader Discusses With Olin Downes Boston Music Lovers—Praises Master Musicians

Adolph Jacchia, the present conductor of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall, was talking. An Italian, his conversation was illuminated by rapid gestures and changes of facial expression, which more than compensated for the somewhat unfinished quality of his English. A thought can be made to outdistance a syllable, especially by one of a Latin race. "I can't say that I believe in talking during the music at the Pop concerts," said Mr. Jacchia. "I don't think the majority of the audience go to these concerts so much for the sake of refreshment and conversation as for the sake of hearing music of a popular but nevertheless a high quality played by the superb orchestra which they can hear for a few cents on a summer evening. Certainly the people who sit in the balconies, and usually pack them, do not go for this sort of thing. They read the programmes in advance, pick out the ones they want to hear, and encourage us greatly by listening with all their ears. It is a deserved tribute to the orchestra. It is also a tribute to the genuine love and taste this public displays for good music.

"The orchestra is of course an orchestra that any conductor may feel happy to be called upon to lead, and I am fortunate in having as many rehearsals as are necessary for the men to understand my wishes and carry them out. This is not so simple as might be imagined, even with this body of players, who are past masters of the whole symphonic literature, and who can read at sight and probably play from memory more than one of the pieces I undertake to perform. The reason why it is not so simple is that in the first place each conductor has his own conceptions and even his technical ways; and in the second place—I am now speaking personally—I have at the request of Mr. Ellis emphasized operatic music on the programmes."

Now the conducting and the playing of operatic music is far from the playing and conducting of symphonic compositions. The musical material of some operas is much slighter than that of a classic symphony; it is commonplace, perhaps; but whatever it is, it is music of the theatre, which demands a special treatment. The composer of a symphony can write in his score quite precise indications of what he wants. The conductor who is great enough as a musician and a leader can interpret his wishes with a fair degree of accuracy. But the conductor of opera has a task which is more elusive and often less satisfactory. Theatre music is never a stable thing. The man who conducts an opera with sensitiveness and eloquence has to adapt himself to a hundred varying conditions of the moment. The singers will be certain to force minor modifications of his plans, but this is only one of the elements with which he has to reckon. The conductor of the opera, in addition to knowing his score and his text—and knowing his text at least as well as his score—has to understand the mechanical programme of a production, the effects of light on the stage, the stage business down to the smallest detail. In a word he has to interpret not merely his score but the whole opera as he proceeds. He is thinking with the soloists, the chorus, the orchestra, the stage mechanicians, electricians and what not. This reflects itself in his reading of the score. If it does not the performance is a failure. The conductor of an opera must also think for, and at, his public. His task, like the task of the composer, is to accentuate the situation on the stage in a way that will carry across the footlights. This is necessarily a first condition of his work, and it may make or mar him. He may become either a master of effects for their own sake, or a musician whose art is as theatrically effective as it is intrinsically noble and profound.

"When I conduct operatic music in Symphony Hall I try to fight as free of the traditions of the concert room as I would if I were conducting the performance of the opera in the theatre. I try to recreate at least some of the movement and climatic quality of the scenes which pass before my mind's eye; I try to make each solo instrumentalist sing his air with the warmth and freedom that would be characteristic of a great singer. I may add that one does not have to try very much with this orchestra! The players are musicians, and understand one almost before he speaks. A word or a sign, and they carry out the idea for themselves.

"But to return, I think it would be a great pity if we were to perform merely as an accompaniment for talk. In that case, I think I should not try as seriously as I do to give programmes that contain meat as well as sugar in them. We could play nothing but waltzes and marches. Mr. Ellis could hire a brass band and be done with it. I think it excellent that the public recognizes the value of this music and these performances as it does."

Mr. Jacchia liked Boston, but felt far from home. Mrs. Jacchia, who has sung more than once in Boston in opera, and his daughter live in New Jersey for the summer. Mr. Jacchia remarked with pardonable pride that his wife was not only an accomplished singer, but also a musician. The two, it may be admitted, are not necessarily synonymous. When Mr. Jacchia was conductor of the Montreal Opera Company, Mme. Ferrabini had opportunity to prove her musicianship, for she was called upon on a few hours' notice to sing—not as Mimi in "Boheme," a part for which her voice naturally equips her—but heroic roles such as Aida and Leonora. She sang both these parts without an orchestral rehearsal, parts which she had studied rather to round out her own repertoire than for the purpose of public performance.

Bostonians remember Mme. Ferrabini well, not only as the Mimi when Mr. Lafitte of the Montreal Opera Company was the Rodolpho in "La Boheme" at the Boston Opera House, but as one of the most gifted of the soloists who toured America with Ruggiero Leoncavallo and his company in the season of 1906-07. And thereby hangs a tale. "It wasn't an affair of a week or a month," said Mr. Jacchia. "Circumstances threw us together a great deal. When I conducted in Italy, Ferrabini was more often than not one of the sopranos. I came to America with Mascagni. She came over with Leoncavallo. I conducted in the East, the West, the North, the South—Ferrabini was with us. She was soprano at Montreal. After seven years of such companionship we married. It was predestined.

How did it happen that he visited America with Mascagni? "Very logically," he replied. "I was Mascagni's first pupil in composition and orchestration when he became a director of the Conservatory at Pesaro. I had the pleasure of studying 'Iris' and edited an arrangement of the score. Mascagni liked what I did. He recommended me to the Ricordis. I soon got a chance to conduct. I was one of six conductors who brought out Mascagni's 'Le Maschere' simultaneously in different Italian cities on the 17th of January, 1901. The other conductors were Mascagni in Rome, Toscanini in Milan, Mugnone in Naples, Ferrari at Turin and Vitali at Genoa. I conducted the Venice performance. When he came to America, Mascagni asked me to come with him."

It is worth while reflecting, here in America, that many Italians do not rate Mr. Giaccomo Puccini as he is rated on this side of the water. "He is a man for the theatre," said Mr. Jacchia. "He knows how to write successfully. But his operas get poorer and poorer all the time. And Leoncavallo—what has become of him?"

We asked, by way of repartee, what had become of Mascagni since the furore over "Cavalleria?" Where were his other operas? Again Mr. Jacchia corroborated the opinion of more than one of Mascagni's countrymen, that "Iris" is a greater opera than "Cavalleria."

"Why?"

"Because the music of 'Cavalleria,' vital and dramatic as it is, could be set to any plot of a similar nature, and it would be just as appropriate. A new text could easily be invented to go with it, and Mascagni's fresh and brutal inspiration would be found to fit another similar plot just as well. But you cannot separate the music from the text in 'Iris.' Every tone and every syllable coincide. The workmanship is far more expert and mature. The music, if thin in places, is finer in texture and more individual in style. I know that audiences in this country have protested against the symbolism of the plot, which appears to them incomprehensible or at least ineffective on the stage. This objection is not made much of in Italy, where the book of 'Iris' is admired. There is another thing. While almost anyone can conduct 'Cavalleria Rusticana' with a certain amount of effect, far as it may be from the utmost that the music contains, a conductor must thoroughly feel and understand the text and the music of 'Iris,'' or he will be able to make little of it. 'Cavalleria' is in a way fool-proof. This is not true of 'Iris.'

"The principal trouble with Mascagni has been, of course, his libretti, and the haste with which he too often composes. Yet the libretto of William Ratcliffe, a version of Heine's poem, is a most remarkable piece of work, for the original text minus the necessary excisions for the sake of condensation and dramatic theatrical effectiveness is used. I may add that there is much powerful music in 'William Ratcliffe.' I do not feel that Mascagni has said his last. They say that this new opera, 'Godoletta,' has had a great success in Milan. He is a genius of the people, and from the people comes an art of which the power is not easily exhausted. This spirit may yet manifest itself triumphantly, before Mascagni dies.

SIXTH WEEK OF THE POPS

The sixth week of the Pops in Symphony Hall which begins tomorrow evening, will be one of the most attractive of the entire season. The management is reverting again to the custom of having soloists and three very distinguished singers have been engaged to appear during the coming week. There will be a soloist each night except Tuesday night. This will be "Norwegian Night," and instead of a soloist the Norwegian Singing Society, of which Mr. A. Sutterud is conductor, will sing a number of Norwegian songs. Moreover, there will be a considerable amount of Scandinavian music on the programme.

On Monday and Friday nights the soloist will be Mr. Arthur Hackett, the young American tenor who had such a sensational success at the Pop Concerts last fall and during the Symphony season, won highest praise for his singing of the solo in Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, both in Boston and New York. Mr. Hackett as a singer, has "arrived," in the full sense of the word, and it is great good fortune that the management has secured him for these two appearances. He will sing on both evenings "Lohengrin's Narrative," from the third act of "Lohengrin," and the exquisite air, "Ah, Moon of My Delight" from Liza Lehmann's "In a Persian Garden."

The soloist Thursday night will be Miss Mary Desmond, the English contralto who for five years was a member of the Hammerstein Opera Company in New York. Miss Desmond has a voice of remarkable beauty and power and she is sure to be liked.

The soloist for Wednesday and Saturday evenings will be Mr. Mario Laurenti, one of the younger baritones of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York. Mr. Laurenti has been heard here only with the Metropolitan Opera Company at its last season in 1916. He is a singer of quite extraordinary quality and much is expected of him. On both evenings his numbers will be the Prologue to Leoncavallo's "Pagliacci" and the famous patter song, "Largo al Factotum," from Rossini's comic opera, "The Barber of Seville."

Mr. Jacchia's favor with the public continues to grow. His programmes are admirable and of wide variety. In his first two weeks he played no less than 109 different pieces.

The plan announced by the management to help boom the Liberty Loan by giving away a $50 bond this week and a $500 bond at the end of the season has excited much enthusiasm. The numbers of the coupons which call for these bonds were deposited last Thursday with the State Street Trust Company, and the number for the $50 bond will be announced at the concert next Saturday evening. The holder of the number will receive a temporary certificate by presenting his coupon at the manager's office Saturday evening.

The programme for Monday night is as follows:

Mr. Arthur Hackett, Soloist.

Overture, "The Sicilian Vespers".....Verdi
Waltz, "Estudiantina".....Waldteufel
a Fascination
b Capriccio.....H. K. Hadley
Suite, "Coppelia".....Delibes
a Valse. b Czardas.
Danse Boheme from "Carmen".....Bizet
Lohengrin's narrative from "Lohengrin" Act III.....Wagner
Valse Caprice, "Tilla".....R. Nagel
Fantasie, "Faust".....Gounod
Overture, "Poet and Peasant".....Suppe
Song, "Ah, Moon of My Delight" from "In a Persian Garden".....Lehmann
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Turkish patrol.....Michaelis
March, "Boston Normal School".....Mulrey

From the
Traveler
June 2,1917.

Special Nights Next Week at Pop Concerts

Boston University Celebrates Wednesday Night—"Request" Program on Thursday.

Those who have attended the Pops in Symphony Hall this week and noted the enthusiasm of the large audiences realize that the management has a "find" in Mr. Jacchia, the new conductor. He has shown himself not only to be a conductor of complete routine, but a musician of imagination, temperament and authority. The orchestra seems to have been re-vitalized under his energetic baton and certain it is that in his own particular specialty—excerpts from Italian opera—he has given performances such as have never been heard in Symphony Hall, at least at the Pop Concerts. Mr. Jacchia has learned his public rapidly and the repertoire will be constantly increased because he intends to make it broader and more inclusive than it ever has been.

Wednesday evening, June 6, Boston University will hold its annual commencement celebration. Tickets will be on sale at the hall on the evening of the concert.

Thursday night will bring the first "Request" program of the season. A large number of requests have been sent in and the program will be made up accordingly. The program for tonight is as follows:

Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai
Waltz, "Waves of the Danube".....Ivanovici
Minuet.....Boccherini
Selection, "Aida".....Verdi
Suite, "Peer Gynt, No. 1".....Grieg
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana".....Mascagni
Solo for trumpet, "Good-Bye".....Tosti
Gustav F. Heim.
Selection, "Faust".....Gounod
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber-Berlioz
Barcarole from "The Tales of Hoffmann".....Offenbach
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier
March Militaire.....Schubert

The program for Monday night is:

Overture, "Nabuco".....Verdi
Waltz, "La Barcarole".....Waldteufel
Nocturne, No. 1, Op. 9.....Chopin
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana".....Mascagni
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Gavotte from "Mignon".....Thomas
Organ solo,
Mr. Marshall.
Carnival in Paris.....Svendson
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Overture, "L'Italiana in Algeria".....Rossini
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
"On the Beautiful Blue Danube".....Strauss
March, "Stars and Stripes Forever".....Sousa

From the
Post
June 3.1917.

THE POPS

A gratifying event of the past week of Pop concerts in Symphony Hall has been the success of the new conductor, Mr. Jacchia. From the very beginning of his engagement, last Monday night, the public has taken to him. Mr. Jacchia has shown himself not only to be a conductor of experience, but a musician of temperament and authority.

In his own particular specialty—excerpts from Italian opera—he has given performances of exceptional interest.

In the coming week, Wednesday evening, June 6, Boston University will hold its annual commencement celebration. Tickets for this concert will be on sale at the hall on the evening of the concert.

Thursday night will bring the first "request" programme of the season. A large number of requests have been sent in and the programme will be made up accordingly. The programme for Monday night is as follows:

Overture, "Nabuco".....Verdi
Waltz, "La Barcarole".....Waldteufel
Nocturne, No. 1, op. 9.....Chopin
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana".....Mascagni
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Gavotte from "Mignon".....Thomas
Organ solo .....
Mr. Marshall.
"Carnival in Paris".....Svendson
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Overture, "L'Italiana in Algeria".....Rossini
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
"On the Beautiful Blue Danube".....Strauss
March, "Stars and Stripes Forever".....Sousa

From the
Journal
June 4th, 1917.

THE POPS

The most gratifying event in many a season of Pop concerts in Symphony Hall is the remarkable success of the new conductor, Mr. Jacchia. From the very beginning last Monday night, the public took to him and the response was felt immediately in the largely increased attendance. Mr. Jacchia has shown himself not only to be a conductor of complete routine, but a musician of imagination, temperament and authority. The orchestra seems to have been revitalized under his energetic baton.

In the coming week, Wednesday evening, June 6, Boston University will hold its annual commencement celebration. Tickets for this concert will be on sale at the hall on the evening of the concert.

Thursday night will bring the first "Request" program of the season. A large number of requests have been sent in and the program will be made up accordingly. The program is as follows:

Overture, "Nabuco".....Verdi
Waltz, "La Barcarole".....Waldteufel
Nocturne, No. 1, op. 9.....Chopin
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana".....Mascagni
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Gavotte from "Mignon".....Thomas
Organ solo—Mr. Marshall.
Carnival in Paris.....Svendson
"The Star-Spangled Banner."
Overture, "L'Italiana in Algeria".....Rossini
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
On the Beautiful Blue Danube.....Strauss
March, "Stars and Stripes Forever".....Sousa

From the
Globe
June 9,1917.

PATRONS OF POPS TO HAVE CHANCE AT LIBERTY BONDS

Patrons of the Pop concerts, beginning today, will each have a chance of getting a Liberty bond of the denomination of $50 or $500 for nothing, the management having arranged to give away the smaller denomination Saturday evening, June 16, and the larger one on the evening of the last concert of the season, probably early in July.

Beginning this evening every person attending a pop on a ticket purchased at the box office at Symphony Hall, whatever the price paid for it, will receive a numbered coupon, which may bear the number entitling the owner to one of the bonds.

The numbers of the two bonds have already been selected by Manager Charles H. Ellis, who is the only person who knows them save officials of the State Street Trust Company, which has the custody of them.

On Saturday evening, next week, the coupon number calling for the $50 bond will be posted at the Pop Concert, and the bond will be given to the person presenting the proper coupon at Mr Ellis' office. On the closing evening of the season the same procedure will be followed as regards the $500 bond.

From the
May 27,1917.
Herald

NEW CONDUCTOR OF POP CONCERTS REACHES BOSTON

Agide Jacchia, Close Associate of Mascagni, Is an Italian Orchestra Director Who Has Thorough Knowledge of American Conditions—In Country Several Years.

There will be a new conductor at the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall next Monday evening, May 28. He is Agide Jacchia, an Italian conductor of high standing. Mr. Jacchia has been in this country several years and is thoroughly familiar with conditions here.

He was born in Lugo, near Bologna, in 1875. In his youth he entered the Conservatory of Music in Parma and after a few years there went to the famous Conservatory of Music in Pesaro, where he became the personal pupil of Pietro Mascagni. The relations between Mr. Jacchia and Mascagni have been close since that time. He was graduated in 1898 with a gold medal for composition. He began immediately as conductor at the age of 22, his first post being in the opera at Brescia. During the next four years he conducted both in Milan and Rome.

When Mascagni came to this country in 1902 Mr. Jacchia accompanied him as his chief assistant and was with him throughout that disastrous tour. Returning to Italy he was in that country conducting in various notable opera houses until 1907; then for two seasons he conducted the Milano Opera Company in San Francisco.

In 1909 he conducted a short brilliant season of Italian opera in the Academy of Music, New York. In 1910-11-12 he was the general music director of the Montreal Opera Company. In 1913-14 he was general music director of the National Opera Company of Canada and the season of 1914-15 saw him chief Italian conductor at the Century Theatre in New York. During the last season he has been with the Boston National Opera Company.

Agide Jacchia.

He arrived in Boston yesterday morning and his programs for the first week will be announced shortly.

[124]

From the Monitor
June 2,1917.

MUSIC IN BOSTON

The management of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall is gratified at the success of the new conductor, Mr. Jacchia. The public took to him at once and the response was felt immediately in the largely increased attendance. Mr. Jacchia has shown himself not only to be a conductor of complete routine, but a musician of imagination, temperament and authority. In his own particular specialty, excerpts from Italian opera, he has given performances such as have never been heard in Symphony Hall at the Pop concerts. Mr. Jacchia has learned his public rapidly and the repertoire will be constantly increased because he intends to make it broader and more inclusive than it ever has been.

In the coming week, on the evening of Wednesday, June 6, Boston University will hold its annual commencement celebration. Tickets for this concert will be on sale at the hall on the evening of the concert.

Thursday night will bring the first "Request" program of the season. A large number of requests have been sent in and the program will be made up accordingly. The program for tonight is as follows:

Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai; waltz, "Waves of the Danube," Ivanovici; minuet, Boccherini; selection, "Aida," Verdi; suite, "Peer Gynt," No. 1, Grieg; selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni; solo for trumpet, "Good-Bye," Tosti, Mr. Gustav F. Heim; selection, "Faust," Gounod; "The Star Spangled Banner"; "Invitation to the Dance," Weber-Berlioz; barcarole from "The Tales of Hoffmann," Offenbach; rhapsody, "España," Chabrier; "March Militaire," Schubert.

The program for Monday night is as follows:

Overture, "Nabuco," Verdi; waltz. "La Barcarole," Waldteufel; nocturne, No. 1, op. 9, Chopin; selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni; suite from "Carmen," Bizet; gavotte from "Mignon," Thomas; organ solo, Mr. Marshall; "Carnival in Paris," Svendson; "The Star Spangled Banner"; overture, "L'Italiana in Algeria," Rossini; intermezzo from "Pagliacci," Leoncavallo; "On the Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss; [illegible]

From the Globe
June 12,1917.

"POPS" BEGIN FIFTH WEEK WITH MR HACKETT

The "Pops" began their fifth week at Symphony Hall last night with Mr Jacchia still an enlivening personality, both as program-maker and as conductor, and with a return to the policy of soloists. Arthur Hackett, the gifted young Boston tenor, whose appearance at the new Fall season of "Pop" concerts last September contributed in no small measure to his rapid rise thereafter, sang twice on the program—Lohengrin's narrative from the opera and "Ah, Moon of My Delight" from Liza Lehmann's cycle. "In a Persian Garden." Warmly applauded, he added songs to Mr Nagle's accompaniments at the piano, Campbell-Tipton's "Spirit Flower" and Branscombe's "Heartsease and Violets," the latter the first of a double encore.

Mr Hackett's fine voice, virile in timbre, grows more dramatic in character without impairing his possibilities in lyric song. His singing shows proportionate advance in authority and style, a discrimination in mood which did not confound the recital of Wagner's mystic knight with the familiar Lehmann melody, oriental and sensuous. Mr Hackett was appropriately intimate in his songs.

Interest in the program was hightened by music from two composers of local associations. Two short pieces by Henry Hadley were played, "Fascination" and "Capriccio," the first, making much of a melody of pleasing development given to the violins against effective counter-pont in the 'cellos, was repeated. The composer was obliged to rise in his place on the floor and bow his acknowledgments.

Rudolph Nagel, a 'cellist of the orchestra in these concerts, the accompanist for the singers, was represented by a Valse Caprice Tilla which should be heard again on these programs. A graceful imagination, a lively and discriminating sense of color, and above all a fecund and vital invention is disclosed in this charming score. Now it is of the sensuous mazes of the dance, and now in memory or in restrospection as a thing apart. There may be a tendency toward over elaboration in detail, although there are exqunsite touches, but scarcely once is the hearer permitted to grow unmindful. The composer was acclaimed and the number repeated. Fond of the celista in the serious concerts, Mr Nagle wrote and played a part for it with effect.

This is Norwegian Night. The Norwegian Singing Society, Mr A. Sutterud, conductor, will sing.

The soloists for the remainder of the week will be: Wednesday and Saturday, Mario Laurenti, baritone of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Thursday night, Mary Desmond, contralto; Friday night, Mr Hackett.

From the Advertiser
June 9,1917.

POPS HAVE PLAN TO AID "LIBERTY"

EACH PATRON BECOMES CANDIDATE FOR BONDS

Special Numbered Coupons to Be Distributed—Prizes Total $550

The nation-wide movement to boom the Liberty Loan and make the coming bond issue a huge success has reached the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall. The management has determined on a plan whereby the concerts will not only contribute directly to the Loan, but indirectly, at least, will help the propaganda very considerably.

Beginning with today every patron of the Pop concerts will become a candidate for the possession of a $50 bond, which will be given Saturday evening, June 16, or a $500 bond, which will be given at the last concert of the season.

The plan has been worked out very carefully by the management. Special numbered coupons have been printed, one to be given with every ticket sold at the box office, whether the ticket is one of admission at 25 cents, one for the balcony at 50 or 75 cents, or one for a table seat at $1. These coupons will be given with every ticket sold from today until the end of the season, and it will be worth the while of the patrons of the Pops to preserve them carefully.

C. A. Ellis, manager of the concerts, has already picked out two numbers, one for the $50 bond which will be given away Saturday evening, June 16, and one for the $500 bond which will be given away the closing night of the season. These numbers have been deposited with the State Street Trust Co. and are known only to Mr. Ellis and the trust company. The number of the coupon calling for the $50 bond will be posted at Symphony Hall, Saturday evening, June 16, and the bond will be given to the person presenting the coupon at Mr. Ellis' office. If the actual bonds have not reached Boston by that day, a temporary certificate will be given. In like manner the number of the coupon calling for the $500 bond will be posted at Symphony Hall on the closing night of the Pop season, and the bond will be given to the person presenting that coupon at the manager's office.

The plan thus outlined has received the heartiest approval of all concerned in the pushing of the sale of the bonds, particularly so that it brings additional publicity to the loan. Between 12,000 and 15,000 people attend the Pop concerts each week, and, with the growing popularity of the new conductor, Mr. Jacchia, and the playing of the world's finest orchestra—for the Pop orchestra comprises 75 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—this number is increasing each week.

From the Journal
June 9.1917.

POP CONCERTS TO HELP BOOM LOAN

Bond for $50 to Be Given June 16 and One for $500 at Season's End.

A new plan to boom the Liberty Loan was announced last night by the management of the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall. On Saturday night, June 16, a $50 bond is to be given away and a $500 bond will be given away at the closing concert of the season. Every ticket sold from now on will make its holder a possible winner of one of the bonds.

With each ticket the purchaser will receive a numbered coupon. The numbers of the two coupons which will entitle the holders to the bonds have been selected by C. A. Ellis, manager of the concerts, and these numbers have been deposited with the State Street Trust Company. Only Mr. Ellis and the bank know what the numbers are.

The plan not only assures a subscription of $550 to the loan, but it is believed that it will be of great aid by attracting additional publicity to the campaign to raise the government's fund. At least 1500 persons attend the concert each week, and the concerts are growing more popular. The orchestra includes 75 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From the Advertiser
June 16, 1917

NEW SOLOISTS TO APPEAR AT POPS

MME. FERRABINI WILL SING ON TWO NIGHTS

Conductor Jacchia Has Arranged Interesting Programs For Next Week

The past week was the largest the Pop concerts have had this season. Undoubtedly the solosits added greatly to the attractiveness of the programs.

For the coming week a very interesting set of programs has been arranged by Conductor Jacchia. Two singers new to the concerts will appear. Monday night, the soloist will be Ethel Frank, a very unusual soprano.

Miss Frank, who is a native of Boston, is a pupil of Vanuccini of Florence. She made her public debut at a recital in Jordan Hall last fall with much success. She is the possessor of a lyric voice of coloratura quality.

The soloist Wednesday and Friday nights will be Mme. Esther Ferrabini, a distinguished Italian soprano. As a young girl she came to this country in 1906 with the Leoncavallo Concert company and was the one bright spot of that strange aggregation of singers and players. For five years she was the principal lyric soprano of the Montreal Opera company. Her appearance as "guest" at the Boston Opera Company during its fourth season, when she sang Mimi in "La Boheme," is gratefully remembered. Incidentally Mme. Ferrabini is the wife of Conductor Jacchia.

Arthur Hackett, who is today the foremost American tenor, will be soloist on Tuesday and Saturday evenings. On Thursday evening Mario Laurenti, the baritone of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who made such a profound sensation the past week, will be the soloist. The program for tonight is as follows:—

Overture, "Mignon".....Thomas
Waltz, "Espana".....Waldteufel
Harp Solo, "In Springtime".....Holy
(Mr. Alfred Holy)
Selection, "La Boheme".....Puccini
Marche Slave.....Tschaikowsky
Cavatina from "Faust".....Gounod
Mario Laurenti
Overture, "Tannhauser".....Wagner
THE STAR SPANGLED BANNER
Fantasia, "Othello".....Verdi
Torcador's Song from "Carmen".....Bizet
Mario Laurenti
Intermezzo, Act III., "The Jewels of the Madonna".....Wolf-Ferrari
Hungarian Dance in G minor.....Brahams

From the Herald
June 3,1917.

THE POPS

The most gratifying event in many a season of Pop concerts in Symphony Hall is the success of the new conductor, Mr. Jacchia. From last Monday night the public took to him and the response was felt immediately in the largely increased attendance. Mr. Jacchia has shown himself a conductor of complete routine and a musician of imagination, temperament and authority. The orchestra seems to have been re-vitalized under his energetic baton. In his own particular specialty—excerpts from Italian opera—he has given performances such as have never been heard in Symphony Hall, at least at the Pop concerts. Mr. Jacchia's repertoire will be constantly increased.

On next Wednesday evening, June 6, Boston University will hold its annual commencement celebration. Tickets for this concert will be on sale at the hall on the evening of the concert.

Thursday night will bring the first "request" program of the season. A large number of requests have been sent in and the program will be made up accordingly. The program for tomorrow is as follows:

Overture, "Nabuco".....Verdi
Waltz, "La Barcarole".....Waldteufel
Nocturne, No. 1, Op. 9.....Chopin
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana".....Mascagni
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Gavotte from "Mignon".....Thomas
Organ solo,
Mr. Marshall.
Carnival in Paris.....Svendson
"The Star-Spangled Banner."
Overture, "L'Italiana in Algeria".....Rossini
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
"On the Beautiful Blue Danube".....Strauss
March, "Stars and Stripes Forever".....Sousa

From the Herald
June 3,1917.

SYMPHONY SUBSCRIPTIONS MUST BE RENEWED BY JUNE 1

Those Who Do Not Act on or Before Next Friday Will Lose Their Seats—Prospects Bright.

Subscribers of last season of the Symphony concerts who have not done so have only until next Friday, June 1, in which to renew their subscription and retain the seats they held last winter. Of these there are only a comparative few, for the renewals which have been coming in since April I have been larger than the management had counted on. Only a small percentage of last season's subscribers have so far failed to renew for the coming season and there is already a considerable list of applicants whose orders will be filled after June 1.

The prospect for the Symphony orchestra next year is most encouraging from every point of view. Already the subscription in Boston, as large as for last season, is practically assured and the chances are that by next fall the number of seats taken will even be larger. It will be remembered that every seat for the Friday afternoon concerts was taken last season and only a comparatively few seats were unsold for the season for the Saturday night concerts.

What is true in Boston is true in all the other cities where the orchestra gives a series of subscription concerts. The two series of five concerts to be given in New York are already sold out and the same is true in Brooklyn, while undoubtedly a like condition will exist in Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. The policy of the management in ignoring the many silly stories printed during last spring about the disbandment of the orchestra has won warm praise from the patrons in all the cities the orchestra visits. There has never been the least scintilla of truth in any of these stories.

It should be impressed upon the subscribers of the Boston concerts who have not yet renewed their subscriptions for the coming season that unless this is done by next Friday, June 1, they will lose their seats, as their failure to subscribe by that date throws the seats automatically over to the management to dispose of to others.

THE POPS

Much is expected of Agide Jacchia, the Italian conducter who makes his debut at the Pops tomorrow evening. Mr. Jacchia is a man of more than usual pleasing personality. Facially he bears a strong resemblance to Pasquale Amato, but he is taller and more slender. Such work as Mr. Jacchia is undertaking now at the Pops is in a measure new to him as the greater part of his career has been devoted to opera, but experience has long since shown that a man with a sound training in the theatre is better skilled for any task put before him than a man whose experience has been limited to concert halls.

For a number of years Mr. Jacchia was closely associated with Mascagni, whose pupil he was, and he helped the composer when the latter was working on his opera "Iris." Mr. Jacchia is a graduate of the famous Conservatory of Music of Pesaro which preserves the best traditions of Rossini.

The new conductor's opening program is attractive. He draws for half of his numbers from the rich stores of Italian opera. The familiar overture to "William Tell" is on the program and this will be played, possibly for the first time in Boston, strictly according to the Rossini traditions of Pesaro. Another piece of unusual interest is the dramatic intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz."

March from "The Queen of Sheba".....Gounod
Selection, "Carmen".....Bizet
Waltz, "Espana".....Waldteufel
Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini
Dance of the Hours.....Ponchielli
Selection, "La Boheme".....Puccini
Minuet.....Boccherini
Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz".....Mascagni
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Fantasia from "Aida".....Verdi
Dance of the Priestesses of Dagon..Saint-Saens
Waltz, "The Skaters".....Waldteufel
Two Hungarian Dances, D major, G minor.

From the Globe
June 14,1917

Soloists at All Symphony Hall "Pops" This Week

The past week was the largest that the "Pop" concerts have had this season. Undoubtedly the soloists who have appeared have added greatly to the attractiveness of the program, and it may be taken practically for granted that henceforth soloists will be a feature at the "Pop" concerts.

Conductor Jacchia's programs this week include two soloists new to these concerts. Tomorrow evening the soloist will be Ethel Frank, who is a native of Boston and is a pupil of Vanuccini of Florence. She made her public debut at a recital in Jordan Hall last Fall with much success. She is the possessor of a lyric voice of coloratura quality.

The soloist Wednesday and Friday nights will be Esther Ferrabini, a distinguished Italian soprano. Ferrabini, as a young girl, came to this country in 1906 with the Leoncavallo Concert Company and was the one bright spot of that strange aggregation of singers and players.

For five years she was the principal lyric soprano of the Montreal Opera Company and her appearance as "guest"

From the American
June 3,1917.

THE influence upon a body of musicians of a powerful, fiery and dominating personality is being remarkably demonstrated every night at the Pops.

Agide Jacchia, the new conductor, has invigorated and inspired the jaded and weary musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra so that they are playing with all the enthusiasm that they would bring to a Strauss tone poem in midseason.

It is an experience to sit in Symphony Hall and hear Jacchia play "Boheme" or "Butterfly," and when you have enjoyed it once you quickly repeat it.

I am an inveterate "Popite." With much regret I heard at several concerts during the first fortnight, careless and perfunctory performances. It was natural for the players to feel that, the Symphony season being over, they should take things as easy as possible, but it was unfair to the audiences that they should give them anything but their finest. Conductor Maquarre, an excellent symphonist, did his best, but got scant attention from his band, and he himself was very uncertain of the operatic routine.

Jacchia isn't the greatest conductor in the world, but he has had twenty years' experience in opera, and he knows all there is to know about that facade of the musical structure.

Years of struggling with hastily assembled orchestras and beating into their souls the meaning of Puccini and Verdi and Mascagni have given him authority and ability to enforce discipline.

It was an easy matter for Jacchia to bring the Boston Symphony players who compose the Pops orchestra up to form. All they needed was a firm hand and a conductor who could make his desires clearly understood. The players themselves have no superiors in the world individually and collectively and all they had to be shown was that these concerts are serious business.

I don't know how Jacchia would play Bruckner or Brahms, possibly the way Maquarre conducts Puccini, but he certainly does love and appreciate the music of the opera. Probably the marvelous tone of the Pops Orchestra inspires him also. Anyway it is pure undiluted delight to hear what he does with the orchestra in Puccini or Mascagni or Verdi numbers.

In perusing half a dozen Jacchia programs, I find that he is neglectful of English and American light opera music, possibly because he hasn't yet appreciated just what the spirit of these concerts is intended to be. Not a single work by an English or American composer appears on any of these bills except the Pomp and Circumstance March of Elgar.

Let me suggest Mr. Jacchia that you give us one or two of the following at each concert, Mikado, Iolanthe, Gondoliers, Pinafore, Pirates of Penzance, Bohemian Girl, Robin Hood, Serenade, Singing Girl, Maid Marion, Eileen, Billie Taylor, Red Mill, Mlle. Modiste, Fortune Teller, The Only Girl, High Jinks, Firefly, Naughty Marietta, Princess Pat, the marches of Sousa and similar light and gay pieces which will introduce a touch of frivolity to your programs.

THE POPS

Ethel Frank, the young Boston soprano, who made her first appearance at the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall last night, had a success and established herself as a favorite with the audience.

Tonight Arthur Hackett will again be the soloist, his third appearance this season. He will sing "Cielo e mare" from "La Gioconda" and Rudolf's narrative from "La Boheme." The program for tonight is as follows:

Overture, "Norma".....Bellini
Waltzes from "Der Rosencavalier".....R. Strauss
"Letter of Manon".....Gilet
Fantasia, "Un Ballo in Maschera".....Verdi
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
(a) Chanson der Toreador. (b) La Garde Montante. (c) Danse Boheme.
Aria, "Cielo e mare" from "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli
(Mr. Hackett.)
"Carnival in Paris".....Svendson
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Selection, "The Fortune Teller".....Herbert
Rudolf's Narrative, "Che gelida manina" from "La Boheme".....Puccini
(Mr. Hackett.)
Coronation March.....Meyerbeer

[125]

From the Post June 0,1917.

Etiquette at the Pops

Conversation While the Orchestra Plays and Its Attendant Joys---The Russian Ballet at Buenos Ayres---A Boston Family of Tenors---Music of Other Days

One more—why the awed silence at the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall while the orchestra plays? Was it ever intended or desired that people should sit through jingling tunes from a current operetta or a waltz by Strauss as bashfully as if it were the ninth symphony of Beethoven? What is the object of a Pop concert? We had always presumed that it was an occasion for entertaining music, refreshment and conversation. But people who would never go near one of the subscription concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the winter, turn and stare with all the authority of the musically scrupulous when their neighbors at an adjoining table indulge in chatter while the orchestra is playing.

Such occasions and such ceremony go very poorly together, and tend to give the Pop concerts the very air of ceremony and formality that none, least of all the management, desires to see there. This is partly the fault of certain of the conductors. On the grounds, doubtless, that they are serious and admirable musicians, they rap the stick for silence on the part of the audience when the orchestra plays, and rap several times until the talk has died down before they begin. The answer to these excellent gentlemen is simply this: that the Pop concerts are informal occasions of which the music is only one integral part, and that if they consider it beneath their dignity to conduct on such occasions they have only to resign the task. A man has a perfect right to choose his own path, but no right, in this case, to impose his particular problems on his hearers. We are very fond of serious music of all kinds. We also like a good time. We do not go to the Pop concerts to be instructed in Brahms and Beethoven, but to listen when a piece of music pleases us, and talk when talk pleases us more than the music, sip a glass of something good and invite our friends to do the same. A little more informality would add to and not detract from the pleasure of these concerts.

FOURTH WEEK OF THE POPS OPENS WITH NEW LEADER

Much is expected of Agide Jacchia, the Italian conductor, who makes his debut at the Pops Monday evening. Mr. Jacchia is a man of more than usual pleasing personality. Facially he bears a strong resmblance to Pasquale Amato, but he is taller and more slender.

Such work as Mr. Jacchia is undertaking now at the Pops is in a measure new to him, as the greater part of his career has been devoted to opera, but experience has long since shown that a man with a sound training in the theatre is better skilled for any task put before him than a man whose experience has been limited to concert halls.

For a number of years Mr. Jacchia was closely associated with Mascagni, whose pupil he was, and he gave great help to the composer when the latter was working on his opera, "Iris." Moreover, Mr. Jacchia is a graduate of the famous Conservatory of Music of Pesaro, which preserves so carefully the best traditions of Rossini.

The new conductor's opening programme is most attractive. He draws for half of his numbers from the rich stores of Italian opera. With the splendid orchestra with which he has to work, some very stirring performances of this stirring music may be looked for. It is interesting to note that the familiar overture to "William Tell" is on the programme, and this will be played, possibly for the first time in Boston, strictly according to the Rossini traditions of Pesaro. Another piece of unusual interest is the very dramatic and thrilling intermezzo from Mascagni's opera, "L'Amico Fritz."

The programme for Monday night follows:

March from "The Queen of Sheba"..Gounod
Selection, "Carmen" .....Bizet
Waltz, "Espana" .....Waldteufel
Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini
Dance of the Hours.....Ponchielli
Selection, "La Boheme" .....Puccini
Minuet .....Boccherini
Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz"..Mascagni

"THE STAR SPANGLED BANNER"

Fantasia from "Aida" .....Verdi
Dance of the priestesses of Dagon..Saint-Saens
Waltz, "The Skaters" .....Waldteufel
Two Hungarian Dances (D major) (G Minor) .....Brahms

From the Globe June 3,1917.

JACCHIA REVIVES INTEREST IN THE 'POPS'

Intelligent and Inspiriting Conductor

Agide Jacchia, the admirable Italian conductor, who has gone far this past week to revive the moribund "Pop" concerts, is no less engaging and stimulating in conversation than on the stand before his orchestra in music from his long familiar Italian operas. There is the same nervous, resonant personality, liberating in voice, body and manner an unceasing dynamic energy and revealing within all an individuality which engages, persuades or quietly commands.

Seated in the library of music at Symphony Hall for the "Pop" concerts, Mr Jacchia talked informingly, pleasurably, not as a lecturer, but as a well-graced conversationalist, drawing upon an experience peculiarly rich for a man still early in the forties. His career has been spent almost entirely in opera. For 17 years he has been identified with an opera house or company. Conducting operatic scores in their entirety, in their due sequence of acts, Mr Jacchia finds the use of operatic medleys known as "selections" with an excerpt chosen here and there as somewhat curious. But he shows great enthusiasm in his association with so complete a membership of the Symphony Orchestra as is the large body of players this season, and is holding frequent rehearsals in the preparation of his programs.

Recalling his own early schooling for his profession, Mr Jacchia was warm in his praise of the Conservatory of Parma, which he entered at 10. "No, there was not its equal in Italy at that time—not in Rome, in Milan, Florence or Naples. Not a pupil was admitted after he was 11, for to begin study early is as necessary for the young musician as for the dancer. And if after one year a pupil did not show some particular promise in musical sense, gift of expression, feeling for rhythm he was dismissed. It was not enough merely 'to play scales'—and the speaker made a characteristic gesture repressive of a facility which was only to be a part of student's equipment.

If the young Italian geniuses of the province of Ravenna failed to find appropriate development, it was not through its high cost of instruction. Under the patronage of Maria Luisa, 32 free scholarships were provided, and to those from whom payment was required was given their tuition, use of instruments, books, together with food and even articles of clothing—all for 40 cents a day.

The courses were thorough and broadly chosen. Piano and solfeggio, or the skilled practice in reading music, were required from all for three years. A diploma in any instrumental or theoretical course required the study of either the violin or cello, so that composition for orchestra or conducting would benefit by the knowledge of them, even though the student had no ambition to become a soloist. Then there were requirements in the organ in Latin, French, harmony and counterpoint.

Mr Jacchia remembers fondly his master, Mascagni, and spoke gratefully of the recent news of the success of his new opera, "Lodoletta," founded upon Ouida's story, "Two Little Wooden Shoes."

"I was a pupil of Mascagni at Pesaro when he was composing 'Iris.' He was always friendly with his boys and would play each morning what he had written the night before. So I learned page by page the opera as it grew."

As Jacchia interprets it, Mascagni's music loses the banal quality which the commonplace conductor gives it. Speaking of the hackneyed Intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mr Jacchia sang it, with the vocalism of a conductor rather than of a singer, but with such a sense of its poignant accent and burning melodic line that one having heard it the evening before would have felt the flaming intensity which he reads into it of it. To him the intermezzo of "L'Amico Fritz" is a dramatic treatment of the melody already played by the gypsy violinist earlier in the opera.

The new conductor is more than a player of notes. While conductor of the Montreal Opera Company he was virtually director of all elements of the performance. For him the stage action has to be a thing of dramatic verity, even in illusion. He finds no sympathy, for example, with such stage business as mistakes the bells in the early dawn of the Winter morning in the third act of "La Boheme" for school bells and sends boys with books and many pranks through the gate to enliven the scene.

A friend of Sem Benelli, the author of the original drama, revised into a libretto for the opera, "The Love of the Three Kings," to Montemezzi's music. Mr Jacchia, considers the opera generally intelligible only as one understands its symbolism, an allegorical representation of the progress of society from the barbarian, loving out of greed for power, even brutality, personified by the towering old blind King, Archibaldo, through his son, Manfredo, necessarily a hybrid character, combining the old and the new, to the man of poetic impulse and chivalrous ardor, Avito, the chosen lover of Fiora, in whom the author sees the spirit of Italy.

Asked whether or not he believed his countrymen would return to florid or decorative composition in opera, Mr Jacchia replied: "There are not the voices for such music, at least not generally. Now too often the voices declaim and the orchestra sings, for there are few singers who are willing to study a role bar by bar for the complete expression of every note."

From the American June 11, 1917

ARTHUR HACKETT PLEASES POP CONCERT AUDIENCE

Young Tenor Sings in German with Great Beauty of Tone and Emotional Eloquence.

Another week of the Pops, directed by Agide Jacchia, began last evening at Symphony Hall. There is now complete accord between the Italian conductor and the members of the orchestra, while his musicianly qualities and energetic readings add greatly to the pleasure of the concerts.

The program was attractive. Verdi's overture, "The Sicilian Vespers"; Waldteufel's waltz, "Estudiantina"; Suppe's overture, "Poet and Peasant," were among the numbers. Mr. Hadley's Fascination and Capriccio, pretty pieces, pleased the audience and the second was repeated. Mr. Nagel's valse caprice "Tilla," skilfully orchestrated, was effective and displayed imagination. This, too, was repeated while both he and Mr. Hadley acknowledged the applause for their compositions.

The feature of the evening, however, was the appearance of Arthur Hackett. This young tenor's singing was greatly admired earlier in the season when he was the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Liszt's "Faust" Symphony. Last evening he sang Lohengrin's Narrative from the third act of Wagner's opera. Perhaps he wished to provide those who praise the efficiency of Americans in German opera with another effective argument. He sang in German, with great beauty of tone, admirable phrasing, emotional eloquence. Later he sang Liza Lehmann's "Ah, Morn of My Delight," and, recalled, added to the program. Mr. Hackett is unusually gifted. His voice alone gives great pleasure, and he has mastered the art of singing simple songs effectively without undue sentimentality.

The program for tonight, "Norwegian Night," will be as follows:

Overture, "Light Cavalry".....Suppe
Waltz, "Dream of Love".....Fahrbach
Selection, "Rigoletto".....Verdi
Male Choruses:
(a) Internationalen.....Degeyter
(Arr. Bjorne Gjartstrom)
(b) Naar Fjordene blaaner..Alfr. Paulsen
(Norwegian Singing Society, A. Sutterud, Conductor)
Suite, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
(a) Morning Mood
(b) Aase's Death
(c) Anitra's Dance,
(d) In the Hall of the Mountain King.
Saeterjentens Sondag.....Ole Bull
Norwegian Folk-Song.....Borch
Male Choruses:
(a) Brudefarten i Hardanger (Bridal Procession) .....H. Kjerulf
(b) Hjemover fra Dangrais.....
Kr. Wendelborg
(Norwegian Singing Society, A. Sutterud, Conductor)
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Two Norwegian dances.....Grieg
Reve Angelique.....Rubinstein
Selection, "Eileen".....Herbert
Bojornes Indtogsmarsch.....Halvorsen

From the Herald June 17, 1917

THIS WEEK AT THE POPS

The past week was the largest that the Pop concerts have had this season. Unloubtedly the soloists who have appeared have added greatly to the attractiveness of the programs. Soloists will henceforth be a feature at the Pop concerts.

This week, the seventh, interesting programs have been arranged by Conductor Jacchia. Two singers new to the concerts will appear. Tomorrow night, June 18, the soloist will be Ethel Frank, a soprano of this city. Miss Frank, a native of Boston, is a pupil of Vanuccini of Florence. She gave a recital in Jordan Hall last fall with much success. The soloist Wednesday and Friday nights will be Mme. Esther Ferrabini, a distinguished Italian soprano. Mme. Ferrabini, as a young girl, came to this country in 1906 with the Leoncavallo concert company and was the one bright spot of that strange aggregation of singers and players. For five years she was the principal lyric soprano of the Montreal opera company and her appearance as "guest" at the Boston opera company in its fourth season when she sang Mimi in "La Boheme," is gratefully remembered. Incidentally she is the wife of Conductor Jacchia. Arthur Hackett, tenor, who has a wide public, will again be soloist the coming week Tuesday and Saturday evenings, while on Thursday evening Mario Laurenti, baritone of the Metropolitan opera company, will be the soloist. The program for tomorrow night is as follows:

Overture, "La Forza del Destino".....Verdi
Waltz, "Tres Jolie".....Waldteufel
"Song Without Words".....Tschaikowsky
Selection, "Tosca".....Puccini
Prelude, "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Aria, "Un bel di vedremo," from "Madama Butterfly" .....Puccini
Ethel Frank.
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier
"The Star-Spangled Banner."
"Egyptian Impressions".....Bainbridge Crist
Aria, "Shadow Dance," from "Dinorah" .....Meyerbeer
Ethel Frank.
Intermezzo from "William Ratcliff"..Mascagni
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" .....Saint-Saens

From the Monitor June 9, 1917

MUSIC IN BOSTON

The sixth week of the Pops in Symphony Hall, which begins Monday evening, June 11, will signal a reversion to the custom of having soloists, and three singers have been engaged to appear during the coming week. There will be a soloist each night except Tuesday night. This will be Norwegian night and instead of a soloist the Norwegian Singing Society, of which A. Sutterud is conductor, will sing a number of Norwegian songs. Moreover, there will be a considerable amount of Scandinavian music on the program.

On Monday and Friday nights the soloist will be Arthur Hackett, the young American tenor who had such a success at the Pop concerts last fall, and during the Symphony season won highest praise for his singing of the solo in Liszt's "Faust" symphony, both in Boston and New York. He will sing on both evenings Lohengrin's narrative from the third act of "Lohengrin" and the exquisite air, "Ah, Moon of My Delight" from Liza Lehmann's "In a Persian Garden."

The soloist Thursday night will be Miss Mary Desmond, the English contralto who for five years was a member of the Hammerstein Opera Company in New York. Miss Desmond has a voice of remarkable beauty and power.

The soloist for Wednesday and Saturday evenings will be Mario Laurenti, one of the younger baritones of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York. Mr. Laurenti has been heard here only with the Metropolitan Opera Company at its last season in 1916. On both evenings his numbers will be the prologue to Leoncavallo's "Pagliacci" and the famous Patter song, "Largo al factotum" from Rossini's comic opera, "The Barber of Seville."

Mr. Jacchia's favor with the public continues to grow. His programs are admirable and of wide variety. In his first two weeks he played no less than 109 different pieces.

The plan announced by the management to help boom the Liberty Loan by giving away a $50 bond this week and a $500 bond at the end of the season has excited much enthusiasm. The numbers of the coupons which call for these bonds were deposited last Thursday with the State Street Trust Company and the number for the $50 bond will be announced at the concert next Saturday evening. The holder of the number will receive a temporary certificate by presenting his coupon at the manager's office Saturday evening. The program for tonight is as follows:

Overture, "La Forza del Destino," Verdi; waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss; intermezzo, "Pagliacci," Leoncavallo; fantasia, "Mefistofele," Boïto; "Scènes Pittoresque," Massenet; violin solo, "Romance" (Jacques Hoffmann), Svendsen; scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin," Wagner; "The Star-Spangled Banner"; overture, "Zampa," Herold; minuet, Bolzoni; selection, "Lucia di Lammermoor," Donizetti; march, "Semper Fidelis," Sousa.

The program for Monday night is as follows:

Overture, "The Sicilian Vespers," Verdi; waltz, "Estudiantina," Waldteufel; "Fascination" and "Capriccio," H. K. Hadley; suite, "Coppelia," Delibes; danse Bohême from "Carmen," Bizet; Lohengrin's narrative from "Lohengrin," Act III, Wagner; valse caprice, "Tilla," R. Nagel; fantasia, "Faust," Gounod; overture, "Poet and Peasant," Suppé; song, "Ah, Moon of My Delight," from "In a Persian Garden," Lehmann; "Turkish Patrol," Michaelis; march, "Boston Normal School," Mulrey. Arthur Hackett, soloist.

From the Globe June 18, 1917

MISS FRANK, SOPRANO, IN DEBUT AT "POP" CONCERTS

Miss Ethel Frank of this city made her first appearance as soloist at the "Pop" concerts last night. She was warmly received by the large audience and added a double encore to both of her program appearances—two arias, the first, "Un bel di," from "Mme Butterfly," and the second, the "Voi che sapete," from "Figaro's Marriage," which latter was announced to be sung in place of the "Shadow" song from Meyerbeer's "Dinorah."

In music, more particularly of a fine or sustained line, such as that of Mozart and even of the sensuous melody from Rimsky-Korsakow's "Sadko," Miss Frank used her voice, lyric in character, and of pure, fresh quality, with musicianship, taste and intelligence. Her singing with piano to Mr Nagel's accompaniments show the more intimate qualities of her style.

Bainbridge Crist was present and acknowledged the applause for his suite, "Egyptian Impressions," first played here a year ago. Mr Hackett will be soloist tonight in arias from "Gioconda" and "Boheme."

From the American June 17, 1917

ETHEL FRANK "THE POPS"

Ethel Frank, lyric soprano soloist at the Pops, Monday, June 18.

ETHEL FRANK, Boston girl who will sing at the Pops the coming week.

Program for Week at the Pops

The past week was the largest that the Pop Concerts have had this season. Undoubtedly the soloists who have appeared have added greatly to the attractiveness of the programs and all of the soloists have achieved remarkable success. It may be taken practically for granted that henceforth solonsts will be a feature at the Pop Concerts.

For the coming week, which is the seventh, a very interesting set of programs has been arranged by Conductor Jacchia and two singers new to the concerts will appear. Tomorrow (Monday) night, June 18, the soloist will be Ethel Frank, a very unusual soprano of this city. Miss Frank, who is a native of Boston, is a pupil of Vanuccini of Florence. She made her public debut at a recital in Jordan Hall last Fall with much success. She is the possessor of a lyric voice of coloratura quality.

From the
Post
June 9,1917.

Etiquette at the Pops

Conversation While the Orchestra Plays and Its Attendant Joys---The Russian Ballet at Buenos Ayres---A Boston Family of Tenors---Music of Other Days

One more—why the awed silence at the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall while the orchestra plays? Was it ever intended or desired that people should sit through jingling tunes from a current operetta or a waltz by Strauss as bashfully as if it were the ninth symphony of Beethoven? What is the object of a Pop concert? We had always presumed that it was an occasion for entertaining music, refreshment and conversation. But people who would never go near one of the subscription concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the winter, turn and stare with all the authority of the musically scrupulous when their neighbors at an adjoining table indulge in chatter while the orchestra is playing.

Such occasions and such ceremony go very poorly together, and tend to give the Pop concerts the very air of ceremony and formality that none, least of all the management, desires to see there. This is partly the fault of certain of the conductors. On the grounds, doubtless, that they are serious and admirable musicians, they rap the stick for silence on the part of the audience when the orchestra plays, and rap several times until the talk has died down before they begin. The answer to these excellent gentlemen is simply this: that the Pop concerts are informal occasions of which the music is only one integral part, and that if they consider it beneath their dignity to conduct on such occasions they have only to resign the task. A man has a perfect right to choose his own path, but no right, in this case, to impose his particular problems on his hearers. We are very fond of serious music of all kinds. We also like a good time. We do not go to the Pop concerts to be instructed in Brahms and Beethoven, but to listen when a piece of music pleases us, and talk when talk pleases us more than the music, sip a glass of something good and invite our friends to do the same. A little more informality would add to and not detract from the pleasure of these concerts.

FOURTH WEEK OF THE POPS OPENS WITH NEW LEADER

Much is expected of Agide Jacchia, the Italian conductor, who makes his debut at the Pops Monday evening. Mr. Jacchia is a man of more than usual pleasing personality. Facially he bears a strong resmblance to Pasquale Amato, but he is taller and more slender.

Such work as Mr. Jacchia is undertaking now at the Pops is in a measure new to him, as the greater part of his career has been devoted to opera, but experience has long since shown that a man with a sound training in the theatre is better skilled for any task put before him than a man whose experience has been limited to concert halls.

For a number of years Mr. Jacchia was closely associated with Mascagni, whose pupil he was, and he gave great help to the composer when the latter was working on his opera, "Iris." Moreover, Mr. Jacchia is a graduate of the famous Conservatory of Music of Pesaro, which preserves so carefully the best traditions of Rossini.

The new conductor's opening programme is most attractive. He draws for half of his numbers from the rich stores of Italian opera. With the splendid orchestra with which he has to work, some very stirring performances of this stirring music may be looked for. It is interesting to note that the familiar overture to "William Tell" is on the programme, and this will be played, possibly for the first time in Boston, strictly according to the Rossini traditions of Pesaro. Another piece of unusual interest is the very dramatic and thrilling intermezzo from Mascagni's opera, "L'Amico Fritz."

The programme for Monday night follows:

March from "The Queen of Sheba"..Gou
Selection, "Carmen" ..... P
Waltz, "Espana" ..... Wald
Overture, "William Tell" ..... D
Dance of the Hours ..... P
Selection, "La Boheme" ..... Re
Minuet ..... abl
Intermezzo from "L'Amico Fritz" ..... wit
"THE STAR SPANGLED B ..... hom
Fantasia from "Aida" ..... The Dance of the priestesses of Dag ..... erou
Waltz, "The Skaters" ..... ladie
Two Hungarian Dances (D ..... will Minor) ..... will b

From the
Globe
June 3,1917.

JACCHIA REVIVES INTEREST IN THE 'POPS'

Intelligent and Inspiriting Conductor

Agide Jacchia, the admirable Italian conductor, who has gone far this past week to revive the moribund "Pop" concerts, is no less engaging and stimulating in conversation than on the stand before his orchestra in music from his long familiar Italian operas. There is the same nervous, resonant personality, liberating in voice, body and manner an unceasing dynamic energy and revealing within all an individuality which engages, persuades or quietly commands.

Seated in the library of music at Symphony Hall for the "Pop" concerts, Mr Jacchia talked informingly, pleasurably, not as a lecturer, but as a well-graced conversationalist, drawing upon an experience peculiarly rich for a man still early in the forties. His career has been spent almost entirely in opera. For 17 years he has been identified with an opera house or company. Conducting operatic scores in their entirety, in their due sequence of acts, Mr Jacchia finds the use of operatic medleys known as "selections" with an excerpt chosen here and there as somewhat curious. But he shows great enthusiasm in his association with so complete a membership of the Symphony Orchestra as is the large body of players this season, and is holding frequent rehearsals in the preparation of his programs.

Recalling his own early schooling for his profession, Mr Jacchia was warm in his praise of the Conservatory of Parma, which he entered at 10. "No, there was not its equal in Italy at that time—not in Rome, in Milan, Florence or Naples. Not a pupil was admitted after he was 11, for to begin study early is as necessary for the young musician as for the dancer. And if after one year a pupil did not show some particular promise in musical sense, gift of expression, feeling for rhythm he was dismissed. It was not enough merely 'to play scales'"—and the speaker made a characteristic gesture repressive of a facility which was only to be a part of student's equipment.

If the young Italian geniuses of the province of Ravenna failed to find appropriate development, it was not through its high cost of instruction. Under the patronage of Maria Luisa, 32 free scholarships were provided, and to those from whom payment was required was given their tuition, use of instruments, books, together with food and even articles of clothing—all for 40 cents a day.

The courses were thorough and broadly chosen. Piano and solfeggio, or the skilled practice in reading music, were required from all for three years. A diploma in any instrumental or theoretical course required the study of either the violin or cello, so that composition for orchestra or conducting would benefit by the knowledge of them, even though the student had no ambition to become a soloist. Then there were requirements in the organ in Latin, French, harmony and counterpoint.

Mr Jacchia remembers fondly his master, Mascagni, and spoke gratefully of the recent news of the success of his new opera, "Lodoletta," founded upon Ouida's story, "Two Little Wooden Shoes."

"I was a pupil of Mascagni at Pesaro when he was composing 'Iris.' He was always friendly with his boys and would play each morning what he had written the night before. So I learned page by page the opera as it grew."

As Jacchia interprets it, Mascagni's music loses the banal quality which the commonplace conductor gives it. Speaking of the hackneyed Intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mr Jacchia sang it, with the vocalism of a conductor rather than of a singer, but with such a sense of its poignant accent and burning melodic line that one having heard it the evening before would have felt the flaming intensity which he reads out of it. To him the intermezzo of 'L'Amico Fritz" is a dramatic treatment of the melody already played by the gypsy violinist earlier in the opera.

The new conductor is more than a player of notes. While conductor of the Montreal Opera Company he was virtually director of all elements of the performance. For him the stage action is to be a thing of dramatic verity, even in illusion. He finds no sympathy, for example, with such stage business as mistakes the bells in the early dawn of the Winter morning in the third act of "La Boheme" for school bells and sends boys with books and many pranks through the gate to enliven the scene.

A friend of Sem Benelli, the author of the original drama, revised into a libretto for the opera, "The Love of the Three Kings," to Montemezzi's music. Mr Jacchia, considers the opera generally intelligible only as one understands its symbolism, an allegorical representation of the progress of society from the barbarian, loving out of greed for power, even brutality, personified by the towering old blind King, Archibaldo, through his son, Manfredo, necessarily a hybrid character, combining the old and the new, to the man of poetic impulse and chivalrous ardor, Avito, the chosen lover of Fiora, in whom the author sees the spirit of Italy.

Asked whether or not he believed his countrymen would return to florid or decorative composition in opera, Mr Jacchia replied: "There are not the voices for such music, at least not generally. Now too often the voices declaim and the orchestra sings, for there are few singers who are willing to study a role bar by bar for the complete expression of every note."

From the American
June 11, 1917

ARTHUR HACKETT PLEASES POP CONCERT AUDIENCE

Young Tenor Sings in German with Great Beauty of Tone and Emotional Eloquence.

Another week of the Pops, directed by Agide Jacchia, began last evening at Symphony Hall. There is now complete accord between the Italian conductor and the members of the orchestra, while his musicianly qualities and energetic readings add greatly to the pleasure of the concerts.

The program was attractive. Verdi's overture, "The Sicilian Vespers"; Waldteufel's waltz, "Estudiantina"; Suppe's overture, "Poet and Peasant," were among the numbers. Mr. Hadley's Fascination and Capriccio, pretty pieces, pleased the audience and the second was repeated. Mr. Nagel's valse caprice "Tilla," skilfully orchestrated, was effective and displayed imagination. This, too, was repeated while both he and Mr. Hadley acknowledged the applause for their compositions.

The feature of the evening, however, was the appearance of Arthur Hackett. This young tenor's singing was greatly admired earlier in the season when he was the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Liszt's "Faust" Symphony. Last evening he sang Lohengrin's Narrative from the third act of Wagner's opera. Perhaps he wished to provide those who praise the efficiency of Americans in German opera with another effective argument. He sang in German, with great beauty of tone, admirable phrasing, emotional eloquence. Later he sang Liza Lehmann's "Ah, Morn of My Delight," and, recalled, added to the program. Mr. Hackett is unusually gifted. His voice alone gives great pleasure, and he has mastered the art of singing simple songs effectively without undue sentimentality.

The program for tonight, "Norwegian Night," will be as follows:

Overture, "Light Cavalry".....Suppe
Waltz, "Dream of Love".....Fahrbach
Selection, "Rigoletto".....Verdi
Male Choruses:
(a) Internationalen.....Degeyter
(Arr. Bjorne Giartstrom)
(b) Naar Fjordene blaaner.Alfr. Paulsen
(Norwegian Singing Society, A. Sutterud, Conductor)
Suite, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
(a) Morning Mood
(b) Aase's Death
(c) Anitra's Dance,
(d) In the Hall of the Mountain King.
Saeterjentens Sondag.....Ole Bull
Norwegian Folk-Song.....Borch
Male Choruses:
(a) Brudefarten i Hardanger (Bridal Procession).....H. Kjerulf
(b) Hjemover fra Fangrais.....
Kr. Wendelborg
(Norwegian Singing Society, A. Sutterud, Conductor)
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Two Norwegian dances.....Grieg
Reve Angelique.....Rubinstein
Selection, "Eileen".....Herbert
Bojorernes Indtogsmarsch.....Halvorsen

From the
Herald
June 17, 1917

THIS WEEK AT THE POPS

The past week was the largest that the Pop concerts have had this season. Unloubtedly the soloists who have appeared have added greatly to the attractiveness of the programs. Soloists will henceforth be a feature at the Pop concerts.

This week, the seventh, interesting programs have been arranged by Conductor Jacchia. Two singers new to the concerts will appear. Tomorrow night, June 18, the soloist will be Ethel Frank, a soprano of this city. Miss Frank, a native of Boston, is a pupil of Vanuccini of Florence. She gave a recital in Jordan Hall last fall with much success. The soloist Wednesday and Friday nights will be Mme. Esther Ferrabini, a distinguished Italian soprano. Mme. Ferrabini, as a young girl, came to this country in 1906 with the Leoncavallo concert company and was the one bright spot of that strange aggregation of singers and players. For five years she was the principal lyric soprano of the Montreal opera company and her appearance as "guest" at the Boston opera company in its fourth season when she sang Mimi in "La Boheme," is gratefully remembered. Incidentally she is the wife of Conductor Jacchia. Arthur Hackett, tenor, who has a wide public, will again be soloist the coming week Tuesday and Saturday evenings, while on Thursday evening Mario Laurenti, baritone of the Metropolitan opera company, will be the soloist. The program for tomorrow night is as follows:

Overture, "La Forza del Destino".....Verdi
Waltz, "Tres Jolie".....Waldteufel
"Song Without Words".....Tschaikowsky
Selection, "Tosca".....Puccini
Prelude, "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Aria, "Un bel di vedremo," from "Madama Butterfly".....Puccini
Ethel Frank.
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier
"The Star-Spangled Banner."
"Egyptian Impressions".....Bainbridge Crist
Aria, "Shadow Dance," from "Dinorah" Meyerbeer
Ethel Frank.
Intermezzo from "William Ratcliff"..Mascagni
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" Saint-Saens

From the Monitor
June 9, 1917

MUSIC IN BOSTON

The sixth week of the Pops in Symphony Hall, which begins Monday evening, June 11, will signal a reversion to the custom of having soloists, and three singers have been engaged to appear during the coming week. There will be a soloist each night except Tuesday night. This will be Norwegian night and instead of a soloist the Norwegian Singing Society, of which A. Sutterud is conductor, will sing a number of Norwegian songs. Moreover, there will be a considerable amount of Scandinavian music on the program.

On Monday and Friday nights the soloist will be Arthur Hackett, the young American tenor who had such a success at the Pop concerts last fall, and during the Symphony season won highest praise for his singing of the solo in Liszt's "Faust" symphony, both in Boston and New York. He will sing on both evenings Lohengrin's narrative from the third act of "Lohengrin" and the exquisite air, "Ah, Moon of My Delight" from Liza Lehmann's "In a Persian Garden."

The soloist Thursday night will be Miss Mary Desmond, the English contralto who for five years was a member of the Hammerstein Opera Company in New York. Miss Desmond has a voice of remarkable beauty and power.

The soloist for Wednesday and Saturday evenings will be Mario Laurenti, one of the younger baritones of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York. Mr. Laurenti has been heard here only with the Metropolitan Opera Company at its last season in 1916. On both evenings his numbers will be the prologue to Leoncavallo's "Pagliacci" and the famous Patter song, "Largo al factotum" from Rossini's comic opera, "The Barber of Seville."

Mr. Jacchia's favor with the public continues to grow. His programs are admirable and of wide variety. In his first two weeks he played no less than 109 different pieces.

The plan announced by the management to help boom the Liberty Loan by giving away a $50 bond this week and a $500 bond at the end of the season has excited much enthusiasm. The numbers of the coupons which call for these bonds were deposited last Thursday with the State Street Trust Company and the number for the $50 bond will be announced at the concert next Saturday evening. The holder of the number will receive a temporary certificate by presenting his coupon at the manager's office Saturday evening. The program for tonight is as follows:

Overture, "La Forza del Destino," Verdi; waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss; intermezzo, "Pagliacci," Leoncavallo; fantasia, "Mefistofele," Boïto; "Scènes Pittoresque," Massenet; violin solo, "Romance" (Jacques Hoffmann), Svendsen; scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin," Wagner; "The Star-Spangled Banner"; overture, "Zampa," Herold; minuet, Bolzoni; selection, "Lucia di Lammermoor," Donizetti; march, "Semper Fidelis," Sousa.

The program for Monday night is as follows:

Overture, "The Sicilian Vespers," Verdi; waltz, "Estudiantina," Waldteufel; "Fascination" and "Capriccio," H. K. Hadley; suite, "Coppelia," Delibes; danse Bohême from "Carmen," Bizet; Lohengrin's narrative from "Lohengrin," Act III, Wagner: valse caprice, "Tilla," R. Nagel; fantasia, "Faust," Gounod; overture, "Poet and Peasant," Suppé; song, "Ah, Moon of My Delight," from "In a Persian Garden," Lehmann; "Turkish Patrol," Michaelis; march, "Boston Normal School," Mulrey. Arthur Hackett, soloist.

MISS FRANK, SOPRANO, IN DEBUT AT "POP" CONCERTS

Miss Ethel Frank of this city made her first appearance as soloist at the "Pop" concerts last night. She was warmly received by the large audience and added a double encore to both of her program appearances—two arias, the first, "Un bel di," from "Mme Butterfly," and the second, the "Voi che sapete," from "Figaro's Marriage," which latter was announced to be sung in place of the "Shadow" song from Meyerbeer's "Dinorah."

In music, more particularly of a fine or sustained line, such as that of Mozart and even of the sensuous melody from Rimsky-Korsakow's "Sadko," Miss Frank used her voice, lyric in character, and of pure, fresh quality, with musicianship, taste and intelligence. Her singing with piano to Mr Nagel's accompaniments show the more intimate qualities of her style.

Bainbridge Crist was present and acknowledged the applause for his suite, "Egyptian Impressions," first played here a year ago. Mr Hackett will be soloist tonight in arias from "Gioconda" and "Boheme."

From the American
June 17, 1917

"ETHEL FRANK "THE POPS"

Ethel Frank, lyric soprano soloist at the Pops, Monday, June 18.

ETHEL FRANK, Boston girl who will sing at the Pops the coming week.

Program for Week at the Pops

The past week was the largest that the Pop Concerts have had this season. Undoubtedly the soloists who have appeared have added greatly to the attractiveness of the programs and all of the soloists have achieved remarkable success. It may be taken practically for granted that henceforth solonsts will be a feature at the Pop Concerts.

For the coming week, which is the seventh, a very interesting set of programs has been arranged by Conductor Jacchia and two singers new to the concerts will appear. Tomorrow (Monday) night, June 18, the soloist will be Ethel Frank, a very unusual soprano of this city. Miss Frank, who is a native of Boston, is a pupil of Vanuccini of Florence. She made her public debut at a recital in Jordan Hall last Fall with much success. She is the possessor of a lyric voice of coloratura quality.

[126]

From the Transcript June 16, 1917

NEW SOLOISTS AT THE POPS

Seventh Week Starts with Ethel Frank, a Boston Soprano

THE past week was the largest that the Pop Concerts have had this season. Undoubtedly the soloists who have appeared have added greatly to the attractiveness of the programmes, so it may be taken practically for granted that henceforth soloists will be a feature at the Pop Concerts.

For the coming week, which is the seventh, a very interesting set of programmes has been arranged by Conductor Jacchia and two singers new to the concerts will appear. Monday night, June 18, the soloist will be Ethel Frank of this city. Miss Frank is a pupil of Vanuccini of Florence. She made her début at a recital in Jordan Hall, last fall, with much success. She is the possessor of a lyric voice of coloratura quality.

The soloist Wednesday and Friday nights will be Mme. Esther Ferrabini, a distinguished Italian soprano. Mme. Ferrabini, as a young girl, came to this country in 1906 with the Leoncavallo Concert Company and was the one bright spot of that strange aggregation of singers and players. For five years Mme. Ferrabini was the principal lyric soprano of the Montreal Opera Company and her appearance as "guest" at the Boston Opera Company in its fourth season, when she sang Mimi in "La Bohème" is gratefully remembered by all who heard her. Incidentally Mme. Ferrabini is the wife of Conductor Jacchia.

Arthur Hackett, who is today the foremost American tenor, and has a wide public, will again be soloist the coming week Tuesday and Saturday evenings, while on Thursday evening Mario Laurenti, the baritone of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who made such a profound sensation the past week, will be the soloist. The programme for tonight is:

Overture, "Mignon" ..... Thomas
Waltz, "Espana" ..... Waldteufel
Harp Solo, "In Springtime" ..... Holy
Mr. Alfred Holy.
Selection, "La Bohème" ..... Puccini
Marche Slave ..... Tschaikowsky
Cavatina from "Faust" ..... Gounod
Soloist: Mr. Mario Laurenti.
Overture, "Tannhäuser" ..... Wagner
Fantasia, "Otello" ..... Verdi
Toreador's Song from "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Mr. Laurenti.
Intermezzo Act 3, "The Jewels of the Madonna" ..... Wolf-Ferrari
Hungarian Dance ..... Brahms

Here is Monday's programme:

Overture, "La Forza del Destino" ..... Verdi
Waltz, "Très Jolie" ..... Waldteufel
"Song Without Words" ..... Tschaikowsky
Selection, "Tosca" ..... Puccini
Prelude, "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Aria, "Un bel di vedremo," from "Madama Butterfly" ..... Puccini
Miss Frank.
Rhapsody, "España" ..... Chabrier
The Star Spangled Banner.
"Egyptian Impressions" ..... Bainbridge Crist
(a) Caravan.
(b) To a Mummy.
(c) Katabet.
(d) A Desert Song.
Aria, "Shadow Dance," from "Dinorah" ..... Meyerbeer
Miss Frank.
Intermezzo from "William Ratcliff" ..... Mascagni
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" ..... Saint-Saëns

From the Record June 12, 1917

Hackett Heartily Applauded at Pops For Splendid Work

ARTHUR HACKETT

The Pops returned last evening to the plan of soloists. The singer of the evening was Arthur Hackett, the delightful young tenor, who on the occasion of his appearances last year created a profound impression.

Last evening he sang Lohengrin's narrative and Liza Lehmann's "Ah, Moon of My Delight." Heartily applauded, he added Campbell-Tipton's "Spirit Flower" and Branscombe's "Heartsease and Violets." Mr. Rudolph Nagel was again at the piano.

Mr. Hackett's voice has apparently gained in breadth and power, but it still retains its fine lyric quality which brought forth much admiration when the young singer made his Boston debut. He will sing again at these concerts Friday evening. This evening the Norwegian Chorus will sing; Thursday Mary Desmond, the English contralto, will sing, and on Wednesday and Saturday a young baritone from the Metropolitan, Maurio Laurenti, will be the soloist.

A Valse Caprice Tilla by Nagel was played by the orchestra and it was heartily redemanded. It is a delightful little work. Two short pieces by Henry Hadley were given.

From the Record June 9, 1917

SOLOISTS WILL AGAIN APPEAR AT BOSTON POPS

Liberty Bond Gift Plan Creates Enthusiasm Among Patrons

The sixth week of the Pops in Symphony Hall, which begins Monday evening, will be one of the most attractive of the season. The management is reverting again to the custom of having soloists, and three very distinguished singers have been engaged to appear during the coming week.

There will be a soloist each night except Monday. This will be "Norwegian Night," and instead of a soloist the Norwegian Singing Society, of which A. Sutterud is conductor, will sing a number of Norwegian songs.

On Monday and Friday nights the soloist will be Arthur Hackett, the young American tenor who had such a sensational success at the Pop concerts last fall and during the Symphony season, won highest praise for his singing of the solo in Liszt's "Faust" Symphony both in Boston and New York. He will sing on both evenings Lohengrin's Narrative from the third act of "Lohengrin," and the exquisite air, "Ah, Moon of My Delight," from Liza Lehmann's "In a Persian Garden."

The soloist Thursday night will be Miss Mary Desmond, the English contralto who for five years was a member of the Hammerstein Opera Company in New York. Miss Desmond has a voice of remarkable beauty and power.

The soloist for Wednesday and Saturday evenings will be Mario Laurenti, one of the younger baritones of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York. Mr. Laurenti was heard here last year with the Metropolitan Opera Company. He is a singer of quite extraordinary quality.

On both evenings his numbers will be the Prologue to Leoncavallo's "Pagliacci" and the famous Patter song, "Largo al factotum" from Rossini's comic opera. "The Barber of Seville."

Mr. Jacchia's favor with the public continues to grow. His programs are admirable and of wide variety. In his first two weeks he played no less than 109 different pieces.

The plan announced by the management to help boom the Liberty Loan by giving away a $50 bond this week and a $500 bond at the end of the season has excited much enthusiasm. The numbers of the coupons which call for these bonds were deposited last Thursday with the State Street Trust Co. and the number for the $50 bond will be announced at the concert next Saturday evening.

From the Herald June 21, 1917

MME. FERRABINI HEARD AT THE POP CONCERT

Mme. Ester Ferrabini, soprano, wife of Conductor Jacchia, made her first appearance at the Pops last evening at Symphony Hall. In 1906 Mme. Ferrabini came to America with Leoncavallo's concert company. For five years she was leading soprano of the Montreal Opera Company. Her performance of Mimi in "La Boheme," when she sang here as guest with the Boston Opera Company in its fourth season, is remembered with pleasure.

Last evening the singer's striking appearance at once pleased the audience. She sang two arias, "Ritorno Vincitor" from Verdi's "Adia" and "Voilosapete, Mamma" from Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana," with native fervor and the free use of open tones dear to many of her countrywomen.

Charles de Mailly, the accomplished flutist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was another soloist of this conjugal evening. Skilfully accompanied by his wife, Mme. Claire Forbes de Mailly, the well known pianist, he played a nocturne and scherzo by Gaubert.

Mme. Ferrabini added several songs to the program and Mr. de Mailly another piece. The charming valse caprice "Tilla" by Mr. Nagel, whose versatility has been revealed as cellist, pianist and composer, was played again, while Tschaikowsky's "Nutcracker" suite and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries" were other features of the program.

This evening Mr. Laurenti, baritone, will again be soloist. The program will be as follows:

Overture, "The Marriage of Figaro" ..... Mozart
Waltz, "Jolly Fellows" ..... Vollstedt
Evening song (for strings only) ..... Schumann
Selection, "Thais" ..... Massenet
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Prologue to "Pagliacci" ..... Leoncavallo
(Mr. Laurenti.)
Overture, "Sakuntala" ..... Goldmark
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Selection, "Eileen" ..... Herbert
Aria, "Largo al factotum," from "The Barber of Seville" ..... Rossini
Wedding March ..... Mendelssohn

Herald, July 14.

WOMAN HISSED AT POP CONCERT

Remains Seated During the "Star Spangled Banner," Pleading Fatigue.

ESCORT MAKES HASTY EXIT

Eleanor Bright, 20 years old, living at the Y. W. C. A. on Warrenton street, caused much commotion at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall last night when she remained seated while the orchestra played the "Star Spangled Banner." She was hissed, and when a man, a member of the party of friends with which she was attending the performance, objected, he made rather a rapid exit from the hall.

It is said that Miss Bright, although of German descent, is not a disciple of the Kaiser. When her party arrived at the hall they were forced to stand for many minutes before they could obtain seats at a table. The girl was tired, so tired that she thought it not amiss to remain seated when the orchestra struck up the national air just as she had obtained possession of a chair.

It is said that several men, noting her action, or rather lack of action, began to hiss, and that the chorus of hisses grew in volume. When the orchestra repeated the selection she was still seated, and finally her escort, seeking to find the originator of the disturbance, made inquiries at several tables nearby. Then, it is said, someone in uniform seized him and hustled him out of the building. When he did not return, his friends also left.

ETHEL FRANK IS HEARD AT POPS

Young Boston Soprano Effective in Famous Aria from Mozart Masterpiece.

Miss Ethel Frank, a young Boston soprano, sang at the Pop concert last evening. She has given successful recitals in this city. Her voice is light, expressive, well schooled. Last evening she was more effective in the famous aria "Soi che sapete," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," than in the air "Un bel di" from Puccini's "Mme. Butterfly." Recalled, she added to the program. Selections from "Tosca," and "Lohengrin" and Bainbridge Crist's "Egyptian Impressions" were other pleasant features of the concert.

Arthur Hackett, whose fine singing last week gave so much pleasure, will again be the soloist this evening. The program will be as follows:

Overture, "Norma" ..... Bellini
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier" ..... R. Strauss
"Letter of Manon" ..... Gillet
Fantasia, "Un Ballo in Maschera" ..... Verdi
Suite from "Carmen" ..... Bizet
(a) Chanson du Toreador,
(b) La Garde Montante.
(c) Danse Boheme.
Aria, "Cielo e mar" ..... Ponchielli
(Mr. Hackett.)
"Carnival in Paris" ..... Svendsen
"The Star Spangled Banner."
Selection, "The Fortune Teller" ... Herbert
Rudolf's Narrative, "Che gelida manina" ..... Puccini
(Mr. Hackett.)
Coronation March ..... Meyerbeer

From the Advertiser June 22, 1917

Pop Concert

Mme. Ester Ferrabini, the distinguished Italian soprano, made her debut at the Pops last night with most notable success. The possessor of a vibrant, brilliant voice and

From the Globe June 21, 1917

MME FERRABINI IN DEBUT AT "POPS"

Mme Ester Ferrabini, the Italian soprano, made her first appearance in Boston in concert last night as soloist at the "Pops." Mme Ferrabini, who is the wife of conductor Jacchia, roused to enthusiasm her audience, one of the largest of the present season, by her broadly dramatic style, particularly in music from the operas of her countrymen. While her voice is one of pronounced effectiveness in the big emotional moments of operatic declamation or arioso, Mme Ferrabini made her points also in the light passages of her songs, denoting a voice also of lyric quality.

The new soprano first sang here as a member of Mascagni's ill-starred company at old Music Hall. Later while principal soprano with the Montreal company she was heard with the Boston Opera Company as Mimi. Her first aria last evening was the "Retorna Vincitor" from "Aida," to which she added Tosti's "Goodby" with orchestra and "Bon jour, Suzon," with piano. "Santuzza's Voi lo sapete, Mamma," sung with marked dramatic force, also was followed by extra numbers.

Charles de Mailly, the flutist, played two charming pieces by Gaubert—a nocturne and scherzo—both characteristic of their names, and of engaging if of tenuous structure. Somewhat too light for full appreciation in the large hall, they would be heard in a smaller room the better to appreciate their delicate and imaginative workmanship and the appropriately sympathetic vein in which they were played. In this Mr de Mailly was companioned at the piano by Mme Claire de Mailly, whom, until recently—very recently—this public had known as Miss Claire Forbes, the young pianist of uncommon musical gifts and promise.

Mr Nagel's valse caprice, "Tilla," again provoked the sweeping enthusiasm which it deserves. Since its first performance the composer tells the writer its "program" is that of the whims and moods of woman in her varied metamophorses. Tonight Mr Laurenti, the baritone, will sing the prolog from "Pagliacci" and Figaro's aria from "The Barber of Seville."

From the Monitor June 21, 1917

MME. FERRABINI AT THE POP CONCERTS

Mme. Esther Ferrabini, soprano, made her first appearance as soloist at the Pop concerts at Symphony Hall on Wednesday evening. With Mr. Jacchia conducting the orchestra, she presented the soprano aria from the first act of "Aida," the aria, "Voi lo sapete," from "Cavalleria Rusticana" and some recall pieces. The artist has a voice of rich tone color though not of great power, one partaking much of contralto quality, yet flexible. Her especial merit is her power of pathetic and tender expression, which showed to better advantage a number of years ago, when she appeared one night at the Boston Opera House as Mimi in "Bohême," than on this occasion, when singing detached arias against the accompaniment of a concert orchestra. She has distinguished ability for characterizing a heroine who is torn with conflicting emotion; and this she must have clearly indicated to attentive listeners in her performance of the Verdi and Mascagni scenes in the Pop concert program. Mme. Ferrabini reappears on Friday night of this week, singing arias from "Madam Butterfly" and "Carmen."

Mario Laurenti, baritone, will be the soloist tonight. He will sing arias from "Pagliacci" and "The Barber of Seville." The orchestral selections will be as follows:

Overture, "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; waltz, "Jolly Fellows," Vollstedt; "Evening Song," (for strings alone), Schumann; selection from "Thais," Massenet; second Hungarian rhapsody, Liszt; overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark; selection, "Eileen," Herbert; "Wedding March," Mendelssohn.

[127]

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

SPEEDWAY

Metropolitan Club Is 61 Points Ahead at Finish

The Metropolitan Driving Club rather rubbed it in on the visiting clubs at the Charles River Speedway yesterday, piling up a lot of points which placed them well in front of the other clubs. The Metropolitan Club earned a total of 76 points, the Newark Club 14, the Nassau Club 15, the Syracuse Club 14 and the Goshen Club 7.

BIG CROWD PRESENT

There was another big crowd present, the track was much faster than on the preceding day and the sport was high class. Of the 12 events on the card, all but two, the 2:19 pace, which went to the Newark gelding Star, and the 2:12 trot, which went to Jess Y, also from Newark, went to horses belonging to the local club.

W. J. McDonald won both divisions of the 2:16 trot, the first with Bingola and the second with Roy Miller. Bingola stepped in 2:14 1-4 and 2:14 1-2, one of the fastest races ever trotted at the speedway.

The fastest heat of the day was won in 2:13 1-4, by Jess Y, the time equalling the trotting record for the speedway.

No one thought that George N. had a chance to beat Peter Dillon, rated a sure winner, but the little brown gelding turned the trick in fine style.

Dr. C. A. Thompson's trotter, Dr. Ben, won a rattling good four heat contest. Mr. Burke's trotter, Bingerloch, also went a rattling good race.

A. J. Furbush had the old trotter, Hawkins, on edge and he simply smoth-

THREE EJECTED AT POPS

Were Only Hissing Woman Who Sat ThroughAnthem

When Miss Eleanor Bright of the Y. W. C. A. refused last evening to rise from her seat at the Pops, Symphony Hall, as the national anthem was played, and scores of the patrons hissed her, Major Frederick B. Downing, of the engineering corps, U. S. A., forced his way through the audience, and mistaking the hissing for an insult to "The Star Spangled Banner," had three young men ejected forcibly.

EXPLAIN HISSING

Two of the men were hustled to the Back Bay police station, where, after protesting their innocence and asserting they were hissing the unpatriotic action of the young woman, they were not held. Their names and addresses were taken and they will be summoned to the local court this morning. The third man was thrown out into the street, and hurried away to escape more rough handling.

The hall was thronged. When "The Star Spangled Banner" was played all the vast audience rose with the exception of one woman in the southeast corner of the main auditorium. Her action was observed by those about her and they began to hiss at her failure to show respect to the nation's song.

Some young men leaned over her shoulder and whispered the advice that she rise, while a large group hissed.

Woman Withdraws

The song was played again. This time, pale and evidently unnerved by the embarrassment in which she had placed herself, the woman arose, stood still for a few moments and then hastily withdrew from the hall. Several recognized her as Miss Eleanor Bright, a resident of the Y. W. C. A., 68 Warrenton street, who is prominent in the Ford Hall meetings.

Major Frederick B. Downing, of 170 Grovers avenue, Winthrop, a West Point man attached to the Engineering Corps, was in the front part of the auditorium. Flushed with anger at what he quickly interpreted to be an insult to the anthem, he brushed his way through the crowd and reached the rear of the auditorium.

"Who did that hissing?" he asked. Three young men were indicated by bystanders. The major rushed at one and seized him. A sailor in uniform stepped up to him and asked if he wanted assistance. He was told "yes." A National Guardsman then volunteered.

Thrown From Hall

The first man seized was violently removed from the hall, all the while protesting that he was a patriotic citizen, and hissed not at the playing of "The Star Spangled Banner," but at

END OF VOLUME

VOLUME 36

BSO
Pops

1917 - 1918

Shipman's Scrap Book
FOR DUPLICATE ORDER NUMBER 911.
HILL, SMITH & CO.
STATIONERS AND BLANK BOOK MANUFACTURERS
8 MILK STREET, BOSTON.
Job No. W 1591
Duplicate this book by sending the above number.

PR
NOT
191

BLANK PAGE

Transcript, Sept 1

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Next Season's Concerts to Be Especially Noteworthy

ONLY six weeks remain before the thirty-seventh season of the Symphony Orchestra is started with the concerts Friday afternoon, Oct. 12, and Saturday evening, Oct. 13. Since the close of the last season the air has been filled with various wild rumors, most of which had found their origin in New York, concerning the future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, all of them to the effect that its existence was seriously imperilled and that the chances were it would be relegated into the history of music in this country. The management has from the beginning refused to take any formal notice of these rumors, which were absurd on their very face, but went ahead with the plans for the coming season, this year as it has been in the past.

If anything the season of 1917-1918 will be more active so far as the orchestra is concerned than last year. The usual number of concerts in Boston and elsewhere are to be given, and in addition some special activities are being planned. Since the first of July Dr. Muck has been in Seal Harbor, Me., where he took a cottage for the summer, and judging from the amount of music that has been forwarded him from the library of the orchestra his summer has been far from idle. It is known that he has worked out almost completely his scheme of programmes for the season, but, following his usual practice, he will refuse until the last moment to make any definite announcement concerning it. Mr. Witek, the concert-master, who has been in Boston the greater part of the summer, has also been very busy preparing the "parts" for performances, marking the bowing and the like.

Boston will have its usual quota of forty-eight concerts in pairs, twenty-four on Friday afternoons and twenty-four on the succeeding Saturday evenings. According to present plans there will be fourteen soloists. Ten of these artists will be visitors in Boston and four will come from the ranks of the orchestra. Of the visiting soloists five will make their first appearance here as soloists with the Symphony Orchestra. These are Mabel Garrison, the charming soprano leggiero; the pianists, Ethel Leginska, Frances Nash and Guiomar Novaes, and the violinist, Irma Seydel. All these are young artists of notable merit. Of the older artists more firmly established in the world of music are Mme. Melba, returning after an absence of several years; Paderewski, Kreisler and John McCormack. The orchestra will be represented by Messrs. Witek and Noack, violinists, and Messrs. Warnke and Malkin, violoncellists.

There is every prospect that the patronage of the Symphony concerts will be as large as last year, which was a banner season for Boston. The number of seats left for the Friday afternoon concerts is now very small, and while for the Saturday evening concerts seats may be had at all prices, the choice will narrow down very rapidly during this month. The season tickets are now on sale at Symphony Hall.

Herald, Sept 1

MUSIC NOTES

Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is said in an announcement sent out from Symphony Hall, to have spent in the course of his summer at Seal Harbor, Me., a considerable part of his time preparing programs for the concerts of the coming season. But as to what the programs are, nothing is said. The soloists for the Boston programs season are named in the announcement, and subscribers may wonder whether Dr. Muck has given particular thought, or has been asked to give thought, to their selection. Three of the soloists are artists whose concerts in the United States are under the direction of the Symphony Orchestra manager and whose work the Symphony public has had much opportunity to measure and enjoy in former years. These three are Mme. Melba, soprano; Mr. Paderewski, pianist; and Mr. Kreisler, violinist. A fourth artist of high popular renown who appeared last year is Mr. McCormack, tenor. A performer who has won a conspicuous place of late in the concert field of the United States and who appears for the first time as a Symphony soloist is Mme. Leginska, pianist. Another, new to the concerts, who comes with the commendation of many audiences, is Mme. Novaes, pianist. A soprano, Miss Garrison, who has given pleasure to the Metropolitan Opera public in New York, will be introduced. A violinist, Miss Seydel, who has learned how to deport herself in front of the orchestra from having appeared with it in out-of-town concerts, is to be promoted to full solo rank. A pianist, Miss Nash, who has everything to prove as to her qualifications, also has a place in the list. According to a general rule of orchestral administration, the concertmaster and the first violoncellist will have solo turns; so will the players who take position next to them. The four men are Messrs. Witek and Noack, violinists; and Messrs. Warnke and Malkin, violoncellists.

The thirty-seventh season of the orchestra opens with a pair of concerts on the afternoon of Friday, Oct. 12, and the evening of Saturday, Oct. 13. The usual number of performances in Boston and other cities will be given and certain enterprises referred to in the announcement as "special activities" will be undertaken. Whether these activities will be something to meet a demand for the popularization of orchestral music, which exists in the majority of cities that have orchestras and is believed by many to exist in Boston, is not noted. The conclusion of the announcement says:

"There is every prospect that the patronage of the Symphony concerts will be as large as last year, which was a banner season for Boston. The number of seats left for the Friday afternoon concerts is now very small; and while for the Saturday evening concerts seats may be had at all prices, the choice will narrow down rapidly. Season tickets are now on sale at Symphony Hall.

Post, Sept 2.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dr. Karl Muck, Conductor

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has just issued a preliminary announcement of its plans for the symphony season in Boston during the coming winter. The prospectus will finally set at rest any few remaining doubts regarding the existence of the orchestra. It will be remembered that last spring the busy gossip-mongers in New York, and Philadelphia particularly, had it quite settled in their own mind that for various reasons the Boston Symphony Orchestra would go out of existence with the end of last season.

The rumors were so obviously absurd that the management took no formal note of them but went ahead, quietly, making plans for the coming season. In its prospectus the management informs the patrons that plans are forming which will make the work of the orchestra broader and more comprehensive than ever before. It ventures the belief that the wisdom of this course will not be questioned by the great and influential public which has for so many years given the orchestra its loyal and devoted support.

In times of mental stress more than ever is art needed to mitigate and offset the anxieties of the day, and of all the arts, none is so well fitted for this work as music. Boston in its possession of its incomparable orchestra is therefore peculiarly fortunate.

The usual number of concerts in Boston and elsewhere are to be given, and in addition some special activities are being planned. Since the first of July Dr. Muck has been in Seal Harbor, Me., where he took a cottage for the summer, and judging from the amount of music that has been forwarded him from the library of the orchestra, his summer has been far from idle.

It is known that he has worked out almost completely his scheme of programmes for the season, but following his usual practice he will refuse until the last moment to make any definite announcement of it. Mr. Witek, the concertmaster, who has been in Boston the greater part of the summer, has also been very busy preparing the "parts" for the performances, marking the bowing and the like.

Boston will have its usual quota of 48 concerts in pairs, 24 on Friday afternoons and 24 on the succeeding Saturday evenings. According to present plans, there will be 14 soloists. Ten of these artists will be visitors in Boston and four will come from the ranks of the orchestra. Of the visiting soloists five will make their first appearance here as soloists with the Symphony Orchestra.

These are Mabel Garrison, the charming soprano leggiero; the pianists, Ethel Leginska, Frances Nash and Guiomar Novaes; and the violinist, Irma Seydel. All these are young artists of notable merit. Of the older artists more firmly established in the world of music are Mme. Melba, returning after an absence of several years; Paderewski, Kreisler and John McCormack. The orchestra will be represented by Messrs. Witek and Noack, violinists, and Messrs. Warnke and Malkin, violincellists.

There is every prospect that the patronage of the Symphony Orchestra will be as large as last year, which was a banner season for Boston. The number of seats left for the Friday afternoon concerts is now very small, and while for the Saturday evening concerts seats may be had at all prices, the choice will narrow down very rapidly during this month. The season tickets are now on sale at Symphony Hall.

PLANS OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

There Will Be 24 Concerts as Usual and Noted Soloists Will Appear

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has issued a preliminary announcement of its plans for the coming Winter.

The prospectus will finally set at rest any few remaining doubts regarding the continued existence of the orchestra. Last Spring there was gossip in New York and Philadelphia that for various reasons the Boston Symphony Orchestra would not be able to give its concerts this season.

The management now informs patrons that plans are forming which will make the work of the orchestra broader and more comprehensive than ever before. In times of mental stress more than ever is art needed to mitigate and offset the anxieties of the day, and of all the arts, none is so well fitted for this work as music. Boston in its possession of its incomparable orchestra is therefore peculiarly fortunate.

The usual number of concerts in Boston and elsewhere are to be given and in addition some special activities are being planned. Since the first of July Dr Muck has been in Seal Harbor, Me, and judging from the amount of music that has been forwarded him from the library of the orchestra, his Summer has been far from idle. It is known that he has worked out almost completely his scheme of programs for the season, but, following his usual practice. he will refuse until the last moment to make any definite announcement of it.

Mr Witek, the concert master who has been in Boston the greater part of the Summer, has also been very busy preparing the "parts" for the performances, marking the bowing and the like.

Boston will have its usual quota of 48 concerts in pairs, 24 on Friday afternoons and 24 on the succeeding Saturday evenings.

According to present plans, there will be 14 soloists. Ten of these artists will be visitors in Boston and four will come from the ranks of the orchestra. Of the visiting soloists, five will make their first appearance here as soloists with the Symphony Orchestra. These are Mabel Garrison, the charming soprano leggiero; the pianists, Ethel Leginska, Frances Nash and Guiomar Novaes; and the violniist, Irma Seydel. Of the older artists more firmly established in the world of music are, Mme Melba, returning after an absence of several years; Paderewski, Kreisler and John McCormack. The orchestra will be represented by Messrs. Witek and Noack, violinists, and Messrs Warnke and Malkin, violincellists.

There is every prospect that the patronage of the symphony concerts will be as large as last year, which was a banner season for Boston. The number of seats left for the Friday afternoon concerts is now very small, and while for the Saturday evening concerts seats may be had at all prices, the choice will narrow down very rapidly during this month. The season tickets are now on sale at Symphony Hall.

Traveler, Sept 1

Symphony Concerts Start in Six Weeks

Only six weeks remain before the 37th season of the Symphony Orchestra is started with the concerts Friday afternoon, Oct. 12, and Saturday evening, Oct. 13. The season of 1917-18 will be more active, so far as the orchestra is concerned, than last year. The usual number of concerts in Boston and elsewhere are to be given and in addition some special activities are being planned. Dr. Karl Muck has worked out almost completely his scheme of programs for the season, but following his usual practice, he will refuse until the last moment to make any definite announcement concerning it. Boston will have its usual quota of 48 concerts in pairs, 24 on Friday afternoons and 24 on the succeeding Saturday evenings. According to present plans there will be 14 soloists. Ten of these artists will be visitors in Boston and four will come from the ranks of the orchestra. Season tickets are now on sale at Symphony Hall.

Herald, Sept 2

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The management of the Bost Symphony Orchestra has just issued preliminary announcement of its plan for the symphony season in Bost during the coming winter. The pro pectus will finally set at rest any fe remaining doubts regarding the exist ence of the orchestra. It will be re membered that last spring the bus gossip-mongers in New York, and Phila delphia particularly, had it quite settled in their own mind that for various reasons the Boston Symphony Orchestra would go out of existence with the end of last season. The rumors were so obviously absurd that the management took no formal note of them but went ahead, quietly, making plans for the coming season. In its prospectus the management informs the patrons that plans are forming which will make the work of the orchestra broader and more comprehensive than ever before. It ventures the belief that the wisdom of this course will not be questioned by the great and influential public which

Herald, Sept 6.

SYMPHONY HALL BUSY WITH SUBSCRIPTIONS

The subscription department at Symphony Hall is one of the busiest places in Boston. The mails bring a flood of checks from subscribers, and a very large number of applications are made by mail, telephone and in person. Conditions brought about by the war seem to have no effect upon the patronage given to the Boston Symphony concerts. The subscription to date is larger than it was at this time last year. There remain five weeks before the first pair of concerts. There are only a few seats left now for the Friday afternoon concerts, while the seats are selling rapidly for the Saturday concerts.

For the convenience of patrons compelled to go up a narrow flight of stairs to the subscription office, the management has removed the office to the ladies' room on the Massachusetts avenue corridor.

NO MEMBERS OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA DRAFTED

The management of the Symphony orchestra has heard from all the young members of the orchestra who were eligible for draft and up to the present time none of these has been taken. Altogether there were eight young men on the list of ellgibles. One of these was called, but was rejected. The others have not yet been called. As a consequence, the personnel of the orchestra is intact. Mr. Longy, the first oboe, went to France last spring, but is now on his way back to this country.

Etc

Journal, Sept 6.

MUSICIANS IN DRAFT

Eight young men of draft age are included among the members of the Symphony Orchestra, but according to a statement issued by the management last night none has been taken for the first draft. One who was drawn was rejected.

Journal, Sept 3.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has just issued a preliminary announcement of its plan for the symphony season in Boston during the coming winter. The prospectus will finally set at rest any few remaining doubts regarding the existence of the orchestra. It will be remembered that last spring the busy gossip-mongers in New York, and Philadelphia particularly, had it quite settled in their own mind that for various reasons the Boston Symphony Orchestra would go out of existence with the end of last season. The rumors were so obviously absurd that the management took no formal note of them but went ahead, quietly, making plans for the coming season. In its prospectus the management informs the patrons that plans are forming which will make the work of the orchestra broader and more comprehensive than ever before. It ventures the belief that the wisdom of this course will not be questioned by the great and influential public which has for so many years given the orchestra its loyal and devoted support. In times of mental stress more than ever is art needed to mitigate and offset the anxieties of the day, and of the arts, none is so well fitted for this work as music. Boston in its possion of its incomparable orchestra is therefore peculiarly fortunate.

The usual number of concerts in Boston and elsewhere are to be given, and in addition some special activities are being planned. Since the 1st of July Dr. Muck has been in Seal Harbor, Me. Judging from the amount of music forwarded him from the library of the orchestra, his summer has been far from idle. It is known that he has worked out almost completely his scheme of programs for the season, but following his usual practise, he will refuse until the last moment to make any definite announcement of it.

Boston will have its usual quota of 48 concerts in pairs, 24 on Friday afternoons and 24 on the succeeding Saturday evenings. According to present plans, there will be 14 soloists. Ten of these artists will be visitors in Boston and four will come from the ranks of the orchestra. Of the visiting soloists, five will make their first appearance here as soloists with the Symphony Orchestra. These are Mabel Garrison, soprano; Ethel Leginska, Frances Nash and Guiomar Novaes, pianists; Irma Seydel; violinist; Mme. Melba, Mr. Paderewski, Kreisler and John McCormack. The orchestra will be represented by Messrs. Witek and Noack, violinists, and Messrs. Warnke and Malkin, violoncellists.

1.

Transcript, Sept 1

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Next Season's Concerts to Be Especially Noteworthy

ONLY six weeks remain before the thirty-seventh season of the Symphony Orchestra is started with the concerts Friday afternoon, Oct. 12, and Saturday evening, Oct. 13. Since the close of the last season the air has been filled with various wild rumors, most of which had found their origin in New York, concerning the future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, all of them to the effect that its existence was seriously imperilled and that the chances were it would be relegated into the history of music in this country. The management has from the beginning refused to take any formal notice of these rumors, which were absurd on their very face, but went ahead with the plans for the coming season, this year as it has been in the past.

If anything the season of 1917-1918 will be more active so far as the orchestra is concerned than last year. The usual number of concerts in Boston and elsewhere are to be given, and in addition some special activities are being planned. Since the first of July Dr. Muck has been in Seal Harbor, Me., where he took a cottage for the summer, and judging from the amount of music that has been forwarded him from the library of the orchestra his summer has been far from idle. It is known that he has worked out almost completely his scheme of programmes for the season, but, following his usual practice, he will refuse until the last moment to make any definite announcement concerning it. Mr. Witek, the concert-master, who has been in Boston the greater part of the summer, has also been very busy preparing the "parts" for performances, marking the bowing and the like.

Boston will have its usual quota of forty-eight concerts in pairs, twenty-four on Friday afternoons and twenty-four on the succeeding Saturday evenings. According to present plans there will be fourteen soloists. Ten of these artists will be visitors in Boston and four will come from the ranks of the orchestra. Of the visiting soloists five will make their first appearance here as soloists with the Symphony Orchestra. These are Mabel Garrison, the charming soprano leggiero; the pianists, Ethel Leginska, Frances Nash and Guiomar Novaes, and the violinist, Irma Seydel. All these are young artists of notable merit. Of the older artists more firmly established in the world of music are Mme. Melba, returning after an absence of several years; Paderewski, Kreisler and John McCormack. The orchestra will be represented by Messrs. Witek and Noack, violinists, and Messrs. Warnke and Malkin, violoncellists.

There is every prospect that the patronage of the Symphony concerts will be as large as last year, which was a banner season for Boston. The number of seats left for the Friday afternoon concerts is now very small, and while for the Saturday evening concerts seats may be had at all prices, the choice will narrow down very rapidly during this month. The season tickets are now on sale at Symphony Hall.

Herald, Sept 1

MUSIC NOTES

Karl Muck, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is said in an announcement sent out from Symphony Hall, to have spent in the course of his summer at Seal Harbor, Me., a considerable part of his time preparing programs for the concerts of the coming season. But as to what the programs are, nothing is said. The soloists for the Boston programs season are named in the announcement, and subscribers may wonder whether Dr. Muck has given particular thought, or has been asked to give thought, to their selection. Three of the soloists are artists whose concerts in the United States are under the direction of the Symphony Orchestra manager and whose work the Symphony public has had much opportunity to measure and enjoy in former years. These three are Mme. Melba, soprano; Mr. Paderewski, pianist; and Mr. Kreisler, violinist. A fourth artist of high popular renown who appeared last year is Mr. McCormack, tenor. A performer who has won a conspicuous place of late in the concert field of the United States and who appears for the first time as a Symphony soloist is Mme. Leginska, pianist. Another, new to the concerts, who comes with the commendation of many audiences, is Mme. Novaes, pianist. A soprano, Miss Garrison, who has given pleasure to the Metropolitan Opera public in New York, will be introduced. A violinist, Miss Seydel, who has learned how to deport herself in front of the orchestra from having appeared with it in out-of-town concerts, is to be promoted to full solo rank. A pianist, Miss Nash, who has everything to prove as to her qualifications, also has a place in the list. According to a general rule of orchestral administration, the concertmaster and the first violoncellist will have solo turns; so will the players who take position next to them. The four men are Messrs. Witek and Noack, violinists; and Messrs. Warnke and Malkin, violoncellists.

The thirty-seventh season of the orchestra opens with a pair of concerts on the afternoon of Friday, Oct. 12, and the evening of Saturday, Oct. 13. The usual number of performances in Boston and other cities will be given and certain enterprises referred to in the announcement as "special activities" will be undertaken. Whether these activities will be something to meet a demand for the popularization of orchestral music, which exists in the majority of cities that have orchestras and is believed by many to exist in Boston, is not noted. The conclusion of the announcement says:

"There is every prospect that the patronage of the Symphony concerts will be as large as last year, which was a banner season for Boston. The number of seats left for the Friday afternoon concerts is now very small; and while for the Saturday evening concerts seats may be had at all prices, the choice will narrow down rapidly. Season tickets are now on sale at Symphony Hall.

Post, Sept 2.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dr. Karl Muck, Conductor

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has just issued a preliminary announcement of its plans for the symphony season in Boston during the coming winter. The prospectus will finally set at rest any few remaining doubts regarding the existence of the orchestra. It will be remembered that last spring the busy gossip-mongers in New York, and Philadelphia particularly, had it quite settled in their own mind that for various reasons the Boston Symphony Orchestra would go out of existence with the end of last season.

The rumors were so obviously absurd that the management took no formal note of them but went ahead, quietly, making plans for the coming season. In its prospectus the management informs the patrons that plans are forming which will make the work of the orchestra broader and more comprehensive than ever before. It ventures the belief that the wisdom of this course will not be questioned by the great and influential public which has for so many years given the orchestra its loyal and devoted support.

In times of mental stress more than ever is art needed to mitigate and offset the anxieties of the day, and of all the arts, none is so well fitted for this work as music. Boston in its possession of its incomparable orchestra is therefore peculiarly fortunate.

The usual number of concerts in Boston and elsewhere are to be given and in addition some special activities are being planned. Since the first of July Dr. Muck has been in Seal Harbor, Me., where he took a cottage for the summer, and judging from the amount of music that has been forwarded him from the library of the orchestra, his summer has been far from idle.

It is known that he has worked out almost completely his scheme of programmes for the season, but following his usual practice he will refuse until the last moment to make any definite announcement of it. Mr. Witek, the concertmaster, who has been in Boston the greater part of the summer, has also been very busy preparing the "parts" for the performances, marking the bowing and the like.

Boston will have its usual quota of 48 concerts in pairs, 24 on Friday afternoons and 24 on the succeeding Saturday evenings. According to present plans, there will be 14 soloists. Ten of these artists will be visitors in Boston and four will come from the ranks of the orchestra. Of the visiting soloists five will make their first appearance here as soloists with the Symphony Orchestra.

These are Mabel Garrison, the charming soprano leggiero; the pianists, Ethel Leginska, Frances Nash and Guiomar Novaes; and the violinist, Irma Seydel. All these are young artists of notable merit. Of the older artists more firmly established in the world of music are Mme. Melba, returning after an absence of several years; Paderewski, Kreisler and John McCormack. The orchestra will be represented by Messrs. Witek and Noack, violinists, and Messrs. Warnke and Malkin, violincellists.

There is every prospect that the patronage of the Symphony Orchestra will be as large as last year, which was a banner season for Boston. The number of seats left for the Friday afternoon concerts is now very small, and while for the Saturday evening concerts seats may be had at all prices, the choice will narrow down very rapidly during this month. The season tickets are now on sale at Symphony Hall.

PLANS OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

There Will Be 24 Concerts as Usual and Noted Soloists Will Appear

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has issued a preliminary announcement of its plans for the coming Winter.

The prospectus will finally set at rest any few remaining doubts regarding the continued existence of the orchestra. Last Spring there was gossip in New York and Philadelphia that for various reasons the Boston Symphony Orchestra would not be able to give its concerts this season.

The management now informs patrons that plans are forming which will make the work of the orchestra broader and more comprehensive than ever before. In times of mental stress more than ever is art needed to mitigate and offset the anxieties of the day, and of all the arts, none is so well fitted for this work as music. Boston in its possession of its incomparable orchestra is therefore peculiarly fortunate.

The usual number of concerts in Boston and elsewhere are to be given and in addition some special activities are being planned. Since the first of July Dr Muck has been in Seal Harbor, Me, and judging from the amount of music that has been forwarded him from the library of the orchestra, his Summer has been far from idle. It is known that he has worked out almost completely his scheme of programs for the season, but, following his usual practice, he will refuse until the last moment to make any definite announcement of it.

Mr Witek, the concert master, who has been in Boston the greater part of the Summer, has also been very busy preparing the "parts" for the performances, marking the bowing and the like.

Boston will have its usual quota of 48 concerts in pairs, 24 on Friday afternoons and 24 on the succeeding Saturday evenings.

According to present plans, there will be 14 soloists. Ten of these artists will be visitors in Boston and four will come from the ranks of the orchestra. Of the visiting soloists, five will make their first appearance here as soloists with the Symphony Orchestra. These are Mabel Garrison, the charming soprano leggiero; the pianists, Ethel Leginska, Frances Nash and Guiomar Novaes; and the violiniist, Irma Seydel. Of the older artists more firmly established in the world of music are, Mme Melba, returning after an absence of several years; Paderewski, Kreisler and John McCormack. The orchestra will be represented by Messrs. Witek and Noack, violinists, and Messrs Warnke and Malkin, violincellists.

There is every prospect that the patronage of the symphony concerts will be as large as last year, which was a banner season for Boston. The number of seats left for the Friday afternoon concerts is now very small, and while for the Saturday evening concerts seats may be had at all prices, the choice will narrow down very rapidly during this month. The season tickets are now on sale at Symphony Hall.

Transcript, Sept 1

Symphony Concerts Start in Six Weeks

Only six weeks remain before the 37th season of the Symphony Orchestra is started with the concerts Friday afternoon, Oct. 12, and Saturday evening, Oct. 13. The season of 1917-18 will be more active, so far as the orchestra is concerned, than last year. The usual number of concerts in Boston and elsewhere are to be given and in addition some special activities are being planned. Dr. Karl Muck has worked out almost completely his scheme of programs for the season, but following his usual practice, he will refuse until the last moment to make any definite announcement concerning it. Boston will have its usual quota of 48 concerts in pairs, 24 on Friday afternoons and 24 on the succeeding Saturday evenings. According to present plans there will be 14 soloists. Ten of these artists will be visitors in Boston and four will come from the ranks of the orchestra. Season tickets are now on sale at Symphony Hall.

Herald, Sept 2

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The management of the Bost Symphony Orchestra has just issued preliminary announcement of its pla for the symphony season in Bost during the coming winter. The pro pectus will finally set at rest any fe remaining doubts regarding the exist ence of the orchestra. It will be r membered that last spring the bus gossip-mongers in New York, and Phil delphia particularly, had it quite settle in their own mind that for various rea sons the Boston Symphony Orchestra would go out of existence with the end of last season. The rumors were so obviously absurd that the management took no formal note of them but went ahead, quietly, making plans for the coming season. In its prospectus the management informs the patrons that plans are forming which will make the work of the orchestra broader and more comprehensive than ever before. It ventures the belief that the wisdom of this course will not be questioned by the great and influential public which

Herald, Sept 6.

SYMPHONY HALL BUSY WITH SUBSCRIPTIONS

The subscription department at Symphony Hall is one of the busiest places in Boston. The mails bring a flood of checks from subscribers, and a very large number of applications are made by mail, telephone and in person. Conditions brought about by the war seem to have no effect upon the patronage given to the Boston Symphony concerts. The subscription to date is larger than it was at this time last year. There remain five weeks before the first pair of concerts. There are only a few seats left now for the Friday afternoon concerts, while the seats are selling rapidly for the Saturday concerts.

For the convenience of patrons compelled to go up a narrow flight of stairs to the subscription office, the management has removed the office to the ladies' room on the Massachusetts avenue corridor.

NO MEMBERS OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA DRAFTED

The management of the Symphony orchestra has heard from all the young members of the orchestra who were eligible for draft and up to the present time none of these has been taken. Altogether there were eight young men on the list of ellgibles. One of these was called, but was rejected. The others have not yet been called. As a consequence, the personnel of the orchestra is intact. Mr. Longy, the first oboe, went to France last spring, but is now on his way back to this country.

Etc

Journal, Sept 6.

MUSICIANS IN DRAFT

Eight young men of draft age are included among the members of the Symphony Orchestra, but according to a statement issued by the management last night none has been taken for the first draft. One who was drawn was rejected.

Journal, Sept 3.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has just issued a preliminary announcement of its plan for the symphony season in Boston during the coming winter The prospectus will finally set at rest any few remaining doubts regarding the existence of the orchestra. It will be remembered that last spring the busy gossip-mongers in New York, and Philadelphia particularly, had it quite settled in their own mind that for various reasons the Boston Symphony Orchestra would go out of existence with the end of last season. The rumors were so obviously absurd that the management took no formal note of them but went ahead, quietly, making plans for the coming season. In its prospectus the management informs the patrons that plans are forming which will make the work of the orchestra broader and more comprehensive than ever before. It ventures the belief that the wisdom of this course will not be questioned by the great and influential public which has for so many years given the orchestra its loyal and devoted support. In times of mental stress more than ever is art needed to mitigate and offset the anxieties of the day, and of the arts, none is so well fitted for this work as music. Boston in its possion of its incomparable orchestra is therefore peculiarly fortunate.

The usual number of concerts in Boston and elsewhere are to be given, and in addition some special activities are being planned. Since the 1st of July Dr. Muck has been in Seal Harbor, Me. Judging from the amount of music forwarded him from the library of the orchestra, his summer has been far from idle. It is known that he has worked out almost completely his scheme of programs for the season, but following his usual practise, he will refuse until the last moment to make any definite announcement of it.

Boston will have its usual quota of 48 concerts in pairs, 24 on Friday afternoons and 24 on the succeeding Saturday evenings. According to present plans, there will be 14 soloists. Ten of these artists will be visitors in Boston and four will come from the ranks of the orchestra. Of the visiting soloists, five will make their first appearance here as soloists with the Symphony Orchestra. These are Mabel Garrison, soprano; Ethel Leginska, Frances Nash and Guiomar Novaes, pianists; Irma Seydel; violinist; Mme. Melba, Mr. Paderewski, Kreisler and John McCormack. The orchestra will be represented by Messrs. Witek and Noack, violinists, and Messrs. Warnke and Malkin, violoncellists.

Transcr. Sept 5

BUSY DAYS AT SYMPHONY HALL

The subscription department at Symphony Hall is one of the busiest places in Boston. The mails are bringing in a flood of checks from subscribers who waited until the last call to take up their seats for the coming season, and there are a very large number of applications made by mail, telephone and in person. The conditions brought about by the war seem to have no effect upon the patronage given to the Boston Symphony concerts. The subscription to date is larger than it was at this time last year. There remain five weeks before the first pair of concerts is given. There are only a few seats left for the Friday afternoon concerts, while the seats are selling rapidly for the Saturday concerts.

Trans

American, Sept 5

* * *

The management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra sets at rest all rumors that the orchestra would disband because of the war and its German conductor and preponderance of German musicians by announcing its plans for the coming season.

Doctor Carl Muck will conduct as usual the twenty-four concerts and twenty-four public rehearsals in Bos- ... as well as the hundred or more concerts in other cities. There will be fewer soloists than in other years but these include the greatest names in the musical world. The fourteen are Melba, Kreisler, Paderewski, John MacCormack, Mabel Garrison, Ethel Leginska, Frances Nash, Guiomar Novaes and Irma Seydel. The orchestra soloists will be Witek, Noack, Warnke and Malkin.

* * *

Globe, Sept 6

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA LOSES NO ONE BY DRAFT

The management of the Symphony Orchestra has heard from all the members of the orchestra who were eligible for draft and up to the present time none of these has been taken.

Altogether there were eight young men on the list of eligibles. One of these was called but was rejected.

The others have not been called, but most of them are high on the list and doubtless will be summoned on the second call.

As a consequence the personnel of the orchestra is intact. Mr Longy, the first oboe, went to France last Spring, but is now on his way back to this country.

American, Sept 5

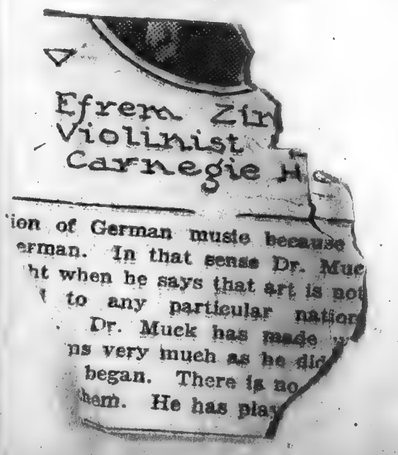
...tarism."

BUSY DAYS AT SYMPHONY HALL

The subscription department at Symphony Hall yesterday was one of the busiest places in Boston. The mails brought in a flood of checks from subscribers who had waited until the last call to take up their seats for the coming season, and there was a very large number of applications made by mail, telephone and in person. The conditions brought about by the war seem to have no effect upon the patronage given to the Boston Symphony concerts.

The subscription to date is larger than it was at this time last year, and the prospects are that this increase will be maintained. There remain five weeks before the first pair of concerts is given. There are only a few seats left now for the Friday afternoon concerts, while the seats are selling rapidly for the Saturday concerts.

For the convenience of patrons who heretofore have been compelled to go up a narrow flight of stairs in Symphony Hall to the subscription office, the management has removed the office to the ladies' room on the Massachusetts ave. corridor.



...ion of German music because ...erman. In that sense Dr. Muc... ...ht when he says that art is not ... to any particular nation. ... Dr. Muck has made ... ...ns very much as he did ... began. There is no ... ...hem. He has play...

Record, Sept 7

BUSY DAYS AT SYMPHONY HALL

The subscription department at Symphony Hall yesterday was one of the busiest places in Boston. The mails brought in a flood of checks from subscribers who had waited until the last call to take up their seats for the coming season, and there was a very large number of applications made by mail, telephone and in person. The conditions brought about by the war seem to have no effect upon the patronage given to the Boston Symphony concerts.

The subscription to date is larger than it was at this time last year, and the prospects are that this increase will be maintained. There remain five weeks before the first pair of concerts is given. There are only a few seats left now for the Friday afternoon concerts, while the seats are selling rapidly for the Saturday concerts.

For the convenience of patrons who heretofore have been compelled to go up a narrow flight of stairs in Symphony Hall to the subscription office, the management has removed the office to the ladies' room on the Massachusetts ave. corridor.

Record, Sept 7

REVIVE MANY OLDER WORKS AT SYMPHONY

Dr. Muck's Plan for Coming Season

Mme. Vix Resting for Her American Season — Early N. Y. Opera

By J. V. Clark

Little by little the plans of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season are being made public. The list of soloists was announced just a week ago. At that time it was stated that Dr. Muck, who has been summering at Seal Harbor, Me., and who has gone over many scores in the Symphony's library, did not chose to make known his programs until the season was virtually on. The conductor persists in his opinion, and declines to give out his program for the present. However, he has made known some of the works he has been restudying and "looking over."

With the continuation of the war it is even more difficult to get novelties this year than for the preceding two seasons. Last year some way or another Dr. Muck presented the usual proportion of new works.

Some had success, some have gone to the never-never-again land. For this season's offerings Dr. Muck has looked over quantities of music in the library of the orchestra which has not been played during his tenure of the orchestra's conductorship.

Dr. Muck this season will play some of the little Haydn symphonies. The success of the one he presented last season insures this. Then there will be standard works by Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Liszt and Schumann in the usual quantity.

Dr. Muck has been restudying the Schumann D minor symphony. Twice he has announced this and both times he has been take nill so that he has had to turn his baton over for the conducting of the work to Mr. Schmidt and Mr. Urak.

Some of the Works Chosen

Dr. Muck has also been working on Berlioz's two overtures, "King Lear," "Franc Juges" and Balakreff's overture on a Spanish theme. Old works that have come under his observation this summer and which will probably be heard on Huntington ave. this winter, are Raff's sumphony "In Walde," Rheinberger's "Wallenstein" symphony, Bizet's "Roma" suite, Goldmark's "Cricket on the Hearth" (introduction to the third act), and Svendsen's 4th symphony in D minor.

More modern works contemplated are Bantock's overture, "Pierrot of the Minute," Delius' "In a Summer Garden" and "Appalachia," Liadoff's "Baba Yaga," Scriabine's "Poeme de l'Extase" and William Wallace's symphonic poem, "Villon."

Grieg's suite, "Aus Holberg's "Zeit," Lalo's suite, "Namouna," Rimsky Korsakoff's "Mlada" and Seckles' "Serenade" have also been sent to Seal Harbor.

Monitor, Sept 8

tiques.

A Symphony Hall announcement which gives hints as to the plans of the conductor mentions Svendsen's fourth symphony, never yet played at the concerts, as likely to be produced. It refers also to pieces of modern schools, including Delius' "Appalachia," new to the concerts, Delius' "In a Summer Garden," Bantock's "Pierrot of the Minute," Liadoff's "Baba Yaga," Scriabin's "Poème de l'Extase" and Wallace's symphonic poem, "Villon." The announcement indicates that the conductor will bring out music from Rimsky-Korsakoff's ballet, "Mlada," which has not been performed by the Symphony Orchestra. It mentions, furthermore, Grieg's "Aus Holberg's Zeit" suite and Lalo's "Namouna" suite.

The announcement makes mention of these works, not as things actually promised for performance, but as things which have been the subject of summer study with him. The list is replete with the titles of works of secondary importance, happily; for the Symphony concerts have been overweighted in recent seasons with big and important music. The conductor seems to be falling in with a policy which other heads of orchestras have adopted of lightening up this year the general program scheme. But if he is adopting such a policy, and if he is admitting small material which the public hitherto has looked down on, he might well seize the opportunity to produce some of the poor stuff that composers in the United States have written. Were he to do so, he might find the Boston public musically less proud and stiff-necked than formerly. If he is going to give mediocrity a chance, he could this season, no doubt, better than ever before, secure kind attention to some of American source.

Globe, Sept 9

Prospective Programs of the Symphony Orchestra

It is no departure from his habit in the past for Dr Muck to maintain complete silence concerning his plans for the symphony concerts, which begin Oct 12-13, but it may be safe to promise that the programs for the coming season will draw on the standard classics in the same measure as in the past. It is probable that the performance last season of one of Haydn's little and almost forgotten symphonies will encourage Dr Muck to bring out others of these delightful little works. There will be the usual number of works by Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Liszt and the like.

Dr Muck has been restudying the D minor symphony of Schumann. It is very interesting that while Dr Muck has announced this twice since his return to Boston in 1912, on both occasions he was ill, so that Mr Urak conducted it once and Mr Schmidt the second time. He has also been working on the "King Lear" and "Franc Juges" overtures of Berloiz, and Balakireff's overture on a Spanish theme.

Particularly interesting in the list of older works which he has had with him the past Summer—works actually old in years and works of a more modern school that have not been heard in a number of seasons. Thus one finds on the list, Raff's symphony, "Im Walde," which has not been played since 1902, under Mr Gericke; Rheinberger's "Wallenstein" symphony is another which has not appeared on a program since 1885, and Bizet's suite, "Roma," has not been heard since 1903.

Then there are the introduction to the third act of Goldmark's opera, "The Cricket on the Hearth," which has not been heard since 1897, and "Prometheus" overture, which has not been heard since 1899, while the same year saw the only performance of the overture to Siegfried Wagner's opera, "Die Baerenhaeuter." Svendsen's 4th Symphony in D minor has never been played at a symphony concert.

Of more modern works which are likely to be performed there may be mentioned Bantock's overture, "Pierrot of the Minute." last played here in 1909; Fritz Delius' "In a Summer Garden," played by Mr Fiedler in the Spring of 1912, and his "Appalachian," which has never been heard here, although announced several times; Liadoff's "Baba Yaga," Scriabine's "Poeme de l'Extase" and William Wallace's symphonic poem, "Villon," the first performed in 1911, the second in 1910, and the third in 1912.

Dr Muck has also been looking at Grieg's suite, "Aus Holberg's Zeit," Lalo's charming suite, "Namouna," which has been played at a Pension Fund concert two years ago, but has not appeared on a symphony program since 1896; Rimsky Korsakoff's "Mlada" and Seckles' "Serenade," the last two of which are new.

Transcr, Sept 9

2.

Program Outlook for the Coming Symphony Season

With the first touch of fall comes the natural curiosity about the programs for the Boston Symphony concerts. In accordance with Dr. Muck's well-known policy, nothing definite can be stated, as everybody knows the best laid plans often go awry even with the world's greatest orchestra. That which may seem feasible in September may become an impossibility by midwinter through no cause that could be anticipated.

Among the more notable works Dr. Muck has been looking over during his vacation at Seal Harbor, Maine, this summer, may be mentioned the following: D minor symphony of Schumann, "King Lear" and "Franc Juges" overtures by Berlioz, Balakireff's overture on a Spanish theme, Raff's symphony "Im Walde," Rheinberger's "Wallenstein" symphony, Bizet's "Roma" suite, the introduction to the third act of Goldmark's "The Cricket on the Hearth," the "Prometheus" overture, overture to Siegfried Wagner's "Die Baerenhaeuter," Svendsen's fourth symphony in D-minor, Bantock's "Pierrot of the Minute" overture, Fritz Delius's "In a Summer Garden" and "Appalachia," Liadoff's "Babba Yaga," Scriabine's "Poeme de l'Extase," William Wallace's symphonic poem "Villon," Grieg's suite "Aus Holberg's Zeit," Lalo's "Namouna" suite, Rimsky Korsakoff's "Mlada and Seckles" and "Serenade," all of which suggests a busy summer and promises some excellent programs notwithstanding the increasing difficulty in getting new music owing to the war.

New Soloists.

According to present plans, there will be 14 soloists. Ten of these artists will be visitors in Boston and four will come from the ranks of the orchestra. Of the visiting soloists, five will make their first appearance here as soloists with the Symphony orchestra. These are Mabel Garrison, soprano; Ethel Leginska, Frances Nash and Guiomar Novaes, pianists; Irma Seydel, violinist; Mme. Melba, Mr. Paderewski, Kreisler and John McCormack. The orchestra will be represented by Messrs. Witek and Noack, violinists, and Messrs. Warnke and Malkin, violincellists.

The directors of the Cecilia Society have granted Chalmers Clifton, condu...

Record, Sept 11
Globe, " 12

VIOLINISTS LEAD SYMPHONY SEASON

Five to Appear Here as Soloists—Many Favorites On Schedule

ARTISTS ANNOUNCE WINTER TOURS

By J. V. CLARK

The violinists are going to have their innings at the Symphony concerts this winter. The attendants at the classic Boston concerts will hear five violinists—two of world fame, virtuosos who have played here, there and everywhere, two members of the orchestra, who for a pair of concerts will leave their desk to stand before the band, and one a young woman, who has played locally many times, but not in Boston proper, with Dr. Muck and his band.

Kreisler and Zimbalist are the old, tried and true favorites. Of the former there is nothing new to be said. His every appearance is hailed with pleasure. Now, after a summer, largely one of rest at Seal Harbor, Me., he is facing a season of nearly 100 concerts.

Zimbalist has been heard all too little in Boston lately. At his concert last winter with his wife, Alma Gluck, he played with his exquisite, silken tone, with more variety of color than earlier in his career.

Anton Witek and Sylvan Noack are the violinists from the orchestra, and Irma Seydel, the newcomer.

Miss Seydel is really the "daughter of the orchestra."

Her father is a Symphony man, her teachers were Symphony men, and it was with the orchestra during the past few years in its out-of-town concerts that she received the valuable routine which has now fitted her to play with the orchestra in Boston.

One of the earliest musical events of

3. Transcript - Sept 6.

New Faces and New Talents for the Symphony Concerts

(Photograph by Apeda, New York)

Guiomar Novaes, Pianist

(Photograph by Mishkin, New York)

Mabel Garrison, Singer

NEWS OF MUSIC

An Inning for Youth at the Symphony Concerts—The Young Soloists in Prospect—Mme. Galli-Curci and Mr. McCormack at Hand—A Whimsey About Mr. Toscanini—Items and Amusements

NEW blood and young blood courses auspiciously through the ten "assisting artists"—the four soloists from the orchestra aside—announced for the Symphony Concerts of autumn, winter and spring. Of the familiar figures of many a year on the stage of Symphony Hall, only Mr. Paderewski, the pianist; Mr. Kreisler, the violinist, and Mme. Melba, the singer, stand on the list. Betwixt and between are Mr. McCormack, the tenor, and Mr. Zimbalist, the violinist, each of whom has passed his first youth and established his place, though, hitherto, he has been called only once to these concerts. Young and rising—in two instances, indeed, as yet hardly risen—are the rest: Miss Garrison, the light and lyric soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House heard here with pleasure when the company visited Boston in 1916; Mme. Leginska, the pianist of salient power and individuality; Miss Nash, pianist also, who was judged unusually promising when she played with the orchestra in Cambridge last autumn; the richly and delicately talented Miss Novaes, pianist yet again, whom Bostonians know so far by a single but by no means forgotten recital; and Miss Seydel, the violinist, daughter of a double-bass player in the orchestra, whom it, kindly conductors and a kindly management have nurtured from her beginnings. In and out of Boston, Mmes. Garrison, Leginska and Novaes have proved their just title to the Symphony Concerts, while Mmes. Nash and Seydel have maintained a promise that seems to justify such notable encouragement.

Time was—and within easy memory—when such well-tested youth was mistakenly overlooked at the Symphony Concerts; when middle age and long-settled reputations usually "assisted" the orchestra; when from season to season, returning and expected singers and virtuosi came too often from the artists' room. It is quite true that a soloist, with Dr. Muck and the orchestra for background, should be of well-tested and generally acknowledged ability; but there are an ability and a rank of youth as well as an ability and a rank of maturity. There is also a signal promise the just fostering of which may easily excuse an occasional misjudgment. Moreover, any institution so long and thoroughly established as the Symphony Concerts on stage and in auditorium needs perennial quickening lest the joints stiffen and it stumble into comfortable routine. New personalities, though they may not be of the ripest, and fresh talents, though they have still to mature, bring enlivening interest to all but the hide-bound devotees of the sure and regular thing in the time-honored—or much more truly the time-deadened—course. A wise management has willed a year of comparative youth in the soloists. A responsively curious public, out of personal and musical interest, for the vitality of the concerts and the arts they serve, should listen well content.

Here in Boston

Two pleasant items of news come today from Symphony Hall. One notes that the subscription of the pending series of Symphony Concerts is larger than was that of last September at the corresponding date. Nearly all the places for the afternoon concerts have been taken; while there has been an appreciable increase in the sale of seats for the evening concerts. For the convenience of the public, the subscription department now has more accessible quarters in the corridor on Massachusetts avenue.

The other item records the happy fact that none of the eight members of the orchestra, liable to military service, has yet been taken for the army. One was called and exempted; the other seven hold numbers too high to fall within present lists. Thus the orchestra will remain virtually intact for another season. The adventurous Mr. Longy is even secure in his way back from France.

Because of managerial differences the concerts in Boston this season of Mr. McCormack and Mme. Galli-Curci will take place, not in Symphony Hall as heretofore, but in the Opera House. He will reappear there on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 14, and she on Sunday afternoon, Sept. 30, with tickets on sale from Sept. 17. The tenor will be heard again in February and also at the Symphony Concerts; and the soprano with the Chicago Opera Company when it makes a mid-winter visit to Boston.

'om JOURNAL

ddress: Providence, R. I.

ite.....

SERIES OF SUBSCRIPTION CONCERTS OPENS OCT 30

Five Programmes Take Place of Symphony Orchestra Season Here.

The series of five subscription concerts which are to take the place of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season here will open Oct. 30. The concerts will be given in Infantry Hall and three of them will be by the symphony orchestra. The dates to follow are Dec. 18, Jan. 15, Feb. 12 and March 19, all on Tuesday evenings.

The first concert of the series calls for the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck, with Geraldine Farrar as soloist. The second will be a violin recital by Fritz Kreisler. The third will be by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Rosamund Young, soprano, as soloist. The fourth will be a joint concert, by Madame Louise Homer, the distinguished American contralto, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist. The fifth concert will be by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Anton Witek, its concert master, as soloist.

Increased work in Boston has necessitated cutting down the number of concerts the Boston Orchestra has given in this city. Charles A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, has arranged the forthcoming series and has provided similar courses with success in Worcester, Pittsburgh and Rochester for several years.

Evening, Sept 10

SYMPHONY REPERTOIRE

It is no departure from his habit in the past for Dr. Muck to maintain complete silence concerning his plans for the symphony concerts which begin Oct. 12-13. Yet enough is known of the works he has been studying during the past summer to announce, with reservations, some of the music most likely to be heard. Dr. Muck, one of the most industrious of men, has been spending a considerable part of his vacation at Seal Harbor, Me., preparing various scores for performance.

Even more difficult this year than in past years has it become to secure novelties in the sense of new music. Anticipating this increased dearth, Dr. Muck has been looking over scores in the library of the orchestra which have not been heard here during his engagement, and some of them not for many years.

The programs for the coming season will draw on the standard classics in the same measure as in the past. It is probable that the performance last season of one of Haydn's little and almost forgotten symphonies will encourage Dr. Muck to bring out others of these delightful little works. There will be the usual number of works by Beach, Beethoven, Brahms, Liszt and the like. Dr. Muck has been restudying the D minor symphony of Schumann. He has also been working on Berlioz's "King Lear" and "Franc Juges" overtures and Balakireff's overture on a Spanish theme.

Raff's symphony, "Im Walde," which has not been played since 1902, under Mr. Gericke; Rheinberger's "Wallenstein" symphony, which has not appeared on a program since 1885, and Bizet's suite "Roma," not heard since 1903; the introduction to the third act of Goldmark's opera, "The Cricket on the Hearth," not heard since 1897; the "Prometheus" overture, not heard since 1899; the overture to Siegfried Wagner's opera, "Die Baerenhaeuter," Svendsen's Fourth symphony in D minor, never played at a symphony concert, may be given. Of more modern works which are likely to be performed may mentioned Bantock's overture, "Pierrot of the Minute," last played here in 1909; Fritz Delius's "In a Summer Garden," played by Mr. Fiedler in the spring of 1912, and his "Appalachia," which has never been heard here, although announced several times; Lindoff's "Baba Yaga," Scriabin's "Poeme de l'Extase" and William Wallace's symphonic poem, "Villon," the first performed in 1911, the second in 1910 and the third in 1912.

Dr. Muck has also been looking at Grieg's suite, "Aus Holberg's Zeit;" Lalo's charming suite, "Namouna," played at a pension fund concert two years ago; Rimsky Korsakoff's "Mlada" and Seckles' "Serenade," the last two being new.

Herald, Sept 9

Symphony Repertoire

It is no departure from his habit in the past for Dr. Muck to maintain complete silence concerning his plans for the symphony concerts which begin Oct. 12-13. Yet enough is known of the works he has been studying during the past summer to announce, with reservations, some of the music most likely to be heard. Dr. Muck, one of the most industrious of men, has been spending a considerable part of his vacation at Seal Harbor, Me., preparing various scores for performance.

Even more difficult this year than in past years has it become to secure novelties in the sense of new music. Anticipating this increased dearth, Dr. Muck has been looking over scores in the library of the orchestra which have not been heard here during his engagement, and some of them not for many years.

The programs for the coming season will draw on the standard classics in the same measure as in the past. It is probable that the performance last season of one of Haydn's little and almost forgotten symphonies will encourage Dr. Muck to bring out others of these delightful little works. There will be the usual number of works by Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Liszt and the like. Dr. Muck has been restudying the D minor symphony of Schumann. He has also been working on Berlioz's "King Lear" and "Franc Juges" overtures and Balakireff's overture on a Spanish theme.

Raff's symphony, "Im Walde," which has not been played since 1902, under Mr. Gericke; Rheinberger's "Wallenstein" symphony, which has not appeared on a program since 1885, and Bizet's suite "Roma," not heard since 1903; the introduction to the third act of Goldmark's opera, "The Cricket on the Hearth," not heard since 1897; the "Prometheus" overture, not heard since 1899; the overture to Siegfried Wagner's opera, "Die Baerenhaeuter." Svendsen's fourth Symphony in D minor, never played at a symphony concert, may be given. Of more modern works which are likely to be performed may be mentioned Bantock's overture, "Pierrot of the Minute," last played here in 1909; Fritz Delius's "In a Summer Garden," played by Mr. Fiedler in the spring of 1912, and his "Appalachia," which has never been heard here, although announced several times; Liadoff's "Baba Yaga," Scriabin's "Poeme de l'Extase" and William Wallace's symphonic poem, "Villon," the the first performed in 1911, the second in 1910 and the third in 1912.

Dr. Muck has also been looking at Grieg's suite, "Aus Holberg's Zeit"; Lalo's charming suite, "Namouna," played at a pension fund concert two years ago; Rimsky Korsakoff's "Mlada" and Seckles's "Serenade," the last two being new.

3

Transcript - Sept 6.

New Faces and New Talents for the Symphony Concerts

(Photograph by Apeda, New York)

Guiomar Novaes, Pianist

(Photograph by Mishkin, New York)

Mabel Garrison, Singer

NEWS OF MUSIC

An Inning for Youth at the Symphony Concerts—The Young Soloists in Prospect—Mme. Galli-Curci and Mr. McCormack at Hand—A Whimsey About Mr. Toscanini—Items and Amusements

NEW blood and young blood courses auspiciously through the ten "assisting artists"—the four soloists from the orchestra aside—announced for the Symphony Concerts of autumn, winter and spring. Of the familiar figures of many a year on the stage of Symphony Hall, only Mr. Paderewski, the pianist; Mr. Kreisler, the violinist, and Mme. Melba, the singer, stand on the list. Betwixt and between are Mr. McCormack, the tenor, and Mr. Zimbalist, the violinist, each of whom has passed his first youth and established his place, though, hitherto, he has been called only once to these concerts. Young and rising—in two instances, indeed, as yet hardly risen—are the rest: Miss Garrison, the light and lyric soprano of the Metropolitan Opera House heard here with pleasure when the company visited Boston in 1916; Mme. Leginska, the pianist of salient power and individuality; Miss Nash, pianist also, who was judged unusually promising when she played with the orchestra in Cambridge last autumn; the richly and delicately talented Miss Novaes, pianist yet again, whom Bostonians know so far by a single but by no means forgotten recital; and Miss Seydel, the violinist, daughter of a double-bass player in the orchestra, whom it, kindly conductors and a kindly management have nurtured from her beginnings. In and out of Boston, Mmes. Garrison, Leginska and Novaes have proved their just title to the Symphony Concerts, while Mmes. Nash and Seydel have maintained a promise that seems to justify such notable encouragement.

Time was—and within easy memory—when such well-tested youth was mistakenly overlooked at the Symphony Concerts; when middle age and long-settled reputations usually "assisted" the orchestra; when from season to season, returning and expected singers and virtuosi came too often from the artists' room. It is quite true that a soloist, with Dr. Muck and the orchestra for background, should be of well-tested and generally acknowledged ability; but there are an ability and a rank of youth as well as an ability and a rank of maturity. There is also a signal promise the just fostering of which may easily excuse an occasional misjudgment. Moreover, any institution so long and thoroughly established as the Symphony Concerts on stage and in auditorium needs perennial quickening lest the joints stiffen and it stumble into comfortable routine. New personalities, though they may not be of the ripest, and fresh talents, though they have still to mature, bring enlivening interest to all but the hide-bound devotees of the sure and regular thing in the time-honored—or much more truly the time-deadened—course. A wise management has willed a year of comparative youth in the soloists. A responsively curious public, out of personal and musical interest, for the vitality of the concerts and the arts they serve, should listen well content.

Here in Boston

Two pleasant items of news come today from Symphony Hall. One notes that the subscription of the pending series of Symphony Concerts is larger than was that of last September at the corresponding date. Nearly all the places for the afternoon concerts have been taken; while there has been an appreciable increase in the sale of seats for the evening concerts. For the convenience of the public, the subscription department now has more accessible quarters in the corridor on Massachusetts avenue.

The other item records the happy fact that none of the eight members of the orchestra, liable to military service, has yet been taken for the army. One was called and exempted; the other seven hold numbers too high to fall within present lists. Thus the orchestra will remain virtually intact for another season. The adventurous Mr. Longy is even secure in his way back from France.

Because of managerial differences the concerts in Boston this season of Mr. McCormack and Mme. Galli-Curci will take place, not in Symphony Hall as heretofore, but in the Opera House. He will reappear there on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 14, and she on Sunday afternoon, Sept. 30, with tickets on sale from Sept. 17. The tenor will be heard again in February and also at the Symphony Concerts; and the soprano with the Chicago Opera Company when it makes a mid-winter visit to Boston.

·om JOURNAL

ddress: Providence, R. I.

ite.....

SERIES OF SUBSCRIPTION CONCERTS OPENS OCT 30

Five Programmes Take Place of Symphony Orchestra Season Here.

The series of five subscription concerts which are to take the place of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season here will open Oct. 30. The concerts will be given in Infantry Hall and three of them will be by the symphony orchestra. The dates to follow are Dec. 18, Jan. 15, Feb. 12 and March 19, all on Tuesday evenings.

The first concert of the series calls for the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck, with Geraldine Farrar as soloist. The second will be a violin recital by Fritz Kreisler. The third will be by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Rosamund Young, soprano, as soloist. The fourth will be a joint concert, by Madame Louise Homer, the distinguished American contralto, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist. The fifth concert will be by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Anton Witek, its concert master, as soloist.

Increased work in Boston has necessitated cutting down the number of concerts the Boston Orchestra has given in this city. Charles A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, has arranged the forthcoming series and has provided similar courses with success in Worcester, Pittsburgh and Rochester for several years.

Evening, Sept 10

SYMPHONY REPERTOIRE

It is no departure from his habit in the past for Dr. Muck to maintain complete silence concerning his plans for the symphony concerts which begin Oct. 12-13. Yet enough is known of the works he has been studying during the past summer to announce, with reservations, some of the music most likely to be heard. Dr. Muck, one of the most industrious of men, has been spending a considerable part of his vacation at Seal Harbor, Me., preparing various scores for performance.

Even more difficult this year than in past years has it become to secure novelties in the sense of new music. Anticipating this increased dearth, Dr. Muck has been looking over scores in the library of the orchestra which have not been heard here during his engagement, and some of them not for many years.

The programs for the coming season will draw on the standard classics in the same measure as in the past. It is probable that the performance last season of one of Haydn's little and almost forgotten symphonies will encourage Dr. Muck to bring out others of these delightful little works. There will be the usual number of works by Beach, Beethoven, Brahms, Liszt and the like. Dr. Muck has been restudying the D minor symphony of Schumann. He has also been working on Berlioz's "King Lear" and "Franc Juges" overtures and Balakireff's overture on a Spanish theme.

Raff's symphony, "Im Walde," which has not been played since 1902, under Mr. Gericke; Rheinberger's "Wallenstein" symphony, which has not appeared on a program since 1885, and Bizet's suite "Roma," not heard since 1903; the introduction to the third act of Goldmark's opera, "The Cricket on the Hearth," not heard since 1897; the "Prometheus" overture, not heard since 1899; the overture to Siegfried Wagner's opera, "Die Baerenhaeuter," Svendsen's Fourth symphony in D minor, never played at a symphony concert, may be given. Of more modern works which are likely to be performed may mentioned Bantock's overture, "Pierrot of the Minute," last played here in 1909; Fritz Delius's "In a Summer Garden," played by Mr. Fiedler in the spring of 1912, and his "Appalachia," which has never been heard here, although announced several times; Lindoff's "Baba Yaga," Scriabin's "Poeme de l'Extase" and William Wallace's symphonic poem, "Villon," the first performed in 1911, the second in 1910 and the third in 1912.

Dr. Muck has also been looking at Grieg's suite, "Aus Holberg's Zeit;" Lalo's charming suite, "Namouna," played at a pension fund concert two years ago; Rimsky Korsakoff's "Mlada" and Seckles' "Serenade," the last two being new.

Herald, Sept 9

Symphony Repertoire

It is no departure from his habit in the past for Dr. Muck to maintain complete silence concerning his plans for the symphony concerts which begin Oct. 12-13. Yet enough is known of the works he has been studying during the past summer to announce, with reservations, some of the music most likely to be heard. Dr. Muck, one of the most industrious of men, has been spending a considerable part of his vacation at Seal Harbor, Me., preparing various scores for performance.

Even more difficult this year than in past years has it become to secure novelties in the sense of new music. Anticipating this increased dearth, Dr. Muck has been looking over scores in the library of the orchestra which have not been heard here during his engagement, and some of them not for many years.

The programs for the coming season will draw on the standard classics in the same measure as in the past. It is probable that the performance last season of one of Haydn's little and almost forgotten symphonies will encourage Dr. Muck to bring out others of these delightful little works. There will be the usual number of works by Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Liszt and the like. Dr. Muck has been restudying the D minor symphony of Schumann. He has also been working on Berlioz's "King Lear" and "Franc Juges" overtures and Balakireff's overture on a Spanish theme.

Raff's symphony, "Im Walde," which has not been played since 1902, under Mr. Gericke; Rheinberger's "Wallenstein" symphony, which has not appeared on a program since 1885, and Bizet's suite "Roma," not heard since 1903; the introduction to the third act of Goldmark's opera, "The Cricket on the Hearth," not heard since 1897; the "Prometheus" overture, not heard since 1899; the overture to Siegfried Wagner's opera, "Die Baerenhaeuter." Svendsen's fourth Symphony in D minor, never played at a symphony concert, may be given. Of more modern works which are likely to be performed may be mentioned Bantock's overture, "Pierrot of the Minute," last played here in 1909; Fritz Delius's "In a Summer Garden," played by Mr. Fiedler in the spring of 1912, and his "Appalachia," which has never been heard here, although announced several times; Liadoff's "Baba Yaga," Scriabin's "Poeme de l'Extase" and William Wallace's symphonic poem, "Villon," the the first performed in 1911, the second in 1910 and the third in 1912.

Dr. Muck has also been looking at Grieg's suite, "Aus Holberg's Zeit"; Lalo's charming suite, "Namouna," played at a pension fund concert two years ago; Rimsky Korsakoff's "Mlada" and Seckles's "Serenade," the last two being new.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

BRILLIANT YEAR FOR BROOKLYN INSTITUTE

Taft, Gerard, Van Dyke and Peary Among the Notable Lecturers.

SIR GEORGE H. REID TO TALK.

Wide Range of Subjects to Be Discussed by Men and Women With National Reputations.

The coming year of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences promises to be one of the most brilliant in its long history. Not only is the variety of educational and recreative course more comprehensive than usual, but arrangements have been made to bring to Brooklyn some of the most prominent figures in the nation, including former President William Howard Taft, former Ambassador to Germany James W. Gerard, Dr. Henry Van Dyke and Rear Admiral Peary. Sir George H. Reid, late Premier of Australia, will also make an address. The Institute has brought together an array of lecturers of nation-wide fame.

Dr. Henry van Dyke will make a speech on Friday evening, October 7, on "Our Unity and the War." Sir George Reid will deliver an address on a subject to be announced later. Rear Admiral Peary will speak on "Ex-Arctic Explorations" on Sunday afternoon, January 6. Ex-Ambassador Gerard will speak on "General Staff of the War" on Sunday afternoon, January 10. Admiral Peary's lecture, "Nearest the Pole," will be given on Friday evening, December 1.

The following are the principal addresses for the year includes the following:

Six lectures on "The Poetry and Philosophy of Browning," by Professor Howard Crosby Butler, Monday evenings, October 2, 9, 16, 23, 30 and November 6.

Six lectures on "The Drama: Its Law and Its Life," by Professor Brander Matthews, Tuesday afternoons, October 3, 10, 17, 24, 31 and November 7.

Five lectures on "The Spirit of France," by Professor A. Guyot Cameron, Wednesday afternoons, October 11, 18, 25 and November 1 and 8.

Five illustrated lectures on "Japan: Its Life, Its Art," by Professor Arthur May Knapp, Thursday afternoons, October 12, 19, 26 and November 2 and 9.

Five lectures on "The Spirit of the Hindu," by Professor Arthur W. Ryder, Friday afternoons, October 13, 20, 27 and November 3 and 10.

Five lectures on "Current History," by Professor Albert Bushnell Hart, Saturday afternoons, October 14, 21 and 28, November 4 and 11.

Four illustrated stories for adults by Miss Cora Urquhart Potter, Monday afternoons, October 16 and 23, November 6 and 20.

Three lecture demonstrations on "Wireless Telegraphy," by Mrs. Frank K. Perkins, Lecturer, Tuesday afternoon and November 6.

Six lectures on "Modern Intellectual Movements," by Professor Hugo Münsterberg, Tuesday afternoons, October 17, 24, 31 and November 7, 14 and 21.

Five lectures on "Modern Intellectual Movements," by Professor Hugo Münsterberg, Wednesday afternoons, October 18, 25 and November 1, 8 and 15.

Five lectures on "Modern Intellectual Movements," by Professor Hugo Münsterberg, Thursday evenings, October 19, 26 and November 2, 9 and 16.

Five lectures on "Modern Intellectual Movements," by Professor Hugo Münsterberg, Friday evenings, October 20, 27 and November 3, 10 and 17.

Five lectures on "Modern Intellectual Movements," by Professor Hugo Münsterberg, Saturday afternoons, October 21 and 28, November 4, 11 and 18.

Five illustrated lectures by Professor Lewis Austin Scott Pelton, of Pratt Institute, Saturday afternoons, October 21, 28, November 4, 11 and 18.

Five illustrated lectures by Professor Lewis Austin Scott Pelton, of Pratt Institute, Saturday afternoons, October 21, 28, November 4, 11 and 18.

Six lectures on "Ancient Cities of Greece," by Professor Allen Marquand, Dean of the Graduate School of Princeton University, Monday afternoons, October 23 and 30, November 6, 13, 20 and 27.

Six lectures on "Ancient Cities of Greece," by Professor Allen Marquand, Dean of the Graduate School of Princeton University, Monday evenings, October 23 and 30, November 6, 13, 20 and 27.

Six lectures on "Ancient Cities of Greece," by Professor Allen Marquand, Dean of the Graduate School of Princeton University, Tuesday afternoons, October 24 and 31, November 7, 14, 21 and 28.

Six lectures on "Ancient Cities of Greece," by Professor Allen Marquand, Dean of the Graduate School of Princeton University, Tuesday evenings, October 24 and 31, November 7, 14, 21 and 28.

Six lectures on "Ancient Cities of Greece," by Professor Allen Marquand, Dean of the Graduate School of Princeton University, Wednesday afternoons, October 25, November 1, 8, 15, 22 and 29.

Six lectures on "Ancient Cities of Greece," by Professor Allen Marquand, Dean of the Graduate School of Princeton University, Wednesday evenings, October 25, November 1, 8, 15, 22 and 29.

Six lectures on "Ancient Cities of Greece," by Professor Allen Marquand, Dean of the Graduate School of Princeton University, Thursday afternoons, October 26, November 2, 9, 16, 23 and 30.

Six lectures on "Ancient Cities of Greece," by Professor Allen Marquand, Dean of the Graduate School of Princeton University, Thursday evenings, October 26, November 2, 9, 16, 23 and 30.

Six lectures on "Ancient Cities of Greece," by Professor Allen Marquand, Dean of the Graduate School of Princeton University, Friday afternoons, October 27, November 3, 10, 17, 24 and December 1.

Six lectures on "Ancient Cities of Greece," by Professor Allen Marquand, Dean of the Graduate School of Princeton University, Friday evenings, October 27, November 3, 10, 17, 24 and December 1.

Six lectures on "Ancient Cities of Greece," by Professor Allen Marquand, Dean of the Graduate School of Princeton University, Saturday afternoons, October 28, November 4, 11, 18, 25 and December 2.

Six lectures on "Ancient Cities of Greece," by Professor Allen Marquand, Dean of the Graduate School of Princeton University, Saturday evenings, October 28, November 4, 11, 18, 25 and December 2.

Four lectures on "The Message of the Hour," by Professor Hugo Münsterberg, Monday evenings, March 26, April 2, 9 and 16.

Four lectures on "The Message of the Hour," by Professor Hugo Münsterberg, Tuesday afternoons, March 27, April 3, 10 and 17.

Four lectures on "The Message of the Hour," by Professor Hugo Münsterberg, Tuesday evenings, March 27, April 3, 10 and 17.

Four lectures on "The Message of the Hour," by Professor Hugo Münsterberg, Wednesday afternoons, March 28, April 4, 11 and 18.

Four lectures on "The Message of the Hour," by Professor Hugo Münsterberg, Wednesday evenings, March 28, April 4, 11 and 18.

Four lectures on "The Message of the Hour," by Professor Hugo Münsterberg, Thursday afternoons, March 29, April 5, 12 and 19.

Four lectures on "The Message of the Hour," by Professor Hugo Münsterberg, Thursday evenings, March 29, April 5, 12 and 19.

Four lectures on "The Message of the Hour," by Professor Hugo Münsterberg, Friday afternoons, March 30, April 6, 13 and 20.

Four lectures on "The Message of the Hour," by Professor Hugo Münsterberg, Friday evenings, March 30, April 6, 13 and 20.

Four lectures on "The Message of the Hour," by Professor Hugo Münsterberg, Saturday afternoons, March 31, April 7, 14 and 21.

Four lectures on "The Message of the Hour," by Professor Hugo Münsterberg, Saturday evenings, March 31, April 7, 14 and 21.

Four lectures on "Naples and Its Environs," by Professor Arthur F. Kinney, Monday afternoons, April 3, 10, 17 and 24.

Four lectures on "Naples and Its Environs," by Professor Arthur F. Kinney, Monday evenings, April 3, 10, 17 and 24.

Four lectures on "Naples and Its Environs," by Professor Arthur F. Kinney, Tuesday afternoons, April 4, 11, 18 and 25.

Four lectures on "Naples and Its Environs," by Professor Arthur F. Kinney, Tuesday evenings, April 4, 11, 18 and 25.

Four lectures on "Naples and Its Environs," by Professor Arthur F. Kinney, Wednesday afternoons, April 5, 12, 19 and 26.

Four lectures on "Naples and Its Environs," by Professor Arthur F. Kinney, Wednesday evenings, April 5, 12, 19 and 26.

Four lectures on "Naples and Its Environs," by Professor Arthur F. Kinney, Thursday afternoons, April 6, 13, 20 and 27.

Four lectures on "Naples and Its Environs," by Professor Arthur F. Kinney, Thursday evenings, April 6, 13, 20 and 27.

Four lectures on "Naples and Its Environs," by Professor Arthur F. Kinney, Friday afternoons, April 7, 14, 21 and 28.

Four lectures on "Naples and Its Environs," by Professor Arthur F. Kinney, Friday evenings, April 7, 14, 21 and 28.

Four lectures on "Naples and Its Environs," by Professor Arthur F. Kinney, Saturday afternoons, April 8, 15, 22 and 29.

Four lectures on "Naples and Its Environs," by Professor Arthur F. Kinney, Saturday evenings, April 8, 15, 22 and 29.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Monday afternoons, March 1, 8, 15 and 22, and April 5.

Four illustrated lectures on "Life in the Tropics," by Professor [illegible], Monday evenings, March 1, 8, 15 and 22, and April 5.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Tuesday afternoons, March 2, 9, 16 and 23, and April 6.

Four illustrated lectures on "Life in the Tropics," by Professor [illegible], Tuesday evenings, March 2, 9, 16 and 23, and April 6.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Wednesday afternoons, March 3, 10, 17 and 24, and April 7.

Four illustrated lectures on "Life in the Tropics," by Professor [illegible], Wednesday evenings, March 3, 10, 17 and 24, and April 7.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Thursday afternoons, March 4, 11, 18 and 25, and April 8.

Four illustrated lectures on "Life in the Tropics," by Professor [illegible], Thursday evenings, March 4, 11, 18 and 25, and April 8.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Friday afternoons, March 5, 12, 19 and 26, and April 9.

Four illustrated lectures on "Life in the Tropics," by Professor [illegible], Friday evenings, March 5, 12, 19 and 26, and April 9.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Saturday afternoons, March 6, 13, 20 and 27, and April 10.

Four illustrated lectures on "Life in the Tropics," by Professor [illegible], Saturday evenings, March 6, 13, 20 and 27, and April 10.

Four lectures on "Literature and War," by Dr. Theodore F. Herman, Monday afternoons, February 5, 12, 19 and 26.

Four lectures on "Literature and War," by Dr. Theodore F. Herman, Monday evenings, February 5, 12, 19 and 26.

Four lectures on "Literature and War," by Dr. Theodore F. Herman, Tuesday afternoons, February 6, 13, 20 and 27.

Four lectures on "Literature and War," by Dr. Theodore F. Herman, Tuesday evenings, February 6, 13, 20 and 27.

Four lectures on "Literature and War," by Dr. Theodore F. Herman, Wednesday afternoons, February 7, 14, 21 and 28.

Four lectures on "Literature and War," by Dr. Theodore F. Herman, Wednesday evenings, February 7, 14, 21 and 28.

Four lectures on "Literature and War," by Dr. Theodore F. Herman, Thursday afternoons, February 8, 15, 22 and 29.

Four lectures on "Literature and War," by Dr. Theodore F. Herman, Thursday evenings, February 8, 15, 22 and 29.

Four lectures on "Literature and War," by Dr. Theodore F. Herman, Friday afternoons, February 9, 16, 23 and March 1.

Four lectures on "Literature and War," by Dr. Theodore F. Herman, Friday evenings, February 9, 16, 23 and March 1.

Four lectures on "Literature and War," by Dr. Theodore F. Herman, Saturday afternoons, February 10, 17, 24 and March 2.

Four lectures on "Literature and War," by Dr. Theodore F. Herman, Saturday evenings, February 10, 17, 24 and March 2.

Five lectures on "Americans of the Past and Present Day: Problems," by Dr. William Hazlett Upson, Monday evenings, February 19 and 26, March 4, 11 and 18.

Five lectures on "Americans of the Past and Present Day: Problems," by Dr. William Hazlett Upson, Tuesday evenings, February 20, March 5, 12, 19 and 26.

Five lectures on "Americans of the Past and Present Day: Problems," by Dr. William Hazlett Upson, Wednesday evenings, February 21, March 6, 13, 20 and 27.

Five lectures on "Americans of the Past and Present Day: Problems," by Dr. William Hazlett Upson, Thursday evenings, February 22, March 7, 14, 21 and 28.

Five lectures on "Americans of the Past and Present Day: Problems," by Dr. William Hazlett Upson, Friday evenings, February 23, March 8, 15, 22 and 29.

Five lectures on "Literature and War," by Dr. Theodore F. Herman, Saturday afternoons, February 24, March 4, 11, 18 and 25.

Five lectures on "Literature and War," by Dr. Theodore F. Herman, Saturday evenings, February 24, March 4, 11, 18 and 25.

Four lectures on "First and Last Things," by Professor Hugo Münsterberg, Monday afternoons, March 26, April 2, 9 and 16.

Four lectures on "First and Last Things," by Professor Hugo Münsterberg, Monday evenings, March 26, April 2, 9 and 16.

Four lectures on "First and Last Things," by Professor Hugo Münsterberg, Tuesday afternoons, March 27, April 3, 10 and 17.

Four lectures on "First and Last Things," by Professor Hugo Münsterberg, Tuesday evenings, March 27, April 3, 10 and 17.

Four lectures on "First and Last Things," by Professor Hugo Münsterberg, Wednesday afternoons, March 28, April 4, 11 and 18.

Four lectures on "First and Last Things," by Professor Hugo Münsterberg, Wednesday evenings, March 28, April 4, 11 and 18.

Four lectures on "First and Last Things," by Professor Hugo Münsterberg, Thursday afternoons, March 29, April 5, 12 and 19.

Four lectures on "First and Last Things," by Professor Hugo Münsterberg, Thursday evenings, March 29, April 5, 12 and 19.

Four lectures on "First and Last Things," by Professor Hugo Münsterberg, Friday afternoons, March 30, April 6, 13 and 20.

Four lectures on "First and Last Things," by Professor Hugo Münsterberg, Friday evenings, March 30, April 6, 13 and 20.

Four lectures on "First and Last Things," by Professor Hugo Münsterberg, Saturday afternoons, March 31, April 7, 14 and 21.

Four lectures on "First and Last Things," by Professor Hugo Münsterberg, Saturday evenings, March 31, April 7, 14 and 21.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Monday afternoons, April 5, 12, 19 and 26.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Monday evenings, April 5, 12, 19 and 26.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Tuesday afternoons, April 6, 13, 20 and 27.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Tuesday evenings, April 6, 13, 20 and 27.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Wednesday afternoons, April 7, 14, 21 and 28.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Wednesday evenings, April 7, 14, 21 and 28.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Thursday afternoons, April 8, 15, 22 and 29.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Thursday evenings, April 8, 15, 22 and 29.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Friday afternoons, April 9, 16, 23 and 30.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Friday evenings, April 9, 16, 23 and 30.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Saturday afternoons, April 10, 17, 24 and May 1.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Saturday evenings, April 10, 17, 24 and May 1.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Monday afternoons, April 11, 18, 25 and May 2.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Monday evenings, April 11, 18, 25 and May 2.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Tuesday afternoons, April 12, 19, 26 and May 3.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Tuesday evenings, April 12, 19, 26 and May 3.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Wednesday afternoons, April 13, 20, 27 and May 4.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Wednesday evenings, April 13, 20, 27 and May 4.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Thursday afternoons, April 14, 21, 28 and May 5.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Thursday evenings, April 14, 21, 28 and May 5.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Friday afternoons, April 15, 22, 29 and May 6.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Friday evenings, April 15, 22, 29 and May 6.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Saturday afternoons, April 16, 23, 30 and May 7.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Saturday evenings, April 16, 23, 30 and May 7.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Monday afternoons, April 17, 24, May 1 and 8.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Monday evenings, April 17, 24, May 1 and 8.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Tuesday afternoons, April 18, 25, May 2 and 9.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Tuesday evenings, April 18, 25, May 2 and 9.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Wednesday afternoons, April 19, 26, May 3 and 10.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Wednesday evenings, April 19, 26, May 3 and 10.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Thursday afternoons, April 20, 27, May 4 and 11.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Thursday evenings, April 20, 27, May 4 and 11.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Friday afternoons, April 21, 28, May 5 and 12.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Friday evenings, April 21, 28, May 5 and 12.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Saturday afternoons, April 22, 29, May 6 and 13.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Saturday evenings, April 22, 29, May 6 and 13.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Monday afternoons, April 23, May 7 and 14.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Monday evenings, April 23, May 7 and 14.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Tuesday afternoons, April 24, May 8 and 15.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Tuesday evenings, April 24, May 8 and 15.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Wednesday afternoons, April 25, May 9 and 16.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Wednesday evenings, April 25, May 9 and 16.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Thursday afternoons, April 26, May 10 and 17.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Thursday evenings, April 26, May 10 and 17.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Friday afternoons, April 27, May 11 and 18.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Friday evenings, April 27, May 11 and 18.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Saturday afternoons, April 28, May 12 and 19.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Saturday evenings, April 28, May 12 and 19.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Monday afternoons, April 29, May 13 and 20.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Monday evenings, April 29, May 13 and 20.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Tuesday afternoons, April 30, May 14 and 21.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Tuesday evenings, April 30, May 14 and 21.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Wednesday afternoons, May 1, 8, 15 and 22.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Wednesday evenings, May 1, 8, 15 and 22.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Thursday afternoons, May 2, 9, 16 and 23.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Thursday evenings, May 2, 9, 16 and 23.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Friday afternoons, May 3, 10, 17 and 24.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Friday evenings, May 3, 10, 17 and 24.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Saturday afternoons, May 4, 11, 18 and 25.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Saturday evenings, May 4, 11, 18 and 25.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Monday afternoons, May 5, 12, 19 and 26.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Monday evenings, May 5, 12, 19 and 26.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Tuesday afternoons, May 6, 13, 20 and 27.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Tuesday evenings, May 6, 13, 20 and 27.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Wednesday afternoons, May 7, 14, 21 and 28.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Wednesday evenings, May 7, 14, 21 and 28.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Thursday afternoons, May 8, 15, 22 and 29.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Thursday evenings, May 8, 15, 22 and 29.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Friday afternoons, May 9, 16, 23 and 30.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Friday evenings, May 9, 16, 23 and 30.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Saturday afternoons, May 10, 17, 24 and 31.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Saturday evenings, May 10, 17, 24 and 31.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Monday afternoons, May 11, 18, 25 and June 1.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Monday evenings, May 11, 18, 25 and June 1.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Tuesday afternoons, May 12, 19, 26 and June 2.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Tuesday evenings, May 12, 19, 26 and June 2.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Wednesday afternoons, May 13, 20, 27 and June 3.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Wednesday evenings, May 13, 20, 27 and June 3.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Thursday afternoons, May 14, 21, 28 and June 4.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Thursday evenings, May 14, 21, 28 and June 4.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Friday afternoons, May 15, 22, 29 and June 5.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Friday evenings, May 15, 22, 29 and June 5.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Saturday afternoons, May 16, 23, 30 and June 6.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Saturday evenings, May 16, 23, 30 and June 6.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Monday afternoons, May 17, 24, June 1 and 8.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Monday evenings, May 17, 24, June 1 and 8.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Tuesday afternoons, May 18, 25, June 2 and 9.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Tuesday evenings, May 18, 25, June 2 and 9.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Wednesday afternoons, May 19, 26, June 3 and 10.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Wednesday evenings, May 19, 26, June 3 and 10.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Thursday afternoons, May 20, 27, June 4 and 11.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Thursday evenings, May 20, 27, June 4 and 11.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Friday afternoons, May 21, 28, June 5 and 12.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Friday evenings, May 21, 28, June 5 and 12.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Saturday afternoons, May 22, 29, June 6 and 13.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Saturday evenings, May 22, 29, June 6 and 13.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Monday afternoons, May 23, June 7 and 14.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Monday evenings, May 23, June 7 and 14.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Tuesday afternoons, May 24, June 8 and 15.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Tuesday evenings, May 24, June 8 and 15.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Wednesday afternoons, May 25, June 9 and 16.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Wednesday evenings, May 25, June 9 and 16.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Thursday afternoons, May 26, June 10 and 17.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Thursday evenings, May 26, June 10 and 17.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Friday afternoons, May 27, June 11 and 18.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Friday evenings, May 27, June 11 and 18.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Saturday afternoons, May 28, June 12 and 19.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Saturday evenings, May 28, June 12 and 19.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Monday afternoons, May 29, June 13 and 20.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Monday evenings, May 29, June 13 and 20.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Tuesday afternoons, May 30, June 14 and 21.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Tuesday evenings, May 30, June 14 and 21.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Wednesday afternoons, May 31, June 15 and 22.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Wednesday evenings, May 31, June 15 and 22.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Thursday afternoons, June 1, 8, 15 and 22.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Thursday evenings, June 1, 8, 15 and 22.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Friday afternoons, June 2, 9, 16 and 23.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Friday evenings, June 2, 9, 16 and 23.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Saturday afternoons, June 3, 10, 17 and 24.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Saturday evenings, June 3, 10, 17 and 24.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Monday afternoons, June 4, 11, 18 and 25.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Monday evenings, June 4, 11, 18 and 25.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Tuesday afternoons, June 5, 12, 19 and 26.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Tuesday evenings, June 5, 12, 19 and 26.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Wednesday afternoons, June 6, 13, 20 and 27.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Wednesday evenings, June 6, 13, 20 and 27.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Thursday afternoons, June 7, 14, 21 and 28.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Thursday evenings, June 7, 14, 21 and 28.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Friday afternoons, June 8, 15, 22 and 29.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Friday evenings, June 8, 15, 22 and 29.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Saturday afternoons, June 9, 16, 23 and 30.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Saturday evenings, June 9, 16, 23 and 30.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Monday afternoons, June 10, 17, 24 and July 1.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Monday evenings, June 10, 17, 24 and July 1.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Tuesday afternoons, June 11, 18, 25 and July 2.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Tuesday evenings, June 11, 18, 25 and July 2.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Wednesday afternoons, June 12, 19, 26 and July 3.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Wednesday evenings, June 12, 19, 26 and July 3.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Thursday afternoons, June 13, 20, 27 and July 4.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Thursday evenings, June 13, 20, 27 and July 4.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Friday afternoons, June 14, 21, 28 and July 5.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Friday evenings, June 14, 21, 28 and July 5.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Saturday afternoons, June 15, 22, 29 and July 6.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Saturday evenings, June 15, 22, 29 and July 6.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Monday afternoons, June 16, 23, 30 and July 7.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Monday evenings, June 16, 23, 30 and July 7.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Tuesday afternoons, June 17, 24, July 1 and 8.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Tuesday evenings, June 17, 24, July 1 and 8.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Wednesday afternoons, June 18, 25, July 2 and 9.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Wednesday evenings, June 18, 25, July 2 and 9.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Thursday afternoons, June 19, 26, July 3 and 10.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Thursday evenings, June 19, 26, July 3 and 10.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Friday afternoons, June 20, 27, July 4 and 11.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Friday evenings, June 20, 27, July 4 and 11.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Saturday afternoons, June 21, 28, July 5 and 12.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Saturday evenings, June 21, 28, July 5 and 12.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Monday afternoons, June 22, 29, July 6 and 13.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Monday evenings, June 22, 29, July 6 and 13.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Tuesday afternoons, June 23, 30, July 7 and 14.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Tuesday evenings, June 23, 30, July 7 and 14.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Wednesday afternoons, June 24, July 1, 8 and 15.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Wednesday evenings, June 24, July 1, 8 and 15.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Thursday afternoons, June 25, July 2, 9 and 16.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Thursday evenings, June 25, July 2, 9 and 16.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Friday afternoons, June 26, July 3, 10 and 17.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Friday evenings, June 26, July 3, 10 and 17.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Saturday afternoons, June 27, July 4, 11 and 18.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Saturday evenings, June 27, July 4, 11 and 18.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Monday afternoons, June 28, July 5, 12 and 19.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Monday evenings, June 28, July 5, 12 and 19.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Tuesday afternoons, June 29, July 6, 13 and 20.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Tuesday evenings, June 29, July 6, 13 and 20.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Wednesday afternoons, June 30, July 7, 14 and 21.

Four lectures on "The Historical Background of the Italian Language," by Professor Earl Barnes, Wednesday evenings, June 30, July 7, 14 and 21.

Four lectures on

The Year of Youth at "The Symphonies"

Orchestra, Conductor, Schedule and Soloists for the New Season, with Many a Hint of Dr. Muck's Repertory

EIGHTEEN months ago, when the annual sale of seats by auction vanished from the routine of the Symphony Concerts, the management judged it wise to make the major part of the announcements for the new year on the heels of the season ended. Thus, in May of 1916, the public of the concerts read the list of "assisting artists" whom it was to hear through the next autumn, winter and spring; while from printed hint and acquired experience, it could readily anticipate the general course of the prospective series. By September, little remained for announcement except the tentative array of pieces that Dr. Muck purposed to set on the programmes. Perhaps so considerable a departure from long-established custom as an abandonment of the auctions for a renewal of subscriptions from year to year warranted for once springtime publication of wintertime plans. Yet when seven months of Symphony Concerts are ended at the beginning of May, a temporarily sated public is less likely to warm to the arrangements for seven months more of them than it is in the autumn when our American year in the arts begins and the return to town brings fresh zest for the pleasures of them. After a season of spendings upon playhouse and concert hall, the tender-pursed or tender-conscienced may hesitate over fresh disbursements for entertainment seemingly a winter away. In the autumn, the whole range of such pleasures lies before them, where to choose, and usually with quickened anticipatory spirits.

Accordingly, the management of the orchestra has returned to old custom and withheld announcements for the pending season of 1917-18 until the autumn in which it begins. A little more than a month hence, on Friday afternoon, Oct. 12—the holiday of Columbus—and on Saturday evening, Oct. 13, the thirty-seventh series of Symphony Concerts will begin in Symphony Hall, to continue there with the usual intervals through the first week of the following May. The five monthly journeys from November to March of the orchestra to New York and southward, with the annual expedition at the end of January to six cities of the Middle States, will break the succession of the concerts, while from time to time, as for many years past, it will be heard in various towns of New England. In all the conductor and the band will undertake the usual hundred odd concerts, which experience has proved possible within the steady maintenance of their spirit and standards.

Orchestra and Conductor

As good fortune has willed, the ranks of the orchestra will remain virtually intact. These are not the days in which a player upon strings, wood or brass, however expert or well-reputed, quits one post to seek another, or meditates return to the Europe whence he may have come. By like token, no more are they the days in which a conductor may scour Paris or Brussels, Munich or Vienna, in quest of virtuosi that may excel those whom they replace. Consequently, expiring contracts were readily renewed last spring and Dr. Muck rests content with the present personnel (as the programme-book calls it) of the orchestra. Happily, too, conscription has spared the youth of the band eligible to military service and may yet spare it through the whole course of the impending season. Thus Dr. Muck will return to the many-voiced instrument that now vibrates to his slightest will, that five years of mutual pleasures and pains, respect and loyalty, have unified with him into a single-minded and single-hearted achievement and ambition. Once more the conductor—and the men with him—may begin in October where they ended in May and he renew, as he will to the end of his working career, his pursuit of an ideal eloquence of performance.

At a time when the financial burdens of the richest and the poorest of us—and of all between—are not light; when obligations and preoccupations are many; it is clear and stimulating evidence of the regard in which this public has come to hold Dr. Muck—musician and man, in work and ways—that the subscriptions to the Symphony Concerts have increased and not diminished. More and more, his audiences discover in what he returns to them not only an illustrious conductor at the acme of his powers, but a rare and pervasive personality still in full vital force. From the orchestral technician exacting the utmost of precision and pliancy from his forces; through the acute and sensitive musician, mindful of every shading and euphony of tone, susceptible to every rhythm, accent and gradient of the page in hand; through the discerning and analytic mind that penetrates the characteristic substance and design of each music undertaken and so releases the true voice and course of it; upward to the interpreter who transmits to his hearers, heightened by his own illumination and emotion, the composer's weight of thought, charm of fancy or passion of power—in all these coordinated faculties, the frequenters of the Symphony Concerts and occasional visitors to them now know Dr. Muck beyond peradventure as one of the master-conductors of a day, the world around, none too amply furnished with them. Behind the outcome, it has long caught glimpses of the devoted mind and spirit that give themselves wholly to the work in hand and count no toil or personal sacrifice too great for the well-doing of it; of the man within the musician; of the personality binding orchestra and audience, music and performance into a single pervaded whole. In the long course of the Symphony Concerts, none of his predecessors has held his public, season after season, so fresh to him and them or so deeply stamped himself upon them.

Spying Out the Repertory

Dr. Muck, however, would not be Dr. Muck did he not have his "little ways." One of those, which sometimes irks his hearers and the newspapers that minister to them, is his unwillingness at the outset of a season to pledge himself to the performance of a specified list of pieces. The making of twenty-four programmes for the concerts of the orchestra at home stretches annually before him. Who may say—as he likes to reason—what exigencies, unforeseen as he assembles his first programme, may dictate to him the composition of his fifteenth? What deserving music beyond his reach or unknown to him in September may be at hand or invite him in January? A considered piece, when at last he has finished his study of it, may be put aside as scarcely justifying the time and pains of rehearsal and performance. Opportunity may prove lacking for the thorough preparation of another. A third may at no time in a season accord with the scheme and quality of the programmes of the week, fortnight or month. Therefore at his summer house upon the Island of Mount Desert Dr. Muck sits mute, yet diligent, over his programmes for the new season.

One timely clew, however, remains to the music that he purposes to choose. The library of the Symphony Orchestra rests in Symphony Hall, and to and fro between it and the conductor's house in the Fenway and the conductor's cottage at Seal Harbor, from May even to September, have gone many packages of scores for his perusal and study. What have they contained? Item: suites of Bach; symphonies of Beethoven and Brahms; long overlooked as well as familiar music of Händel, Mozart, Haydn; the conjugal symphony of Schumann (No. 2 in D-minor), in which Dr. Muck has not yet been heard in Boston; symphonic poems of Liszt—among them the rarely-played "Die Ideale," and the less hackneyed overtures of Berlioz—to Shakspeare's play of "King Lear," and to "Les Francs Juges." Off other shelves, whereon they have gathered dust these many years, have gone Raff's "Forest Symphony" that our fathers and mothers applauded as highly romantic and pictorial music; a "Wallenstein Symphony" by the half-forgotten Rheinberger; Goldmark's eloquent overture, "Prometheus," and an orchestral fragment of his Dickensian opera, "The Cricket on the Hearth"; Bizet's suite, "Roma," strangely neglected in the scanty sum of his symphonic music; the warmly-imagined and brightly-colored dances of Lalo's "Namouna"; the "symphonic picture" that Rimsky-Korsakov drew from the scene of sorcery in his opera of "Mlada," and Grieg's fanciful little suite of music to Holberg's Danish comedies of the eighteenth century.

Other parcels, perhaps not so thick, have carried to Dr. Muck the desired music of some of the younger moderns and ultra-moderns—notably Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstacy," the only example of his symphonic music yet heard (in 1910) in Boston; Delius's sumptuous tone-poem "In a Summer Garden;" Bantock's wistful and shimmering overture to Ernest Dowson's poem of "Pierrot of the Minute;" and the scholarly Wallace's tone-poem, "Villon. (Bantock and Delius being men of ranging minds and imagination, escape the usual pedestrianism and ennuis of British music.) With the publication of symphonic music almost suspended in continental Europe, these are not the days in which to expect from France or Italy, Germany or Austria, pieces with the ingratiating or alarming parenthesis on the programme (New: First Time). American composers, to whom Dr. Muck has ever been justly hospitable and perhaps a little more, no doubt are prepared to fill the gap; while one example of their recent work—Mr. Carpenter's finely imagined and glowingly accomplished symphony, produced at Norfolk last June—richly deserves the performance in Boston that it will receive from Mr. Damrosch in New York and Mr. Stock in Chicago. Moreover, for music as yet unheard in this town, there now lie on Dr. Muck's work-table the Norwegian Svenden's symphony in D-minor and Delius's applauded tone-poem, "Appalachia," upspringing from negro tunes heard distantly and at nightfall to a sonorous and throbbing choral close.

The Year of Youth

As to the "assisting artists" for the new season, with the happy and stimulating infusion among them of risen and rising youth, something has already been said in this place. The well-content with familiar presences and familiar talents may take their fill of pleasure from Mr. Paderewski and Mr. Kreisler, while the rest of us may be permitted to hope that they will find new material upon which to exercise them vividly. Mr. McCormack has sought and received the satisfaction of a re-engagement, after his fair fortunes with conductor and audience last February, and again from the tenor's throat will flow eighteenth-century music as many a listener likes to believe it was sung when it also was "New: First Time." Mr Zimbalist, in whom sensibility to the more elusive qualities of pure music goes hand in hand with like feeling for the subtle and sublimated voice of the violin, has at last been called to the concerts at which—no such finely tempered artist—at first appeared in America. If Mme. Melba shuns floridly ornate music and clings to the Mozart, for example, that asks her middle tones, still lovely to hear, and her perfections of vocal style, by the tokens of her more recent visits all should go well with her. From the string choir of the orchestra, M. Witek and M. Noack—more accomplished violinists than many a wandering virtuoso—and Mr. Warnke and Mr. Malkin of the violincellos will play the concertos that personal desert and annual custom allot them.

Yet, for the open-minded to new talents and for the curious over new personalities, the keener anticipation of the soloists plays over the proved quality of Miss Garrison's young voice and skill, as she has waxed in both at the Metropolitan Opera House; over the high-pitched temperament, the fiery power and the vivid individuality of Mme. Leginska with a concerto of Rubinstein for her battle-horse of the piano; over the finely touched abilities and the personal grace of the applauded Miss Novaes, "the pianist of the year" in New York and elsewhere last season; over the youthful promise—so high that it has given them a place in the concerts—of Miss Nash and Miss Seydel. Who shall say now that women-pianists have scant opportunity with the orchestra when three will "assist" it in the new season or that it overlooks the Boston-born and musically bred, when Miss him, though he miss many a note. Four-Seydel's father from the ranks of the teen are the soloists all told, leaving ten double-basses watches his violinist-daughter pairs of concerts free and clear for the at the present summit of his and her ambitions. Dr. Muck may advisedly pardon pure milk of the orchestral word.

H. T. P.

Ethel Leginska

Posed and Painted by Lillian Fisk

5. Post - Sept 9.

AS TO THE SYMPHONY REPERTOIRE

It is no departure from his habit in the past for Dr. Muck to maintain complete silence concerning his plans for the Symphony concerts, which begin Oct. 12-13. Dr. Muck has always held that it is unwise for a conductor of an orchestra that gives a long series of concerts to make definite announcement before the opening of the season as to the works he intends to play. Such an announcement may be made in the best of faith, but a hundred things may come up in the course of a long season of 30 weeks to prevent the performance of this or that work, thereby insuring the disappointment of some patrons who made up their minds to hear the particular works omitted.

But while Dr. Muck has made no announcement as to his plans enough is known of the various works he has been studying during the past summer to make announcement, with all reservations, some of the music which is most likely to be heard between the middle of October and the first of May. Dr. Muck, one of the most industrious of men, has been spending a considerable part of his vacation at Seal Harbor, Me., preparing various scores for performance. Great packages of music have been sent to him from the library of the orchestra, and it is fairly certain that he has in his own mind worked out a general scheme of programmes for the entire season.

Even more difficult this year than in past years has it become to secure novelties, in the sense of new music. Yet last season, it will be remembered, while Dr. Muck made few promises as to novelties, he was able to present the usual proportion of new works which had their usual success, meaning that a number of them will never come to performance again. Anticipating this increased dearth of new music Dr. Muck has been looking over scores in the library of the orchestra which have not been heard here during his engagement, and some of them not for many years.

It may be safe to promise that the programmes for the coming season will draw on the standard classics in the same measure as in the past. It is probable that the performance last season of one of Haydn's little and almost forgotten symphonies will encourage Dr. Muck to bring out others of these delightful little works. There will be the usual number of works by Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Liszt and the like. Dr. Muck has been restudying the D minor symphony of Schumann. It is very interesting that while Dr. Muck has announced this twice since his return to Boston in 1912, on both occasions he was ill so that Mr. Urak conducted it once and Mr. Schmidt the second time. He has also been working on the "King Lear" and "Franc Juges" overtures of Berlioz, and Balakireff's overture on a Spanish theme.

Particularly interesting is the list of older works which he has had with him the past summer—works actually old in years and works of a more modern school that have not been heard in a number of seasons. Thus one finds on the list, Raff's symphony "Im Walde," which has not been played since 1902 under Mr. Gericke. Rheinberger's "Wallenstein" symphony is another which has not appeared on a programme since 1895, and Bizet's suite "Roma" has not been heard since 1903. Then there are the introduction to the third act of Goldmark's, opera "The Cricket on the Hearth," which has not been heard since 1897, and "Prometheus" overture, which has not been heard since 1899, while the same year saw the only performance of the overture to Siegfried Wagner's opera, "Die Baerenhaeuter." Svendsen's fourth symphony in D minor has never been played at a Symphony concert.

Of more modern works which are likely to be performed, there may be mentioned Bantock's overture "Pierrot of the Minute," last played here in 1909; Fritz Delius' "In a Summer Garden," played by Mr. Fiedler in the spring of 1912, and his "Appalachia," which has never been heard here although announced several times; Liadoff's "Baba Yaga," Scriabine's "Poeme de l'Extase" and William Wallace's symphonic poem, "Villon," the first performed in 1911, the second in 1910 and the third in 1912.

Dr. Muck has also been looking at Grieg's suite "Aus Holberg's Zeit," Lalo's charming suite "Namouna," which has been played at a pension fund concert two years ago, but has not appeared on a symphony programme since 1896; Rimsky Korsakoff's "Mlada" and Seckles' "Serenade," the last two of which are new.

Courier, Sept 8.

SYMPHONY WILL REVIVE OLD WORKS

Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Liszt And Schumann on Dr. Muck's Program

MODERN COMPOSERS NOT TO BE NEGLECTED

Little by little the plans of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming season are being made public. The list of soloists was announced just a week ago. At that time it was stated that Dr. Muck, who has been summering at Seal Harbor, Me., and who has gone over many scores in the Symphony's library, did not chose to make known his programs until the season was virtually on. The conductor persists in his opinion, and declines to give out his program for the present. However, he has made known some of the works he has been restudying and "looking over."

With the continuation of the war it is even more difficult to get novelties this year than for the preceding two seasons. Last year some way or another Dr. Muck presented the usual proportion of new works.

Some had success, some have gone to the never-never-again land. For this season's offerings Dr. Muck has looked over quantities of music in the library of the orchestra which has not been played during his tenure of the orchestra's conductorship.

Dr. Muck this season will play some of the little Haydn symphonies. The success of the one he presented last season insures this. Then there will be standard works by Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Liszt and Schumann in the usual quantity.

Dr. Muck has been restudying the Schumann D minor symphony. Twice he has announced this and both times he has been taken ill so that he has had to turn his baton over for the conducting of the work to Mr. Schmidt and Mr. Urak.

Some of the Works Chosen

Dr. Muck has also been working on Berlioz's two overtures, "King Lear," "Franc Juges" and Balakreff's overture on a Spanish theme. Old works that have come under his observation this summer and which will probably be heard on Huntington ave. this winter, are Raff's symphony "In Walde," Rheinberger's "Wallenstein" symphony, Bizet's "Roma" suite, Goldmark's "Cricket on the Hearth" (introduction to the third act), and Svendsen's 4th symphony in D minor.

More modern works contemplated are Bantock's overture, "Pierrot of the Minute," Delius' "In a Summer Garden" and "Appalachia," Liadoff's "Baba Yaga," Scriabine's "Poeme de l'Extase" and William Wallace's symphonic poem, "Villon."

Grieg's suite, "Aus Holberg's Zeit," Lalo's suite, "Namouna," Rimsky Korsakoff's "Mlada" and Seckles' "Serenade" have also been sent to Seal Harbor.

As all the world knows, [illegible]

Transcript, Sept 12

NEWS OF MUSIC

THE PROSPECTS FOR ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS

With One Accord from Boston to San Francisco, the Established Series Report Increased or Undiminished Subscriptions —Mr. Stokowski's Plans for Philadelphia—The Present End of Sousa's Band —Mr. Urban's Work for the Metropolitan — Items, Opinions and Announcements

WHATEVER the fortunes of miscellaneous recitals this season—and they are likely to depend upon the individual reputation or vogue of the singer, violinist or pianist undertaking them—the established series of orchestral concerts in the largest cities bid fair to be as well attended and supported as ever. In spite of the misgivings of many a bystander and, within himself, of more than one manager, the subscriptions to symphony concerts have generally increased rather than generally diminished. The Boston Orchestra reports a more active and larger subscription for its concerts at home on Saturday evenings than for several years, while nearly every place for the concerts of Friday afternoons is already preëmpted. For similar pairs of concerts the Philadelphia Orchestra stands in like good case. Seats for the concerts of the Chicago Orchestra are obtainable now only for the series of Saturday evenings. The Philharmonic Society in New York has sound reason to believe that the larger public it won last winter will not forsake it; while Mr. Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra will move from Æolian to Carnegie Hall, because the numbers of their audiences require the larger auditorium. Finally, the secondary symphony orchestras, like those of Cincinnati, St. Louis, Minneapolis and San Francisco, are faring no less well, proportionately, than the metropolitan bands; while not one of either has much diminished its occasional journeys from the "home town."

By all these signs, symphony concerts throughout the United States will not only continue through the first war-time winter, but will even be better supported than in some more peaceful seasons. Evidently the American public, like the publics of London, Manchester, Paris, Rome, Vienna and Munich, is not minded to surrender its interest and pleasure in concerts of serious music to the preoccupations or indifference of warfare that at last touches it nearly, domestically. As evidently, and yet more desirably, it is minded to divorce its regard for the players of the music it will hear gladly, from the mounting antagonisms of that same warfare. Subjects of the German and of the Austrian emperor, a few, perhaps, of the Tsar of Bulgaria, if none of the Turk, will sit numerously in all these orchestras, in some instances, even lead them. If the conductors assort their programmes with the usual catholicity, these orchestras will also play sundry pieces by living German and Austrian composers. Yet by every token thus far disclosed, their audiences—outside a negligible fraction of extreme and narrow partisans—will listen to men and music with little thought for the time of the background of war. After all, the writing, the playing and the hearing of serious music is a world of its own—isolated and self-contained.

Herald, Sept 7

MADAME MELBA ON WAY TO AMERICA

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony Orchestra, has received a cable from Aukland, New Zealand, from Madame Melba, which indicates that she is now on the Pacific enroute to San Francisco. The censorship does not allow her to give her time of sailing or the ship on which she is to come, but as the cablegram reads that she will be in Chicago the early part of next month, she must have already sailed. As already announced Madame Melba is one of the soloists who will appear with the Symphony Orchestra next seoson. She will be the soloist at the concert in Christmas week.

Herald, Sept 17

MADAME MELBA IS NOW ON WAY TO AMERICA

C. A. Ellis, manager of the Symphony Orchestra, has received a cable from Mme. Melba which indicates that she is now on the Pacific en route to San Francisco. She will be in Chicago the early part of next month.

Mme. Melba is one of the soloists who will appear with the Symphony Orchestra. She will sing at the concert in Christmas week.

Brooklyn, Leitizen Sept 30.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S PLANS

Madame Melba to Sing in First Concert Here.

Renewals of subscriptions and new subscriptions have been received in large numbers by the institute for the concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy this coming season. Madame Melba, who is to be the first soloist of the season at the December concert, is due to arrive in Vancouver next Thursday. She has been spending the last six months at her home in Australia and her first important work will be a series of appearances with the Chicago Grand Opera Company. At the February concert, the soloist is to be Winifred Christie, a Scotch pianist, who had a most sensational success at her appearance with the orchestra in Boston last fall. In January, the soloist will be Fritz Kreisler. There will be no soloist either at the November or March concerts.

The orchestra itself will be undergoing a very novel experience this coming week. Its entire personnel and Dr. Muck will be in Camden, N. J., where it will spend the week making records for the Victor Talking Machine. Several years ago, it was agreed that the Boston Symphony Orchestra should make records whenever the Victor people believed that they were ready to this successfully. Now it is the belief that orchestral records by a large orchestra can be made with good effect. The orchestra will return to Boston at the end of the week and its regular season begins the following Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 12 and 13.

THURSDAY
SEPTEMBER 13, 1917

Boston Evening Record

Famous Musicians Who Will Appear as Soloists With the Symphony Orchestra — Col. Roosevelt and Some Suffrage Leaders

DAILY NEWS
PICTORIAL

Fritz Kreisler
Great drawing card for Boston's orchestra.

Mabel Garrison
To share soprano soloists' honors with Melba.

Irma Seydel
Youthful violinist, "daughter of the orchestra."

Ethel Leginska
"Sensational" pianist to be a Symphony star.

Efrem Zimbalist
Who returns this season as a Symphony soloist.

Guiomar Novaes
Girl pianist who reminds one of Teresa Carreno.

Frances Nash
American pianist to play with Boston Symphony.

John McCormack
Irish tenor to sing again with Symphony.

Clipping, Sept 15

SYMPHONY ARTIST BACK FROM FRANCE

Georges Longy, Oboe Player, Witnessed Pershing's Historic Arrival There

SPEAKS OF PLANS FOR WINTER SEASON

Georges Longy, oboe player with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, founder of the Longy Club of wind instruments, and conductor of the Boston Orchestral and McDowell Clubs, returned this week from a summer in the north of France.

With his daughter, Mlle. Renee, who is a pupil of Dumesnil and Alfredi Casella, and winner of the grand prize for the pianoforte at the "Cour Pianistique Paul S. Heard," he sailed last May on the French liner Chicago. Aboard there were 400 Americans, joining the ambulance and aviation corps. Submarines were avoided, and the crossing was like other years, except that no lights were allowed at night. Even the smallest cigarette was banned. Informal concerts were arranged. Both Mr. Longy and Mlle. Renee devoted much of their time to directing these.

In Paris Mr. Longy visited the various musical editors, and procured a large amount of new choral and orchestral music, which has never been used in the United States. When asked his opinion on the musical conditions abroad he remarked: "The world of music tottered on its foundations at the first cruel shock of this world war. However, the three years which have elapsed have enabled music to regain its poise and symmetry

Much of the music is vivacious, and the Opera Comique is well patronized. "Promethe," an opera by Gabriel Faure, which was given in Paris, has an interesting innovation, in that the two principle characters, Albert Lambert from the Comedie Francaise and a young woman from the Opera Comique, speak their lines, while the other characters sing. The effect, although unusual, is thoroughly artistic.

On the 26th of June Mr. Longy was in Paris as a judge for the final examinations of the Conservatoire Nationale of Music. But he returned shortly afterwards to Somme, where his beautiful country estate is located. An English general, Locke-Elliott, and his staff occupied the large house, and Mr. Longy and his daughter were content to spend the summer months in one of the small cottages on the grounds. The musician spent many hours in his garden. Gen. Locke-Elliott has been a commander in India for almost 40 years, so he was stationed with a regiment of Indian cavalry. The soldiers in the vicinity were all English and Hindu, and only three civilians remained at the village.

Somme was 45 miles from the front, and although no persons are allowed to visit the firing line, the estate was within sound of the constant roar of huge guns, and served as a target for German airplanes. The quantity of gunpowder in the air worked atmospheric changes, and much rain fell.

Asked in regard to food and economic conditions, Mr. Longy replied that there was very little suffering among the poor; for although food prices have increased 300 p.c., the wages paid for labor are extremely high. Two meatless days and two pastryless days are demanded from all families, no matter what their rank.

Thousands of well-known artists and musicians are in the ranks in Macedonia, one of whom is Mr. Fosse, a former oboe player in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Longy was fortunate enough to witness the landing of Gen. Pershing and the American soldiers. He says that all France went wild with enthusiasm, and that Parisians wept on each other's shoulders as the procession passed up the Avenue De Opera. Paris keeps much of its old-time atmosphere of life and vivacity, and the only change is in the scarcity of men. Soldiers are drafted at 19 now, and the medical examinations are not as strict as formerly.

The return trip to America was made on the str. Espagne, which arrived at an American port last Tuesday. Mr. Longy is now entering his 20th season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Born in Abbeville, France, in 1868, Mr. Longy began his study of music at the age of 5 years. He devoted himself to the oboe, violin and piano, specializing in the oboe. In 1882 he entered the Conservatoire National de Musique at Paris, studying harmony under Taudou, and the oboe under Cillet. Later he won the first prize for the oboe, and was engaged at the famous Lamoureaux Concerts. With the assistance of his friend, Prosper Mu[illegible]art, teacher of clarinet at the Conservatoire National de Musique, he re-established "La Societie de Musique de Chambre pour Instruments a vent." In 1895 he was made an Officer D'Academie, one of the highest honors the French Government can bestow on

BACK FROM OLD HOME IN THE SOMME

Longys Return With New Music—Saw Pershing

Georges Longy, oboist of the Symphony, founder of the famous Longy Club, and musician of world-wide note, is back in Boston after a three months' stay in France, in the heart of the Somme region, only 45 miles back of the British battle lines.

With M. Longy went Mlle. Longy, his daughter, and they journeyed over for a two-fold purpose; one, to visit Madame Longy, wife and mother, who is caring for the Longy home, just between Abbeville and Amiens; and the second, to enable M. Longy to attend the conservatory commencement and to bring over new music, to be heard for the first time in Boston this winter.

SAW GEN. PERSHING

They saw General Pershing; they saw a German battleplane over their heads at night; they saw the British King, with President Poincare and the Prince of Wales at the Abbeville Hospital; they heard new operas, strange to the new world; they heard the cannonading at their very doors, almost; they heard a strange new language—mixture of bad French and bad English, the "war tongue"; they ate atrocious bread, "war bread"; and they brought back the news that "the Somme is no longer German."

Monsieur and Mlle. Longy sailed on on the Chicago last May. After much difficulty in getting about, they finally reached Paris. "We were hurrying through one June day, when, just before the opera, we saw an enormous throng," tells Mlle. Longy, in her vivacious English, with just the faintest Gallic trace. "We saw the crowds surge and cheer, but we couldn't understand. Finally we saw the reason. Pershing was passing through Paris.

"There had been much gloom in France. The French know as little about the Russian situation as we, and there was much uncertainty and doubt. You cannot imagine the enthusiasm, in the midst of this, that the arrival of the Americans created. The French were delighted. General Pershing was welcomed, as I am sure he never expected to be.

"We found food prices very high, although we obtained it easily enough. It was of the usual quality—all except the bread."

"Ah, the bread!—it was awful!" put in M. Longy, "and you know, the French know what good bread is. But it was on everybody's tongue in Paris, the word of hope: 'Better bread by winter!'—they meant by that, the war would be soon over.

The Somme All British

"We went frequently to Abbeville, our own country place being between that city and Amiens. At Abbeville, the King, with the president and the Prince of Wales, visited the hospital. Of course, the hospitals are crowded; we were only 45 miles from the British lines, and heard the cannonading constantly. Everything is British in the Somme; it is a 'British occupation,' but they are doing wonderful work for France."

Said Mlle. Longy: "We heard a new language in the Somme—a strange mixture of bad French and bad English—used, I suppose, by the soldiers of both armies. It sounds as though the English soldiers used what French words he knew, and filled up the missing ones with English; and the French soldier vice-versa. It's the new 'war-language.' It sounds very strange. Then there are lots of Hindoo soldiers, too, who add their bit to the general mix-up."

Battleplane Overhead

"One night, at about 1 o'clock in the morning, we saw a black shadow above our heads—a German battleplane. It flew past, and we heard in the morning that it had tried to blow up parts of Aggeville, but had had no success."

As to music, M. Longy said:

"I was one of the 'jury' at commencement at the Paris Conservatory to pass on the wood-wind players. I picked up a lot of new music and brought it back with me; but there is much being written that cannot be published, because of the scarcity of paper. Even the newspapers now cost two cents instead of one.

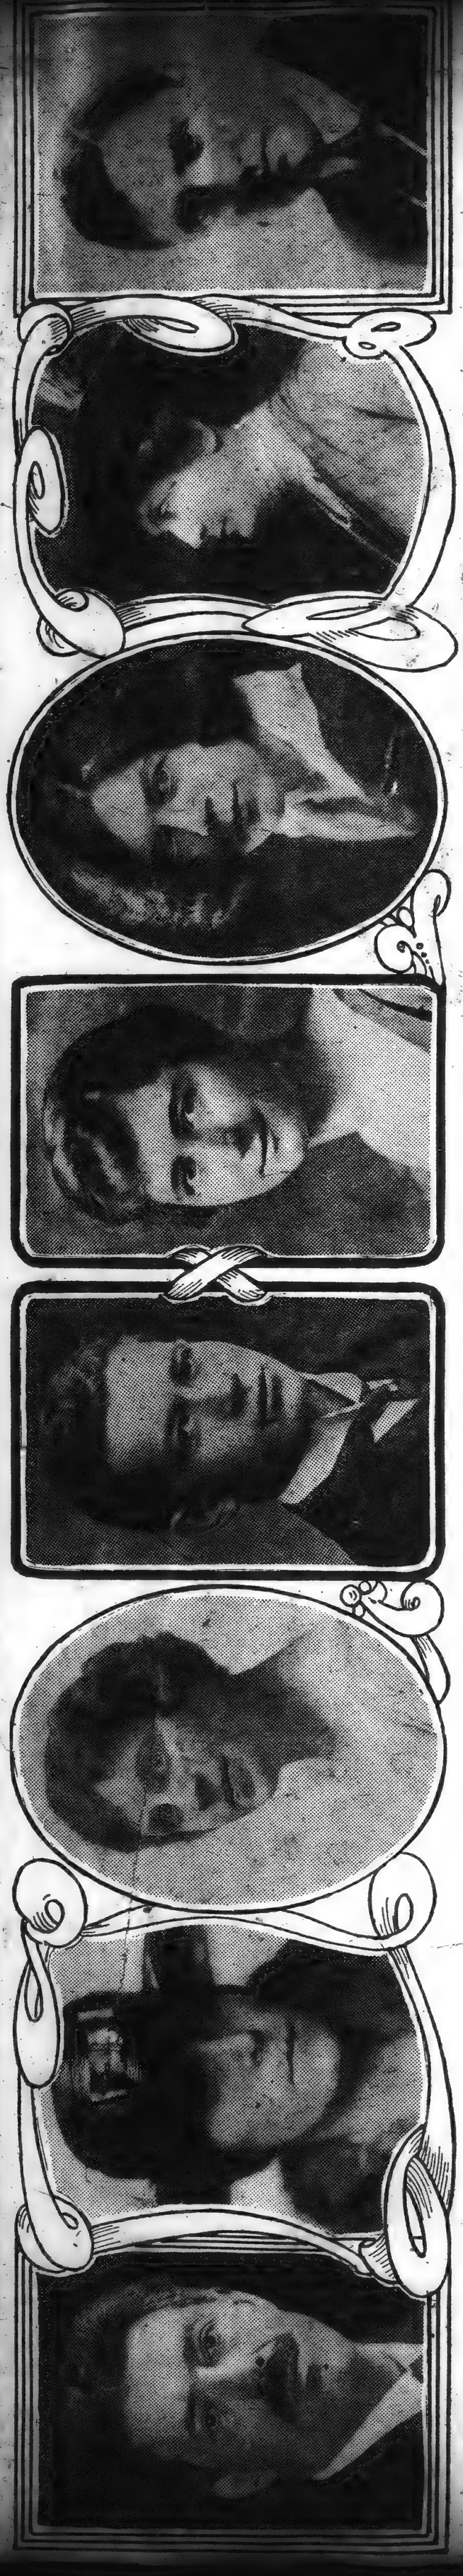
New Faure Opera

"I went to Paris four times. We heard a new opera by Faure 'Promethee,' which, strangely enough, has for its principal character an actor, not a singer. The part was superbly taken by Albert Lambert of the Comedie Francaise. This piece, which has charming music, is very unusual and peculiar in its manner, and I wonder if it would prove a success here. Chevillard conducted. We also heard a ballet called 'Fees des Fleurs' or 'Adelaide,' the music to which was Ravel's 'Valse Noble et Sentimentale,' a strange thing altogether, but quite interesting. Grovlez conducted."

One thing the Longys were certain of: they weren't torpedoed, and didn't see a single submarine.

THE SUNDAY HERALD, BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 16, 1917.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL REVIEW ❖ ❖ BY PHILIP HALE



The Symphony Soloists for the Coming Season. Left to Right, Fritz Kreisler, Frances Nash, Mabel Garrison, Efrem Zimbalist, Irma Seydel, Ethel Leginska, Nellie Melba and John McCormack.

THE TEN SYMPHONY SOLOISTS OF THE SEASON INCLUDE FIVE NEWCOMERS

In selecting the assisting artists for the coming season of Symphony concerts the management has sought to maintain a diversified interest, mingling the older and more familiar singers and instrumentalists with the newer. The number of soloists will not be so large as last year and this reversion to the practice of former years will be welcomed by the majority of Symphony patrons. Last season there were only seven concerts without soloists and the original plans had called for only five. So few concerts of orchestral music alone make it difficult for the conductor to present in their proper environment many interesting works which deserve performance. Such was the case last season.

For the coming season of 24 pairs of concerts, 14 soloists have been engaged. Four are the artists who lend distinction to the orchestra: Messrs. Witek and Noack, of the violins, and Messrs. Warnke and Malkin, of the violoncellos. The other 10 come, so to say, from abroad. While none of these is strange in the artistic world. Last season she played with the Symphony orchestra in Providence and her performance of Rubinstein's D minor concerto was one of the sensational events of the season. She will play this work in Boston.

Frances Nash, a young American, played Saint-Saens concerto in G minor with the Symphony orchestra in Cambridge last season. A sincere pianist, she will play this concerto here.

Guiomar Novaes, the Brazilian pianist, who is making her first appearance with the Symphony orchestra, made her debut in New York in the season of 1915-1916. She had come to America, a refugee from Europe, unheralded and unknown. At her first recital she revealed herself as a pianist of extraordinary gifts, beauty, temperament, a mistress of the "grand style."

Irma Seydel, who will make her first appearance here as a Symphony soloist, is a "daughter of the orchestra." Her father has been a Symphony man for many years. Her teachers were Symphony men and it is with the Symphony orchestra in the past few years in its out of town concerts that she has received valuable routine. She has been applauded in Germany as in this country.

The other artists invited to assist at the concerts are for the most part old and tried friends, Mme. Melba, Mr. Paderewski, Mr. Kreisler, Mr. McCormack and Mr. Zimbalist. Mme. Melba is at present in Australia, but she will be sailing soon for San Francisco to appear with the Chicago opera company in Chicago and on tour, as well as to give a series of concerts. Mr. Paderewski, practically now a resident of this country, is still at Paso Robles, Cal., where he is developing a ranch of large size. He will begin a long concert tour next month. Fritz Kreisler has spent most of the summer in his cottage at Seal Harbor, Me. He faces the task of about 100 appearances before warm weather returns. One of the pleasantest episodes of last season was the appearance with the orchestra of John McCormack. Efrem Zimbalist, violinist, has not played here with the orchestra for several years.

to Boston, five of them are making their first appearance here as Symphony soloists. These are Mabel Garrison, Ethel Leginska, Frances Nash, Guiomar Novaes and Irma Seydel.

Mabel Garrison is one of the most gifted of the younger generation of American sopranos. For several years past she has been a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York and has had the unusual experience of having in that institution worked her way from humble secondary roles to be a leader among the sopranos. A year ago last spring Miss Garrison delighted Boston by the manner in which she sang the florid air of Oscar in "Un ballo in maschera." Last season at a few hours' notice she took the place of Mme. Hempel as Astrifiammente in "The Magic Flute." Her performance of the "Vengeance" aria aroused enthusiasm.

Ethel Leginska, Frances Nash and Guiomar Novaes are young pianists, who have given successful recitals in Boston. The exotic appearance of Mme. Leginska and her temperamental playing have given her a niche of her own

From SUN

Address: New York City

Date

Estab 94

The Adele Margulies Trio, one of the foremost chamber music organizations of the country for fourteen years, announces a series of two concerts at Aeolian Hall on Tuesday evenings, November 20 and January 8, instead of the three usually given. Associated with Miss Margulies, pianiste, as in seasons past, will be Leopold Lichtenberg, the violinist, whose name has been associated with the work of the organization as prominently as that of Miss Margulies herself, and Alwin Schroeder, violoncellist, known in New York for many years as a former member of the Kneisel Quartet and as a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Some new and interesting numbers have been aded to the trio's repertoire during the summer's rehearsing at Saranac Lake.

N. Y. Sun Sept 29

The option on seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in New York will expire Monday.

e his home. A really great artist he s in every sense of the word, perhaps the one man of the younger generation who will follow in the footsteps of Paderewski.

Plans are being made for a very unusual program to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Dr Karl Muck, at the last concert. This cannot be announced definitely until Dr Muck returns to Boston from Maine the first of the month, but in the meantime, the musical public of Springfield may look forward to a most unusual treat. Mail orders for the concerts are being taken now by Edward H. Marsh, who has the local management. His address is the Besse building. The regular season sale will open at Otto Baab's, Wednesday, October 10.

N Y Sun Sept 30-1917

To-morrow, Monday, October 1, the option on seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in New York will expire. The orchestra itself will spend this week in Camden, N. J., where it is to make records for the Victor talking machine. The entire orchestra will be there with Dr. Muck.

N Y Mail Sept. 29

Next Monday, October 1, the option on seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in New York will expire.

Springfield Republican Sept-26-1917

THE ELLIS CONCERTS

BRING ALL THE STARS HERE

Interesting Notes on the Artists Who Will Appear at the Auditorium

It is one of the secrets of the remarkable success of Charles A. Ellis of Boston in the various courses of subscription concerts he gives in the country, that he seeks to give a welcome diversity, not only in a single course of concerts, but always endeavors to make the course of one year differ radically from the course of another. The Ellis concerts given in Springfield a year ago were remarkable in quality and attractiveness. The second course of Ellis concerts, which is to be given during the coming winter, will equal the first in every respect and in certain important features will differ from it greatly.

In his prospectus for the season Mr Ellis has announced the names of seven artists who will appear at these concerts, in addition to the concert given by the Boston symphony orchestra. Five of these are singers, appearing at the first concert under the collective title of the Metropolitan opera quartet, for all four of them are members of New York's great operatic institution.

The quartet comprises Mabel Garrison, soprano, Sophie Braslau, contralto, Giovanni Martinelli, tenor, and Arthur Middleton, baritone. Three of these artists belong to the younger generation of American singers. Mabel Garrison is the possessor of one of the most beautiful lyric soprano voices this country has ever known, and in addition to this, is also the possessor of a very charming personality. A native of Baltimore, a few years ago she entered the Metropolitan opera company to take minor roles, and because she was an American without any "pull" she continued to take minor roles until chance lifted her into the front rank of the prima donnas of that institution. This came a year ago when she was called on, without notice, to sing the exceedingly difficult role of the Queen of the Night in Mozart's "The Magic Flute," taking the place of Frieda Hempel, who was ill. To use the well-worn phrase, Miss Garrison awoke the next morning to find herself famous, for she conquered the difficult music with consummate ease and her voice was, in the full sense of the word, a "sensation."

Sophie Braslau, who also has been for several years a member of the Metropolitan opera company, is the possessor of that rarest of gifts nowadays, a large contralto voice. Mezzo sopranos and sopranos, almost mezzo, grow on nearly every bush, but the race of contraltos seems to be diminishing. In addition to the beauty of her voice, Miss Braslau is a most excellent musician and artist. The tenor of the quartet, Giovanni Martinelli, shares with Caruso the leading roles of the Metropolitan opera company. Mr Martinelli is young and his voice has the ringing freshness of youth. Although it would not be fair to say that he is a rival of the great Caruso it still remains a fact that New York prefers him to Caruso in many of the roles they both sing. He is an Italian tenor of the finest quality.

Arthur Middleton is also a member of the Metropolitan opera company, although much of his time is given to concert work. A native of Chicago and a concert and church singer in that city, after long endeavor he finally succeeded in getting Toscanini to hear him. Toscanini said in his entire experience he had heard no such voice as Middleton's and Middleton immediately became a member of the great New York institution.

The second concert brings Fritz Kreisler in a violin recital. In nearly all the principal cities of the country Kreisler is now giving at least one recital each year, and in the larger cities, like New York, Boston, Philadelphia and Chicago, he appears from three to five times, and as a matter of fact, in New York last year he played in recitals, musical concerts and private musicales 19 times, which must be additional proof of the esteem in which this admirable artist is held. His modesty, his sincerity, and his absolute devotion to the public, in that he always gives the very best that is in him, have done much to put him in the foremost rank of today's violinists.

Two favorite artists are scheduled for the third concert, February 12, Louise Homer and Ossip Gabrilowitsch. Madame Homer is one of America's most valued contributions to the music of this generation. She is thoroughly American in every sense of the word, for only a comparatively small part of her career, and that in the beginning, was spent abroad, and that almost entirely in France. Her recognition by the American public came quickly and her hold on its affections is secure. Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist, the son-in-law of Mark Twain, has in the last few years become thoroughly Americanized and while he will undoubtedly give concerts abroad after the war, America, in the future, will

LIST OF SYMPHONY SOLOISTS FOR SEASON SHOWS BRILLIANT TALENT TO BE HEARD HERE

For a very considerable part of Boston's musical public the most vital part of the prospectus of the Symphony Orchestra for an approaching season is the list of soloists. This is true not only of Boston, but the musical world at large, for personality must ever play an important role in so personal a thing as the interpretation of music. Up to the last year of Mr. Gericke's engagement it was the custom to have a soloist practically at every pair of Boston Symphony concerts. It was inevitable that much mediocrity found its way to old Music Hall and Symphony Hall.

Then the management began to lessen the number of soloists, allowing the orchestra to be its own soloist more frequently than it had been in the past, meanwhile concentrating its efforts on securing soloists of only the highest quality. This plan has worked admirably and the only departure from it in the coming season, which begins Oct. 12-13, is the unusually large proportion of artists of the younger generation who are engaged.

Fourteen soloists will appear at as many pairs of concerts. Of these, four as usual, are those most admirable artists who sit in the orchestra—Messrs. Witek and Noack of the violins and Messrs. Warnke and Malkin of the violincellos. Of the 10 who are "guests" of the orchestra, three are singers, three are violinists and four are pianists.

The singers are Madame Melba, John McCormack and Mabel Garrison, the last named making her first appearance with the orchestra. Mme. Melba is at present in Australia, but she will be sailing soon for San Francisco to appear with the Chicago Opera Company in Chicago and on tour as well as to give a series of concerts.

One of the pleasantest episodes of last season was the appearance of John McCormack with the orchestra. Again this tenor showed himself an artist of superlative quality and his re-engagement for the coming season is welcome news.

Mabel Garrison is without question one of the most gifted of the younger generation of American sopranos. For several years past she has been a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York, and has had the unusual experience of having in that institution worked her way from the humble secondary roles with which she began to a leader among the sopranos. This is so rare an occurence at the Metropolitan that it is in itself a distinction.

A year ago last spring Miss Garrison enchanted Boston with the delicious manner in which she sang the florid air given to Oscar in Verdi's "Un Ballo in Maschera." Last season she was summoned in New York on a few hours' notice to take the place of Mme. Hempel and sing Astriflammente in Mozart's "The Magic Flute." Her performance of the great "Vengeance" aria with its terrible staccato passages aroused extraordinary enthusiasm and Miss Garrison had "arrived."

The list of pianists is headed by the magic name of Paderewski. Mr. Paderewski, practically now a resident of his country, is still on his great estate in Paso Robles, Cal., where he is developing a ranch of large size. He finds the summer climate there, the dry heat of the interior, much to his liking and admirable for his health. He begins a long concert tour next month.

Frances Nash, pianist.

The other pianists are young artists new to the Symphony concerts in Boston. All of them, however, have made more than favorable impressions at their recitals in this city. They are Ethel Leginska, Frances Nash and Guiomar Novaes.

The exotic appearance of Mme. Leginska, in combination with her most temperamental playing, has given her a niche of her own in the artistic world. Last season she played with the Symphony Orchestra in Providence and her performance of Rubenstein's D minor concerto was one of the sensational events of the season. She will play this work in Boston.

Frances Nash, a very gifted young American, played Saint-Saens' concerto in G minor with the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge last season. She must be counted as one of the "finds" of the year, for that engagement was largely due to faith in warm recommendations.

She is a very sincere artiste, of well developed temperament, and a very sound and talented musician. She will play the Saint Saens concerto here with the orchestra.

Mabel Garrison, soprano.

South America's contribution to the world of artists has been small. All the more welcome, therefore, was the appearance of the young Brazilian pianist, Guiomar Novaes, who came just before the passing of the great Carreno. Miss Novaes, who is making her first appearance with the Symphony Orchestra, made her debut in New York in the season of 1915-16. She had come to America, a refugee from Europe, unheralded and unknown.

At her first recital she revealed herself as a pianist of extraordinary gifts, her beauty, temperament and grand style strongly reminding the older generation of Teresa Carreno when that splendid artist came to America as a girl. Miss Novaes undoubtedly has a distinguished career before her.

Finally, the violinists, in addition to those from the orchestra, are Fritz Kreisler, Irma Seydel and Efrem Zimbalist. The much beloved artist, Fritz Kreisler, has spent most of the summer in his cottage among the artists who have settled in Seal Harbor, Me. He faces the task of about a hundred appearances before warm weather returns.

Irma Seydel, who is making her first appearance in Boston as a Symphony soloist, is one of the finest products of the city and, in a sense, a "daughter of the orchestra." Her father has been a Symphony man for many years, and it is with the Symphony Orchestra in the past few years in its out-of-town concerts that she has received the valuable routine which has fitted her now to play with the orchestra in Boston and take her place among the foremost women violinists of our time.

IRMA SEYDEL, VIOLINIST.

Efrem Zimbalist, one of the most gifted violinists of the present day, has not appeared here with orchestra for several years. With Kreisler, Zimbalist, Seydel, Witek and Noack, patrons of the concerts are assured of violin playing of highest quality.

Mme. Nellie Melba.

musicians. The three former associates of Mr. Kneisel have been working on the standard quartets with Mr. Kreisler during the summer at Seal Harbor, Me., where the musicians have been spending the vacation period.

Journal, Sept 17

SYMPHONY SOLOISTS

No part of the prospectus issued each autumn by the Symphony Orchestra is so eagerly awaited as the list of artists who will appear as soloists during the season. The orchestra itself is taken for granted. Also is taken for granted that Dr. Muck will vary the repertoire of "standard classics" with the usual number of modern works and novelties.

ETHEL LEGINSKA
To be one of the soloists at Symphony Hall this season.

Certainly for the coming season, which begins Oct. 12, the management of the orchestra has provided novelty. Out of the 10 soloists who come from abroad, five are making their first appearances here as Symphony soloists. All of these are young women. The other five artists from abroad are old friends. In addition to these 10, there will be four representatives from the orchestra itself—Messrs. Witek and Noack of the violins and Messrs. Warnke and Malkin of the violincellos. The schedule calls for three singers, five violinists, four pianists and two 'cellists.

The five young artists making their first appearance as Symphony soloists are Mabel Garrison, Ethel Leginska, Frances Nash, Guiomar Novaes and Irma Seydel. Other soloists are Melba, Paderewski, Kreisler, John McCormack and Efrem Zimbalist.

supporting company, with ing additions, will be the
which has been appearin
"Out There." A. E.
"The Barton Mystery";
and Teresa Maxwell-Conc
nteresting additions, and
ing are Lynn Fontanne, F
Cooper, Leonard Mudie, J.
Douglas Ross, and Catherine
The final performance of "
will be given Tuesday, and will then be dark for two da

Sergeant Arthur Guy Emp
f "Over the Top," will ta legie Hall tonight, with tren
s his subject.

gret that any alien might dare to impugn our unswerving loyalty to our country!

We declare that under no conditions should Karl Muck be allowed to lead an orchestra in our city, and we most heartily commend the actions of the Board of Police Commissioners and of the Grand Jury in prohibiting this concert.

Camp Meade Band Plays.

Just before the meeting a band of the Three Hundred and Thirteenth Infantry gave a concert at the foot of the monument in front of the Lyric. Later the band and a detachment from Company I of the same regiment, under the command of Capt. Richard J. Hughes, marched into the theater.

The soldiers, advancing down the center aisle, with their bayonets glistening and led by an immense American flag, were greeted with cheer after cheer, and the tumult did not subside until long after they had taken their places on the stage and in the orchestra.

Many Prominent Men There.

On the stage many of the most prominent men of the city were noted. Col. Jacob Hook rubbed elbows with a Grand Army veteran in full re- and J. Harry Deems, formerly ge of the music in the city's was present with a flag which, said, he had carried throughou many.

Just pre to the meeting employees of t yric removed from the billboards in front of the theater the posters advertising the concert which was to have taken place tomorrow night. There was no mention of hostility against the management of the theater, however, and a strong police force was present to guard against any disorder; but the police had nothing to do other than to frequently applaud the speakers.

LIST OF SYMPHONY SOLOISTS FOR SEASON SHOWS BRILLIANT TALENT TO BE HEARD HERE

For a very considerable part of Boston's musical public the most vital part of the prospectus of the Symphony Orchestra for an approaching season is the list of soloists. This is true not only of Boston, but the musical world at large, for personality must ever play an important role in so personal a thing as the interpretation of music. Up to the last year of Mr. Gericke's engagement it was the custom to have a soloist practically at every pair of Boston Symphony concerts. It was inevitable that much mediocrity found its way to old Music Hall and Symphony Hall.

Then the management began to lessen the number of soloists, allowing the orchestra to be its own soloist more frequently than it had been in the past, meanwhile concentrating its efforts on securing soloists of only the highest quality. This plan has worked admirably and the only departure from it in the coming season, which begins Oct. 12-13, is the unusually large proportion of artists of the younger generation who are engaged.

Fourteen soloists will appear at as many pairs of concerts. Of these, four as usual, are those most admirable artists who sit in the orchestra—Messrs. Witek and Noack of the violins and Messrs. Warnke and Malkin of the violincellos. Of the 10 who are "guests" of the orchestra, three are singers, three are violinists and four are pianists.

The singers are Madame Melba, John McCormack and Mabel Garrison, the last named making her first appearance with the orchestra. Mme. Melba is at present in Australia, but she will be sailing soon for San Francisco to appear with the Chicago Opera Company in Chicago and on tour as well as to give a series of concerts.

One of the pleasantest episodes of last season was the appearance of John McCormack with the orchestra. Again this tenor showed himself an artist of superlative quality and his re-engagement for the coming season is welcome news.

Mabel Garrison is without question one of the most gifted of the younger generation of American sopranos. For several years past she has been a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York, and has had the unusual experience of having in that institution worked her way from the humble secondary roles with which she began to a leader among the sopranos. This is so rare an occurence at the Metropolitan that it is in itself a distinction.

A year ago last spring Miss Garrison enchanted Boston with the delicious manner in which she sang the florid air given to Oscar in Verdi's "Un Ballo in Maschera." Last season she was summoned in New York on a few hours' notice to take the place of Mme. Hempel and sing Astriflammente in Mozart's "The Magic Flute." Her performance of the great "Vengeance" aria with its terrible staccato passages aroused extraordinary enthusiasm and Miss Garrison had "arrived."

The list of pianists is headed by the magic name of Paderewski. Mr. Paderewski, practically now a resident of this country, is still on his great estate in Paso Robles, Cal., where he is developing a ranch of large size. He finds the summer climate there, the dry heat of the interior, much to his liking and admirable for his health. He begins a long concert tour next month.

Frances Nash, pianist.

The other pianists are young artists new to the Symphony concerts in Boston. All of them, however, have made more than favorable impressions at their recitals in this city. They are Ethel Leginska, Frances Nash and Guiomar Novaes.

The exotic appearance of Mme. Leginska, in combination with her most temperamental playing, has given her a niche of her own in the artistic world. Last season she played with the Symphony Orchestra in Providence and her performance of Rubenstein's D minor concerto was one of the sensational events of the season. She will play this work in Boston.

Frances Nash, a very gifted young American, played Saint-Saens' concerto in G minor with the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge last season. She must be counted as one of the "finds" of the year, for that engagement was largely due to faith in warm recommendations.

She is a very sincere artiste, of well developed temperament, and a very sound and talented musician. She will play the Saint Saens concerto here with the orchestra.

Mabel Garrison, soprano.

South America's contribution to the world of artists has been small. All the more welcome, therefore, was the appearance of the young Brazilian pianist, Guiomar Novaes, who came just before the passing of the great Carreno. Miss Novaes, who is making her first appearance with the Symphony Orchestra, made her debut in New York in the season of 1915-16. She had come to America, a refugee from Europe, unheralded and unknown.

At her first recital she revealed herself as a pianist of extraordinary gifts, her beauty, temperament and grand style strongly reminding the older generation of Teresa Carreno when that splendid artist came to America as a girl. Miss Novaes undoubtedly has a distinguished career before her.

Finally, the violinists, in addition to those from the orchestra, are Fritz Kreisler, Irma Seydel and Efrem Zimbalist. The much beloved artist, Fritz Kreisler, has spent most of the summer in his cottage among the artists who have settled in Seal Harbor, Me. He faces the task of about a hundred appearances before warm weather returns.

Irma Seydel, who is making her first appearance in Boston as a Symphony soloist, is one of the finest products of the city and, in a sense, a "daughter of the orchestra." Her father has been a Symphony man for many years, and it is with the Symphony Orchestra in the past few years in its out-of-town concerts that she has received the valuable routine which has fitted her now to play with the orchestra in Boston and take her place among the foremost women violinists of our time.

IRMA SEYDEL, VIOLINIST.

Efrem Zimbalist, one of the most gifted violinists of the present day, has not appeared here with orchestra for several years. With Kreisler, Zimbalist, Seydel, Witek and Noack, patrons of the concerts are assured of violin playing of highest quality.

Mme. Nellie Melba.

musicians. The three former associates of Mr. Kneisel have been working on the standard quartets with Mr. Kreisler during the summer at Seal Harbor, Me., where the musicians have been spending the vacation period.

Journal, Sept 17

SYMPHONY SOLOISTS

No part of the prospectus issued each autumn by the Symphony Orchestra is so eagerly awaited as the list of artists who will appear as soloists during the season. The orchestra itself is taken for granted. Also is taken for granted that Dr. Muck will vary the repertoire of "standard classics" with the usual number of modern works and novelties.

ETHEL LEGINSKA

To be one of the soloists at Symphony Hall this season.

Certainly for the coming season, which begins Oct. 12, the management of the orchestra has provided novelty. Out of the 10 soloists who come from abroad, five are making their first appearances here as Symphony soloists. All of these are young women. The other five artists from abroad are old friends. In addition to these 10, there will be four representatives from the orchestra itself—Messrs. Witek and Noack of the violins and Messrs. Warnke and Malkin of the violincellos. The schedule calls for three singers, five violinists, four pianists and two 'cellists.

The five young artists making their first appearance as Symphony soloists are Mabel Garrison, Ethel Leginska, Frances Nash, Guiomar Novaes and Irma Seydel. Other soloists are Melba, Paderewski, Kreisler, John McCormack and Efrem Zimbalist.

supporting company, with
ing additions, will be the
which has been appearin
"Out There." A. E. A
"The Barton Mystery";
and Teresa Maxwell-Conc
nteresting additions, and
ing are Lynn Fontanne, F
Cooper, Leonard Mudie, J.
Douglas Ross, and Catherine
The final performance of "
will be given Tuesday, and
will then be dark for two da

Sergeant Arthur Guy Emp
f "Over the Top," will ta egie Hall tonight, with tren
s his subject.

gret that any alien might dare to impugn our unswerving loyalty to our country!

We declare that under no conditions should Karl Muck be allowed to lead an orchestra in our city, and we most heartily commend the actions of the Board of Police Commissioners and of the Grand Jury in prohibiting this concert.

Camp Meade Band Plays.

Just before the meeting a band of the Three Hundred and Thirteenth Infantry gave a concert at the foot of the monument in front of the Lyric. Later the band and a detachment from Company I of the same regiment, under the command of Capt. Richard J. Hughes, marched into the theater.

The soldiers, advancing down the center aisle, with their bayonets glistening and led by an immense American flag, were greeted with cheer after cheer, and the tumult did not subside until long after they had taken their places on the stage and in the orchestra.

Many Prominent Men There.

On the stage many of the most prominent men of the city were noted. Col. Jacob Hook rubbed elbows with a Grand Army veteran in full re- and J. Harry Deems, formerly ge of the music in the city's was present with a flag which, said, he had carried throughou rmany.

Just pre to the meeting employees of t vric removed from the billboards in front of the theater the posters advertising the concert which was to have taken place tomorrow night. There was no mention of hostility against the management of the theater, however, and a strong police force was present to guard against any disorder; but the police had nothing to do other than to frequently applaud the speakers.

9. Tranler, Sept 17

Monitor, Sept 16

Symphony Soloists for Season 1917-18.

New Soloists Engaged for Symphony Season

Autumn and the beginning of the concert season by the Boston Symphony orchestra go hand in hand, hence it is that just about now the followers of these concerts are eager to hear what is to be offered in the way of programs and who are to be the soloists. The first question has to go largely unanswered, for the very good reason that no conductor under the sun can very well tell in the fall what the conditions will be four to six months ahead. When it comes to the second question, however, the answer is complete and most satisfying.

The outstanding feature in Dr. Muck's announcement of soloists for the coming season is the large number of new faces to be seen at these concerts. Notable among these will be Mabel Garrison, soprano, of the Metropolitan opera company; Ethel Leginska, the much admired pianist; Frances Nash,, pianist, whose rapid advance in her chosen profession is thus fitly recognized, and Guiomar Novaes, pianist, of South America, whose recital appearance created a general desire to see and hear her to better advantage. Then there is Irma Seydel, violinist, no stranger to the musical public, and a young player who has already won a big following.

From the older school there will be Mme. Melba, famous throughout the world for her golden voice; Paderewski, the great pianist; Fritz Kreisler, violinist of violinists; John McCormack, whose remarkable debut with the orchestra last season will not soon be forgotten; Efrem Zimbalist, violinist, and Messrs. Witek and Noack, violinists, and Warnke and Malkin, cellists, from the ranks of the orchestra.

The season opens Friday afternoon, Oct. 12.

Additional interest is imparted to the coming appearances of the Flonzaley Quartet by the announcement that Ugo Ara, the viola player of the quartet, has entered the Italian war service and his place in the quartet is to be taken by Louis Bailly, one of the best artists in France.

Fritz Kreisler is to be associated with the Kneisel players for a number of concerts this season, taking the place of Franz Kneisel as first violin. The Boston concerts will be in Jordan Hall, Dec. 20 and Feb. 11. Mr. Kreisler's share in the proceeds will be donated to the Musician's Foundation, in aid of needy musicians. Hope is still entertained of getting Mr. Kneisel to resume his place with the quartet.

n REPUBLICAN

ress: Springfield, Mass

SEP 20 1917

ELLIS CONCERTS' PROGRAM

To Bring the Finest Musicians in the Country Here This Winter

Although the general public sale of season tickets for the second series of Ellis subscription concerts which is to be given in the Auditorium, this city, during the coming winter, does not open until Wednesday, October 10, mail orders for such tickets are now being accepted and all applications and inquiries should be addressed to the local manager of the concerts, Edward H. Marsh, in the Besse building.

The Ellis concerts of 1916-17 formed one of the pleasantest diversions of the season. Their quality, like all concerts which bear the names of Charles A. Ellis of Boston, was of the highest possible and their variety was admirably arranged. Even better, from the point of view of the variety, will be the concerts of the coming season. They will be four in number, given in the Auditorium on Wednesday evenings, the dates being October 31, November 28, January 16 and February 27.

The series will open with a most unusual attraction in a quartet of distinguished singers who are members of the Metropolitan opera company of New York. All of these artists belong to the younger generation and are already seriously rivaling their elders. The quartet comprises three Americans and one Italian. The Americans are Mable Garrison, soprano leggiero; Sophie Braslau, contralto; Arthur Middleton, baritone. The Italian is Giovanni Martinelli, first tenor of the Metropolitan opera company after Caruso.

Fritz Kreisler is to appear in Springfield again in a recital of violin music. This recital will make the second of the Ellis concerts.

The third concert provides for the joint appearance of Mme Louise Homer, the most distinguished of American contraltos, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, unquestionably the greatest of the younger generation of pianists.

The fourth and closing concert brings the one appearance of the Boston symphony orchestra under Dr Karl Muck and in respect to this concert most interesting plans are being made for something quite unusual and out of the ordinary.

MUSIC NOTES

An announcement from Symphony Hall gives brief notes of the soloists who are to assist this season at the regular concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Miss Mabel Garrison is described as one of the most gifted of the younger generation of American singers, "who for several years past has been a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York and has had the unusual experience of having in that institution worked her way from humble, secondary roles to a leader among the sopranos. This is so rare an occurrence in the Metropolitan that it is in itself a distinction."

The three pianists, Mme. Ethel Leginska, Miss Frances Nash and Miss Guiomar Novaes, are referred to as having made a favorable impression in Boston at recitals. "Miss Nash," the announcement goes on, "played the Saint-Saëns concerto in G minor with the Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, last season. She is a sincere artist, a sound and talented musician." And in regard to Miss Novaes: "She made her début in New York in the season of 1915-1916 She had come to America a refugee from Europe, unheralded and unknown. At her first recital she revealed herself as a pianist of extraordinary gifts, her style strongly reminding many of Teresa Carreno when that artist came to the United States as a girl."

Miss Irma Seydel, the violinist, is spoken of as a daughter of the orchestra, since "her father has been a Symphony man for many years, her teachers were Symphony men, and it was with the Symphony Orchestra in its out-of-town concerts that she received the valuable routine which has fitted her now to play with the orchestra in Boston."

In regard to the other soloists, the notice reads: "Mme. Melba, who has been at home in Australia since last spring, is due to arrive in San Francisco the end of this month to fill engagements with the Chicago Opera Company and to give concerts. She will be the soloist at the Symphony concerts of Christmas week. Mr. Paderewski is still on his ranch in Paso Robles, Cal. He begins a long concert tour next month. Fritz Kreisler has spent most of the summer in his cottage among the artists who have settled in Seal Harbor, Me. He faces the task of about 100 recital and concert appearances this winter. One of the pleasantest episodes of last season was the appearance with the orchestra of John McCormack. His reengagement for the coming season will be welcomed.

"Efrem Zimbalist, one of the most gifted violinists of the day, has not appeared here with the orchestra for several years. With Kreisler, Zimbalist, Seydel, Witek and Noack, patrons of the concerts are assured of violin playing of the highest quality."

Georges Longy, the first oboe player of the orchestra, has returned from his annual visit to France. All the members of the organization are said to be now at hand, ready to take up the work of the season. The orchestra assembles this fall with the same membership as that with which it broke up last spring.

Transcr, Sept 17

Symphony Soloists for Season 1917-18.

New Soloists Engaged for Symphony Season

Autumn and the beginning of the concert season by the Boston Symphony orchestra go hand in hand hence it is that just about now the followers of these concerts are eager to hear what is to be offered in the way of programs and who are to be the soloists. The first question has to go largely unanswered, for the very good reason that no conductor under the sun can very well tell in the fall what the conditions will be four to six months ahead. When it comes to the second question, however, the answer is complete and most satisfying.

The outstanding feature in Dr. Muck's announcement of soloists for the coming season is the large number of new faces to be seen at these concerts. Notable among these will be Mabel Garrison, soprano, of the Metropolitan opera company, Ethel Leginska, the much admired pianist, Frances Nash, pianist, whose rapid advance in her chosen profession is thus fitly recognized, and Guiomar Novaes, pianist, of South America, whose recital appearance created a general desire to see and hear her to better advantage. Then there is Irma Seydel, violinist, no stranger to the musical public, and a young player who has already won a big following.

From the older school there will be Mme. Melba, famous throughout the world for her golden voice; Paderewski, the great pianist; Fritz Kreisler, violinist of violinists; John McCormack, whose remarkable debut with the orchestra last season will not soon be forgotten; Efrem Zimbalist, violinist, and Messrs. Witek and Noack, violinists, and Warnke and Malkin, cellists, from the ranks of the orchestra.

The season opens Friday afternoon, Oct. 12

Additional interest is imparted to the coming appearances of the Flonzaley Quartet by the announcement that Ugo Ara, the viola player of the quartet, has entered the Italian war service and his place in the quartet is to be taken by Louis Bailly, one of the best artists in France.

Fritz Kreisler is to be associated with the Kneisel players for a number of concerts this season, taking the place of Franz Kneisel as first violin. The Boston concerts will be in Jordan Hall, Dec. 20 and Feb. 11. Mr. Kreisler's share in the proceeds will be donated to the Musician's Foundation, in aid of needy musicians. Hope is still entertained of getting Mr. Kneisel to resume his place with the quartet.

n REPUBLICAN

ress: Springfield, Mass

ELLIS CONCERTS' PROGRAM

To Bring the Finest Musicians in the Country Here This Winter

Although the general public sale of season tickets for the second series of Ellis subscription concerts which is to be given in the Auditorium, this city, during the coming winter, does not open until Wednesday, October 10, mail orders for such tickets are now being accepted and all applications and inquiries should be addressed to the local manager of the concerts, Edward H. Marsh, in the Besse building.

The Ellis concerts of 1916-17 formed one of the pleasantest diversions of the season. Their quality, like all concerts which bear the names of Charles A. Ellis of Boston, was of the highest possible and their variety was admirably arranged. Even better, from the point of view of the variety, will be the concerts of the coming season. They will be four in number, given in the Auditorium on Wednesday evenings, the dates being October 31, November 28, January 16 and February 27.

The series will open with a most unusual attraction in a quartet of distinguished singers who are members of the Metropolitan opera company of New York. All of these artists belong to the younger generation and are already seriously rivaling their elders. The quartet comprises three Americans and one Italian. The Americans are Mable Garrison, soprano leggiero; Sophie Braslau, contralto; Arthur Middleton, baritone. The Italian is Giovanni Martinelli, first tenor of the Metropolitan opera company after Caruso.

Fritz Kreisler is to appear in Springfield again in a recital of violin music. This recital will make the second of the Ellis concerts.

The third concert provides for the joint appearance of Mme Louise Homer, the most distinguished of American contraltos, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, unquestionably the greatest of the younger generation of pianists.

The fourth and closing concert brings the one appearance of the Boston symphony orchestra under Dr Karl Muck and in respect to this concert most interesting plans are being made for something quite unusual and out of the ordinary.

Mercur, Sept 16

MUSIC NOTES

An announcement from Symphony Hall gives brief notes of the soloists who are to assist this season at the regular concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Miss Mabel Garrison is described as one of the most gifted of the younger generation of American singers, "who for several years past has been a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company of New York and has had the unusual experience of having in that institution worked her way from humble, secondary roles to a leader among the sopranos. This is so rare an occurrence in the Metropolitan that it is in itself a distinction."

The three pianists, Mme. Ethel Leginska, Miss Frances Nash and Miss Guiomar Novaes, are referred to as having made a favorable impression in Boston at recitals. "Miss Nash," the announcement goes on, "played the Saint-Saëns concerto in G minor with the Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, last season. She is a sincere artist, a sound and talented musician." And in regard to Miss Novaes: "She made her début in New York in the season of 1915-1916. She had come to America a refugee from Europe, unheralded and unknown. At her first recital she revealed herself as a pianist of extraordinary gifts, her style strongly reminding many of Teresa Carreno when that artist came to the United States as a girl."

Miss Irma Seydel, the violinist, is spoken of as a daughter of the orchestra, since "her father has been a Symphony man for many years, her teachers were Symphony men, and it was with the Symphony Orchestra in its out-of-town concerts that she received the valuable routine which has fitted her now to play with the orchestra in Boston."

In regard to the other soloists, the notice reads: "Mme. Melba, who has been at home in Australia since last spring, is due to arrive in San Francisco the end of this month to fill engagements with the Chicago Opera Company and to give concerts. She will be the soloist at the Symphony concerts of Christmas week. Mr. Paderewski is still on his ranch in Paso Robles, Cal. He begins a long concert tour next month. Fritz Kreisler has spent most of the summer in his cottage among the artists who have settled in Seal Harbor, Me. He faces the task of about 100 recital and concert appearances this winter. One of the pleasantest episodes of last season was the appearance with the orchestra of John McCormack. His reengagement for the coming season will be welcomed.

"Efrem Zimbalist, one of the most gifted violinists of the day, has not appeared here with the orchestra for several years. With Kreisler, Zimbalist, Seydel, Witek and Noack, patrons of the concerts are assured of violin playing of the highest quality."

Georges Longy, the first oboe player of the orchestra, has returned from his annual visit to France. All the members of the organization are said to be now at hand, ready to take up the work of the season. The orchestra assembles this fall with the same membership as that with which it broke up last spring.

American Sept 16

10.

Many Fine Soloists Are Listed for Symphony Season

Above is Mabel Garrison, soprano, who will be one of the soloists of the Symphony Orchestra the coming season. Below is Madame Melba.

Irma Seydel, who will draw sweet voices from her violin, as a Symphony Orchestra soloist.

Soloists Listed for Symphony Season

THE list of soloists engaged for the coming season of Symphony concerts is more than ordinarily interesting. While it contains the usual quota of names of world-wide fame, it likewise has an unusual proportion of young artists making their first appearances as Symphony soloists in Boston.

The schedule prepared for the season beginning October 12-13 calls for fourten pairs of concerts with soloists and ten pairs with orchestra alone. Of the fourteen artists engaged, four, as usual, are representative members of the string sections of the orchestra, Messrs. Witek and Noack, Warnke and Malkin. The other ten come, so to say, from abroad.

The list contains three singers, five violinists, two 'cellists and four pianists. The singers are Madame Melba, John McCormack and Mabel Garrison. The violinists are Fritz Kreisler, Efrem Zimbalist, Irma Seydel, Anton Witek and Sylvian Noack. The 'cellists are Heinrich Warnke and Joseph Malkin. The pianists are Mr. Paderewski, Ethel Leginska, Frances Nash and Guiomar Novaes.

Divided nationally, we find three Americans, Mabel Garrison, Frances Nash and Irma Seydel; one English, Leginska; one Australian, Melba; two Russians, Zimbalist and Malkin; one Russian Pole, Paderewski; one Brazalian, Novaes; one Bohemian, Witek; one Hollander, Noack; one German, Warnke; one Irishman, John McCormack, and one Austrian, Kreisler.

Three of these soloists are old and well-beloved friends, Madame Melba, Paderewski and Kreisler.

RECORD

ss: Philadelphia, Pa.

SEP 23 1917

—Subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts, which will be given in the Academy of Music the coming winter, have still one week for arrangement as to seats. The limit of reservations is set for Monday, October 1. Seats which are not taken up by that date may be disposed of by the management to other applicants. Concerts will be given on Monday evenings, November 5, December 3, January 7, February 11 and March 11. Three soloists are announced — Madam Melba, Winifred Christie, Scotch pianist, and Fritz Kreisler. The orchestra will return with exactly the same personnel as that of last year and with Dr. Karl Muck directing.

PRESS

: Philadelphia, Pa.

Subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts which will be given in the Academy of Music the coming Winter, who have not yet taken up their seats, are reminded that they have only next week in which to do so. The limit of reservations is set for Monday, October 1 and seats which are not taken up by that date may be disposed of by the management to other applicants. The renewal of subscriptions for the coming season is reported by the management in Boston to be quite equal to the renewals of last year.

As already announced, the concerts will be given on Monday evenings, November 5, December 3, January 7, February 11, and March 11. Three concerts are announced. Madame Melba, Winifred Christie, that most interesting Scotch pianist, and Fritz Kreisler.

The Orchestra will return with exactly the same personnel it had last year. The Orchestra begins its work in Boston on Friday afternoon, October 12, and its season ends in the same city on Saturday evening, May 4.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

FAMOUS SOLOISTS TO BE HEARD WITH THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Following its custom of the past, the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in engaging its soloists for the season, which begins Oct 12-13, has sought so to vary the concerts purely orchestral and concerts with soloists that interest will be maintained at highest point throughout the Winter.

In all 14 soloists have been engaged for the 24 pairs of concerts. Four of these come from the orchestra, those admirable artists, Messrs Witek and Noack of the violins and Messrs Warnke and Malkin of the violincellos.

The other 10 come, so to say, from abroad, and of these five are old familiar friends and five of the rising generation, who, while known to Boston through recitals, are making their first appearance here at the Symphony concerts.

As the list stands now, there are three singers, five violinists, two cellists and four pianists. The singers are Mme Melba, John McCormack and Mabel Garrison; the violinists, Fritz Kreisler, Efrem Zimbalist, Irma Seydel, Anton Witek and Sylvian Noack; the cellists, Heinrich Warnke and Joseph Malkin, and the pianists, Ethel Leginska, Frances Nash, Guiomar Novaes and Mr Paderewski.

What may be regarded somewhat as a departure from the past is the engagement of an unusually large proportion of the younger artists who are making names for themselves in the world of music.

Mabel Garrison is one of the most gifted of the younger generation of American sopranos. For several years past she has been a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company. A year ago last Spring Miss Garrison enchanted Boston with the manner in which she sang the florid air given to Oscar in Verdi's "Un ballo in maschera." Last season she was summoned in New York on a few hours' notice to take the place of Mme Hempel and sing Astriamante in Mozart's "The Magic Flute."

Ethel Leginska, Frances Nash and Guiomar Novaes are young pianists, all of whom have made more favorable impressions at their recitals in Boston.

Frances Nash, a very gifted young American, played Saint-Saens concerto in G minor with the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge last season. She must be counted as one of the "finds" of the year, for that engagement was largely on faith of warm recommendation.

The young Brazilian pianist, Miss Guiomar Novaes, made her debut in York in the season of 1915-1916. She had come to America, a refugee from Europe, unheralded and unknown. At her first recital she revealed herself as a pianist of extraordinary gifts.

Irma Seydel, who is making her first appearance in Boston at a Symphony soloist, is in a sense, a "daughter of the orchestra." Her father has been a Symphony man for many years and her teachers were symphony men.

Knabe Sept 23

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first three Symphony programs of the season will be ready for publication next week. There will be no soloist at the first and third concerts. At the second pair of concerts, on the 19th and 20th, the soloist will be Efrem Zimbalist, the distinguished Russian violinist. This year there will be four concerts before the southern trip begins, for all the trips except those which come in February and March have been moved back one week.

The subscription sale of seats for the Symphony concerts is progressing greatly to the satisfaction of the management. There are still a few seats left for the Friday afternoon concerts and a considerable choice of seats for the Saturday evening concerts.

The schedule of the orchestra is now complete. It calls for 48 concerts in Boston (24 pairs), eight concerts in Cambridge, 10 in New York, five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, three in Providence, two in Hartford, two in Worcester, and one each in Lynn, Northampton, Manchester, N. H., Springfield, Rochester, Buffalo, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit and New Bedford. There will be two pension fund concerts in Boston and three special concerts, concerning which announcement will be made later. This makes a total of 109 concerts, the usual quota for 30 weeks. Business for the orchestra, outside of Boston, will be on a par with last year, which means that it will be the maximum possible.

Cambridge Concerts

The usual series of eight Symphony concerts will be given in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, on Thursday evenings during the coming season. The dates are Oct. 18, Nov. 15, Dec. 13, Jan. 17, Feb. 21, March 21, April 4 and April 25. Subscribers of last season have an option on their seats for the coming season until Monday, Oct. 8. The unclaimed seats will be offered for sale on Saturday, Oct. 13, at George H. Kent's, University Bookstore, Harvard square.

The soloists include Guiomar Novaes, Ethel Leginska, Arthur Hackett and Jacques Thiboud. Others will be announced.

Post, Sept 23

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The first three Symphony programmes of the season will be ready for publication next week. There will be no soloist at the first and third concerts. At the second pair of concerts, on the 19th and 20th, the soloist will be Efrem Zimbalist, the distinguished Russian pianist, who had not been heard with the orchestra for a number of years. This year there will be four concerts before the Southern trips begin, for all the trips except those which come in February and March have been moved back one week.

The subscription sale of seats for the Symphony concerts is progressing greatly to the satisfaction of the management. There are still a few seats left for the Friday afternoon concerts and a considerable choice of seats for the Saturday evening concerts, but at the rate which mail orders are coming in each day and buyers are visiting Symphony Hall it is certain that the subscription for the season will be at least as large as that of last year, which was practically a record.

Nearly all of the members of the orchestra have returned from their summer vacations. Symphony Hall has undergone its annual house-cleaning and is spick and span for the coming year. Dr. and Mrs. Muck are still at their cottage at Seal Harbor, where they will be until the first of the month. Dr. Muck has accomplished a great amount of work during the summer and has managed to walk from 10 to 15 miles every day, rain or shine. Mr. Ellis, who saw him at Seal Harbor last week, says that he has never been in better health.

The schedule of the orchestra is now complete. It calls for 48 concerts in Boston (24 pairs)—eight concerts in Cambridge, 10 in New York, five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn; three in Providence, two in Hartford, two in Worcester, and one each in Lynn, Northampton, Manchester, N. H., Springfield, Rochester, Buffalo, Pittsburg, Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit and New Bedford. There will be two pension fund concerts in Boston and three special concerts, concerning which announcement will be made later. This makes a total of 109 concerts, the usual quota for 30 weeks. Business for the orchestra outside of Boston will be on a par with last year.

Herald Sept 22

BOSTON MUSIC NOTES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor, is to give 24 pairs of concerts at Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass., on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, together with eight concerts at Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass., 15 concerts in New York, N. Y. (including five in Brooklyn), and five concerts in each of the cities, Philadelphia, Pa.; Baltimore, Md., and Washington, D. C.; three concerts in Providence, R. I.; two in each of the cities, Hartford, Conn., and Worcester, Mass., and single concerts in Buffalo, N. Y.; Rochester, N. Y.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Cleveland, O.; Toledo, O.; Detroit, Mich.; Springfield, Mass.; Northampton, Mass.; Lynn, Mass.; New Bedford, Mass., and Manchester. N. H. The Boston concerts open on Oct. 12. The first soloist to appear is Efrem Zimbalist, the violinist, who is booked for Oct. 19 and 20.

Globe Sept 23

Boston Symphony Concert Season Soon to Begin

The first three Symphony programs of the season will be ready for publication next week. There will be no soloist at the first and third concerts. At the second pair of concerts, Oct 19 and 20, the soloist will be Efrem Zimbalist, the distinguished Russian pianist, who has not been heard with the orchestra for a number of years. This year there will be four concerts before the Southern trips begin.

The subscription sale of seats is progressing greatly to the satisfaction of the management. There are still a few seats left for the Friday afternoon concerts and a considerable choice of seats for the Saturday evening concerts.

The schedule of performances calls for 48 concerts in Boston, eight concerts in Cambridge, 10 in New York, five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn; three in Providence, two in Hartford, two in Worcester, and one each in Lynn, Northampton, Manchester, N H, Springfield, Rochester, Buffalo, Pittsburg, Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit and New Bedford. There will be two pension fund concerts in Boston and three special concerts, concerning which announcement will be made later.

Cambridge Symphony Concerts

The usual series of eight concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, on Thursday evenings this season. The dates are Oct 18, Nov 15, Dec 13, Jan 17, Feb 21, March 21, April 4 and 25. Subscribers of last season have an option on their seats for the coming season until Monday, Oct 8. The unclaimed seats will be offered for sale Saturday, Oct 13, at the University Bookstore, Harvard sq.

The soloists include Guiomar Novaes, Ethel Leginska, Arthur Hackett and Jacques Thibaud.

American Sept 23

Efrem Zimbalist to Be Soloist at Symphony

THE first three Symphony programs of the season will be ready for publication next week.

There will be no soloist at the first and third concerts. At the second pair of concerts, on the 19th and 20th, the soloist will be Efrem Zimbalist, the distinguished Russian pianist, who has not been heard with the orchestra for a number of years.

This year there will be four concerts before the Southern trips begin, for all the trips, except those which come in February and March, have been moved back one week.

The subscription sale of seats for the Symphony Concerts is progressing greatly to the satisfaction of the management. There are still a few seats left for the Friday afternoon concerts and a considerable choice of seats for the Saturday evening co-

N. Y. Telegraph Oct 1

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The option on seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in New York will expire to-day. The orchestra itself will spend this week in Camden, N. J., where it is to make records for the Victor Talking Machine. The entire orchestra will be there with Dr. Karl Muck, conductor.

PRESS
Philadelphia, Pa.
SEP 23

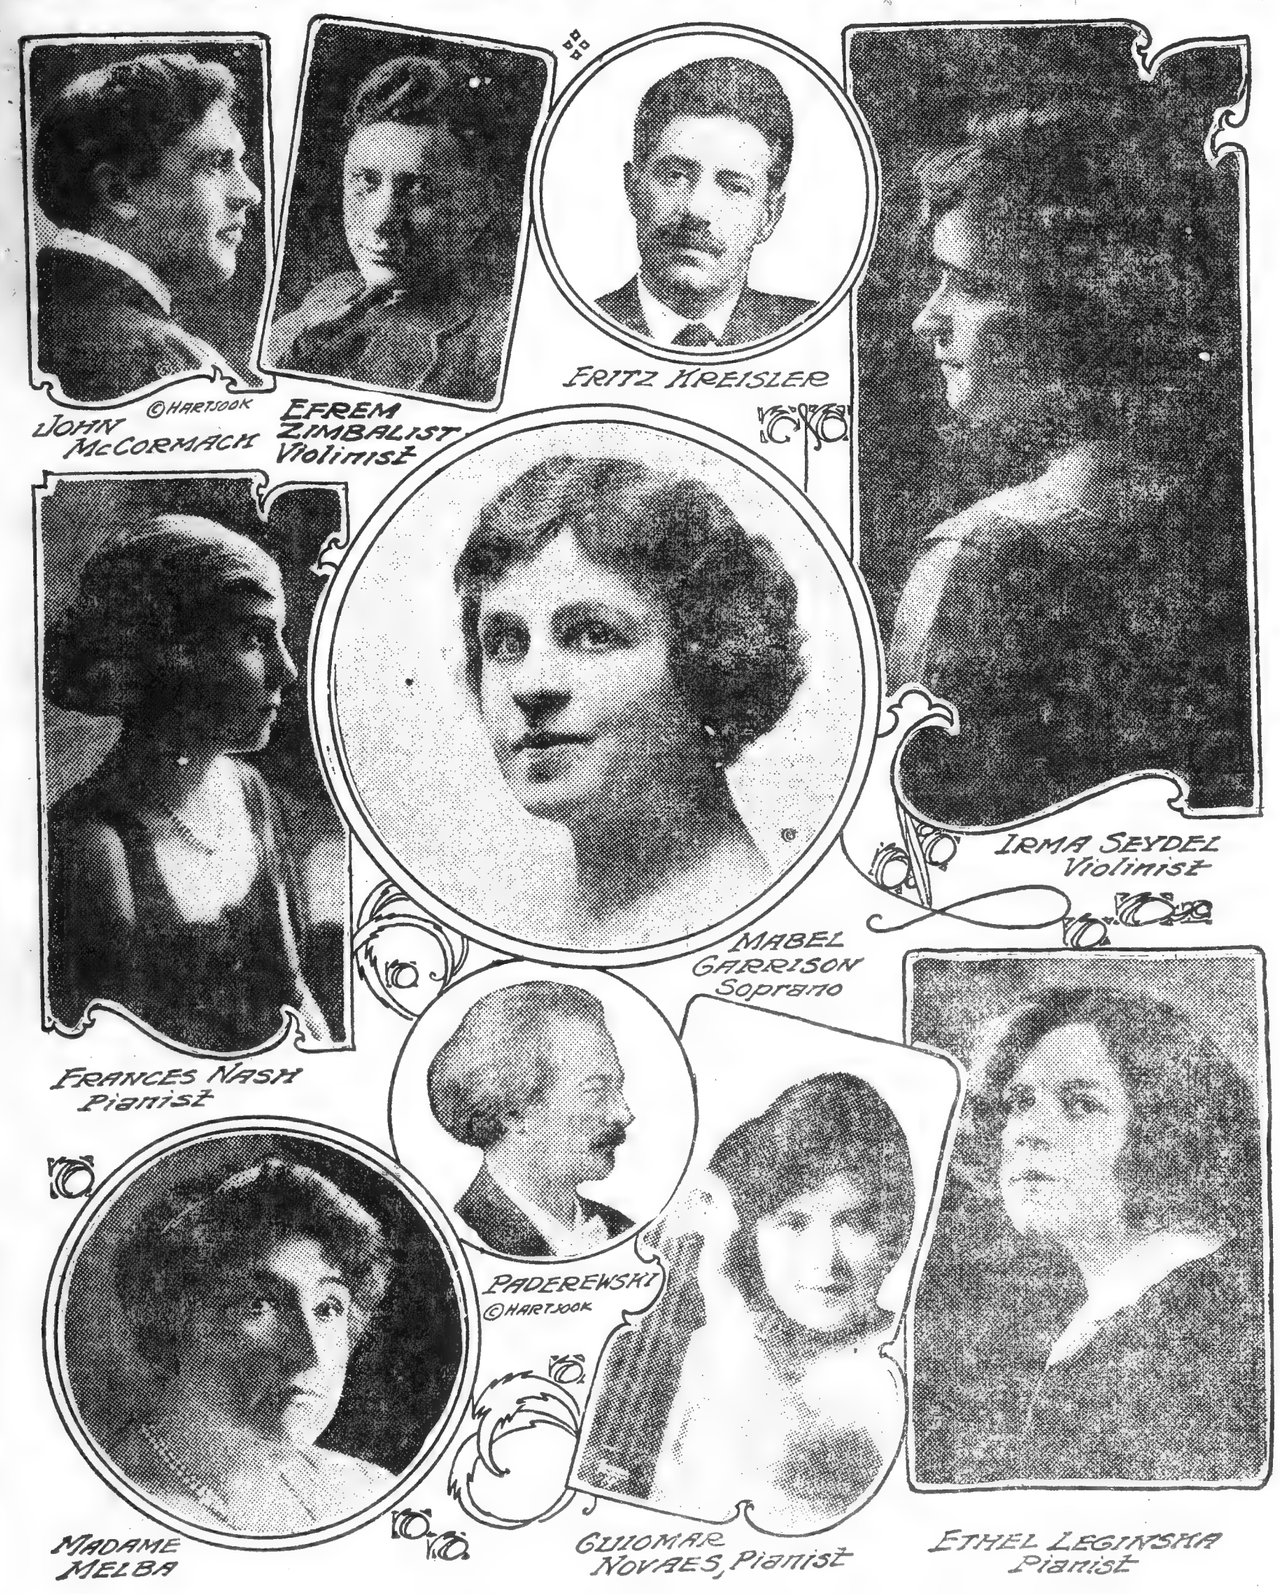
The announcement that the Philadelphia Orchestra advance sale is unprecedented, and that extra seating space has been found necessary at the Academy of Music for those who wish to attend, is certainly comforting news. For a time it was felt that music would be neglected for more material things in the coming season, but it is very evident that music-lovers feel that they are going to have sufficient time from their other duties to support our own orchestra and singing societies and undoubtedly visiting organizations.

The Boston Symphony orchestra is also meeting with the good fortune of a big sale for the five concerts to be given here, and instead of three concerts as heretofore included the Damrosch season in Philadelphia, an additional concert is announced for this season, with eminent soloists, and with the change to matinee instead of evening concerts.

The usual number of concerts by distinguished soloists, many of whom remained in this country throughout the Summer on account of the European war, as well as our Operatic Society, and local artists are arranging concerts to the same number as were given during the previous season.

Philadelphia will have a musical season that will be distinguished in the artists that have been engaged for the concert stage, and in combination with the opera to be given here, there is every evidence that melody is not going to be effected in any way by the war, at least not this winter.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS



FAMOUS SOLOISTS TO BE HEARD WITH THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Following its custom of the past, the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in engaging its soloists for the season, which begins Oct 12-13, has sought so to vary the concerts purely orchestral and concerts with soloists that interest will be maintained at highest point throughout the Winter.

In all 14 soloists have been engaged for the 24 pairs of concerts. Four of these come from the orchestra, those admirable artists, Messrs Witek and Noack of the violins and Messrs Warnke and Malkin of the violincellos.

The other 10 come, so to say, from abroad, and of these five are old familiar friends and five of the rising generation, who, while known to Boston through recitals, are making their first appearance here at the Symphony concerts.

As the list stands now, there are three singers, five violinists, two cellists and four pianists. The singers are Mme Melba, John McCormack and Mabel Garrison; the violinists, Fritz Kreisler, Efrem Zimbalist, Irma Seydel, Anton Witek and Sylvian Noack; the cellists, Heinrich Warnke and Joseph Malkin, and the pianists, Ethel Leginska, Frances Nash, Guiomar Novaes and Mr Paderewski.

What may be regarded somewhat as a departure from the past is the engagement of an unusually large proportion of the younger artists who are making names for themselves in the world of music.

Mabel Garrison is one of the most gifted of the younger generation of American sopranos. For several years past she has been a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company. A year ago last Spring Miss Garrison enchanted Boston with the manner in which she sang the florid air given to Oscar in Verdi's "Un ballo in maschera." Last season she was summoned in New York on a few hours' notice to take the place of Mme Hempel and sing Ah! fiammente in Mozart's "The Magic Flute."

Ethel Leginska, Frances Nash and Guiomar Novaes are young pianists, all of whom have made more favorable impressions at their recitals in Boston.

Frances Nash, a very gifted young American, played Saint-Saens concerto in G minor with the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge last season. She must be counted as one of the "finds" of the year, for that engagement was largely on faith of warm recommendation.

The young Brazilian pianist, Miss Guiomar Novaes, made her debut in York in the season of 1915-1916. She had come to America, a refugee from Europe, unheralded and unknown. At her first recital she revealed herself as a pianist of extraordinary gifts.

Irma Seydel, who is making her first appearance in Boston at a Symphony soloist, is in a sense, a "daughter of the orchestra." Her father has been a Symphony man for many years and her teachers were symphony men.

Herald Sept 23

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The first three Symphony programs of the season will be ready for publication next week. There will be no soloist at the first and third concerts. At the second pair of concerts, on the 19th and 20th, the soloist will be Efrem Zimbalist, the distinguished Russian violinist. This year there will be four concerts before the southern trip begins, for all the trips except those which come in February and March have been moved back one week.

The subscription sale of seats for the Symphony concerts is progressing greatly to the satisfaction of the management. There are still a few seats left for the Friday afternoon concerts and a considerable choice of seats for the Saturday evening concerts.

The schedule of the orchestra is now complete. It calls for 48 concerts in Boston (24 pairs), eight concerts in Cambridge, 10 in New York, five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, three in Providence, two in Hartford, two in Worcester, and one each in Lynn, Northampton, Manchester, N. H., Springfield, Rochester, Buffalo, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit and New Bedford. There will be two pension fund concerts in Boston and three special concerts, concerning which announcement will be made later. This makes a total of 109 concerts, the usual quota for 30 weeks. Business for the orchestra, outside of Boston, will be on a par with last year, which means that it will be the maximum possible.

Cambridge Concerts

The usual series of eight Symphony concerts will be given in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, on Thursday evenings during the coming season. The dates are Oct. 18, Nov. 15, Dec. 13, Jan. 17, Feb. 21, March 21, April 4 and April 25. Subscribers of last season have an option on their seats for the coming season until Monday, Oct. 8. The unclaimed seats will be offered for sale on Saturday, Oct. 13, at George H. Kent's, University Bookstore, Harvard square.

The soloists include Guiomar Novaes, Ethel Leginska, Arthur Hackett and Jacques Thiboud. Others will be announced.

Post, Sept 23

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The first three Symphony programmes of the season will be ready for publication next week. There will be no soloist at the first and third concerts. At the second pair of concerts, on the 19th and 20th, the soloist will be Efrem Zimbalist, the distinguished Russian pianist, who had not been heard with the orchestra for a number of years. This year there will be four concerts before the Southern trips begin, for all the trips except those which come in February and March have been moved back one week.

The subscription sale of seats for the Symphony concerts is progressing greatly to the satisfaction of the management. There are still a few seats left for the Friday afternoon concerts and a considerable choice of seats for the Saturday evening concerts, but at the rate which mail orders are coming in each day and buyers are visiting Symphony Hall it is certain that the subscription for the season will be at least as large as that of last year, which was practically a record.

Nearly all of the members of the orchestra have returned from their summer vacations. Symphony Hall has undergone its annual house-cleaning and is spick and span for the coming year. Dr. and Mrs. Muck are still at their cottage at Seal Harbor, where they will be until the first of the month. Dr. Muck has accomplished a great amount of work during the summer and has managed to walk from 10 to 15 miles every day, rain or shine. Mr. Ellis, who saw him at Seal Harbor last week, says that he has never been in better health.

The schedule of the orchestra is now complete. It calls for 48 concerts in Boston (24 pairs)—eight concerts in Cambridge, 10 in New York, five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn; three in Providence, two in Hartford, two in Worcester, and one each in Lynn, Northampton, Manchester, N. H., Springfield, Rochester, Buffalo, Pittsburg, Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit and New Bedford. There will be two pension fund concerts in Boston and three special concerts, concerning which announcement will be made later. This makes a total of 109 concerts, the usual quota for 30 weeks. Business for the orchestra outside of Boston will be on a par with last year,

Monitor Sept 22

BOSTON MUSIC NOTES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Karl Muck, conductor, is to give 24 pairs of concerts at Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass., on Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, together with eight concerts at Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass., 15 concerts in New York, N. Y. (including five in Brooklyn), and five concerts in each of the cities, Philadelphia, Pa.; Baltimore, Md., and Washington, D. C.; three concerts in Providence, R. I.; two in each of the cities, Hartford, Conn., and Worcester, Mass., and single concerts in Buffalo, N. Y.; Rochester, N. Y.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Cleveland, O.; Toledo, O.; Detroit, Mich.; Springfield, Mass.; Northampton, Mass.; Lynn, Mass.; New Bedford, Mass., and Manchester, N. H. The Boston concerts open on Oct. 12. The first soloist to appear is Efrem Zimbalist, the violinist, who is booked for Oct. 19 and 20.

Globe Sept 23

Boston Symphony Concert Season Soon to Begin

The first three Symphony programs of the season will be ready for publication next week. There will be no soloist at the first and third concerts. At the second pair of concerts, Oct 19 and 20, the soloist will be Efrem Zimbalist, the distinguished Russian pianist, who has not been heard with the orchestra for a number of years. This year there will be four concerts before the Southern trips begin.

The subscription sale of seats is progressing greatly to the satisfaction of the management. There are still a few seats left for the Friday afternoon concerts and a considerable choice of seats for the Saturday evening concerts.

The schedule of performances calls for 48 concerts in Boston, eight concerts in Cambridge, 10 in New York, five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn; three in Providence, two in Hartford, two in Worcester, and one each in Lynn, Northampton, Manchester, N H, Springfield, Rochester, Buffalo, Pittsburg, Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit and New Bedford. There will be two pension fund concerts in Boston and three special concerts, concerning which announcement will be made later.

Cambridge Symphony Concerts

The usual series of eight concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, on Thursday evenings this season. The dates are Oct 18, Nov 15, Dec 13, Jan 17, Feb 21, March 21, April 4 and 25. Subscribers of last season have an option on their seats for the coming season until Monday, Oct 8. The unclaimed seats will be offered for sale Saturday, Oct 13, at the University Bookstore, Harvard sq.

The soloists include Guiomar Novaes, Ethel Leginska, Arthur Hackett and Jacques Thibaud.

PRESS
Philadelphia, Pa.

The announcement that the Philadelphia Orchestra advance sale is unprecedented, and that extra seating space has been found necessary at the Academy of Music for those who wish to attend, is certainly comforting news. For a time it was felt that music would be neglected for more material things in the coming season, but it is very evident that music-lovers feel that they are going to have sufficient time from their other duties to support our own orchestra and singing societies and undoubtedly visiting organizations.

The Boston Symphony orchestra is also meeting with the good fortune of a big sale for the five concerts to be given here, and instead of three concerts as heretofore included the Lenten season in Philadelphia, an additional concert is announced for this season, with eminent soloists, and with the change to matinee instead of evening concerts.

The usual number of concerts by distinguished soloists, many of whom remained in this country throughout the summer on account of the European war, as well as our Operatic Society and local artists are arranging concerts to the same number as were given during the previous season.

Philadelphia will have a musical season that will be distinguished by the artists that have been engaged for the concert stage, and in combination with the opera to be given here. There is every evidence that melody is not going to be effected in any way by the war, at least not this winter.

American Sept 23

Efrem Zimbalist to Be Soloist at Symphony

THE first three Symphony programs of the season will be ready for publication next week.

There will be no soloist at the first and third concerts. At the second pair of concerts, on the 19th and 20th, the soloist will be Efrem Zimbalist, the distinguished Russian pianist, who has not been heard with the orchestra for a number of years.

This year there will be four concerts before the Southern trips begin, for all the trips, except those which come in February and March, have been moved back one week.

The subscription sale of seats for the Symphony Concerts is progressing greatly to the satisfaction of the management. There are still a few seats left for the Friday afternoon concerts and a considerable choice of seats for the Saturday evening con-

N. Y. Telegraph Oct 1

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The option on seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in New York will expire to-day. The orchestra itself will spend this week in Camden, N. J., where it is to make records for the Victor Talking Machine. The entire orchestra will be there with Dr. Karl Muck, conductor.

SOLOISTS WHOM BOSTON WILL HEAR AT THIS YEAR'S SYMPHONY CONCERTS

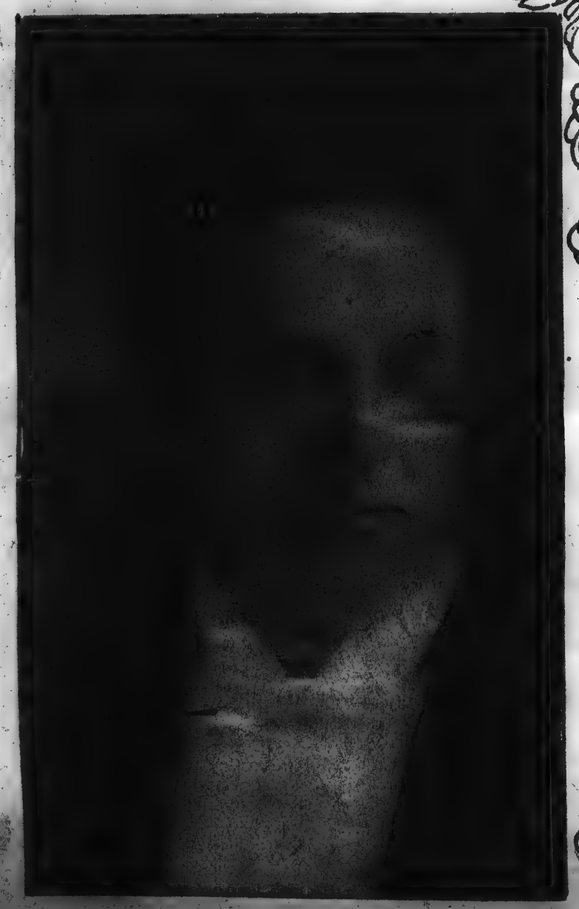
Paderewski.

Guiomar Novaes.

Melba..

Mabel Garrison.

Fritz Kreisler.



John McCormack.

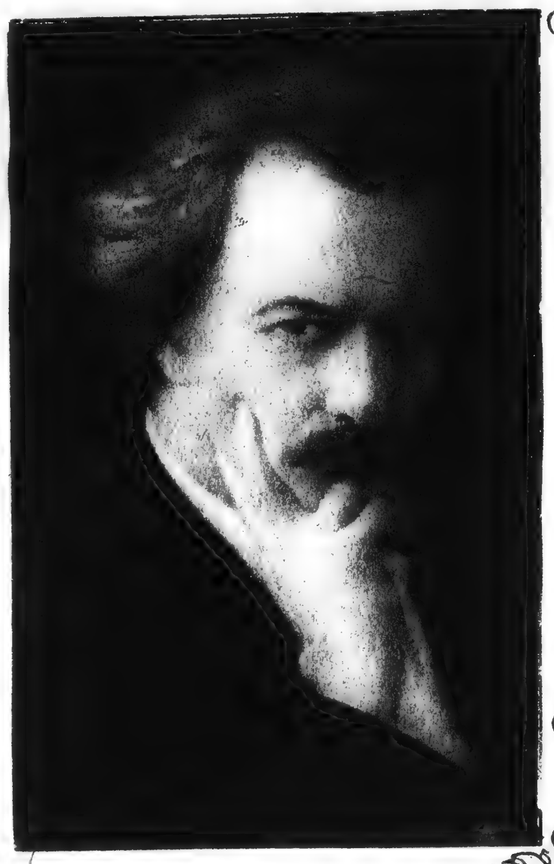
Frances Nash.

Ethel Leginska.

Irma Seydel.

Efrem Zimbalist.

SOLOISTS WHOM BOSTON WILL HEAR AT THIS YEAR'S SYMPHONY CONCERTS



Paderewski.

Guiomar Novaes.

Melba..

Mabel Garrison.

Fritz Kreisler.

John McCormack.

Frances Nash.

Ethel Leginska.

Irma Seydel.

Efrem Zimbalist.

Transcript, Sept 27

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The subscription sale of seats for the Symphony concerts is progressing, greatly to the satisfaction of the management. There are still a few seats left for the Friday afternoon concerts, and a considerable choice of seats for the Saturday evening concerts, but at the rate which mail orders are coming in each day and buyers are visiting Symphony Hall, it is certain that the subscription for the season will be at least as large as that of last year, which was practically a record.

Nearly all of the members of the orchestra have returned from their summer vacations. Symphony Hall has undergone its annual house-cleaning, and is spick and span for the coming year. Dr. and Mrs. Muck are still at their cottage at Seal Harbor, where they will be until the first of the month. Dr. Muck has accomplished a great amount of work during the summer.

Journal, Oct 1

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

This week the Symphony Orchestra will make records for a talking machine. The entire orchestra will leave Boston tonight at 7 o'clock for Camden, N. J., where it will remain until Friday evening. Dr. Muck will join the orchestra in Camden.

Various efforts have been made in the last few years to take records of orchestras, so several years ago the Victor Talking Machine Company began making experiments to this end and Mr. Ellis promised them that whenever they were ready, the Boston Symphony Orchestra would make records for them. This last spring experiments had reached such a stage that they could make records of a band of 100 men.

The subscription is going on at Symphony Hall in a satisfactory manner. The prospects of the orchestra have never been better in all the cities.

SYMPHONY IN CAMBRIDGE

Renewals of subscriptions for the eight concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, this winter are now being taken at the University Bookstore in Harvard square.

The concerts will be given, as usual, on Thursday evenings, the dates being Oct. 18, Nov. 15, Dec. 13, Jan. 17, Feb. 21, March 21, April 4 and April 25.

There will be seven soloists for the eight concerts. These are Jacques Thibaud, the French violinist; Guiomar Novaes, pianist; Ethel Leginska, pianist; Arthur Hackett, tenor; Laura Littlefield, soprano; Alice Allen, pianist, and Howard Goding, pianist.

Record - Sept. 28

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Play for Talking Machine Records

Monday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 100 strong, leaves Boston. No, not for good; no, not for a concert tour before the Boston season. The entire orchestra goes to Camden, N. J., where it will stay until Friday. Although Dr. Muck, the conductor, does not leave Boston with the orchestra, he will meet his men in Camden.

Why is the band going to little Camden? To make talking machine records! It is an open secret that for a long long time the Victor Talking Machine Co. has sought the service of the finest band in this country.

For a long time talking machine companies have been making experiments in reproducing orchestral music, and at the present time making of orchestral records has reached such a point of excellence that Charles Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, consented to have the Boston band play for the Victor people.

It is believed that the new records will bring out all the various tones of the orchestra in their several qualities.

The work of making talking machine record has necessitated the calling together of the orchestra one week earlier than was expected. The men will meet Monday morning in Symphony Hall and will have a short preliminary rehearsal under the direction of Assistant Conductor Schmidt. The pieces chosen for reproduction will of a necessity be short and will be brilliant in orchestral coloring.

Dr. Muck is greatly interested in the experiment and will do everything in his power to co-operate with the company in making record.

If records of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are soon to be on sale through the country—and there is every reason to believe they will—he wants them to represent the orchestra at its best.

Other news from the orchestra is that the sale of seats for both the Boston and Cambridge concerts is excellent and that the management has every reason to believe that the band will have a season of unparalleled prosperity.

American, Sept 27

GREAT DEMAND FOR SYMPHONY TICKETS

First Three Programs to Be Ready for Publication Next Week

SCHEDULE PROVIDES 48 BOSTON CONCERTS

The subscription sale of seats for the Symphony Concerts is progressing, greatly to the satisfaction of the management. There are still a few seats left for the Friday afternoon concerts and a considerable choice of seats for the Saturday evening concerts, but at the rate which mail orders are coming in each day and buyers are visiting Symphony Hall, it is certain that the subscription for the season will be at least as large as that of last year, which was practically a record.

Nearly all the members of the Orchestra have returned from their summer vacations. Symphony Hall has undergone its annual house-cleaning and is spick and span for the coming year. Dr. and Mrs. Muck are still at their cottage at Seal Harbor, where they will be until the first of the month. Dr. Muck has accomplished a great amount of work during the summer and has managed to walk from 10 to 15 miles every day, rain or shine. Mr. Ellis, who saw him at Seal Harbor last week, says that he has never been in better health.

The first three programes of the season will be ready for publication next week. There will be no soloist at the first and third concerts. At the second pair of concerts, on the 19th and 20th, the soloist will be Efrem Zimbalist, the distinguished Russian pianist, who has not been heard with the Orchestra for a number of years. This year, there will be four concerts before the Southern trips begin, for all the trips, except those which come in February and March, have been moved back one week.

The schedule of the Orchestra is now complete. It calls for 48 concerts in Boston (24 pairs), eight concerts in Cambridge, 10 in New York, five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, three in Providence, two in Hartford, two in Worcester, and one each in Lynn, Northampton, Manchester, N. H., Springfield, Rochester, Buffalo, Pittsburg, Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit and New Bedford.

There will be two pension fund concerts in Boston and three special concerts, concerning which announcement will be made later. This makes a total of 109 concerts, the usual quota for 30 weeks. Business for the orchestra, outside of Boston, will be on a par with last year, which means that it will be the maximum possible.

The usual series of eight Symphony concerts will be given in Saunders Theatre, Harvard University, on Thursday evenings during the coming season. The dates are Oct. 18, Nov. 15, Dec. 13, Jan. 17, Feb. 21, March 21, April 4 and April 25. Subscribers of last season have an option on their seats for the coming season until Monday, Oct. 8. The unclaimed seats will be offered for sale on Saturday, Oct. 13, at George H. Kent's, University Bookstore, Harvard Square.

The soloists include Guiomar Novaes, Ethel Leginska, Arthur Hackett, Jacques Thibaud. Others will be announced.

Transcript, Sept 27

Somewhat unexpectedly, the Symphony Orchestra will spend next week at the factories of the Victor Talking Machine Company at Camden, in New Jersey, making records for it. Hitherto the management and the conductor have declined various proposals for such an undertaking, because the outcome was likely to fall short of the quality and the balance of tone usually attained by the orchestra. The Victor Company, it seems, has long been busy with experiments upon the making of orchestral records, so that each choir—strings, no less than the wood-winds and the brass—should have just measure and quality in the whole body of tone. It now believes it has accomplished this end. Accordingly the Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Muck conducting, will now play for it—for the most part short and brilliant virtuoso pieces. If the new methods secure the desired balance and euphony, the records will be sold broadcast.

Miss Novaes, the pianist, whom Boston has hardly heard in the full flush of her young powers, is not only to play with the Symphony Orchestra in the course of the season but also to venture a concert or two of her own.

Monitor, Sept 29

concert, on the [illegible]

ORCHESTRAS TO MAKE PHONOGRAPH RECORD

CAMDEN, N. J.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be here from Oct. 2 to 5, making records for the Victor Talking Machine Company, under the musical direction of Karl Muck. Short pieces of a brilliant quality are scheduled to be played. Another organization which is to make records for the company is the Philadelphia Orchestra, coming here in the course of the season and playing under the direction of Leopold Stokowski.

The Victor company for some time has been working on a plan for an orchestral campaign, with a view to using the services of some of the leading groups of symphony players in the United States; and it has constructed a new sounding room at its plant here, in which to carry on the enterprise. It is said to have perfected its mechanical devices to such an extent that it can reproduce details of large instrumentation on its disks with fidelity.

Advertiser, Sept 29

SYMPHONY WILL PLAY FOR "RECORDS"

Monday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 100 strong, leaves Boston. No, not for good; no, not for a concert tour before the Boston season. The entire orchestra goes to Camden, N. J., where it will stay until Friday. Although Dr. Muck, the conductor, does not leave Boston with the orchestra, he will meet his men in Camden.

Why is the band going to little Camden? To make talking machine records! It is an open secret that for a long long time the Victor Talking Machine Co. has sought the service of the finest band in this country.

For a long time talking machine companies have been making experiments in reproducing orchestral music, and at the present time making of orchestral records has reached such a point of excellence that Charles Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, consented to have the Boston band play for the Victor people.

It is believed that the new records will bring out all the various tones of the orchestra in their several qualities.

The work of making talking machine record has necessitated the calling together of the orchestra one week earlier than was expected. The men will meet Monday morning in Symphony Hall and will have a short preliminary rehearsal under the direction of Assistant Conductor Schmidt. The pieces chosen for reproduction will of a necessity be short and will be brilliant in orchestral coloring.

Dr. Muck is greatly interested in the experiment and will do everything in his power to co-operate with the company in making record.

If records of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are soon to be on sale through the country—and there is every reason to believe they will—he wants them to represent the orchestra at its best.

Other news from the orchestra is that the sale of seats for both the Boston and Cambridge concerts is excellent and that the management has every reason to believe that the band will have a season of unparalleled prosperity.

appointed to represent the stores in this line of work. The appointment has yet to be made from Massachusetts.

Brooklyn Citizen, Sept 23 1917

Although the first concert of the season in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra does not come until Friday, Nov. 9, the subscription department at the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences is already busily engaged with the renewals by subscribers of last year. There is every indication that the subscription will be the same as a year ago when the entire house was sold out for the entire series. Because of a complication that arose, note should be made by the patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that all the concerts do not come on Friday evenings as in the past. In December, the concert will fall on a Thursday evening, instead of Friday evening. The dates of the five concerts are as follows: Friday, Nov. 9; Thursday, Dec. 6; Friday, Jan. 11; Friday, Feb. 15, and Friday, March 15.

Three soloists are announced. These are Madame Melba, Winifred Christie, that most interesting Scotch pianist, and Fritz Kreisler. The orchestra will return with exactly the same personnel it had last year, and Dr. Muck, of course, will be the conductor.

Post, Sept 30

MUSICAL COMMENT

BY OLIN DOWNES

CAMBRIDGE CONCERTS

Renewals of subscriptions for the eight concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, the coming winter are now being taken at the University Book Store in Harvard square, Cambridge. Patrons have until a week from tomorrow, Monday, Oct. 8, in which to renew their subscriptions and to secure the seats they had last year. The general sale to new patrons will open Saturday morning, Oct. 13, at the University Book Store.

The concerts will be given as usual on Thursday evenings, the dates being Oct. 18, Nov. 15, Dec. 13, Jan. 17, Feb. 21, March 21, April 4 and April 25.

There will be seven soloists for the eight concerts. These are Jacques Thibaud, the distinguished French violinist; Guiomar Novaes, pianist; Ethel Leginska, pianist; Arthur Hackett, tenor; Laura Littlefield, soprano; Alice Allen, pianist, and Howard Goding, pianist.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Symphony Orchestra, during the coming week, is to have the most interesting experience of making records for a talking machine. The entire orchestra will leave Boston tomorrow evening at 7 o'clock for Camden, N. J., where it will be until Friday evening. Dr. Muck will join the orchestra in Camden.

Various efforts have been made in the last few years to take records of orchestras, so several years ago, the Victor Talking Machine Company began making experiments to this end and Mr. Ellis promised them that whenever they were ready, the Boston Symphony Orchestra would make records for them. This last spring, their experiments had reached such a stage that they believed that the time had come when they could make records of a band of 100 men, bringing out all the various tones in their several qualities. As a result, the orchestra has assembled one week earlier than usual for this purpose.

Tomorrow morning the orchestra assembles in Symphony Hall to have a preliminary rehearsal under Assisting Conductor Schmidt. Of necessity, only short pieces will be played, those of a more brilliant quality. Dr. Muck is himself very much interested in the experiment and there is reason to believe that records of Boston's great orchestra will soon be on sale throughout the country.

The subscription is going on at Symphony Hall in a satisfactory manner. The prospects of the orchestra have never been better in all the cities where it gives concerts and the season will undoubtedly be a notable one from every point of view.

AMERICAN

ess: Baltimore, Md.

SEP 23 1917

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony concerts will be given on Monday evening, November 5, December 3, January 7, February 11 and March 11. Madame Melba, Winifred Christie, that most interesting Scotch pianist, and Fritz Kreisler will be soloists.

From TRIBUNE

Address: New York City

Date [illegible] 1917

To-day the option on seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in New York will expire. The orchestra itself will spend this week in Camden, N. J., where it is to make records for the Victor talking machine. The entire orchestra will be there with Dr. Muck.

Journal. Sept 1

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

This week the Symphony Orchestra will make records for a talking machine. The entire orchestra will leave Boston tonight at 7 o'clock for Camden, N. J., where it will remain until Friday evening. Dr. Muck will join the orchestra in Camden.

Various efforts have been made in the last few years to take records of orchestras, so several years ago the Victor Talking Machine Company began making experiments to this end and Mr. Ellis promised them that whenever they were ready, the Boston Symphony Orchestra would make records for them. This last spring experiments had reached such a stage that they could make records of a band of 100 men.

The subscription is going on at Symphony Hall in a satisfactory manner. The prospects of the orchestra have never been better in all the cities.

SYMPHONY IN CAMBRIDGE

Renewals of subscriptions for the eight concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, this winter are now being taken at the University Bookstore in Harvard square.

The concerts will be given, as usual, on Thursday evenings, the dates being Oct. 18, Nov. 15, Dec. 13, Jan. 17, Feb. 21, March 21, April 4 and April 25.

There will be seven soloists for the eight concerts. These are Jacques Thibaud, the French violinist; Guiomar Novaes, pianist; Ethel Leginska, pianist; Arthur Hackett, tenor; Laura Littlefield, soprano; Alice Allen, pianist, and Howard Goding, pianist.

Record - Sept. 28

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Play for Talking Machine Records

Monday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 100 strong, leaves Boston. No, not for good; no, not for a concert tour before the Boston season. The entire orchestra goes to Camden, N. J., where it will stay until Friday. Although Dr. Muck, the conductor, does not leave Boston with the orchestra, he will meet his men in Camden.

Why is the band going to little Camden? To make talking machine records! It is an open secret that for a long long time the Victor Talking Machine Co. has sought the service of the finest band in this country.

For a long time talking machine companies have been making experiments in reproducing orchestral music, and at the present time making of orchestral records has reached such a point of excellence that Charles Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, consented to have the Boston band play for the Victor people.

It is believed that the new records will bring out all the various tones of the orchestra in their several qualities.

The work of making talking machine record has necessitated the calling together of the orchestra one week earlier than was expected. The men will meet Monday morning in Symphony Hall and will have a short preliminary rehearsal under the direction of Assistant Conductor Schmidt. The pieces chosen for reproduction will of a necessity be short and will be brilliant in orchestral coloring.

Dr. Muck is greatly interested in the experiment and will do everything in his power to co-operate with the company in making record.

If records of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are soon to be on sale through the country—and there is every reason to believe they will—he wants them to represent the orchestra at its best.

Other news from the orchestra is that the sale of seats for both the Boston and Cambridge concerts is excellent and that the management has every reason to believe that the band will have a season of unparalleled prosperity.

Amerikan Sept 27

GREAT DEMAND FOR SYMPHONY TICKETS

First Three Programs to Be Ready for Publication Next Week

SCHEDULE PROVIDES 48 BOSTON CONCERTS

The subscription sale of seats for the Symphony Concerts is progressing, greatly to the satisfaction of the management. There are still a few seats left for the Friday afternoon concerts and a considerable choice of seats for the Saturday evening concerts, but at the rate which mail orders are coming in each day and buyers are visiting Symphony Hall, it is certain that the subscription for the season will be at least as large as that of last year, which was practically a record.

Nearly all the members of the Orchestra have returned from their summer vacations. Symphony Hall has undergone its annual housecleaning and is spick and span for the coming year. Dr. and Mrs. Muck are still at their cottage at Seal Harbor, where they will be until the first of the month. Dr. Muck has accomplished a great amount of work during the summer and has managed to walk from 10 to 15 miles every day, rain or shine. Mr. Ellis, who saw him at Seal Harbor last week, says that he has never been in better health.

The first three programes of the season will be ready for publication next week. There will be no soloist at the first and third concerts. At the second pair of concerts, on the 19th and 20th, the soloist will be Efrem Zimbalist, the distinguished Russian pianist, who has not been heard with the Orchestra for a number of years. This year, there will be four concerts before the Southern trips begin, for all the trips, except those which come in February and March, have been moved back one week.

The schedule of the Orchestra is now complete. It calls for 48 concerts in Boston (24 pairs), eight concerts in Cambridge, 10 in New York, five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, three in Providence, two in Hartford, two in Worcester, and one each in Lynn, Northampton, Manchester, N. H.; Springfield, Rochester, Buffalo, Pittsburg, Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit and New Bedford.

There will be two pension fund concerts in Boston and three special concerts, concerning which announcement will be made later. This makes a total of 109 concerts, the usual quota for 30 weeks. Business for the orchestra, outside of Boston, will be on a par with last year, which means that it will be the maximum possible.

The usual series of eight Symphony concerts will be given in Saunders Theatre, Harvard University, on Thursday evenings during the coming season. The dates are Oct. 18, Nov. 15, Dec. 13, Jan. 17, Feb. 21, March 21, April 4 and April 25. Subscribers of last season have an option on their seats for the coming season until Monday, Oct. 8. The unclaimed seats will be offered for sale on Saturday, Oct. 13, at George H. Kent's, University Bookstore, Harvard Square.

The soloists include Guiomar Novaes, Ethel Leginska, Arthur Hackett, Jacques Thibaud. Others will be announced.

Transcript Sept 27

Somewhat unexpectedly, the Symphony Orchestra will spend next week at the factories of the Victor Talking Machine Company at Camden, in New Jersey, making records for it. Hitherto the management and the conductor have declined various proposals for such an undertaking, because the outcome was likely to fall short of the quality and the balance of tone usually attained by the orchestra. The Victor Company, it seems, has long been busy with experiments upon the making of orchestral records, so that each choir—strings, no less than the wood-winds and the brass—should have just measure and quality in the whole body of tone. It now believes it has accomplished this end. Accordingly the Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Muck conducting, will now play for it—for the most part short and brilliant virtuoso pieces. If the new methods secure the desired balance and euphony, the records will be sold broadcast.

Miss Novaes, the pianist, whom Boston has hardly heard in the full flush of her young powers, is not only to play with the Symphony Orchestra in the course of the season but also to venture a concert or two of her own.

Monitor - Sept 29

concert, on the [illegible]

ORCHESTRAS TO MAKE PHONOGRAPH RECORD

CAMDEN, N. J.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be here from Oct. 2 to 5, making records for the Victor Talking Machine Company, under the musical direction of Karl Muck. Short pieces of a brilliant quality are scheduled to be played. Another organization which is to make records for the company is the Philadelphia Orchestra, coming here in the course of the season and playing under the direction of Leopold Stokowski.

The Victor company for some time has been working on a plan for an orchestral campaign, with a view to using the services of some of the leading groups of symphony players in the United States; and it has constructed a new sounding room at its plant here, in which to carry on the enterprise. It is said to have perfected its mechanical devices to such an extent that it can reproduce details of large instrumentation on its disks with fidelity.

Advertiser Sept 27

SYMPHONY WILL PLAY FOR "RECORDS"

Monday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 100 strong, leaves Boston. No, not for good; no, not for a concert tour before the Boston season. The entire orchestra goes to Camden, N. J., where it will stay until Friday. Although Dr. Muck, the conductor, does not leave Boston with the orchestra, he will meet his men in Camden.

Why is the band going to little Camden? To make talking machine records! It is an open secret that for a long long time the Victor Talking Machine Co. has sought the service of the finest band in this country.

For a long time talking machine companies have been making experiments in reproducing orchestral music, and at the present time making of orchestral records has reached such a point of excellence that Charles Ellis, the manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, consented to have the Boston band play for the Victor people.

It is believed that the new records will bring out all the various tones of the orchestra in their several qualities.

The work of making talking machine record has necessitated the calling together of the orchestra one week earlier than was expected. The men will meet Monday morning in Symphony Hall and will have a short preliminary rehearsal under the direction of Assistant Conductor Schmidt. The pieces chosen for reproduction will of a necessity be short and will be brilliant in orchestral coloring.

Dr. Muck is greatly interested in the experiment and will do everything in his power to co-operate with the company in making record.

If records of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are soon to be on sale through the country—and there is every reason to believe they will—he wants them to represent the orchestra at its best.

Other news from the orchestra is that the sale of seats for both the Boston and Cambridge concerts is excellent and that the management has every reason to believe that the band will have a season of unparalleled prosperity.

appointed to represent the stores in this line of work. The appointment has yet to be made from Massachusetts.

Brooklyn Citizen Sept-23 1917

Although the first concert of the season in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra does not come until Friday, Nov. 9, the subscription department at the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences is already busily engaged with the renewals by subscribers of last year. There is every indication that the subscription will be the same as a year ago when the entire house was sold out for the entire series. Because of a complication that arose, note should be made by the patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that all the concerts do not come on Friday evenings as in the past. In December, the concert will fall on a Thursday evening, instead of Friday evening. The dates of the five concerts are as follows: Friday, Nov. 9; Thursday, Dec. 6; Friday, Jan. 11; Friday, Feb. 15, and Friday, March 15.

Three soloists are announced. These are Madame Melba, Winifred Christie, that most interesting Scotch pianist, and Fritz Kreisler. The orchestra will return with exactly the same personnel it had last year, and Dr. Muck, of course, will be the conductor.

Part - Sept 30

MUSICAL COMMENT

30

BY OLIN DOWNES

CAMBRIDGE CONCERTS

Renewals of subscriptions for the eight concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, the coming winter are now being taken at the University Book Store in Harvard square, Cambridge. Patrons have until a week from tomorrow, Monday, Oct. 8, in which to renew their subscriptions and to secure the seats they had last year. The general sale to new patrons will open Saturday morning, Oct. 13, at the University Book Store.

The concerts will be given as usual on Thursday evenings, the dates being Oct. 18, Nov. 15, Dec. 13, Jan. 17, Feb. 21, March 21, April 4 and April 25.

There will be seven soloists for the eight concerts. These are Jacques Thibaud, the distinguished French violinist; Guiomar Novaes, pianist; Ethel Leginska, pianist; Arthur Hackett, tenor; Laura Littlefield, soprano; Alice Allen, pianist, and Howard Goding, pianist.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Symphony Orchestra, during the coming week, is to have the most interesting experience of making records for a talking machine. The entire orchestra will leave Boston tomorrow evening at 7 o'clock for Camden, N. J., where it will be until Friday evening. Dr. Muck will join the orchestra in Camden.

Various efforts have been made in the last few years to take records of orchestras, so several years ago, the Victor Talking Machine Company began making experiments to this end and Mr. Ellis promised them that whenever they were ready, the Boston Symphony Orchestra would make records for them. This last spring, their experiments had reached such a stage that they believed that the time had come when they could make records of a band of 100 men, bringing out all the various tones in their several qualities. As a result, the orchestra has assembled one week earlier than usual for this purpose.

Tomorrow morning the orchestra assembles in Symphony Hall to have a preliminary rehearsal under Assisting Conductor Schmidt. Of necessity, only short pieces will be played, those of a more brilliant quality. Dr. Muck is himself very much interested in the experiment and there is reason to believe that records of Boston's great orchestra will soon be on sale throughout the country.

The subscription is going on at Symphony Hall in a satisfactory manner. The prospects of the orchestra have never been better in all the cities where it gives concerts and the season will undoubtedly be a notable one from every point of view.

AMERICAN

ess: Baltimore, Md.

SEP 23 1917

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony concerts will be given on Monday evening, November 5, December 3, January 7, February 11 and March 11. Madame Melba, Winifred Christie, that most interesting Scotch pianist, and Fritz Kreisler will be soloists.

From TRIBUNE

Address: New York City

Date.....

To-day the option on seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in New York will expire. The orchestra itself will spend this week in Camden, N. J., where it is to make records for the Victor talking machine. The entire orchestra will be there with Dr. Muck.

Globe - Sept 30

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Make Music Records

The Symphony Orchestra this week is to have the interesting experience of making records for a talking machine. The entire orchestra will leave Boston tomorrow evening for Camden, N J, where it will be until Friday evening. Dr Muck will join the orchestra in Camden.

Various efforts have been made in the last few years to take records of orchestras, so several years ago, the Victor Talking Machine Company began making experiments to this end and Mr Ellis promised that whenever ready the Boston Symphony Orchestra would make records for them.

Last Spring the experiments indicated that the time had come when records could be made of a band of 100 men, bringing out all the various voices in their several qualities. As a result the orchestra has assembled one week earlier than usual for this purpose.

Tomorrow morning the orchestra will have a preliminary rehearsal under assisting conductor Schmidt. Of a necessity, only short pieces will be played; those of a more brilliant quality.

The subscription for the season here is going on in a satisfactory manner at Symphony Hall.

Transcript - Sept 29

The Boston Symphony orchestra during the coming week is to play for records for a talking machine. The orchestra will leave Boston Monday evening at 7 o'clock for Camden, N. J., where it will be until Friday evening. Dr. Muck will join the orchestra in Camden.

Renewals of subscriptions for the eight concerts which the Boston Symphony orchestra will give in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, the coming winter are now being taken at the University Book Store in Harvard Square, Cambridge. Patrons have until Monday, Oct. 8, in which to renew their subescriptions and to secure the seats they had last year. The general sale to new patrons will open Saturday morning, Oct. 13, at the store. There will be seven soloists, Jacques Thibaud, French violinist; Guiomar Nocaes, pianist; Ethel Leginska, pianist; Arthur Hackett, tenor; Laura Littlefield, soprano; Alice Allen, pianist, and Howard Goding, pianist.

Herald - Sept 30

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This week the Symphony Orchestra will have the interesting experience of making records for a talking machine. The entire orchestra will leave Boston tomorrow (Monday evening) at 7 o'clock for Camden, N. J., where it will remain until Friday evening. Dr. Muck will join the orchestra in Camden.

Various efforts have been made in the last few years to take records of orchestras, so several years ago, the Victor Talking Machine Company began making experiments to this end and Mr. Ellis promised them that whenever they were ready, the Boston Symphony Orchestra would make records for them. This last spring experiments had reached such a stage that they could make records of a band of 100 men. As a result, the orchestra has assembled one week earlier than usual for this purpose.

Tomorrow (Monday morning), the orchestra will assemble in Symphony Hall to have a preliminary rehearsal under assisting conductor Schmidt. Only short pieces will be played, those of a more brilliant quality. Soon records of Boston's great orchestra will be on sale throughout the country.

The subscription is going on at Symphony Hall in a satisfactory manner. The prospects of the orchestra have never been better in all the cities.

Cambridge Symphony Concerts.

Renewals of subscriptions for the eight concerts which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, this winter, are now being taken at the University Book Store in Harvard square, Cambridge. Patrons have until a week from tomorrow, Monday, Oct. 8, in which to renew their subscriptions and to secure the seats they had last year. The general sale to new patrons will open Saturday morning, Oct. 13, at the University Book Store.

The concerts will be given as usual on Thursday evenings, the dates being Oct. 18, Nov. 15, Dec. 13, Jan. 17, Feb. 21, March 21, April 4 and April 25.

There will be seven soloists for the eight concerts. These are Jacques Thibaud, the French violinist; Guiomar Novaes, pianist; Ethel Leginska, pianist; Arthur Hackett, tenor; Laura Littlefield, soprano; Alice Allen, pianist, and Howard Goding, pianist.

Transcript Oct 4-1917

Concerts in Prospect

The first of the two concerts that the Symphony Orchestra annually undertakes for the increase of its Pension Fund will fall earlier this season than usual—on Sunday afternoon, Oct 28. Miss Farrar has proffered her services for the occasion and to meet her convenience it was shifted from November to October. Except at this concert she will not sing in Boston during the musical year.

Mr. Kreisler, the violinist, will be heard for the first time in Boston this autumn at Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 21, when his recital will begin a new series—to continue through the winter—of Sunday concerts.

Traveler, Sept 27

Symphony to Give Programs the Coming Week

Orchestra Scheduled to Give 109 Concerts in 30 Weeks—Big Seat Demand.

The first three programs of the new season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be ready for publication next week. There will be no soloist at the first and third concerts. At the second pair of concerts, on the 19th and 20th, the soloist will be Miss Efrem Zimbalist, Russian violinist. There will be four concerts before the southern trips begin, for all the trips except those which come in February and March have been moved back one week.

The schedule of the orchestra calls for 48 concerts in Boston (24 pairs), eight concerts in Cambridge, 10 in New York, five each in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and Brooklyn, three in Providence, two in Hartford, two in Worcester and one each in Lynn, Northampton, Manchester, N. H., Springfield, Rochester, Buffalo, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit and New Bedford. There will be two pension fund concerts in Boston and three special concerts, concerning which announcement will be made later. This makes a total of 109 concerts, the usual quota for 30 weeks.

The demand for seats indicates another record season, both at home and on tour. There are still a few Friday afternoon seats available and more of a choice for Saturday evening, but applications at Symphony Hall by mail and in person are steadily absorbing these.

Dr. and Mrs. Muck expect to come up from Seal Harbor about Oct. 1.

The Symphony concerts in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, on Thursday evenings during the coming season will be as follows: Oct. 18, Nov. 15, Dec. 13, Jan. 17, Feb. 21, March 21, April 4 and April 25. Subscribers of last season have an option on their seats for the coming season until Monday, Oct. 8. The unclaimed seats will be offered for sale on Saturday, Oct. 13, at George H. Kent's, University Bookstore, Harvard square.

The soloists include Guiomar Novaes, Ethel Leginska, Arthur Hackett and Jacques Thibaud. Others will be announced.

From EVENING PUBLIC LEDGER

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

The doubt that prevailed last spring concerning Dr. Karl Muck's status with the Boston Symphony Orchestra is finally cleared up with the definite announcement that he will direct the regular series of concerts to be given this season at the Academy of Music. The great orchestra's personnel is unchanged, and this fact comes as a gratifying assurance that musical delights in prospect will measure up to the highest standards despite the war.

The Boston season of the orchestra will begin on October 12 and will run through thirty weeks. One hundred and ten concerts are on Doctor Muck's schedule. Philadelphia's share in it will be five symphony programs, the first of which will be submitted in the Academy on the evening of November 5. The other dates are December 3, January 7, February 11 and March 11. These will be all Monday evenings.

Among the soloists announced for the Philadelphia season are Nellie Melba, Winifred Christie, violinist, and Fritz Kreisler. Novelties and the master classics will as usual be effectively blended on the orchestra's programs.

From AMERICAN

Address: Baltimore, Md.

Date SEP 16 1917

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is its thirty-seventh, opens in Boston October 12 and 13. The usual spring series of five concerts will be given in the Lyric Theater, Baltimore. They will come on Wednesday evenings, November 7, December 5, January 9, February 13 and March 13. A singer, Madame Melba; a pianist, Miss Winifred Christie; a violinist, Fritz Kreisler, are the solo-

Est 1884

Transcript Oct 4

Here in Boston

Now that Mr. Paderewski's withdrawal from the concert-hall has left a vacant place among the "assisting artists" to the Symphony Orchestra, a correspondent makes the timely suggestion that it be filled by Mr. Thibaud, the violinist. He is to play with the band at Cambridge; at his best he deserves to play with it in Boston; while he has not been heard at the Symphony Concerts since his relatively immature days.

From BULLETIN

Address: PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Date

38½-inch, 64x60s, 10c.; 39-inch, 56x44s, 8½c.

SERIES OF SUBSCRIPTION CONCERTS OPENS OCT 30

Five Programmes Take Place of Symphony Orchestra Season Here.

The series of five subscription concerts which are to take the place of the Boston Symphony Orchestra season here will open Oct. 30. The concerts will be given in Infantry Hall and three of them will be by the symphony orchestra. The dates to follow are Dec. 18, Jan. 15, Feb. 12 and March 19, all on Tuesday evenings.

The first concert of the series calls for the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck, with Geraldine Farrar as soloist. The second will be a violin recital by Fritz Kreisler. The third will be by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Rosamund Young, soprano, as soloist. The fourth will be a joint concert, by Madame Louise Homer, the distinguished American contralto, and Ossip Gabrilowitsch, the Russian pianist. The fifth concert will be by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Anton Witek, its concert master, as soloist.

Increased work in Boston has necessitated cutting down the number of concerts the Boston Orchestra has given in this city. Charles A. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, has arranged the forthcoming series and has provided similar courses with success in Worcester, Pittsburgh and Rochester for several years.

From NORTH AMERICAN

Address: Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Estabi

The season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its thirty-seventh, opens in Boston Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 12 and 13. Then on, its work will be uninterrupted for thirty weeks, its final concerts of the season being given in Boston on May 3 and 4. With its personnel unchanged and, of course, Doctor Muck as its conductor, the great orchestra will give its usual number of concerts—110.

The usual series of five concerts will be given in the Academy of Music, Philadelphia Monday evenings, the dates being November 5, December 3, January 7, February 11 and March 11. Three soloists are announced. A singer, Madame Melba; a pianist, Miss Winifred Christie; a violinist, Fritz Kreisler. Already the subscription for the series is heavy.

From TRIBUNE

Address: New York City

Date SEP 23 1917

Only one week remains in which the subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall may take up their tickets. The option on all tickets not taken up lapses on Monday, October 1, and the Boston office of the orchestra reports that the waiting list of applicants for tickets is larger this year than it has ever been in the past. Patrons of the symphony concerts should note a slight irregularity in dates for the Thursday evening series. Owing to a complication in the bookings in Carnegie Hall, the December concert will be given on Friday evening, the 7th, instead of the usual Thursday evening, the 6th. The dates for this series, then, are Thursday evening, November 8; Friday evening, December 6, and Thursday evenings, January 10, February 14 and March 14.

Est 1884

From SUN

Address: New York City

Date

Only one week remains in which the subscribers to the Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall may take up their tickets. The option on all tickets not taken up lapses on Monday, October 1, and the Boston office of the orchestra reports that the waiting list of applicants for tickets is larger this year than it has ever been in the past. Patrons of the symphony concerts should note a slight irregularity in dates for the Thursday evening series. Owing to a complication in the bookings in Carnegie Hall the December concert will be given on Friday evening, December 7, instead of the usual Thursday evening, December 6. The dates for the Thursday concerts, then, are Thursday evening, November 8, Friday evening, December 7, and Thursday evenings, January 10, February 14 and March 14.

From TIMES

Address: Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date OCT 2 1917

BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Dr. Muck Announces First Concert on October 9.

Although the first concert of the season in Brooklyn by the Boston Symphony Orchestra does not come until Friday, November 9, the subscription department at the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, is already busily engaed with the renewals by subscribers of last year. There is every indication that the subscription will be the same as a year ago when the entire house was sold out for the entire series. Because of a complication that arose, note should be made by the patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, that all the conerts do not come on Friday evenings as in the past. In December, the oncert will fall on a Thursday evening, instead of Friday evening. The dates of the five conerts are as follows: Friday, November 9, Thursday, December 6; Friday, January 11; Friday, February 15, and Friay, March 15.

Three soloists are announced. These are Mme. Melba, Winifred Christie, that most interesting Scotch pianist, and Fritz Kreitler. The orchestra will return with exactly the same personnel it had last year, and Dr. Muck will, of course, be the conductor.

Boston Advertiser Editorial Oct. 1-1917

"CANNED" SYMPHONY

Some time during its trip, which is to start tonight, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to have the most novel and interesting experience of making records for the victrola talking machine. Preparatory to this final decision to comply with the repeated request of this concern the orchestra had been making many experiments to ascertain the possibilities for successful reproduction of pieces played by the full orchestra. Most of the talking machine orchestras been been surprisingly small, many of the brass instruments being eliminated in favor of the wooden and stringed ones, because the latter reproduce much better. Various efforts have been made in the last few years to take records of full orchestras, but the results have been unsatisfactory, due, perhaps, to an excusable ignorance of the proper balancing of the instruments for such delicate work. Dr. Muck, unusually interested in the experiment, together with his assistant conductor, Ernest Schmidt, who will conduct the first experiment, believes the Boston Symphony is now ready to obtain satisfactory results. Nothing heavy nor long, of course, will be attempted, as most orchestral records are short.

The music world will await the outcome with an eagerness second only to the musicians themselves. No orchestra is more eminently worthy of the honor of being the first to be successful with full instrument records than the Boston Symphony. None also is more desired of being heard. Altogether too few are privileged to hear it now, as it performs not a dozen times outside of Boston during the season. To embark successfully in this new field would bring it an eager clientele the world over. We may be sure that Dr. Muck will see to it that the records are up to the usual standard of Symphony productions, in spite of those who will clamor for "canned Boston Symphony" of any kind.

Transcript Oct. 2

Mr. Paderewski Withdraws

Mr. Paderewski, the pianist, declines to keep his engagements, which were many, for the musical year and has instructed his manager at Symphony Hall to cancel the long series of concerts East and West arranged for him. Accordingly, he will not be heard at the Symphony Concerts in the course of the winter or in recitals of his own. The reason, assigned by the pianist for this disappointing decision is his desire to devote himself wholly to the administration of Polish relief funds, departing, if necessary, to Europe for that purpose. However, before the season is done, it is quite possible for the pianist to change his fickle mind or to need the money which his concerts yield him. As close observers have already noted, his name has been struck from the list of "assisting artists" at the Symphony Concerts.

Transcript Oct. 2-1917

NEWS OF MUSIC

Dr. Muck's First Programme for the Symphony Concerts—Liszt's "Prometheus" for a Novel Piece—Mr. Paderewski Abandons Concerts

AS Dr. Muck passed through Boston on his way from Mount Desert to Philadelphia, he left at Symphony Hall his programme for the first pair of Symphony Concerts this autumn on Friday afternoon, Oct. 12, and Saturday evening, Oct. 13. It stands:

Symphony, No. 5, in C minor.....Beethoven
Overture to Shakspeare's play, "King Lear".....Berlioz
Symphonic Poem, "Prometheus".....Liszt
(First Times at These Concerts)
Prelude to the Opera, "Parsifal".....Wagner

With substantially such a programme Dr. Muck has usually begun a new season—a symphony by Beethoven for the first number and thereafter three more or less romantic pieces out of the acknowledged masters of modern music. Last year, by way of variation, from familiar numbers he set on his first list an overture of Berlioz, "The Corsair," seldom heard nowadays. This autumn, he continues the practice with a revival of Berlioz's half-forgotten overture to "King Lear"; while he joins to it a symphonic poem by Liszt, "Prometheus," unheard within long memory in American concert-halls. The piece is the fifth of the series; it was finished in 1850; and Mr. Huneker says of it in his book about the composer:

> It is a noble figure that Liszt has translated into music, the Titan. Immediately at the opening the swirl of the struggle is upon us, and the first theme is the defiance of the Titan—a noble yet obstinate melody. The god is chained to the rock to great orchestral tumult. His efforts to break the manacles incite further musical riot, and then comes the wail of helpless misery. This recitative leads into a furious burst when the shackled one clenches his fists and threatens all Godhead. Even Zeus is defied. Then arises the belief in a deliverer, a faith motif which is one of those heartfelt inventions of the melodic Liszt. After this the struggle continues. Magnificently, the god, believing in his own obstinate will for freedom, the composition concludes on this supreme note.

Mr. Hervey, of The Morning Post in London, also waxes warm over "Prometheus," in his essay upon Liszt's music, saying:

> "Prometheus," music of real power and great depth of feeling, was written to celebrate the unveiling of a statue of Herder. Liszt says that he chose for his subject "Prometheus Unbound," as he believed that this poem expressed "that which was purest and most generous in the sentiments of one who was called the apostle of humanity. From the ancient myth, Liszt has extracted the fundamental idea which he explains in the following words: "Audacity, suffering, endurance and salvation; bold aspiration towards the highest destinies which the human mind can attain; creative activity, want of expansion . . . expiatory sufferings exposing our vital organs to an incessant gnawing, without annihilating us; condemnation to a hard enchainment on the most arid shores of our nature; cries of anguish and tears of blood . . . but an instinctive belief in our native grandeur, in a future deliverance; a tacit faith in a liberator who will make the long-tortured captive rise to the transmundane regions from which he stole the luminous spark . . . and lastly, the accomplishment of the great work of mercy, the arrival of the great day." He ends by summing up his idea in the words "Malheur et Gloire," which may be taken as the motto of the music. Apparently he also has intended to symbolize in his poem the two elements of progress and reaction, the latter being suggested by a double fugue, which is skilfully and elaborately worked out. Altogether "Prometheus" is a remarkable example of classic sentiment allied to romantic feeling.

Herald Oct. 7

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The first Symphony concerts of this season will be on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The 37th season orchestra has every promise of being successful. The subscription is large, and there has been the usual interest in the orchestra, which returned yesterday from Camden, N. J., where for four days it was making records for the Victor talking machine.

For the first time in its history, the orchestra begins a season with no changes in its personnel. The membership is exactly the same as the last. Mr. Sauerquell, for many years librarian, died last spring. His place has been taken by his assistant, Leslie J. Rogers.

A novelty, so far as the Symphony orchestra is concerned, appears on the first program: the Fifth Symphonic Poem of Liszt, "Prometheus." The symphony will be Beethoven's Fifth, and the other numbers will be the "King Lear" overture of Berlioz and the Prelude to "Parsifal." The length of the concert will be about one hour and three-quarters.

Herald

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY

The general sale of season tickets for the Symphony concerts in Cambridge on Thursday evenings in Sanders Theatre will open at the University book store, Harvard square, next Saturday morning. The concerts will be eight in number and the dates are Oct. 18, Nov. 15, Dec. 13, Jan. 17, Feb. 21, March 21, April 4 and April 25. An interesting list of soloists has been announced. Perhapus the greatest interest will be in the appearance of the distinguished violinist, Jacques Thibaud, who will then make his first appearance with the Symphony orchestra in many years. Other soloists will be Arthur Hackett, tenor; Laura Littlefield, soprano; Ethel Leginska, pianist; Guiomar Novaes, pianist; Alice Allen, pianist, and Howard Goding, pianist.

Transcript Oct. 4-1917

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

FRIDAY AFTERNOON VS. SATURDAY EVENING

A Puzzling Circumstance of Symphony Concerts Observable in Boston and Elsewhere—Miss Farrar, Mr. Kreisler and Mr. Werrenrath Soon to Be Heard Here—Mr. Stock's Plans for Chicago—Uniforms and the Metropolitan—Items, Incidents, Impressions

THE Boston, the Chicago, the Philadelphia orchestras all continue to give the second in each pair of their concerts on Saturday evenings. Likewise in each of the three cities the audience assembled for them is appreciably less numerous than that which the same programme, soloist, band and conductor gather on the preceding Friday afternoon. Practically every seat in Symphony Hall in Boston, in Orchestra Hall in Chicago, in the Academy of Music in Philadelphia is taken by subscription for the afternoons; while in the evenings, unless the "assisting artist" is of exceptional vogue or the programme contains some much admired piece, too many chairs stand empty throughout the house; and in almost equal proportion between the cheaper and the dearer places. In New York on the other hand, both the Philharmonic Society and Mr. Damrosch's orchestra have abandoned concerts to subscribers on Saturday evenings. The Philharmonic has shifted them to Thursday evenings; while Mr. Damrosch confines himself wholly to afternoon concerts—the first of each pair on a Friday; the second on the following Sunday. Whether the Philharmonic plays to larger audiences on Thursday evenings than it used to do on Saturday evenings has not been made known; but the listeners to Mr. Damrosch fill the hall on both his afternoons.

For one and the same fact, the explanations are many and various. Admittedly in all three cities, "society" goes most numerously to the afternoon concerts; but while "society" is an essential part of the public of the orchestras in question it is by no means the whole of it. As some say, the world and his wife now go into the country for "week-ends" and on Saturday evenings are miles from theatres and concert-halls. As others have it, the quest of entertainment on the half-holiday of Saturday afternoon leaves no appetite for it in the evening; yet Saturday is the night of the week at the playhouses. According to others still, symphony concerts even for those with an occasional mind to them are somewhat too exacting for a week-end pleasure. And so forth from many a different point of view. The most persuasive of all is usually the one least often asserted. The symphony orchestras on Saturday evenings open their doors to the public that as yet is neither socially nor musically significant; that public in large degree is still a stranger to the pleasures of such concerts; hence the empty seats—and hence still more the need of a campaign of education—perhaps with lowered prices, divided subscriptions and other incidental aids—to fill them. H. T. P.

Post Oct 7-1917

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY

The general sale of season tickets for the Symphony concerts in Cambridge which are given on Thursday evenings in Sanders' Theatre, will open at the University Book Store, Harvard square, next Saturday morning, Oct. 13. The concerts will be eight in number and the dates are Oct. 18, Nov. 15, Dec. 13, Jan. 17, Feb. 21, March 21, April 4 and April 25.

Jacques Thibaud, will then make his first appearance with the Symphony orchestra in many years. Other soloists will be the tenor, Arthur Hackett: Miss Laura Littlefield, well and favorably known as a singer of this city; Ethel Leginska, Guiomar Novaes, Alice Allen and Howard Goding, pianists.

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT

The formal opening of the Boston musical season comes next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 12 and 13, with the first pair of Symphony concerts. This, the 37th season of the orchestra, has every promise of being one of the most successful. The subscription is large both for the Friday and Saturday concerts, and there has been the usual keen interest in the orchestra. The orchestra returned yesterday (Saturday) from Camden, N. J., where for four days it was making records for the Victor talking machine. Dr. Muck, who has been in Seal Harbor all summer and went direct from there to Philadelphia, returned with the orchestra.

It is interesting to note that for the first time in its history the orchestra begins a new season with no changes in its personnel. Changes have been few the last two or three years, but this year the membership is exactly the same as the last. Mr. Sauerquell, who was for so many years librarian of the orchestra, died last spring, and his place has been taken by his assistant, Leslie J. Rogers.

A novelty, so far as the Symphony Orchestra is concerned, appears on the first programme. This is the fifth Symphonic Poem of Liszt entitled "Prometheus." In going over the library last spring Dr. Muck discovered that it contained the score and parts of this work, and, as is well known, he is very keen on Liszt music.

The Symphony will be the Fifth of Beethoven, and the other numbers will be the rather rare "King Lear" Overture of Berlioz and the Prelude to "Parsifal." The length of the programme is about one hour and three-quarters.

Traveler Oct 6

Geraldine Farrar for Symphony Hall

Famous Grand Opera Soprano to Be Soloist at Sunday Afternoon Concert.

The annual series of Sunday afternoon concerts for Symphony Hall is announced to start Oct. 21 with Fritz Kreisler, violinist, as the attraction. From that date there will be something doing every Sunday afternoon with the annual Pension Fund concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra two of the notable attractions, the first coming Oct. 28 with Geraldine Farrar as the soloist.

Something of the unusual appears in the announcement for Nov. 4. It will be given by four singers from the Metropolitan Opera Company and naturally the program will be to a large extent operatic. The soprano is Mabel Garrison. The contralto will be Sophie Braslau. Martinelli will be the tenor, and the bass will be Arthur Middleton.

The following week, Sunday, Nov. 11, will bring the first recital of the season of Mischa Elman, violinist. Others who will be heard in the course of the season are Mesdames Melba, Schumann-Heink, Louise Homer, Frieda Hempel and Alma Gluck, and Ysaye, Gabrilowitsch and Guimar Novaes.

First Symphony Concert

The thirty-seventh session of the Symphony orchestra will begin next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. For the first time since its organization the orchestra assembles for its first rehearsal with exactly the same personnel it had the season before.

The first program contains a work that is new to the Symphony concerts. This is Liszt's symphonic poem "Prometheus," the fifth of the series, coming in order between the "Orpheus" and the "Mazeppa." The Symphony will be Beethoven's fifth in C minor. The other numbers will be Berlioz's overture "King Lear" and the prelude to "Parsifal."

The general sale of season tickets for the symphony concerts in Cambridge will open at the University Book Store, Harvard square, Saturday morning, Oct. 13. The concerts will be eight in number and the dates are Oct. 18, Nov. 15, Dec. 13, Jan. 17, Feb. 21, March 21, April 4, and April 25. Perhaps the greatest interest in the soloists will center in the appearance of the French violinist, Jacques Thibaud, who is then to make his first appearance with the Symphony orchestra in many years. Other soloists will be the young American tenor, Arthur Hackett, Miss Laura Littlefield, soprano; Ethel Leginska, pianist; Guiomar Novaes, the talented Brazilian; Alice Allen, pianist, and Howard Goding, pianist.

American Oct-7

Symphony to Interpret Liszt Poem

THE formal opening of the Boston musical season comes next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, October 12 and 13, with the first pair of Symphony concerts. This, the thirty-seventh season of the orchestra, has every promise of being one of the most successful.

It is interesting to note that for the first time in its history, the orchestra begins a new season with no changes in its personnel. Changes have been few the last two or three years, but this year the membership is exactly the same as the last. Mr. Sauerquell, who was for so many years librarian of the orchestra, died last Spring and his place has been taken by his assistant, Leslie J. Rogers.

A novelty, so far as the Symphony Orchestra is concerned, appears on the first program. This is the Fifth Symphonic Poem of Liszt entitled "Prometheus." In going over the library last Spring, Dr. Muck discovered that it contained the score and parts of this work, and as is well known, he is very keen on Liszt music.

The Symphony will be the Fifth of Beethoven, and the other numbers will be the rather rare "King Lear" overture of Berlioz and the prelude to "Parsifal." The length of the program is about one hour and three-quarters.

Traveler Oct. 6-1917

Geraldine Farrar for Symphony Hall

Famous Grand Opera Soprano to Be Soloist at Sunday Afternoon Concert.

The annual series of Sunday afternoon concerts for Symphony Hall is announced to start Oct. 21 with Fritz Kreisler, violinist, as the attraction. From that date there will be something doing every Sunday afternoon with the annual Pension Fund concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra two of the notable attractions, the first coming Oct. 28 with Geraldine Farrar as the soloist.

Something of the unusual appears in the announcement for Nov. 4. It will be given by four singers from the Metropolitan Opera Company and naturally the program will be to a large extent operatic. The soprano is Mabel Garrison. The contralto will be Sophie Braslau. Martinelli will be the tenor, and the bass will be Arthur Middleton.

The following week, Sunday, Nov. 11, will bring the first recital of the season of Mischa Elman, violinist. Others who will be heard in the course of the season are Mesdames Melba, Schumann-Heink, Louise Homer, Frieda Hempel and Alma Gluck, and Ysaye, Gabrilowitsch and Guimar Novaes.

First Symphony Concert

The thirty-seventh session of the Symphony orchestra will begin next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. For the first time since its organization the orchestra assembles for its first rehearsal with exactly the same personnel it had the season before.

The first program contains a work that is new to the Symphony concerts. This is Liszt's symphonic poem "Prometheus," the fifth of the series, coming in order between the "Orpheus" and the "Mazeppa." The Symphony will be Beethoven's fifth in C minor. The other numbers will be Berlioz's overture "King Lear" and the prelude to "Parsifal."

The general sale of season tickets for the symphony concerts in Cambridge will open at the University Book Store, Harvard square, Saturday morning, Oct. 13. The concerts will be eight in number and the dates are Oct. 18, Nov. 15, Dec. 13, Jan. 17, Feb. 21, March 21, April 4, and April 25. Perhaps the greatest interest in the soloists will center in the appearance of the French violinist, Jacques Thibaud, who is then to make his first appearance with the Symphony orchestra in many years. Other soloists will be the young American tenor, Arthur Hackett, Miss Laura Littlefield, soprano; Ethel Leginska, pianist; Guiomar Novaes, the talented Brazilian; Alice Allen, pianist, and Howard Goding, pianist.

~~Globe Oct. 7~~ Transcript Oct-6

CONCERTS IN PROSPECT

The Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Muck and Novel Liszt—Miss Farrar, Mr. Kreisler and Mr. McCormack to Return—Mr. Werrenrath for the First Time by Himself—Various Beginners

THE new series of Symphony Concerts will begin next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall under unusually unchanged circumstance. Even a summer with a draft has not altered the personnel of the orchestra; for a sixth consecutive year and for an eighth year in all, Dr. Muck continues as conductor; while the renewal of subscriptions assures an audience much like those of recent seasons. Even the programme is of the familiar pattern with which Dr. Muck is wont to begin a new year, traversing in order Beethoven's fifth symphony (in C minor); the overture of Berlioz to Shakspeare's tragedy "King Lear"; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Prometheus"; and the prelude of Wagner to his music-drama, "Parsifal." Never before in all probability has "Prometheus" been played in Boston; while elsewhere, even in Germany, it has been rarely. Nor is Berlioz's overture a familiar piece to the frequenters of orchestral concerts.

Transcript Oct. 6

Friday afternoon, Oct. 26, in Symphony Hall, the third of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr Muck.

Saturday evening, Oct. 27, in Symphony Hall, the third of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Muck.

Sunday afternoon, Oct. 28, in Symphony Hall, the first of the two annual concerts of the Symphony Orchestra for the increase of its Pension Fund. Dr. Muck will conduct through a miscellaneous programme and Miss Farrar, as volunteer, will be heard for the first and only time in Boston this season.

REDUCTION

RATIO

13x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

Globe. Oct-7

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

New Symphony Season Begins Friday.

The formal opening of the Boston musical season comes this week with the first pair of Symphony concerts. This, the 37th season of the orchestra, has every promise of being one of the most successful, for the subscription is large both for the Friday and Saturday concerts. The orchestra returned yesterday from Camden, N J, where for four days it was making records for the Victor Talking Machine.

It is interesting to note that for the first time in its history the orchestra begins a new season with the membership exactly the same as the last. Mr Sauerquell, who was for so many years librarian, died last Spring and his place has been taken by his assistant, Leslie J. Rogers.

A novelty, so far as the Symphony Orchestra is concerned, appears on the first program. This is the fifth Symphonic Poem of Liszt, entitled "Prometheus."

The symphony will be the fifth of Beethoven, and the other numbers will be the rather rare "King Lear" overture of Berlioz and the prelude to "Parsifal."

Cambridge Symphonies

The general sale of season tickets for the Symphony concerts in Cambridge will open at the University Bookstore next Saturday morning. The concerts will be given on Thursday evenings, Oct 18, Nov 15, Dec 13, Jan 17, Feb 21, March 21, April 4 and 25.

The season's soloists will include the distinguished French violinist, Jacques Thibaud; Arthur Hackett, Laura Littlefield, Ethel Leginska, Guiomar Novaes, Alice Allen and Howard Goding.

Record Oct 8

DRAFT TAKES NO MEMBERS FROM SYMPHONY RANKS

Mme. Holesco to Make Her American Debut Here—Notes

By J. V. Clark

Dr. Karl Muck and the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra met at Symphony Hall this morning for the first rehearsal of the year—that is, the first rehearsal for the regular symphony concerts.

For the first time since its organization the orchestra assembled for its first rehearsal with exactly the same personnel it had the season before. There were no new members when the orchestra gathered this morning. There were no last year's members missing. This is remarkable under normal conditions, and even more remarkable under war conditions.

The army draft, which was expected to call some of the younger men, has as yet touched none. It is possible that the second call may take some from the orchestra.

The orchestra, which has been out of town for a week making talking machine records, this morning rehearsed Liszt's poem, Prometheus, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C Minor, and Berlioz's overture to King Lear, which stand on the first program this week.

Advertiser Oct 9

NOT ONE SYMPHONY MEMBER DRAFTED

Orchestra Meets Intact for First Rehearsal of The Year

MME. HOLESCO MAKES AMERICAN DEBUT HERE

Dr. Karl Muck and the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra met at Symphony Hall yesterday for the first rehearsal of the year—that is, the first rehearsal for the regular symphony concerts.

For the first time since its organization the orchestra assembled for its first rehearsal with exactly the same personnel it had the season before. There were no new members when the orchestra gathered yesterday morning. There were no last year's members missing. This is remarkable under normal conditions, even more remarkable under war conditions.

The army draft, which was expected to call some of the younger men, has as yet touched none. It is possible that the second call may take some from the orchestra.

The orchestra, which has been out of town for a week making talking machine records, yesterday morning rehearsed Liszt's poem, Prometheus, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C Minor, and Berlioz's overture to King Lear, which stand on the first program this week.

Record Oct-13-1917

ZIMBALIST AND NOVAES STARS WITH SYMPHONY

Artists for Boston and Cambridge—Orchestral Season Opens

By J. V. Clark

The music season is really on. With the opening of the Symphony season with a large audience at the rehearsal, and with Symphony concerts the coming week in Boston and Cambridge, the season may justly be called well under way.

Two distinguished and young soloists will play with the Symphony next week. In Boston, Efrem Zimbalist, the violinist, will play the Beethoven concerto. The orchestral pieces will be Sibelius, "Finlandia"; Scriabin, "Le Poeme de l'Extace," and Enesco, "Rumanian Rhapsody."

In Cambridge the soloist will be the Brazilian pianist, Guiomar Novaes, who later in the year will play with the orchestra in Boston.

For the opening rehearsal of the season, yesterday, Dr. Muck chose a program made up largely of the romanticists, a program of tried and true orchestral works. As is his wont there was no soloist at the first performance. The orchestra played Beethoven's fifth symphony, Berlios' "Lear" overture, Liszt's "Prometheus," and Wagner's "Parsifal" prelude. The performance, especially of the last three movements of the symphony, was a notable one. Dr. Muck was greeted heartily as he stepped on the stage to conduct.

Monitor Oct-13

Miss Guiomar Novaes, pianist, appears with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Sanders Theater, Cambridge, on the evening of Thursday, Oct. 18, presenting the Beethoven G major concerto, No. 4. On the program are the first symphony of Sibelius in E minor and the Berlioz "King Lear" overture.

Efrem Zimbalist, violinist, appears with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall at the concerts of Oct. 19 and 20, taking part in the Beethoven violin concerto. The program is as follows:

Sibelius, "Finlandia," symphonic poem for orchestra, op. 26, No. 7; Scriabin, "Le poème de l'extase," op. 54; Beethoven, concerto for violin and orchestra in D major, op. 61; Enesco, "Rhapsodie Roumaine" in A major, op. 11, No. 1.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1917 Monitor Oct-13

Symphony Concert

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

AN UNTROUBLED AND AUSPICIOUS BEGINNING

The Doubtful Resurrection of Liszt's "Prometheus" and Berlioz's Half-Forgotten Overture to "King Lear" — Free and Eloquent Performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony—An Audience Unwontedly Thrilled by the Prelude to "Parsifal"—Warm Welcome for Dr. Muck

No "incident" of any sort whatever befell at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon; and the auditor who ignored the calendar might as readily have believed himself at the beginning of the season of 1913-14, when there was neither war nor thought of war, as at the beginning of the season of 1917-18, with the United States in arms against the German Empire. Every seat in Symphony Hall had been taken, though the call of the holiday into the country left a few vacant; while more intending listeners were turned away from the box-offices than even on a Friday when Mr. Paderewski or Miss Farrar is the "assisting artist." The programme—a symphony of Beethoven and succeeding pieces by Berlioz, Liszt and Wagner—was of familiar pattern for these "opening concerts." Without a change in personnel and hardly one in the disposition of the band upon the stage, the orchestra sat in familiar place. When Dr. Muck, with a well-mastered yet perceptible nervousness of bearing, first came to his place upon the conductor's stand, he was received with long, hearty, and general clapping, neither more nor less (nor in any wise different) than the applause that in each October for five years past has welcomed his return to public work. When, however, he and the orchestra ended an unusually eloquent performance—even for them—of Beethoven's symphony in C minor, the plaudits from every quarter of the auditorium were uncommonly eager and insistent, until at last, as the conductor took his place within the crescent of his risen men, the hall rang with them.

Being much less interesting and stimulating music, however well glossed in performance, Berlioz's overture to "King Lear" and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Prometheus," were but tepidly received. On the other hand, in the prelude to Wagner's opera of "Parsifal," music, conductor and orchestra hushed the audience into rapt silence; while at the end came that still and quivering pause, between the last note and the first plaudits, which witnesses, beyond any clapping or any words, the intense emotional illusion of what has gone before. Public performance in the arts knows no finer, fuller reward than this tremulous instant in which an audience returns to normal self from the spell that has transported it. Indeed, the applause for which the listening company lingered seemed almost bathos after that significant silence.

Never before has Liszt's fifth symphonic poem, "Prometheus" been played at the Symphony Concerts; only once before in the dim and distant seventies has it been played in Boston; while nowadays from Stettin to San Francisco it appears very seldom on orchestral programmes. As a whole Dr. Muck has been justified in his reëstablishment in the active repertory of one and another of the neglected symphonic poems of Liszt. "Ce qu' on Entend sur la Montagne" amply deserved resurrection: "Mazeppa" does not lack romantic voice or tonal excitements; "Hungaria" emits pungent tribal flavors; but, at a single hearing and with the best will in the world toward Liszt's music in general and in particular, "Prometheus" seemed hardly worth revival—outside a season in which, as an Irishman might say, there are no "novelties" but overlooked classics. No single poem but a whole tragedy of Herder suggested to Liszt the design and the voice of the piece; for some fete at Weimar in 1850, when this "Prometheus" of words was acted, he wrote his own "Prometheus" of tones. A summary of Herder's tragedy, a prefatory note by the composer himself, the usual marshalling of analysts and commentators on the pages of the programme-book were presumed to prepare the ears and the mind of the hearer for the contents and the impression of the music.

Yet out of the symphonic poem itself, with no more clue than the title and average recollection of the Promethean legend from Æschylus through Shelley to Moody, rose the visions and the passions Liszt sought to body forth in tones—the enchained hero superhuman alike in suffering and in fortitude, while the wrath of the high gods, despoiled of fire, beat and tortured him; his voice, now defiant, now piteous, but always resolved, cutting these tumults; the glory of his goal which was man's freedom; the ardors that burned away his pains. In epitome and in tones Liszt, so enkindled, would write his Promethean tragedy, epical, grandiose, heroic. Unfortunately, these sweeps of his poetic imagination transcended the scope of his musical invention and executive resource.

With broad, deep strokes, in outcry of brass and swirl of strings, in chromatic tumults and orchestral thunders, the music pictures Prometheus racked by the bolts and the bird of Zeus. Heavy chords shake the heavens and the earth; dissonances that must have rent the ears of the fifties, rend also the air; chromatic agonies slither across it; Valkyr-like screams—how well Wagner remembered his Liszt!—pierce it; the tone-poem beats forward as in the throbs of pain. There is pause; then stately and formidable proclamation, as in noble tonal guise, of the motive of freedom; passionate pleading in strings, horns and wood-winds that Wagner also did not forget; a singular double-fugue as though heroes of a primeval Hellenic world had suddenly taken refuge in the Semitic garrulity of the Book of Job; a return to the tumult and outcry of the beginning, until the great voice of the motive of freedom finally outswells it.

So to describe the tone-poem is to summon to it a deal of sympathetic aid from the perceptions and the answering imaginings of the hearer. For in itself, the music seems but a long and little varied expanse of chromatic sound and fury. Try as Liszt may, in the substance of his motives, in the transmutation, the contrasting, the combining of them he never penetrates below the surface of the Promethean myth. Seeking to write tonal tragedy, he writes merely shrieking or crotund tonal melodrama. Courting epic grandeur, he begins, continues, ends, no more than romantically excited. More than once, only the passionate energy of the music saves it from sonorous or slithering commonplace.

Relatively novel, also, and of almost as meagre outcome, was Berlioz's "Grand Overture to Shakspeare's Tragedy of 'King Lear,' for Full Orchestra" (as the bombastic title goes) which, after a certain vogue in the Symphony Concerts of the nineties has not been heard at them for thirteen years. Presumably the play stirred Berlioz no less than the Promethean legend inflamed Liszt, but seeking to translate into tones the march and moods, the picturing and the passions, of a majestic and racking tragedy, the Frenchman, like the Hungarian, makes music that is no more than romantic excitement over it. True, Berlioz does avoid the full measure of Lisztian sound and fury; but few of his major pieces more suggest the laying side by side of vivid fragments of musical ideas rather than impassioned development and eloquent progress with them. Of course he contrasts a piteous motive, say of the whole tragedy, say of Cordelia within it, and say also of Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus," with hollow music of bodement, stormy music of rage, majestic music of kingly power, vociferous music of a barbaric Britain. Hollow chords search out the wan voices of bassoons and clarinets; the strings rush up and down the scale while the sharp wood-winds top them: the drums rain blows; the brass is the voice of majesty, fury, mourning; there are hushes and suspensions in the progress of the overture; then chromatic leaps or stark proclamation of significant motives. Impressive enough, perhaps, as the music passes in the swift commerce of a quarter-hour at a symphony concert, but in spite of a few strokes of pity or power, of the commonplace of Berlioz, romantic composer and master of instrumental suggestion. After all it is the penalty of the romantic temperament and the romantic method to be uneven of outcome; while somehow Prometheus and Lear seem matter for the music of a Beethoven rather than a Liszt or a Berlioz.

So it was that the classic pieces, beginning and ending the concert, entered in and possessed it. Sometimes, in this first hour of the musical year, Dr. Muck and the orchestra have semed to play the chosen symphony of Beethoven with a zeal for exposition and precision, as though to make sure of themselves, that a little stiffened and dried it. Yesterday, however, as if assured from the first chords to the last of their mutual will and mettle, they played the symphony in C minor with a truly Beethovenish freedom and eloquence. The first movement ascended in those swift and thrilling progressions wherein the deed of the composer becomes the will of the conductor and the voice of the orchestra. Beethoven's tumults tossed upon the rhythms that the performance intensified until the power of his chords, no less sustained by the imparting voices, concentrated and stilled them. The higher, brighter strings glowed with propulsive power; the darker missed no under-beat; Beethoven-wise the flutes gleamed above the orchestral song; the horns were as one deep and mellow voice. So played the music renewed vitality and passion; here in full, free speech was the symphony of Beethoven's ardent maturity—the symphony of exaltation and exultation.

Like mood and voice Dr. Muck carried into the succeeding Andante. Not once did the pace slow unduly, the rhythms sag, the luminous phrases blur. As it returned, the dominant and songful melody rose more and more full-throated, deeply exultant; yet side by side with it, as in orchestral mirror of the beauty and the poetry of the music, went the reiterated phrase of quiet exaltation. The voice of a singing woman could hardly have formed and colored it more perfectly. The running figures of the Scherzo glinted against the dark under-body with the tremor and presentment of mystery that Berlioz is sure Beethoven designed; the magic of rhythm, the magic of tonal color, above all the magic of the conductor's modulations of pace, together heightened the transition from the quivering shadow with which the Scherzo ends into the radiant flash with which the Finale begins. In the long and culminating progress to the end, Dr. Muck's mind measured Beethoven's fervors in the swift ascents and descents, contrasts and changes of the music—so in dream one traverses a whole range of mountains as in the twinkling of an eye—while his response of spirit deepened Beethoven's heroic exaltation, heightened his heroic exultation. For, in spite of the label, "Eroica," over the third symphony, this fifth is Beethoven's heroic music.

Read or heard in cold blood, the prelude to "Parsifal" does not escape shortcomings that pervade the whole opera. From the first measure to the last, it is a long meditated, an astutely calculated, music. The artful progress and contrasts of the design the reiteration of motives, each more poignant in itself or in treatment than that which went before, the exactness of accent, the fixity, so to say, of every harmonic and instrumental stroke, are of the Wagner whose pen was tipped, not with the fires of "Tristan" or the ardors of "The Mastersingers," but with the more thoughtful emotions of age and experience. Wagner heard his two masterpieces in his mind and heart; he heard "Parsifal" also in the theatre. It is quite possible to make the prelude sound dry and specific—précis, and not preface, to the succeeding opera. The more, then, is it incumbent upon conductor and orchestra to invest the music out of their own insight and emotional response with the insistently sublimated passion that Wagner wrought into it. At the end of the first act and in the final scene of the opera, the hearer listens to the rites of the Grail as to a very sublimation of the sensations and the emotions of the Eucharist. So he must be translated with the prelude into the alternation of music of poignant spiritual anguish with music of ecstatic spiritual consolation.

As some will say, Dr. Muck takes the prelude at too long-drawn a pace, though that pace he heard from Wagner himself, who—the doubters of Munich say—liked to languish over his music in his old age, sensuous to his final hour. Again, as some will urge, Dr. Muck etches so deep each phrase that unbroken continuity depends upon the wondrous skill of the orchestra in sustained instrumental song. Or once more, as these same objectors will contend, he is as calculating as Wagner in the piercing measures of anguish and the beatified measures of solace. Yet yesterday there was no questioning the illusion, the transport even, that his version of the prelude wrought. It is hard to remember when an audience in Symphony Hall, or in any other theatre or concert-room of this town, when conductor and men themselves, have been so generally, sincerely, deeply stirred. It was as though, of a sudden, the enclosing walls had fallen and stark without was the present anguish of the world—and serene beyond, the consolation.

H. T. P.

SEASON PLANS ... FOR ELLIS ARTI...

Fritz Kreisler, the violinist, one the artists whose United States to are managed by C. A. Ellis of Bost Mass., is scheduled to appear on t concert platform at about the rate once in every two days until early April, 1918. His engagements chiefly in the Middle West and in N England, New York State and Pen sylvania. In the first half of Octo he is playing in cities of Michig Late in the month, he will be in ea ern cities, but will return to Michig Oct. 31, playing in Detroit on t date. Early in November he appea in Chicago, Ill. Thereafter he vis places in Ohio, and makes a seco visit to the East, returning throu Pennsylvania. He will play in easte cities until early in December, wh he will be in Chicago again to m an engagement with the Chicago Sy phony Orchestra. Through the mon of December he is to be chiefly in t Middle West, making one trip Ea He will spend nearly the whole January and February in the East January making a tour with the B ton Symphony Orchestra and in F ruary appearing with the Philh monic Orchestra in New York. T first half of March will find him b on the western circuit, Minneapo being his northernmost city and Louis his southernmost. Late March he will be in the East o more, appearing in orchestral conce in New York and Boston and giv recitals in various places.

Mme. Geraldine Farrar, the sopra another artist whose bookings handled by C. A. Ellis, is to spend entire opera season on duty at Metropolitan Opera House in N York. She gives a few concerts fore that season opens, appearing Pittsfield, Mass., Oct. 22; in Burli ton, Vt., Oct. 24; in Boston, Ma Oct. 28; in Haverhill, Mass., Nov. and in New Bedford, Mass., Nov.

Mme. Melba, the soprano, a t Ellis artsist, is booked to appear Chicago opera performances and i certain number of concerts.

Mr. Paderewski, the pianist, a fo of the distinguished performers wh work is handled by the Boston m ager, is out of the concert field, said, for the winter, having can his engagements in order to atte matters relating to Poland an war.

Advertiser Oct 11

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT TOMORROW

Tomorrow brings the opening of the 37th season of the Symphony Con certs. Tomorrow's concert will b given as usual at 2.30, and the con cert of Saturday evening at 8 o'clock. The program comprises the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven, the "King Lear" Overture of Berlioz, the "Pro metheus" of Franz Liszt, and th Prelude to "Parsifal." The "Prome theus," which is Liszt's Fifth Sym phonic Poem, is being played at th Symphony concerts for the first time.

Post Oct. 11

First Symphony Conc...

Tomorrow (Friday) brings the o...ing of the 37th season of the Sympho... concerts. Tomorrow's concert will ... given as usual at 2.30, and the concer... of Saturday evening at 8 o'clock. Dr... Karl Muck conducting. The programme comprises the Fifth Symphony of Bee... thoven, the "King Lear" overture of ... Berlioz, the "Prometheus" overture of Franz Liszt, and the prelude to "Parsifal." The "Prometheus," which is Liszt's fifth symphonic poem, is being played at the Symphony concerts for the first time.

...ll play T...
...sing it. The Marseillaise and other airs of the Allies will be sung.

As a climax a resolution will be introduced expressing the outraged sentiments of Baltimore against the "Kaiser's own Muck."

Throughout the city yesterday a favorite topic of conversation was Dr. Muck. He is only a little less unpopular with Baltimoreans than his patron, Kaiser Wilhelm.

William A. Pinkerton, one of the most celebrated detectives in the world and the mention of whose name starts an organized retreat in the army of crooks, who is a guest at the Hotel Belvedere, paid his respects to Dr. Muck yesterday afternoon.

"Speaking of Dr. Muck," said Mr. Pinkerton yesterday afternoon in the lobby of the Hotel Belvedere, "if I had my way he would be on his way back to Germany or somewhere else."

When asked where the "somewhere else" was Mr. Pinkerton closed his square-set jaws with a snap and flared up with his old-time fire and said:

"If any American citizen had dared to do in Germany what Dr. Muck has done in this country the German government would have ordered him shot. No American living would have dared to refuse to play the German national ... th in when requested "t... so in G...many ...ved. That' all I have to say about Dr. Muck."

REDUCTION

RATIO

12x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

A4

A5

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

Christian Science Monitor - Oct. 13.

Monitor Oct. 13.

Post Oct. 13

BEETHOVEN WORK OPENS SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA YEAR

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Karl Muck, Conductor—First concert of thirty-seventh season, given in Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass., afternoon of Oct. 12, 1917. The program: Beethoven, symphony in C minor, No. 5; Berlioz, overture to "King Lear"; Liszt, "Prometheus" symphonic poem; Wagner, prelude to "Parsifal."

Everything as usual. The appraisal of German music made by the Boston Symphony public in 1881 and confirmed year after year, remains, as far as outward appearances go, unchanged. Beethoven, whose name is lifted up in gold over the proscenium arch of the hall where the Symphony concerts for 17 seasons have been given, seems to be cherished as fondly as ever. Not in one summer, evidently, does a community revise its views of a country's art work which it has long patronized. Certainly it does not in that time cast them away altogether.

The Friday matinees began as they have begun since the majority of listeners can remember, with a filled house and with lively applause. Here in one of the central seats on the floor sits a man who holds the stub of his twenty-eighth annual ticket. There in the far corner of the second balcony sits another who stood in line from the middle of the forenoon until half-past one o'clock in order to hear the violins attack the opening motive of the symphony; and he has already bought a Saturday night ticket that he may have double enjoyment of the program. The C minor symphony, assuredly, is a great and faultless work.

And yet revaluation must some time come. For acceptance of the piece based on mere cultural enthusiasm cannot last forever. Enthusiasm of this sort prevailed in the United States for the classical Greek literature, in the days of the early democratic society; but it came to an end. There was a time when the American youth felt that if he had the heart, temper and outlook of an Homeric hero, he was liberally bred. But one fine morning he awoke to the hero's deficiencies of character, or perhaps to his own possibilities in an environment more modern than Homer's, and threw his loyalty to the classical culture to the winds. The enthusiasm for the classic German orchestral repertory which musically inclined people in the United States have held for half a century can conceivably be modified, with no more serious upsetting of intellectual foundations than attended the change of feeling about the Greek literary classics. The fifth symphony of Beethoven is unquestionably the finest balanced four-movement orchestral work ever scored, just as the twenty-second book of the "Iliad" is the finest proportioned narrative ever sketched. But deeper than the question of structural beauty lies that of expression.

Among orchestral works, the fifth symphony was perhaps the first one to record that assertiveness which characterized one stream of German musical outpouring all through the Nineteenth Century. The mood of the fourth movement of the symphony is the beginning of that egotistic style of utterance which surprised the world in the orchestral writing of Wagner and caused it to stand amazed in the instrumental confessions of Strauss. Not that the finale of the C minor symphony is at all bumptiously clamant, after the manner of the early portions of the opera, "Siegfried"; not that it has any of the snarling sarcasm of the tone poem, "Zarathustra," or the rough mockery of the rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel"; but it clearly stands in a parental relation to these. It is as far as possible from anything Schubert or Schumann ever said and rather far from anything Brahms ever owned up to either.

A composer easily mistaken for a French counterpart of Beethoven, because of the impetuousness of his talents, but one who after all was primarily a sentimentalist, Berlioz, kept the players on Friday eddying about in a narrow circle of keys with his "King Lear" overture. A composer who taught all modern writers harmonic freedom, Liszt, presented himself in familiar guise in his "Prometheus" symphonic poem, a work held, unaccountably, from the Boston Symphony repertory until now.

MUSIC IN BOSTON

Choral music may be expected to have a significant revival in Boston this season, with the Symphony Orchestra attaching to itself a group of singers and presenting, in three special concerts, the Beethoven ninth symphony, the Mahler second symphony and the Bach "St. Matthew" Passion. For a long time persons who have regretted the decline of choral singing in the city have looked on the Symphony Orchestra as a reliance for saving the situation. They had high hopes for a good outcome when Mr. Fiedler, as conductor of the orchestra, made an alliance with the Cecilia Society and undertook some choral programs. But their expectations were disappointed. The venture was very nearly an artistic breakdown, because, so good authorities said, the members of the chorus were inert and unresponsive toward their rehearsal duties. A better prospect seems to attend the enterprise on which Dr. Muck is embarking, since the chorus that will assist him is of recent organization and since it has nothing to swerve it from the main task of getting up the three programs.

The concerts will be given on Tuesday evenings as follows: Nov. 20, Beethoven's ninth symphony, with Mmes. Hempel and Keyes and Messrs. Hackett and Middleton as the soloists; Jan. 22, the Mahler second symphony; March 26, the Bach "St. Matthew" Passion.

The chorus for these performances is to consist of more than 300 voices. A schedule of rehearsals was presented to every singer who was invited to join, so there would be no doubt as to what was to be required in the way of preparation. Stephen Townsend, the trainer of the chorus, is holding practice for the women at Jacob Sleeper Hall on Wednesday afternoons and for the men at the same place early Wednesday evenings.

Tickets for the three concerts are to be sold on the subscription plan. They may be engaged before the sales open by mail order at Symphony Hall.

GREAT CHORUS FORMED TO SING WITH SYMPHONY

Herald Oct 11

Dr. Muck Announces Dates of Choral Works—Notes of Music World

By J. V. Clark

One of the most important effects of the European war on musical Boston has been the formation of a chorus of 375 voices to give important choral works with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

One of the chief regrets of Dr. Muck's Boston engagements has been that it has been impossible for him to give choral works here, owing to the lack of a proper chorus. In 1914 arrangements were made with the famous Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto to come to Boston in 1915 for concerts with the Boston orchestra. The war changed all those plans.

Last winter the success of the chorus of women's voices in Liszt's "Dante Symphony" brought the suggestion from Stephen Townsend, who trained the chorus, that he establish a permanent chorus in Boston to work in connection with the Symphony. This plan was agreed to and this summer 400 singers, professional, non-professional and amateur, have been working long and hard.

Wednesday afternoons during the summer the women have been coached at Boston University. Wednesday evenings the men have had their vocal training. The chorus, now 375, will be turned over to Dr. Muck for final training.

At the first concert of choral music, Nov. 20, the chief work will be Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The second concert, Jan. 22, will be made up of the Mahler Second Symphony. At the third concert in Holy Week, "The Passion According to St. Matthew" will be sung. Dr. Muck will conduct these concerts.

The soloists at the first concert will be Frieda Hempel, soprano; Margaret Keyes, contralto; Arthur Hackett, tenor, and Arthur Middleton, bass. The soloists for the last two concerts have not as yet been announced. These three concerts will undoubtedly be among the most interesting musical events of the season in Boston.

Between making "The Woman God Forgot" for the movies and opening her opera season's work in New York, Nov. 5, Miss Farrar is collecting a few extra dollars concertizing in the smaller New England cities. On Nov. 28 she sings at Symphony Hall with the Symphony Orchestra for the benefit of the Symphony's Pension Fund. This will be her only Boston appearance this year. Every seat should always be sold at every Pension Fund concert.

MUCK OPENS SEASON OF SYMPHONY

Master of Conductors Cordially Greeted at Concert

BY OLIN DOWNES

The first concert of the 1917-18 season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Contrary to irresponsible gossip and rumor, Dr. Muck was in his accustomed place at the accustomed hour. At 2:30 the bell rang for the closing of the doors of the auditorium, and the conductor stepped on the stage, a little graver, as it seemed, and not less distinguished in his bearing than in previous years.

The audience greeted Dr. Muck cordially.

GRANDEUR OF BEETHOVEN

The programme consisted of Beethoven's fifth symphony, Berlioz's "King Lear" overture, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Prometheus," performed for the first time at these concerts, and Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal." The last three movements of the symphony were particularly impressive to the writer, as Dr. Muck conducted them on this occasion. Seldom within memory have the slow movement and the finale of this symphony had such a profoundly emotional quality as they had yesterday.

There are days when, looking at the cold print of the slow movement and this same finale of one of the greatest orchestral compositions of all time, the reader chills with the realization that time is passing, even for this marvel of music, and that the musical idioms of 1807, surcharged as they are with the loftiest possible inspiration, are becoming, alas, old-fashioned. That is the cold truth.

Made Eloquent by Dr. Muck

But the warm reality of Dr. Muck's reading yesterday made one only aware of a single thing, the surpassing vitality and eloquence of every note that Beethoven put down. It is true, without doubt, that the language of music changes its forms more rapidly than that of any other art, but it is also true that in few arts is the spirit so important and the letter so unimportant a thing. An insignificant piece in the hands of a master may mean more than a great composition in the hands of a mediocrity.

Dr. Muck always responds to the grandeur of the fifth symphony. Yesterday he defied the passage of a hundred years with it.

Berlioz Feverish Spirit

Berlioz, enamoured of Camille Moke—the tale is one of the best that he tells in his memoirs—left Rome, where he was reaping the benefit of the grand prize offered by the Conservatoire for a deserving composition, disguised himself as a lady's maid, and taking with him laudanum, strychnine, and two revolvers, set out for Paris to kill his false one. On his way he fell or threw himself into the sea, was fished out, considerably cooled off, stopped at Florence and composed the "King Lear" overture. He read Shakspere's tragedy in a laurel grove on the banks of the Arno and rolled in the grass in his enthusiasm. He composed the overture in feverish haste. The sketches were complete in a month's time. Such was the spirit of the '30s!

This spirit of course flames in the [illegible]erly [illegible]or, [illegible]nd [illegible]m-[illegible]ess [illegible]at the same time such an appalling ability to thunder forth platitudes of the vintage of half a century, as Berlioz.

In Dramatic Fury

Alternating with the opening theme that must have been written with the thought of Lear, in his majesty and his towering wrath, astray on the heath, and with passages that blaze with feeling, are such commonplace progressions as a student would be scolded for today. We mention this as a curiosity rather than as an indication of the value of the overture. We can all be students, but we cannot all be Berlioz! The brilliancy of his instrumentation, the dramatic fury of his spirit, the dauntless will to express that which obsesses him, and that give rise to new musical shapes which did not exist before—these belong to genius.

Liszt's "Prometheus"

The romantic composers of the '30s certainly did take themselves seriously! There is Liszt's "Prometheus," less vital, in essence, than Berlioz's overture, but with a much more mature technic of composition and orchestration back of it. But how relentlessly Liszt will work certain musical formulas, certain chords, such as the "diminished 7th," and certain sequences which so intoxicate him by their sheer sound that he has apparently no means of realizing how empty and extravagant they are! It was a disease common in that time, from which even Wagner, the greatest of these three men, did not escape.

But yesterday, under Dr. Muck's guiding and sympathetic hand, all this music absorbed the hearer. A sudden flaunting of Italianism amid the thunders of "Prometheus," a glaring passage of bombast and bravado in the "King Lear" overture—with it all, they were men of genius, in dead earnest, and there is all the difference between their thunder machines and the petty imitations of them by second-rate composers of today that there is between the Paris of the American tourist and the Paris apotheosized by Honore de Balzac.

American Oct-14

LARGE AUDIENCES GREET SYMPHONY

Enthusiasm Marks Opening of 37th Season of Boston's Famous Orchestra.

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

Impressive proof of the enthusiasm and liberality of Boston music-lovers marked the opening of the thirty-seventh Symphony season Friday. Never before in the history of the peerless orchestra were so many persons left standing in line outside Symphony Hall when the last of the "rush" seats had been sold. Nor were Dr. Karl Muck and the men of the orchestra ever given a more cordial greeting.

If any doubts regarding the effect of the war upon the prestige or popularity of the orchestra had cropped up, they were swept aside brusquely by the customary generous appreciation of an audience that occupied every seat in Symphony Hall. It was as if musicians and auditors had been transported to another world, free from everything but regard for musical art, which, in its best estate—as at these Symphony concerts, for instance—is truly catholic and cosmopolitan.

PROGRAM PRAISED.

But aside from the opportunity afforded to testify at the season's outset to the undiminished regard for the organization which has kept Boston among the art centres of the world, there was uncommon interest in this first program, chiefly on account of the Fifth Beethoven Symphony, one of the masterpieces of the Prometheus of Bonn. The performance of this work alone would make these opening Symphony concerts one of the memorable events of the new season. It was a performance altogether Olympian in character. It revealed in full the unrivalled brilliancy of the hundred players and the eminently poetic quality of Dr. Muck's readings

PLAYERS RESPOND.

Equally beautiful was the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal." In these two numbers the tonal and technical graces of the orchestra and the interpretative power of the conductor reach their zenith. An ovation rewarded the performance of the symphony, the audience applauding until the whole orchestra stood up.

Berlioz's overture to "King Lear" was revived, Friday, after having been shelved for many years. Liszt's "Prometheus," a symphonic poem now on a Symphony program for the first time, sounded only indifferently well between Beethoven and Wagner.

Herald Oct-11

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Tomorrow brings the opening of the 37th season of the Symphony concerts, which are to be given as usual at 2:30 and 8 o'clock. The program includes the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven, the "King Lear" Overture of Berlioz; the "Prometheus" of Franz Liszt and the Prelude to "Parsifal." The "Prometheus," Liszt's Fifth Symphonic Poem, is being played at the Symphony concerts for the first time.

Christian Science Monitor Oct. 13.

BEETHOVEN WORK OPENS SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA YEAR

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Karl Muck, Conductor—First concert of thirty-seventh season, given in Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass., afternoon of Oct. 12, 1917. The program: Beethoven, symphony in C minor, No. 5; Berlioz, overture to "King Lear"; Liszt, "Prometheus" symphonic poem; Wagner, prelude to "Parsifal."

Everything as usual. The appraisal of German music made by the Boston Symphony public in 1881 and confirmed year after year, remains, as far as outward appearances go, unchanged. Beethoven, whose name is lifted up in gold over the proscenium arch of the hall where the Symphony concerts for 17 seasons have been given, seems to be cherished as fondly as ever. Not in one summer, evidently, does a community revise its views of a country's art work which it has long patronized. Certainly it does not in that time cast them away altogether.

The Friday matinees began as they have begun since the majority of listeners can remember, with a filled house and with lively applause. Here in one of the central seats on the floor sits a man who holds the stub of his twenty-eighth annual ticket. There in the far corner of the second balcony sits another who stood in line from the middle of the forenoon until half-past one o'clock in order to hear the violins attack the opening motive of the symphony; and he has already bought a Saturday night ticket that he may have double enjoyment of the program. The C minor symphony, assuredly, is a great and faultless work.

And yet revaluation must some time come. For acceptance of the piece based on mere cultural enthusiasm cannot last forever. Enthusiasm of this sort prevailed in the United States for the classical Greek literature, in the days of the early democratic society; but it came to an end. There was a time when the American youth felt that if he had the heart, temper and outlook of an Homeric hero, he was liberally bred. But one fine morning he awoke to the hero's deficiencies of character, or perhaps to his own possibilities in an environment more modern than Homer's, and threw his loyalty to the classical culture to the winds. The enthusiasm for the classic German orchestral repertory which musically inclined people in the United States have held for half a century can conceivably be modified, with no more serious upsetting of intellectual foundations than attended the change of feeling about the Greek literary classics. The fifth symphony of Beethoven is unquestionably the finest balanced four-movement orchestral work ever scored, just as the twenty-second book of the "Iliad" is the finest proportioned narrative ever sketched. But deeper than the question of structural beauty lies that of expression.

Among orchestral works, the fifth symphony was perhaps the first one to record that assertiveness which characterized one stream of German musical outpouring all through the Nineteenth Century. The mood of the fourth movement of the symphony is the beginning of that egotistic style of utterance which surprised the world in the orchestral writing of Wagner and caused it to stand amazed in the instrumental confessions of Strauss. Not that the finale of the C minor symphony is at all bumptiously clamant, after the manner of the early portions of the opera, "Siegfried"; not that it has any of the snarling sarcasm of the tone poem, "Zarathustra," or the rough mockery of the rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel"; but it clearly stands in a parental relation to these. It is as far as possible from anything Schubert or Schumann ever said and rather far from anything Brahms ever owned up to either.

A composer easily mistaken for a French counterpart of Beethoven, because of the impetuousness of his talents, but one who after all was primarily a sentimentalist, Berlioz, kept the players on Friday eddying about in a narrow circle of keys with his "King Lear" overture. A composer who taught all modern writers harmonic freedom, Liszt, presented himself in familiar guise in his "Prometheus" symphonic poem, a work held, unaccountably, from the Boston Symphony repertory until now.

Liszt's "Prometheus"

The romantic composers of the '30s certainly did take themselves seriously! There is Liszt's "Prometheus," less vital, in essence, than Berlioz's overture, but with a much more mature technic of composition and orchestration back of it. But how relentlessly Liszt will work certain musical formulas, certain chords, such as the "diminished 7th," and certain sequences which so intoxicate him by their sheer sound that he has apparently no means of realizing how empty and extravagant they are! It was a disease common in that time, from which even Wagner, the greatest of these three men, did not escape.

But yesterday, under Dr. Muck's guiding and sympathetic hand, all this music absorbed the hearer. A sudden flaunting of Italianism amid the thunders of "Prometheus," a glaring passage of bombast and bravado in the "King Lear" overture—with it all, they were men of genius, in dead earnest, and there is all the difference between their thunder machines and the petty imitations of them by second-rate composers of today that there is between the Paris of the American tourist and the Paris apotheosized by Honore de Balzac.

MUSIC IN BOSTON

Choral music may be expected to have a significant revival in Boston this season, with the Symphony Orchestra attaching to itself a group of singers and presenting, in three special concerts, the Beethoven ninth symphony, the Mahler second symphony and the Bach "St. Matthew" Passion. For a long time persons who have regretted the decline of choral singing in the city have looked on the Symphony Orchestra as a reliance for saving the situation. They had high hopes for a good outcome when Mr. Fiedler, as conductor of the orchestra, made an alliance with the Cecilia Society and undertook some choral programs. But their expectations were disappointed. The venture was very nearly an artistic breakdown, because, so good authorities said, the members of the chorus were inert and unresponsive toward their rehearsal duties. A better prospect seems to attend the enterprise on which Dr. Muck is embarking, since the chorus that will assist him is of recent organization and since it has nothing to swerve it from the main task of getting up the three programs.

The concerts will be given on Tuesday evenings as follows: Nov. 20, Beethoven's ninth symphony, with Mmes. Hempel and Keyes and Messrs. Hackett and Middleton as the soloists; Jan. 22, the Mahler second symphony; March 26, the Bach "St. Matthew" Passion.

The chorus for these performances is to consist of more than 300 voices. A schedule of rehearsals was presented to every singer who was invited to join, so there would be no doubt as to what was to be required in the way of preparation. Stephen Townsend, the trainer of the chorus, is holding practice for the women at Jacob Sleeper Hall on Wednesday afternoons and for the men at the same place early Wednesday evenings.

Tickets for the three concerts are to be sold on the subscription plan. They may be engaged before the sales open by mail order at Symphony Hall.

GREAT CHORUS FORMED TO SING WITH SYMPHONY

Herald Oct 11

Dr. Muck Announces Dates of Choral Works—Notes of Music World

By J. V. Clark

One of the most important effects of the European war on musical Boston has been the formation of a chorus of 375 voices to give important choral works with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

One of the chief regrets of Dr. Muck's Boston engagements has been that it has been impossible for him to give choral works here, owing to the lack of a proper chorus. In 1914 arrangements were made with the famous Mendelssohn Choir of Toronto to come to Boston in 1915 for concerts with the Boston orchestra. The war changed all those plans.

Last winter the success of the chorus of women's voices in Liszt's "Dante Symphony" brought the suggestion from Stephen Townsend, who trained the chorus, that he establish a permanent chorus in Boston to work in connection with the Symphony. This plan was agreed to and this summer 400 singers were enrolled. Mr. Townsend has since been in charge of the training. The chorus, now 375, will be turned over to Dr. Muck for final training.

es Proposition is Effort to on Subject

At the first concert of choral music, Nov. 20, the chief work will be Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The second concert, Jan. 22, will be made up of the Mahler Second Symphony. At the third concert in Holy Week, "The Passion According to St. Matthew" will be sung. Dr. Muck will conduct these concerts.

The soloists at the first concert will be Frieda Hempel, soprano; Margaret Keyes, contralto; Arthur Hackett, tenor, and Arthur Middleton, bass. The soloists for the last two concerts have not as yet been announced. These three concerts will undoubtedly be among the most interesting musical events of the season in Boston.

Between making "The Woman God Forgot" for the movies and opening her opera season's work in New York, Nov. 5, Miss Farrar is collecting a few extra dollars concertizing in the smaller New England cities. On Nov. 28

Post Oct 13

MUCK OPENS SEASON OF SYMPHONY

Master of Conductors Cordially Greeted at Concert

BY OLIN DOWNES

The first concert of the 1917-18 season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Karl Muck conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Contrary to irresponsible gossip and rumor, Dr. Muck was in his accustomed place at the accustomed hour. At 2:30 the bell rang for the closing of the doors of the auditorium, and the conductor stepped on the stage, a little graver, as it seemed, and not less distinguished in his bearing than in previous years.

The audience greeted Dr. Muck cordially.

GRANDEUR OF BEETHOVEN

The programme consisted of Beethoven's fifth symphony, Berlioz's "King Lear" overture, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Prometheus," performed for the first time at these concerts, and Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal." The last three movements of the symphony were particularly impressive to the writer, as Dr. Muck conducted them on this occasion. Seldom within memory have the slow movement and the finale of this symphony had such a profoundly emotional quality as they had yesterday.

There are days when, looking at the cold print of the slow movement and this same finale of one of the greatest orchestral compositions of all time, the reader chills with the realization that time is passing, even for this marvel of music, and that the musical idioms of 1807, surcharged as they are with the loftiest possible inspiration, are becoming, alas, old-fashioned. That is the cold truth.

Made Eloquent by Dr. Muck

But the warm reality of Dr. Muck's reading yesterday made one only aware of a single thing, the surpassing vitality and eloquence of every note that Beethoven put down. It is true, without doubt, that the language of music changes its forms more rapidly than that of any other art, but it is also true that in few arts is the spirit so important and the letter so unimportant a thing. An insignificant piece in the hands of a master may mean more than a great composition in the hands of a mediocrity.

Dr. Muck always responds to the grandeur of the fifth symphony. Yesterday he defied the passage of a hundred years with it.

Berlioz Feverish Spirit

Berlioz, enamoured of Camille Moke—the tale is one of the best that he tells in his memoirs—left Rome, where he was reaping the benefit of the grand prize offered by the Conservatoire for a deserving composition, disguised himself as a lady's maid, and taking with him laudanum, strychnine, and two revolvers, set out for Paris to kill his false one. On his way he fell or threw himself into the sea, was fished out, considerably cooled off, stopped at Florence and composed the "King Lear" overture. He read Shakspere's tragedy in a laurel grove on the banks of the Arno and rolled in the grass in his enthusiasm. He composed the overture in feverish haste. The sketches were complete in a month's time. Such was the spirit of the '30s!

This spirit, of course, flames in the "King Lear" overture, and this overture appears to be distinguished equally by its enthusiasm and dramatic fervor, and its extraordinary solecisms and lack of a sense of humor! Few composers had the consuming consciousness of this epoch in such a degree, and at the same time such an appalling ability to thunder forth platitudes of the vintage of half a century, as Berlioz.

In Dramatic Fury

Alternating with the opening theme that must have been written with the thought of Lear, in his majesty and his towering wrath, astray on the heath, and with passages that blaze with feeling, are such commonplace progressions as a student would be scolded for today. We mention this as a curiosity rather than as an indication of the value of the overture. We can all be students, but we cannot all be Berlioz! The brilliancy of his instrumentation, the dramatic fury of his spirit, the dauntless will to express that which obsesses him, and that give rise to new musical shapes which did not exist before—these belong to genius.

American Oct-14

LARGE AUDIENCES GREET SYMPHONY

Enthusiasm Marks Opening of 37th Season of Boston's Famous Orchestra.

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

Impressive proof of the enthusiasm and liberality of Boston music-lovers marked the opening of the thirty-seventh Symphony season Friday. Never before in the history of the peerless orchestra were so many persons left standing in line outside Symphony Hall when the last of the "rush" seats had been sold. Nor were Dr. Karl Muck and the men of the orchestra ever given a more cordial greeting.

If any doubts regarding the effect of the war upon the prestige or popularity of the orchestra had cropped up, they were swept aside brusquely by the customary generous appreciation of an audience that occupied every seat in Symphony Hall. It was as if musicians and auditors had been transported to another world, free from everything but regard for musical art, which, in its best estate—as at these Symphony concerts, for instance—is truly catholic and cosmopolitan.

PROGRAM PRAISED.

But aside from the opportunity afforded to testify at the season's outset to the undiminished regard for the organization which has kept Boston among the art centres of the world, there was uncommon interest in this first program, chiefly on account of the Fifth Beethoven Symphony, one of the masterpieces of the Prometheus of Bonn. The performance of this work alone would make these opening Symphony concerts one of the memorable events of the new season. It was a performance altogether Olympian in character. It revealed in full the unrivalled brilliancy of the hundred players and the eminently poetic quality of Dr. Muck's readings

PLAYERS RESPOND.

Equally beautiful was the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal." In these two numbers the tonal and technical graces of the orchestra and the interpretative power of the conductor reach their zenith. An ovation rewarded the performance of the symphony, the audience applauding until the whole orchestra stood up.

Berlioz's overture to "King Lear" was revived, Friday, after having been shelved for many years. Liszt's "Prometheus," a symphonic poem now on a Symphony program for the first time, sounded only indifferently well between Beethoven and Wagner.

Herald Oct-11

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Tomorrow brings the opening of the 37th season of the Symphony concerts, which are to be given as usual at 2:30 and 8 o'clock. The program includes the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven, the "King Lear" Overture of Berlioz; the "Prometheus" of Franz Liszt and the Prelude to "Parsifal." The "Prometheus," Liszt's Fifth Symphonic Poem, is being played at the Symphony concerts for the first time.

Transcript Oct-11

THREE CHORAL CONCERTS UNDER DR. MUCK

Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, Mahler's Second Symphony and Bach's Matthew Passion Music with a Choir of Three Hundred and More Voices—Mr. Townsend's Share—Skriabin from the Symphony Orchestra—Mr. McCormack's and Mr. Kreisler's Programmes—Items, Incidents, Opinions

At last the end is crowning the work and Dr. Muck's long cherished desire for a choir with which he might undertake choral music of large dimensions is maturing into actual accomplishment. The smaller but notably diligent and efficient choir which Mr. Stephen Townsend provided him for the choral close of Liszt's "Faust Symphony" and for incidental choral passages in other symphonic music prepared the way for the larger undertaking. Mr. Townsend believed it possible to assemble a chorus of at least three hundred voices—professional, semi-professional and amateur—of like quality in tone, intelligence with music and assiduity at rehearsal. Last spring he set about the gathering and the organization of such a body. Before the summer ended he had found, chosen and coördinated three hundred and seventy-five fit singers and pledged them to attend the longest and most arduous series of rehearsals that a chorus in Boston has lately undergone. This choir, divided into first and second sopranos, first and second tenors, altos and basses, is now at work under the guidance of Mr. Townsend, is keeping faithfully to the scheduled rehearsals and promises to remain as numerous and diligent throughout the winter. In each of the three pieces which Dr. Muck has in view, Mr. Townsend will school the singers and then, as the time for performance draws near, deliver them to the finishing hand of Dr. Muck.

These three pieces are the Choral Symphony of Beethoven to be heard at a special concert on Tuesday evening, Nov. 20, in Symphony Hall; Mahler's second symphony, appointed for a second special concert, on Tuesday evening, Jan. 22; and Bach's Passion Music According to Matthew, announced for the third special concert on Tuesday evening, March 26, within Holy Week. At all three concerts, needless almost to say, the orchestra will be the Symphony Orchestra. Never before on this side of the Atlantic has Dr. Muck conducted in Beethoven's symphony. Mahler's massive symphony, written for full orchestra, full chorus and solo voices, has hitherto been heard but once in America at a concert of the Philharmonic Society in New York. The Passion Music speaks for itself as a masterpiece of choral music and as a rite of the concert-room. The "assisting artists" for each concert will as nearly as possible match chorus and orchestra in fitness for the work in hand. As yet they have been chosen only for the performance of the Choral Symphony—Mmes. Hempel and Keyes and Messrs. Hackett and Middleton. Since the palmiest days of Mr. Lang with the Cecilia no choral concerts of such interest have been undertaken in Boston; while within even longer memory none have promised such measure of pleasure.

Programmes in Prospect

